[illegible] on could [illegible]

[illegible] it worth [illegible]

[illegible] of paper and write a [illegible] it worth $5,00

that's capital. [illegible] ounce and a qua[illegible]

[illegible] stamp [illegible] "eagle [illegible]" on [illegible] $2[illegible].-- th[illegible]

A mechani[illegible] worth [illegible]

$1,0[illegible].-- [illegible]

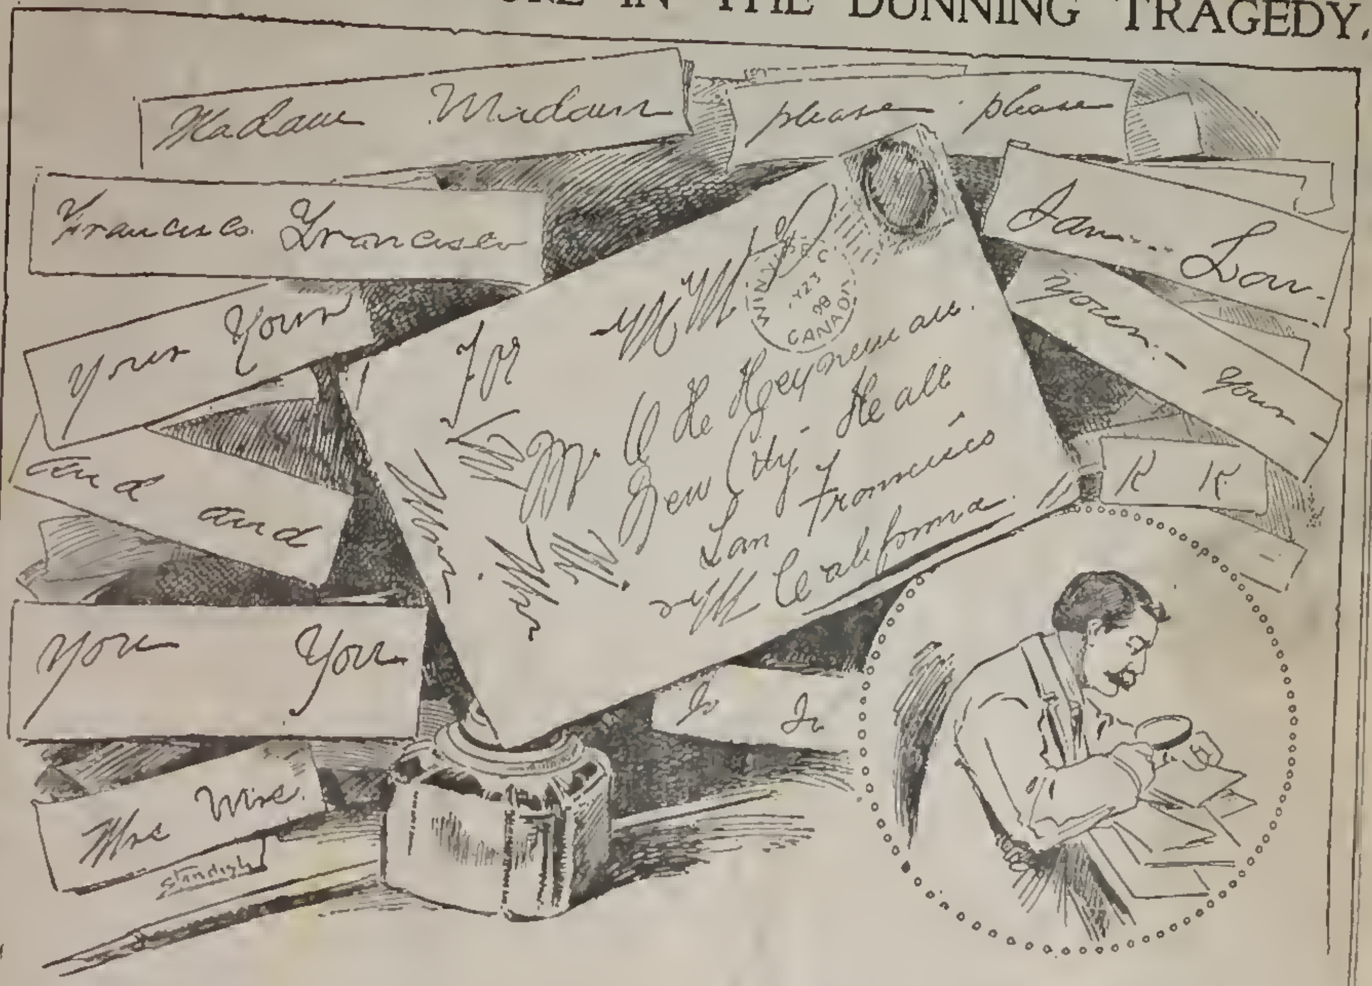
sell it for [illegible]

[illegible]

Digitized by the Internet Archive
in 2013

http://archive.org/details/theodorekytkascr318981900kytk_0

HANDWRITING WILL CUT AN IMPORTANT FIGURE IN THE DUNNING TRAGEDY.



ONE OF THE strong features of the police case against Mrs. Botkin is that furnished by Theodore Kytka, the handwriting expert, whose report to Chief Lees deals with some 30 instances of similarity between the prisoner's known chirography and the writing of the anonymous letter, the "Mrs. C." note and the address on the candy box.

When Kytka was set to work making comparisons he was given the letter written by Mrs. Botkin to her landlady, Mrs. B. Price of the Hotel Victoria, several orders for changes of postoffice address bearing samples of the accused woman's handwriting and an envelope on which she had scribbled while trying a pen. The last-named sample was secured when Mrs. Botkin was about to sign the statement which she made to Chief Lees. She desired to try the pen, and Otto Hesterman, stenographer for the Chief, handed her a letter from his pocket. She wrote a few disconnected words on the face of the envelope, and this was at once turned over to the handwriting expert. The disputed writings were four in number—two anonymous letters, one written with a pencil and the other with a pen, the wrapper on the package sent to Dover, and the note within the box of poisoned candy.

It was first established that the writer of the anonymous letters sent the candy. This was an easy task, as the addresses on the envelopes and on the wrapper were in the same hand. Then, according to the report made to Chief Lees, all the disputed writings were subjected to minute comparisons with admitted writings of Mrs. Botkin.

One of the first striking features shown is that in all the writings, both admitted and disputed, every small "d" lacks connection with the letter preceding. Again, in all the writings the letters following the small "b" are always higher, having an upward slant. The light down strokes in the Price letter are also found in the anonymous letters and in the address on the package. Mrs. Botkin has a peculiar way of making the small letter "e." In the disputed writings there are several instances of the "e" having been made first in Mrs. Botkin's natural way and then written over in an attempt to conceal the first formation of the letter. Whenever Mrs. Botkin makes the small letter "l" it is of the same size as the preceding letter. This peculiarity is found in the disputed writings.

The most successful attempt at disguise was the note inclosed in the box of candy, but even that is betrayed by a mannerism. The "C" in the signature is inclosed in quotation marks. In the Price letter there is the same thing, the name Price being quoted without reason.

When writing to Mrs. Price the accused woman placed the date of the year thus: 1-98. In one of the anonymous letters it is plain that 1897 was first written 1-97 and the figure eight was afterward written over the dash. As to the word "Francisco," in both the admitted and disputed writings, the "r" and "a" are separated, as are also the "n" and "c." Then, again, the "cls" are larger than the other small letters. The small letter "k" and the capital "F" in the disputed writings cannot be mistaken. The prisoner has a habit of placing dashes after words in addresses and in the middle of sentences is a peculiarity noted in the disputed writings.

Kytka's report includes all the minor points of resemblance, for he points out that the envelope of the Price letter and the two anonymous letters are exactly the same and that all three show Mrs. Botkin's habit of beginning a superscription very near the left-hand side of the envelope.

A few of the letters written by Mrs. Botkin to John P. Dunning while he was in the West Indies as a war correspondent are now on their way to Chief Lees, and when they arrive they will also be compared with the disputed writings.

In the comparisons illustrated above first word or letter of each pair is from Mrs. Botkin's writing and the second is from the writings in dispute.

MRS. CRAVEN COMES BACK.

SEPTEMBER 23, 1898.

Announces Her Intention to Renew the Fight.

SHE HAS A SECRET UP HER SLEEVE.

NEW LAWYERS FROM THE EAST AND PLENTY OF MONEY NOW.

The Lady of the Fair Case Promises a Merry War in the Courts and Evidence Entirely New.

A number of well-meaning but busy attorneys at law will be pained to learn that Mrs. Nettie R. Craven of Fair will fame is back in San Francisco. Mrs. Craven has come with colors flying and with trunks crowded with handsome gowns—gifts of her daughter and son-in-law. She has taken permanent apartments at the Palace Hotel, her old lawyers have rallied around her, and in addition new talent will be imported from the East. Her attorney of record will be Max Koehler, a brother of her son-in-law and a prominent St. Louis attorney. Mrs. Craven expects that Judge Curtis and D. M. Delmas will still be among her legal defenders, neither of them having withdrawn from the case.

Mrs. Craven looks much as she did when last here, though she is somewhat thinner. She has almost entirely recovered her health since she left here last February. She has not been idle since, but has been collecting evidence and getting ready to begin her fight all over again. She has come back as she said she would, partly in anticipation of the Cooney trial, which is set for Monday, and partly to defend herself against the aspersions that were cast upon her during the Fair case.

Mrs. Craven was seen last night in her apartments at the Palace. "I have come back," she said, with sparkling eyes—that is, with blood in her eye—"prepared to do battle. I don't need the money now, but I want to show them that I am not afraid, and that the things they said about me were not true. I am going to be the plaintiff now. I was the defendant before, and at a disadvantage, but I haven't been idle while I have been away. I have been at my mother's house in Iowa, where I had eleven trunks full of papers. I have spent days going through these and I have found some very important documents. I have a big surprise up my sleeve. I am dying to tell it, for it is hard for me to keep a secret, but I must not. That was why my son-in-law wanted his brother to come with me. They did not want me to come alone for fear I would say more than I should, but at the last moment Mrs. Max Koehler was taken ill, and, after postponing my trip once, I started, for I wanted to be here in case Mr. Cooney should want me. I never deserted a friend in distress yet.

"This time I am going to bring some actions myself, and they will not be confined to those two pieces of property in litigation before, from which it may be inferred that Mrs. Craven is about to open fire all along the line.

"I don't want the money, but I want my rights," she continued. "If I win I shall give most of my money away, and, anyway, I have no need of money now. My daughter and son-in-law will be here as soon as my daughter is well enough to travel and Mr. Koehler can get away. They are going to buy a place here and spend part of each year here. I shall probably remain in their San Francisco home [illegible] I am [illegible] attached to San Francisco, though I have no relatives here. My son-in-law is as much interested in my [illegible] as I am, and it has always been his wish that I [illegible] and fight it out. I was always good to the Fair children, but [illegible] Every one has treated me so badly I feel I have lost all sympathy. Not a foot of the Fair property can be sold until my claims are settled. [illegible] the other day a man [illegible] to buy the [illegible] street property [illegible] said [illegible] he would buy it [illegible] I told him I was still fighting. He said that Judge Slack's decision could [illegible] change the record and that there would be no clear title unless I [illegible] the papers.

"My return must have been a great surprise to some of the attorneys on the other side. I met one of them on the street [illegible] day and [illegible] started as if he had seen a ghost. I met Judge Slack and he looked [illegible] frightened.

"Nobody ever dared to say anything about me before this thing happened. The worst that was ever said [illegible] was that I was a politician. They called me that because I had a habit of getting what I wanted [illegible] here. [illegible] my family did [illegible] my daughter and Mr. Koehler have done everything in the world to make me happy, and I have been happy.

"I didn't care at all [illegible] books of [illegible] they [illegible] about [illegible] though they were [illegible] as the grocery book [illegible] [illegible]"

"As for the Koehlers, my daughter has a beautiful home. She is a [illegible] of hospitals and is busy doing things for others. She is a very lucky girl, and the cares of a household, where she is the mistress of five servants, sit lightly upon her. Her husband adores her, and they have a baby daughter three months old. The baby is named Dorothy May and is the most beautiful child I have ever seen. It has wonderful violet eyes, and we think it a most remarkable baby. The Koehlers have a yacht and travel a great deal. They are planning for a trip around the world. Margaret's lines have fallen in pleasant places, and my home will always be with them, but first I must have my rights in this matter and be justified before the world. Then I can settle down and be happy."

FAIR WILL CONTEST.

The Way Paved for a Trial of the Case.

The way was paved yesterday for a trial of Charles L. Fair's famous contest of the trust will of his father, James G. Fair. Judge Troutt made an order overruling all demurrers to the contest and denying a motion that certain pleadings be made more definite. This proceeding was virtually by consent, and in the same manner the contest was set for trial on December 5th. The complaint against the trust provisions of the will has already been determined in another suit, now on appeal to the Supreme Court.

Judge Slack declared the trust void, and, should that decision be sustained, it is not probable that much vigor will be put in the pending contest. In all respects other than the trust provision the will is satisfactory to the contestants.

POLICE NET FOR FORGERS

New Witnesses Found in the Becker-Cregan Case.

PROSECUTION READY FOR A SECOND TRIAL.

FOUR OUTSIDERS WILL CORROBORATE THE ACCOMPLICES' EVIDENCE.

Photographs of the $22,000 Check Show Chemical Changes That Make the Forgery Plain.

Four new witnesses in the Becker-Cregan forgery case have been found by the police in anticipation of the second trial, which is set for Monday next in Judge Cook's court. Their names are being kept from publicity by Chief Lees, but the testimony they have to give is most important, as it will corroborate that given at the first trial by Joseph McCluskey and Frank Dean, the accomplices of Becker and Cregan in forging the $22,000 check on the Crocker-Woolworth Bank on December 18, 1895.

It was for lack of testimony corroborative of that given by McCluskey and Dean that the Supreme Court reversed the Superior Court judgment which convicted Charles Becker and James Cregan of the gigantic bank forgery.

Another strong and new feature of the case against the forgers, which Chief Lees will present at the approaching trial, is found on the face of the check itself. Enlarged photographs of the slip of paper were completed yesterday by Theodore Kytka, a handwriting expert. They show that an interesting chemical change has taken place in the writing on the forged check. As a result no expert testimony will be necessary this time to convince a jury that it was raised from $12 to $22,000 by the skillful forgers before Frank Dean placed it on deposit in the Nevada Bank.

In Expert Kytka's photographs of the original letters and figures on the check are a dead black in color, while the changes made in raising its denomination are in a bluish tint.

It appears that the forgers, instead of using ink, imitated the ink used in writing out the original check by a watercolor paint of their own manufacture. This was laid on with a delicate brush wherever required. So true was the imitation that it could not be detected by the bank officials who handled the check, and even at the trial of Becker and Cregan the handwriting experts had to use [illegible] in their endeavors to demonstrate to the jury that the check had been raised. Since then the blue tint, by reason of chemical changes, has faded completely out of the ink. On the other hand, the aniline ink has retained its original blueness, making a striking contrast with the blackness of the letters and figures which were not tampered with by the forgers.

Subpoenas for all the witnesses on behalf of the prosecution have been issued within the past few days. No trouble will be experienced in having the two most direct witnesses on hand. Frank Dean is in the City Prison. Joseph McCluskey has been located in New York city, where he is living [illegible] and is ready to come West whenever required. To further insure a [illegible] and conviction of Becker and Cregan, ex-Judge Murphy has been retained as special prosecutor in the case.

MRS. BOTKIN'S MOMENT IN THE COURT.

The Prisoner's Way Blocked by an Inquisitive Throng.

Her Habeas Corpus Hearing Continued Two Weeks by Consent.

CHIEF LEES CONFIDENT.

SEPTEMBER 20, 1898.

He Proposes to Mandamus Governor Budd as a Federal Agent.

Mrs. Cordelia Botkin got out of the City Prison yesterday just long enough to walk up stairs to Judge Cook's courtroom and down again.

She was accompanied by Captain Seymour and another detective, and she made the journey to the courtroom in anticipation of a habeas corpus hearing and resultant freedom. Before she reached the court, however, the hearing had been postponed for two weeks and her prospect of immediate freedom had vanished.

The courtroom was crowded, on the main floor and in the gallery, and there were thirty or forty women in the throng. At 10 o'clock the Botkin case was called by Judge Cook, and there was disappointment when it was learned that the defendant's presence would not be required.

"The defense moves a continuance for two weeks at least," said Attorney McGowan, appearing with Attorney Wheeler, when the case was taken up. "We ask the continuance by consent of counsel," he continued, "and we expressly waive the presence of the petitioner in court at this time."

"Two weeks," repeated Judge Cook. "That will bring it right into the middle of the Figel case."

"Then we can set a new day, if necessary," suggested Mr. McGowan.

"Very well, Monday, October 3d, by consent," responded His Honor. "In the meantime the prisoner is remanded to her present custody, to be returned here at the time mentioned."

The several hundred spectators promptly proceeded to file out of the room, and the hallway was jammed by them when Mrs. Botkin and Captain Seymour were discovered in the corridor. The crowd's departure in various directions was suddenly checked, there was a rally around the prisoner, and men and women joined in the attempt to get near. It was [illegible], afterward, that none of the women had been injured in the crush.

Policemen were needed to aid the [illegible] in forcing a way to the [illegible], and the curiosity-impelled mob sought to follow the prisoner. There was only a [illegible] in the courtroom, though, for the bailiff, upraising his hand, said: "It is all over, you may retire." The retreat through the crowd was as difficult as the entrance had been.

Mrs. Botkin was dressed in plain black, with a black sailor hat whose [illegible] ribbon was tied in a bow near the back. Her sister, Miss Dora Brown, was with her. Earlier in the forenoon Miss Brown had brought a bouquet of sweet peas for her sister, but Captain Seymour refused to permit the transmission of it to the prisoner.

"We can't have any of that truck," said the Captain to the [illegible], and so the fragrant blossoms reposed on the desk of appreciative Policeman Dougherty.

A preliminary hearing of the Botkin case had been set for to-morrow morning in Judge Joachimsen's department of the Police Court, but counsel have agreed on a two weeks' continuance.

Chief Lees has been working hard to bring the Botkin extradition question into the Federal courts, hoping to obtain a ruling that will stand as a precedent in all such cases. With the assistance of Hawley's work on "Interstate Extradition," he thinks he has found a way. Hawley, a celebrated law writer, holds that the Governor grants an extradition warrant in the capacity of an agent or officer of the Federal Government, not in the capacity of Governor. He says:

The Governor of the State in issuing a warrant of extradition does not act in the capacity of a State, but of a Federal officer. His warrant amounts in effect to a [illegible] that upon the [illegible] presented to him the demanding State has a right to the possession of the fugitive. His duty in the premises is that of a subordinate ministerial officer intrusted by the United States with the performance of a duty arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States. It is because of his position as a subordinate officer that his acts may be reviewed and the [illegible] in his warrant questioned.

Were he in the exercise of the [illegible] power vested in the Governor by the Constitution of his State, the situation would be entirely different.

* * * The confusion which has arisen in the courts is partly attributed to the fact that because he is a Governor it is assumed that in interstate extradition he acts as Governor, that is as the executive branch of the State Government. This is not true. His whole authority in the premises is conferred upon him by the Act of Congress, and it might by the same power be taken away from him and vested in any Federal officer.

Hawley further says that "the Governor upon whom a lawful requisition is made is no more entitled to refuse extradition than a Sheriff is to refuse to execute a legal writ which is placed in his hands." On the point of whether the Delaware requisition is lawful, the Botkin case may go before the Federal courts. Chief Lees says that the Governor will be mandamused, not as a Governor, but as Mr. Budd, a Federal agent, and he expressed confidence in the result. It is said that all previous attempts of this kind have been attempts to mandamus Governors as State officers.

Detective McVey, the Delaware agent, is the most perplexed man concerned in the litigation. "I don't know a thing about the case, and half of that isn't so," he dubiously remarked yesterday, and that seems to be the condition of almost everybody connected with the extradition attempt.

COONEY HAS NEW FRIENDS

Executors of Fair Estate Willing to See Him Go Free.

THEY ARE OPPOSED TO A TRIAL OF HIS CASE.

CHARGES HAVE BEEN PENDING AGAINST THE NOTARY FOR MONTHS.

District Attorney Barnes, However, Insists That He Be Brought Into Court Without Delay.

The executors of the Fair estate have evinced a disposition to drop the prosecution of J. J. Cooney, the notary public who stands accused of perjury in swearing to a certain deposition that figures in the litigation over the dead Senator's property. If they had been able to have their own way the charges against Cooney would have been dismissed before now, but District Attorney Barnes has refused to consent to such a course and insists that the evidence against Cooney must be presented in court and the case judged on its merits.

For various reasons the trial of Cooney has been postponed time and again, although more than a year has elapsed since he was held to answer by Judge Cook, sitting as the committing magistrate. As soon as Mrs. Craven was defeated in the Superior Court in her attempt to establish her claim to a portion of Fair's estate the executors seemed to lose interest in the work of bringing Cooney to the bar of justice, and it was never found difficult to secure their consent to a continuance of his trial. Of late they have openly expressed a desire to dismiss the charges which they pressed formerly with so much energy and to allow the notary public to go unpunished rather than to try the case at the present.

The case was finally set for trial last Monday and Mrs. Craven's return to the city from the East was taken to mean that she was ready to lend [illegible] a hand in clearing himself of the charges growing out of his testimony in her behalf. When the matter was about to be called up in court Garret McEnerney, acting for Executor [illegible] and his associates, gave Assistant District Attorney [illegible] to understand that he would prefer to have the matter put [illegible]. He had [illegible] saying that he would rather stand in the [illegible] than have an immediate trial but under any circumstances he desired a postponement. [illegible] was unwilling to act without consulting with District Attorney Barnes, who was [illegible] with the [illegible] at [illegible] Point, and all that he would [illegible] was a continuance until [illegible]. Barnes, however, was [illegible] especially as he had [illegible] appeared before Judge [illegible] when [illegible] was to be set for trial. At the same time Barnes [illegible] to the opinion that the attorneys for the Fair heirs [illegible] in allowing him to prove the charges against Cooney while they were so eager to make the most of when they [illegible] vitally interested in the civil action before Judge Slack. When the case [illegible] to trial he will be assisted [illegible] Knight [illegible] figured in the [illegible] Fair [illegible] a place of [illegible].

The willingness of the executors to let Notary Cooney go unharmed is [illegible] the fact that the [illegible] of the charges against him by a [illegible] might affect their position in the Supreme Court in the matter of the appeal which Mrs. Craven has taken. In the lower court they secured a judgment in which the [illegible] under which Mrs. Craven was a claimant was held to be a forgery, and [illegible] was [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible]. But if he should be cleared of the criminal charge now pending against him it is thought that [illegible] would be a [illegible] to establish the validity of the will in contest.

[illegible]

[illegible] Hauk, Curtaz & Son [illegible] "Daily Report" [illegible] Theodore Kytka [illegible] Mr. Kytka [illegible] "Daily Report" [illegible]

COLOR PHOTOGRAPHY DISCOVERED AT LAST.

Every Hue of Flower, Tree, Grass or Any Other Object Accurately Reproduced, and All by the Sun, as In the Ordinary Photograph.

WORK OF THE LATE JAMES W. M'DONOUGH, OF CHICAGO.

Long Years of Enthusiastic Research, Countless Experiments and Innumerable Failures Before the Inventor Finally Hit Upon the Process Which Gave Him the Victory.

DIED JUST AS HIS LABOR WAS REWARDED BY SUCCESS.

Persevered in Spite of Long Continued Ill Health Until He Found the Method Which Will Be of Untold Importance in Medicine, Astronomy and the Detection of Crime.

CHICAGO, Ill., Saturday.—Color photography has been made a final success by a Chicago man.

The process of using an ordinary camera and in one-fifth of a second accurately photographing all of the brilliant hues of a flower garden, all the contrasts in green of a landscape, all the wonders of a summer sky, the jewel upon your finger, the ribbon at your throat, the stripes in your clothes, the decorations of your hat, the bouquet on your lapel, is now a reality.

Not a canvas of the old masters but what may be reproduced with every tint of the original; not a shade of color in the banks of flowers of Jackson Park but what may greet the eyes from a photograph, not a color line in the features and dress of a friend but may be retained forever upon the plain panel of a photographic card—and this all done, not by retouching or tinting, not by laborious processes after the picture itself is taken, but done by the sunlight instead in the same instant that the picture itself is taken.

The discovery and its practical application is the work of the late James W. McDonough, of Chicago. He has been dead a year, but what he discovered has been in the hands of friends and business associates ever since. What he discovered is due primarily to the dirty and nasty condition of the Chicago River.

Due to Chicago River.

Crossing the river on the Madison Street Bridge one day in 1870, Mr. McDonough noticed on the surface of the murky water the colors of the spectrum caused by escaping oil from some nearby warehouse. The thought came to him that the river would present a beautiful spectacle if covered with those colors.

His second thought was as to why that river's surface could not be photographed. From this thought gradually developed and grew the process of color photography—the first ever given to the world—that will always be known as McDonough's.

Mr. McDonough was in the early years of his life wealthy and given to scientific pursuits. His work in connection with the telephone was primarily along the line to the discovery of the receiver, and he fought his rights in the courts until he and all others were defeated.

Worn in health and weakened in fortune Mr. McDonough turned from the telephone to his old dreams of color photography, and pursued them until satisfied that the work could be done. He died just as success was at hand.

The process that he created is a color photography which is purely mechanical. The ordinary camera is used, and the negatives are produced and developed by the usual processes, but before exposing the negative in the camera a transparent screen ruled with the three primary colors is interposed between the negative and object to be photographed.

Like an Ordinary Plate.

After developing the negative a positive plate is produced from it, which, viewed by itself, does not differ from the ordinary black and white plate, but when it is laid upon a viewing screen, ruled with the primary colors, a duplicate of the taking screen used in the camera, the colors in the object photographed appear.

The principle of color photography is a mixture of colored lights on the retina. A transparent medium is ruled in fine colored lines, 200 to 400 to the inch. These lines are red, blue and green, commonly speaking. These are the fundamentals of the spectrum, the yellow of a few years ago now being rejected, and their mixture produces white light. In other words, the color of each is such as to absorb the remaining two and transmit only its own light.

To make a picture it is necessary to place one of these ruled screens in immediate contact with the sensitive surface of the dry plate and expose the same as in ordinary photography. The sensitive plate must be what is known as isochromatic plates, that is sensitive to all the colors of the spectrum.

After a negative is made a positive is also made by contact printing, as in the usual manner. This positive is then placed over the ruled screen and the dark lines on the positive are made to register with the colored lines on the screen. When this is done the picture is seen in its natural colors.

Making Paper Photographs.

Paper photographs are made by printing in the usual manner on the sensitive paper ruled with the three colored lines, or on the screen. Halftone pictures in colors are also made by printing with black ink from a half tone plate made from the original upon paper bearing the three colored lines ruled on its surface, the same as a screen.

Photographers and chemists of an inquiring turn of mind have attempted in various ways to make color photography a possibility since [illegible]. The experiments, generally, were so costly, the possibility of failure so great, that all of them, with the exception of McDonough, surrendered at one time or another and proclaimed that the camera would never be able to reproduce the rose with all the gorgeousness in which it hung upon the parent stem.

McDonough said it could be done, and the day before his death photographed himself in one of the flower gardens of Jackson Park. He never lived to see the picture completed, but it stands today in a frame he finished himself with every hue of the blossoms surrounding him faithfully reproduced, the work of the sun and the process.

He read in a newspaper one morning that Lippmann, a foreign scientist, had advanced the claim that he could photograph in colors. His process was what is now known as the "interference" method. By "interference" is meant that the rays of light as they passed through a transparent medium of unequal thickness and were reflected back to the eye by a mirror interfered with each other and created different color effects. Lippmann's method was purely a scientific experiment, and it was impossible to see the colors of pictures as he termed them, except in a certain angle of light.

Many Failures Before Success.

Lippmann's work attracted McDonough, and he started to work out his own theory as to how the natural colors of the sky and earth could be photographed. A majority of his experiments for years were absolute failures. One effort after another was [illegible] until he came to the correct principle, which was to cover a flat plate with very fine lines and then to endeavor to reduce these lines in greater or less angles, so as to give off the colors from a picture photographed on the surface.

His perpetual assumption was that the sun would reproduce colors if [illegible] the receiving plate was of the proper kind. His work was to find that plate.

The plate or block which he finally determined to be the proper one is what is known technically as a diffraction grating, and gives off colors when a beam of light strikes its surface at an angle. The first experiments with such a plate were more than discouraging, and when further efforts seemed useless McDonough was about to cast it aside. The day that he determined to do so he accidentally noticed on the surface of the block what seemed to be spots of different colors. The thought came to him instantly, "Why not stipple on the colored spots, photograph through them, and try and get some color result."

He purchased an air brush, and, after securing such colors as red, green and blue, began blowing them in small particles and attempting to secure an evenly grained plate. But, previous to placing these colors, McDonough made a series of tests to secure the least number of fundamental colors possible whose combination would produce white light or a neutral tint. In these tests he discovered the theories and teachings of the text books of twenty years ago that yellow was a fundamental color—were wrong.

Found the Right Color.

He found that it was a compound color, and would not absorb red or green. He then tested with red, green and blue, and added some yellow to the red and to the green. By this means he secured an orange red and a yellowish green. These two colors he found would make a beautiful yellow when combined in equal quantities—that is, following the laws of the mixture of colored lights.

These experiments were being carried on in Chicago with few to encourage him, and his fortune was dwindling every day. Still McDonough, a teacher and given heart and soul to scientific work, felt that he was on the right road to discovery, and persevered. He proceeded with his stippling, and was more or less successful in obtaining a negative from which a positive was made and mounted on the original screen, and thus a picture in the natural colors was obtained.

He had now only to make the process so simple that it would command commercial attention. He applied for a patent and received it. His future effort was to dispense with the stippling process. Numberless experiments were undertaken with different methods for placing the colors. First he colored powdered shellac and that was dusted on. The plate was then heated and the shellac melted to a flat layer.

Powdered starch was used also, and colored, but starch, having a globular form, would not lie close enough, thus allowing white light to pass through between the balls or globules. Finely divided glass of different colors was used and then fused on the plates, but the colors were bad. Clear sand, gums of all kinds, particles of mica and hundreds of other substances were brought into play with indifferent success.

A large number of these experiments were carried on at Lake Geneva, where McDonough had a summer home. In the winter he returned to Chicago to study this work.

Getting the Right Plate.

In the effort to secure just the plate needed McDonough was most successful when the plate was covered with a resin in small particles and then dipped in the color desired. Then re-covered with another resin and re-dipped until the colors were placed in an exquisite mosaic screen.

While bringing the stippled plate to its perfection McDonough in the hours of [illegible] began experimenting with screens of a regular pattern, such as lines. His first effort was to find some method for ruling lines on a transparent medium, such as glass, mica and celluloid. He tried ruling lines with a common drawing pen, but the lines varied so in width and thickness that it was impossible to make a good picture. He then [illegible] a lithographic ruling machine, and with this made some fair screens, with which a few pictures were taken.

After this, so determined were his efforts that he devised a machine which would rule on flexible material like celluloid, gelatine and rubber. He found that celluloid and gelatine were of no practical use owing to their expansion and contraction under the influence of heat and cold. Mica could not be skillfully used for sure large sheets as it was difficult [illegible]. He eventually produced the ruling machine now being used for his pictures.

Worked Day and Night.

The work of this man was little short of heroic. He labored days and weeks to secure a [illegible] that would be suitable for making single color lines. The [illegible] of this color had all [illegible]. Thousands of colors were to be considered and rejected by him after tests, [illegible] which he found it necessary to [illegible] that they would [illegible] to the right color in thin lines, for it is [illegible] that the color of a dye [illegible] for instance, a wedge shaped bottle filled with [illegible] will change its color from a yellow at the thin edge to a dark red at the thick end, and a bright red under ordinary conditions would only be a yellow when spread in thin lines.

When McDonough had secured a perfect transparency he turned his attention to printing on paper. His idea was to rule the paper and emulsify or sensitize over this ruling. He tested many methods and finally succeeded in ruling the paper so that a beautiful picture could be printed by simply using the negative made through this ruled screen over the ruled paper and registering the lines created on the negative by the subject through the screen, so that they would be parallel, and placing this in the sunlight to print, and then toning this print as is ordinarily done, the result being a picture in colors on the paper.

Found Colors for Paper.

Before McDonough succeeded in this branch of his work colors for paper had to be made. He was months finding these colors, as they had to be insoluble one with another and also in the toning and fixing processes. They also must stand the sunlight and not fade or wash off during the operations necessary to produce a photographic print on paper.

Remarkable as his labors had been up to this point, McDonough was still not satisfied. He had changed the sunlight and made the shades of a lily possible of reproduction not only upon the photograph plate, but upon paper. Now he desired to find a process of printing in half tone in colors.

By making a half tone plate from the original negative made through the ruled tri-colored screen, and then printing with black ink upon paper ruled with the same three colors as were on the screen he succeeded in realizing what is alleged to be a perfect method of printing half tone pictures in their natural colors.

In all this work it was absolutely necessary that McDonough should have a plate that was sensitive to all colors, as the ordinary dry plate is sensitive to only the blue end of the spectrum. McDonough, after testing every isochromatic plate on the market, found all defective, and therefore invented his own sensitive plates, the only ones that have ever succeeded in photographing the red end of the spectrum of faint stars.

Invented a Shutter.

His labors did not end with this. He found that he must have a device whereby in the use of his camera all the colors could be made to act equally at different times of the day under different lights. He invented a small transparent shutter, which in itself is one of the most remarkable inventions in photographic apparatus produced in the last twenty [illegible] years.

The transparent shutter can be adjusted to any color of light. The different colors can be raised or lowered at will by the operator, and all will act equally on the sensitive plate. The special [illegible] permitted by this shutter is to obtain perfect color rendering at all times of the day and under different kinds and degrees of illumination. This shutter is placed either in front or back of the lens, or can be used in the diaphragm slit.

The practical value of color photography cannot be estimated. In the field of the physician it will produce a revolution. Now it is made possible to photograph the different stages of dangerous disease, to retain the plates, to use them for comparative purposes, to know just what is the shade of color at a certain stage of the disease of the body of the patient himself. Photographs of ulcerations, of membranes, of skin affections is all possible and so valuable that the use of the process is almost certain to be demanded at once by the medical profession.

The McDonough patents, which are of the broadest kind, have been granted by the United States, England, France, Belgium, Austria and Germany.

Use in Astronomy.

In astronomy the color work of McDonough is already in experimental use in the Yerkes Observatory at Williams Bay, near Chicago. Of the McDonough sensitive plates George E. Hale, director of the observatory, writes:—

"With their aid I have been able to photograph for the first time the red portion of the spectra of very faint stars, and it is easy to see that plates of this character will prove invaluable in both solar and stellar spectroscopic investigations. The possibility of photographing the red region of stellar spectra opens up an immense field of research hitherto unexplored."

In the detection and prevention of crime the color photograph promises to become an important adjunct of the Bertillon system. George Porteous, head of that system in Chicago, has already instituted experimental work along this line. Rogues may now be photographed as to the color of their hair, of their eyes, the shade of scars upon them, redness of skin, and a thousand and one minutiae hitherto unusable by detectives.

Preserving Every Minutiae of Color.

In the process of taking the picture of a person the color of his hat, of his necktie, of his clothes, of his shirt front, of his jewelry, is all accurately taken and forever kept.

One of the best experimental pictures recently taken by the process is that of Ferdinand W. Peck, Commissioner General of the Paris Exposition, where appears in the lapel of his coat the red rose he wore, radiant with all of the color it had blossomed in.

Mr. McDonough is dead, and cannot tell his own story, but there remains some testimony from his own lips as to what he passed through while discovering color photography that is extremely interesting. At one time he was a manufacturer of furniture at No. [illegible] South Canal street, in this city. While making chairs and sofas on the first three floors of his building, on the fourth floor he maintained a laboratory, in which, during leisure moments, he experimented with the problems of light.

The disease which prostrated him for several years was melancholia. In the first attack he slept nearly a month continuously. After that he had double vision. He could not walk straight. He forgot the multiplication table. He fell asleep in restaurants, street cars and other places. He ran into buildings, and had to be led about the street. He was compelled to learn to walk. For six months every year he was so prostrated he could not work.

Never Lost Faith.

Despite these afflictions Mr. McDonough never lost faith in color photography and prosecuted his researches until success was his.

While he was working for a telephone company in New York, in 188[illegible], and still continuing his color experiments, the building in which he had his apparatus, books and [illegible] the notes of years' accumulation, burned, and he was compelled to start all over again. He built up a new library, in which were the works of Chevreul, Lommel, Vogel, [illegible], Abney and Hugel.

He made various applications for patents, which were rapidly granted by the government, until the invention of what is known as the Joly color process set up the claim that McDonough was not the original discoverer of the process. A long legal battle took place before the patent office authorities, in which McDonough came out the victor.

Mr. McDonough once [illegible] the patent office some examples of his work, saying:

"Here is a picture made in Washington Park of a front. In the foreground are seen some lotus plants and lilies. In the centre is a group of victoria regias. In the extreme background is a group of scarlet canna lilies. At one side are the photographs of two ladies who stepped before the camera when we made the exposure. Under the trees over their heads are seen a group of [illegible] plants. Their peculiar bluish green will be noticed. The trees above them are slightly touched by frost.

What a Picture Shows.

"Here is a picture of a policeman. The color of the mail box beside him is faded, just as represented here. The little boy sitting down has differently colored tan stockings and shoes. Above him and back of him may be seen a climbing vine, whose peculiar green may be noticed. The difference of the red of the brick chimney and cornice of the house shown will be noticed. The slate of the second story of the house is of a very peculiar formation. The colors are true."

McDonough's description of how he obtained the plates which have utilized the power of the sun and permitted the transmission of colors to a photograph, is simple:—

"I arrived at a way of printing upon glass or paper," he said. "I took gelatine, which I dissolved in water. I took aniline colors dissolved in glycerine and poured them upon the surface of my engraved block, about an eighth or sixteenth of an inch in thickness, and over this before the gelatine had set, I placed a sheet, at one time, of cardboard. When the gelatine had cooled off it was attached to the pasteboard. This arrangement was four or five inches square.

Like Hektograph Work.

"I should have said just before this that the dissolved dyes were poured into the gelatine, forming a colored mass. The gelatine sticking to the cardboard when removed from the line block had taken the exact figure of the ruled lines on the engraved block. When this was placed upon a piece of white paper or a gelatine surface it communicated its color to the paper, much after the manner of the ordinary hektograph work.

"I printed with three blocks on gelatine, albumen paper and dry plates, as they are called, sometimes in three parallel lines, to fill up the surface, and sometimes in two sets of parallel lines, and crossed them with a third. The colors I used were, among others that I tried, what is called commonly an 'insoluble blue,' because it is not soluble in water to any extent, another was [illegible], another was a green admixture and a yellow, the latter being used for mixing to grade the other colors. These were all soluble in glycerine and alcohol.

"The registering of the lines was a very difficult matter, and I was led to the system of lining mentioned before and to printing them directly upon the sensitive dry plate. This plate was used directly in the camera and afterward developed."

Colors Do Not Fade.

An essential feature of the McDonough process is that the colors do not fade, even after long exposure to the light and the air. In defending his absorption color screens, which in a sense are the foundation of his discovery, Mr. McDonough said:—

"I show that three colors—reddish orange, yellowish green and violet blue—may be placed upon paper and glass of such a depth that each will mutually absorb the colors transmitted by the others, and that red and green, thus mutually absorptive, will transmit yellow, and that the yellow will not absorb the red and green.

"Here is a spectroscope by means of which these colors may be tested by placing the junction of two glass pieces across the slit of the spectroscope. The spectroscope will be so arranged as to show the Fraunhofer lines. It may be seen that there is a dark space between the two colors, and that they will not overlap when thus viewed. By closing the spectroscope slit this dark space will become larger. By opening the slit these colors will overlap each other to any degree desired, showing that the sensation curves depend entirely upon illumination and that they may be regulated by regulating the illumination.

Peculiarity of Yellow.

"It must be remembered that the spectral yellow is a color of very small area, and, I think, never seen in nature except when separated by means of the spectroscope or some analogous method, and that the yellows of pigments will pass through and be transmitted by red and green, which will mutually absorb each other to such an extent that a picture obtained by the use of these screens will show the yellow in a very natural way.

"There is altogether too much stress placed upon the photograph of the spectrum for commercial work, although it is desirable to photograph it."

Sufficient has been given of the technical features of Mr. McDonough's work to show to what depth he probed and how unsatisfied he was with all progress until his plates, in development, revealed to him the actual beauties of the garden or scene upon which his camera had been focused.

Should one wish to go deeper into the processes by which he reached the end of his labors he may do so by sending to the United States Patent Office for Interference Case No. [illegible]: James W. McDonough vs. John Joly, Art of Producing Colored Pictures by the Aid of Photography. McDonough's record."

McDonough's Associates.

At the time of his death there was and for years had been associated with him E. E. [illegible], a mechanical engineer of reputation. McDonough's intimates, aside from him, had been Thomas A. Banning and Dwight K. Tripp. Mr. Banning had fought his legal battles for him before the Patent Office in Washington, and had become an enthusiast himself on the subject of color photography.

More than five hundred examples of the practical working of the McDonough plates give proof of the practicability of the process. Some are of the scenes from Douglas Park, others from Jackson Park, still others of prominent persons or of highly colored Japanese screens and fine work are a continual delight and feast for the eye.

It is believed that Mr. McDonough's process will revolutionize all color work in magazines, that the more or less laborious processes, that the lithographer's stone is to be seen over the lithographer's stone in to be done away with, and that the color illustrated magazine of the future will be a thing of beauty beside which the production of to-day cannot hold up its head.

Color Work for Magazines.

When a photographer may meet Emperor William in all the gorgeousness of an imperial uniform and take his picture in color just as he appears to the eye, and then transmit that picture to the paper of an ordinary magazine, color illustration will have approached perfection. This work the McDonough process will do.

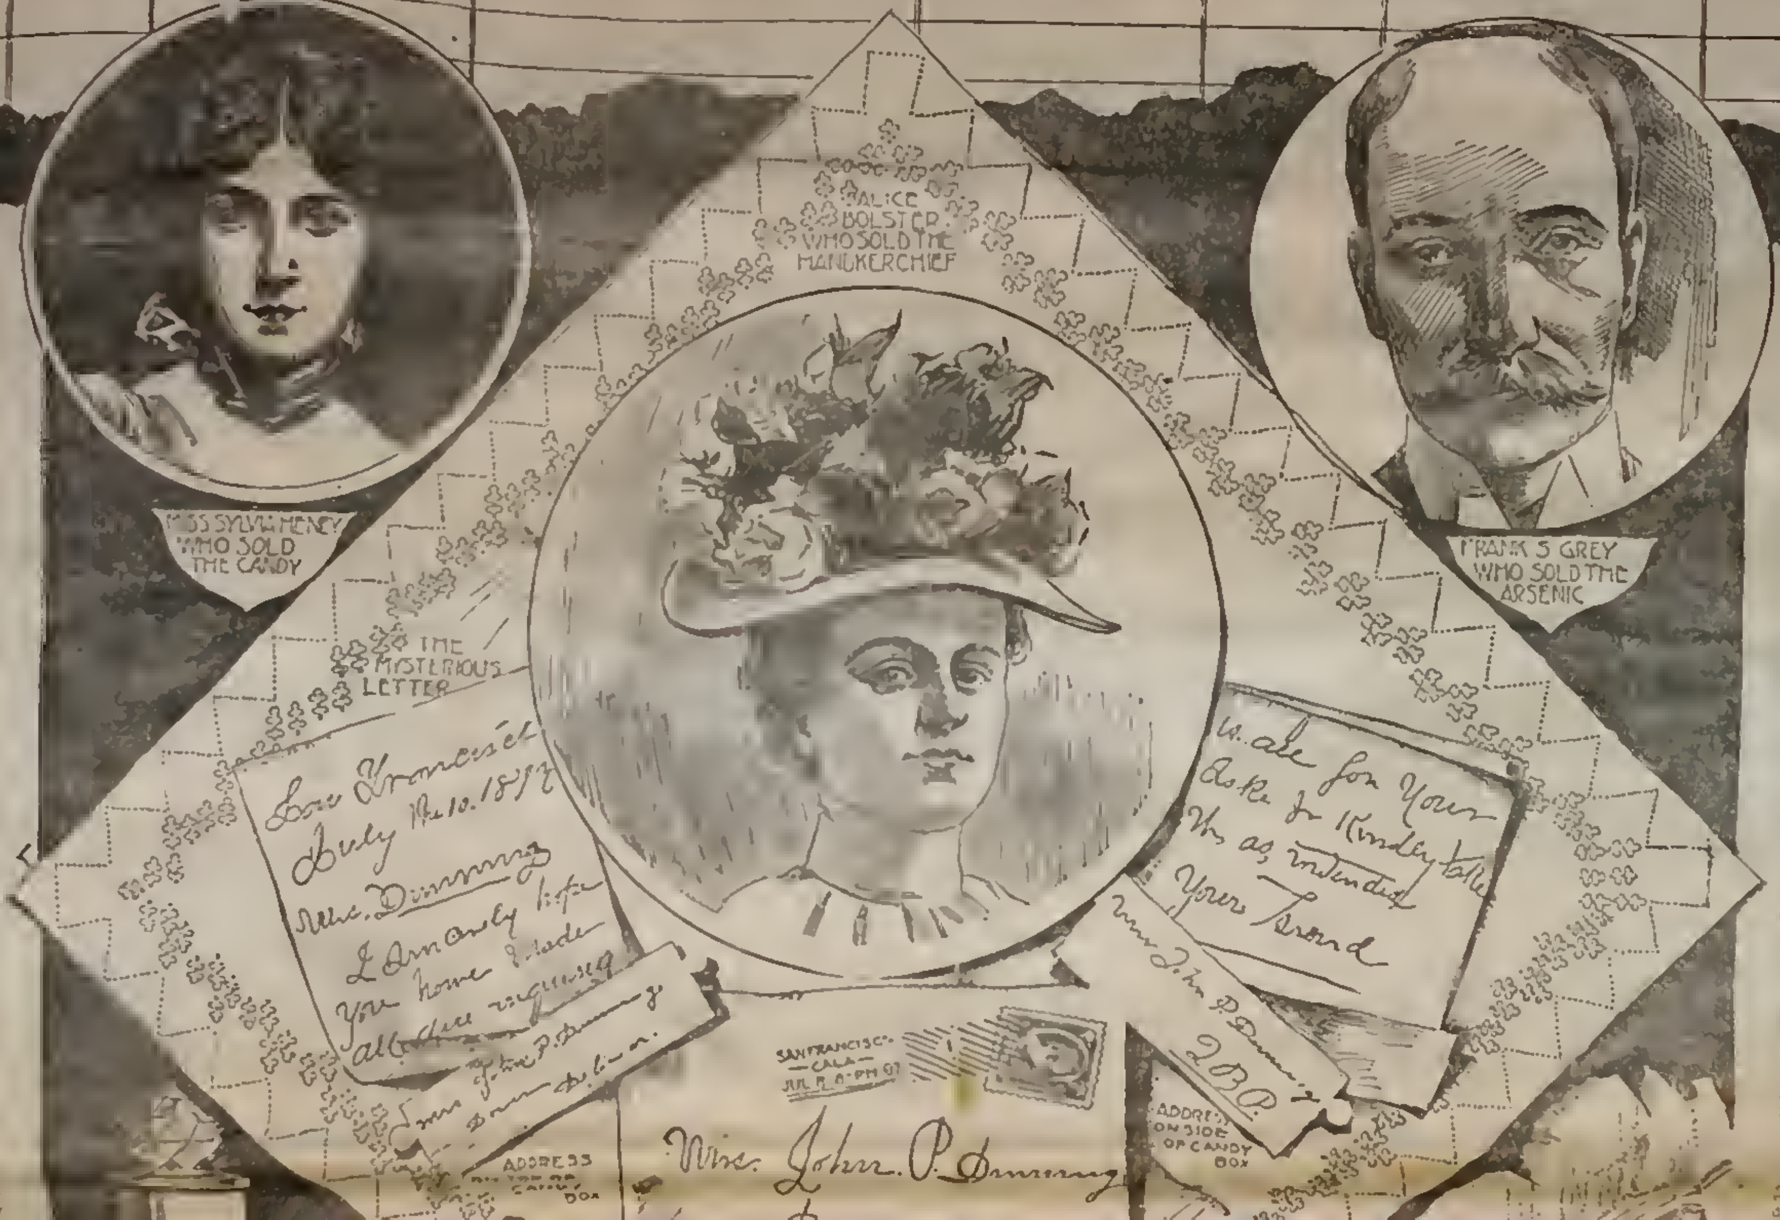
In a popular way the McDonough process may be adapted to the kodak without any extraordinary expense or trouble. It may be taken into any photograph gallery and be made a part of it without a revolution or anything but purchase.

The patent office thought so highly of McDonough's work that at the [illegible] Exposition it has made an exhibit of other patents that it has granted, the government standing the expense of the exhibit.

CHOCOLATES, HANDKERCHIEF, HANDWRITING AND POISON---ALL TRACED TO MRS. BOTKIN.

FAC-SIMILE OF THE PAGE OF THE POISON RECORD BOOK OF DRUGGIST GREY SHOWING THE ENTRY OF MRS. BOTKIN'S PURCHASE.

DATE	TIME	NAME OF PURCHASER	ADDRESS OF PURCHASER	NAME OF POISON	QUANTITY SOLD	FOR WHAT PURPOSE USED	NAME OF DISPENSER
	PM
6.1.98	2	Mr Botkin	Cal & Hyde Sts	Arsenic	℥ii	Bleaching	Grey



THE CASE AGAINST MRS. BOTKIN UP TO DATE.

DURING the last fortnight the San Francisco police have forged a number of important new links in the chain of evidence against Mrs. Cordelia Botkin, who is charged with the murder of Mrs. J. P. Dunning and Mrs. J. D. Deane, of Dover, Del. Mrs. Botkin was arrested on August 22. Since then each day has brought its interesting developments. The Sunday Journal gave a careful analytical study of Mrs. Botkin, together with the history of the case to that date, September 4. To-day it presents the new facts that have been brought to light within the past two weeks.

The police have worked systematically upon three leading points in the mystery—first, to find where the candy that was poisoned and sent across the continent had been made and purchased; second, where the handkerchief enclosed with the bonbons had been bought, and third, what druggist had sold the arsenic that caused the death of the two victims. They have apparently been successful in securing all these vitally important bits of evidence.

MRS. CORDELIA BOTKIN, the woman who was arrested in San Francisco August 22 charged with the Dunning-Deane murders, is ready ... her ... and the ... that ... during the ... And ... for the ... of evidence that has been ... about her ...

Grand Jury.

It could not at first be told who had sold the box of candy in question. Since then it has been found that Miss Sylvia Heney made the sale on July ... to a woman who she is ready to swear was Mrs. Botkin. She has testified to that effect before the Chief of Police. Her story is corroborated in every detail by Miss Dittmer, another saleswoman in the Haas store, who remembers the circumstances of the sale and can also identify the purchaser as Mrs. Botkin.

Another clew that links the fatal box of candy to Mrs. Botkin was discovered a few days ago. Before August 4, the day on which the candy was mailed, Mrs. Botkin had been a guest at the Victoria Hotel. Since she left ... case has occupied the room she stayed in.

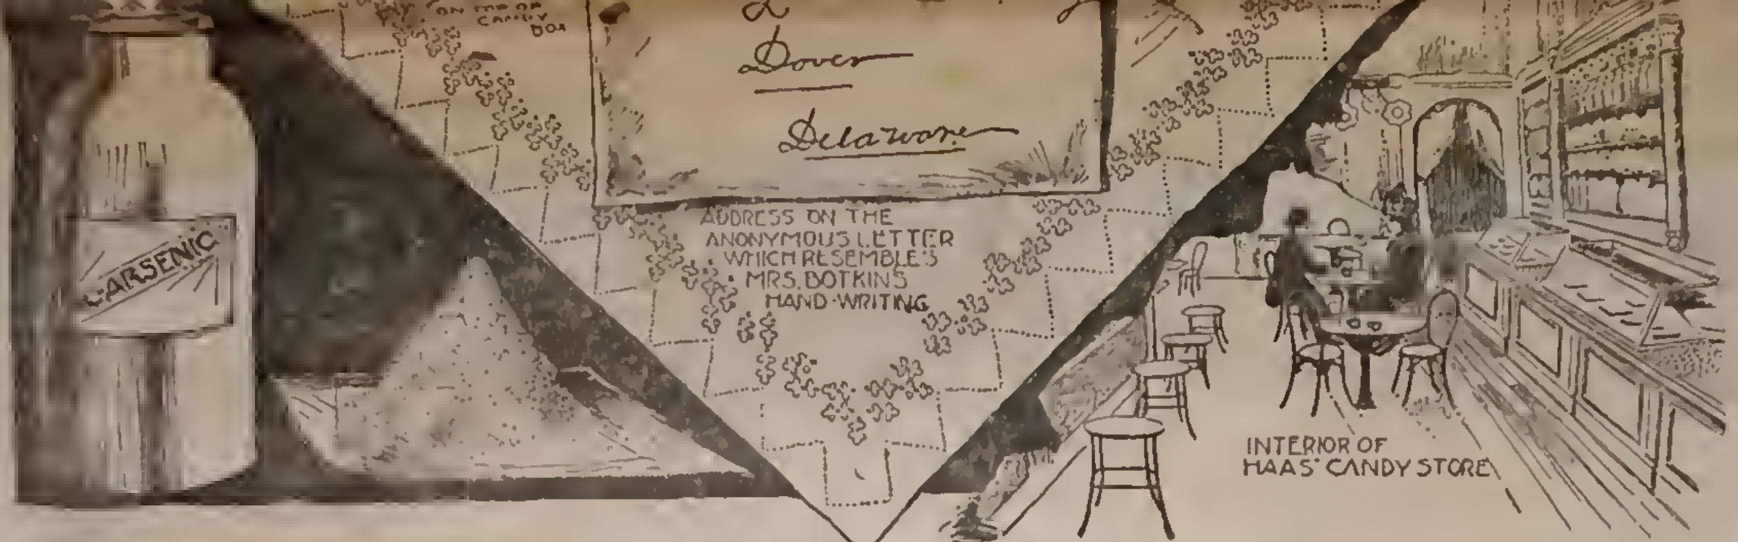
While cleaning this room about a week ago, a housemaid found a small paper wafer, such as is used by confectioners in sealing candy boxes. The name Haas was stamped upon it in raised letters. This forms another link in the curious chain of circumstantial evidence that is gradually tightening about Mrs. Botkin.

The ... important discovery made by the police was that the handkerchief which had been enclosed in the box of candy was purchased at the City of Paris dry goods store, Geary and Stockton streets, San Francisco.

With this fact established, it was next necessary to find which clerk in the store had made the sale.

To do this it was necessary to go over all the sales slips for the greater part of July. The ... of which an exact reproduction from photograph is given here was one of a ... lot.

After a careful examination of the ... it was found that a ... handkerchief of ... had been ... and do ... very much that she would be able ...



PE[illegible]S, OBJECTS [illegible] DOCUMENTS WHICH ARE FORMING a CHAIN OF EVIDENCE AGAINST MRS. BOTKIN IN THE NOW FAMOUS CANDY POISONING CASE.

[illegible] that marked her bearing during the first days [illegible] and [illegible], for the net-work of evidence that has been forming about her [illegible] and unrelentingly is now almost [illegible], without even the shadow of a [illegible].

It does not seem possible that the evidence [illegible] can be falsely circumstantial. From the very first every development in the case has [illegible] to Mrs. Botkin as the guilty one, and absolutely nothing has turned up to shake the conviction of the police and public that it was her hand that sent death across the continent.

[illegible] San Francisco police have brought [illegible] important facts to light during the [illegible].

[illegible] preceding these discoveries the [illegible] Dunning [illegible] [illegible] pointing out Mrs. Botkin as the one [illegible] of the death of his wife and Mrs. Deane, his sister-in-law.

The accusation was based upon the [illegible] of the note sent with the box of [illegible] candy [illegible] the handwriting of Mrs. [illegible]. The note read: "With [illegible] to yourself and baby. Mrs. C."

[illegible] Dunning [illegible] anonymous letters which had been [illegible] as having been written [illegible] Mrs. Botkin. The letters had been [illegible] Mrs. Dunning with the [illegible] turning her against her husband, [illegible] in San Francisco.

[illegible] that Mrs. Dunning had sent a [illegible] was in Salt Lake [illegible] explanation. He [illegible] Mrs. Botkin [illegible] a suggestion as to the probable [illegible].

Mrs. Botkin had answered that the letter [illegible] from a certain Mrs. Seely [illegible] San Francisco [illegible] the original of this letter [illegible] that it had been written by Mrs. Botkin herself.

There had been [illegible] of these letters in [illegible] and each one is identical as to the handwriting [illegible] Mrs. Botkin. One, under the date of July 10, [illegible], has [illegible]. The first and last pages of the letter are reproduced on this page. In part [illegible] as follows:

"San Francisco, July the 10, 1898.

"[illegible] I scarcely hope you have made all due inquiry concerning the grave [illegible] I sent you—[illegible] the pure interest I have in you—concerning the conduct of your husband, and if you have not you are not the woman I always supposed you were if you would ever renew former [illegible] with a man that so forgot you as to [illegible] you in the position he so [illegible].

"He was constantly with this interesting and pretty woman who by the way is an English woman. She is now divorced from her husband all owing to the marked [illegible] with Mr. Dunning.

[illegible] of the woman, as she is [illegible] and education, and [illegible] the other hand they both of them [illegible] to the extreme delight of a quiet [illegible]. You can make all the inquiries [illegible] at the address I gave you.

"I am sure you ought to ask for your own satisfaction even the assurance that [illegible] your husband [illegible] all you want to know and [illegible] that [illegible] life to you [illegible] held by Mr. [illegible] family and [illegible] where they are.

"YOUR FRIEND."

The marked resemblance between the address [illegible] the envelope of the anonymous letter reproduced here and that on the box of poisoned candy is a very important [illegible].

Therefore Mr. Kytka, the well known handwriting expert, has been making a careful study of Mrs. Botkin's handwriting, and at the proper time will present the result of [illegible].

THE CASE AS IT STANDS.

By Chief of Police Lees, of San Francisco.

IN [illegible] we have secured four important facts in the Dunning-Deane murder case.

[illegible] candy was bought at the store of George Haas & Son about the 31st of July last, but the date is not yet [illegible] that Mrs. Botkin returned from a visit to Stockton.

[illegible] the [illegible] which was found in the bottom of the box was bought at the City of Paris dry goods store. We are [illegible] Mrs. Botkin made that purchase.

Third, the superscription on the package [illegible] anonymous letters were undoubtedly written by the [illegible] person. Whether that person is Mrs. [illegible] I am not prepared to say. Experts will analyze and compare the known writing with these examples, and their reports will have an important bearing on the case.

[illegible], which is the most direct and important circumstance against the accused woman, is the purchase by her on June 1 of two ounces of arsenic, the [illegible] caused the death of the two women and the identification of Mrs. Botkin as the purchaser [illegible] with her own admission of the fact.

We are now gathering [illegible] evidence to join with these facts, and in a few days it will be decided whether or not [illegible] delivered to the authorities of Delaware.

I cannot express an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of Mrs. Botkin, nor can I foreshadow the action of our Governor.

his investigation. As yet he does not commit himself.

Following the public announcement of Dunning's [illegible] and the [illegible] resemblance in the handwriting exhibited in the case, new important evidence came with almost daily regularity.

The diligent search made by the San Francisco police to locate the place at which the chocolate candy was made and the box and its contents [illegible] met with splendid success.

It was found that the candy had been purchased at the store of George Haas & Son, about July 31, the day on which Mrs. Botkin returned to San Francisco from a visit to Stockton.

The box and part of the candy that carried death to Mrs. Dunning had been sent from Dover to the San Francisco authorities. Mr. Haas was able to identify them positively as having come from his establishment and he has so testified before the [illegible] all the circumstances of the sale [illegible] doubts very much that she would be able to identify the person who bought the handkerchief.

However, the [illegible] bit of circumstantial evidence that seems to crop up in this case whenever needed, is here present. [illegible] the day of the sale Mrs. Botkin is known to have [illegible] a money order at the [illegible]. She was a frequent visitor at the City of Paris, and had often, according to the bookkeeper's statement, [illegible] money orders at the desk. The bookkeeper [illegible] the [illegible] August [illegible] and [illegible] statement together with the tracing of the money order through the [illegible] will perhaps form another strong link in the evidence.

With the sale of the handkerchief [illegible] firmly established, the police turned all their energies in trying to find out where the poison that was placed in the chocolates had been obtained.

This was, of course, a definite task, but a laborious one, for it necessitated a careful examination of the drug store records of poison sales throughout the city. Every time a drug clerk sells a poisonous drug he is required by law to record the fact upon books specially kept for the purpose. It is a precaution for just such emergencies as the present case gives rise to.

In examining the poison records the detectives at first looked up only the days of the last of July and the first part of August, when Mrs. Botkin was known to be in San Francisco. In this manner they made an unsuccessful examination of the poison book at the Owl drug store and continued on their rounds.

After they left the clerks of the store, becoming interested in the matter, began to look over the books themselves. They examined further back than the detectives had done, and came upon the entry reproduced at the top of this page.

From this it will be seen that June 1 Mrs. Botkin—although the clerk entered the name as "Bothin"—bought two ounces of arsenic, ostensibly for the purpose of bleaching. The clerk who made the sale was Grey. As soon as he saw the entry in the book he recalled every detail of the sale and stood ready to identify the woman to whom he sold the arsenic.

This he was soon called upon to do. He was taken to the matron's room in the City Prison, where Mrs. Botkin is confined and immediately pointed her out as the one whose name he had registered as "Bothin" in the poison book.

Confronted with such conclusive evidence as this, Mrs. Botkin admitted a few days later that she had made this purchase of arsenic. She had previously insisted that she could not remember any time at which she had bought any poisonous drug. One of her lawyers, however, told rather carelessly that she had already mentioned to him the fact of this purchase of June 1. It certainly seems as though fate were conspiring to make the case against Mrs. Botkin as bad as possible.

Drug Clerk Grey states that the arsenic he sold to Mrs. Botkin was in the powdered form. Next comes the damaging coincidence that the chemical analysis of the poison made at Dover shows that the arsenic put into the chocolates was also in the form of powder.

The [illegible] important links of evidence told of here have been summarized briefly for the Sunday Journal by Chief of Police Lees, of San Francisco, who has been so successful in preparing the case as it now stands.

STRANGE MYSTERY OF THREE BEAUTIFUL SISTERS.

Continued from Page Thirteen.

The match, it is asserted, was for that season [illegible] doubly celebrated; first at [illegible] in Naples. Presently it occurred to Bomba that he had done all the ill that he could. Amid the clamors and cries of sedition and bareness he vacated the planet, leaving behind nothing but a rotten reputation and a rickety throne. The one still subsists, the other has gone. Yet that throne, however rickety, it took [illegible] to overthrow. The young queen fought for it, not for herself, but for her child, [illegible] her husband [illegible] the front, wrenching the sword from [illegible] trembling hand, brandishing it in her [illegible] holding and defending Gaeta, the Bourbon [illegible] stronghold [illegible] Victor Emmanuel [illegible] was that [illegible] into paroxysms of [illegible] an interlude of her girlhood she had [illegible] in a quadrille of royals, every one of [illegible] on her return was either dead, exiled or [illegible].

Then came the succession of incidents which [illegible] has told so aptly and so well, the transformation of her husband from a sword into a candle, the miseries of the shabby genteel, the harbors of [illegible] tawdry [illegible], incidents poignant in themselves, yet followed by others more poignant still, the suicide of her cousin, the murder of her nephew, the destruction of one sister and the assassination of another. If ever a woman has supped on horrors, it is she.

It was a road less tortuous, perhaps, yet quite as golgothic, on which Elizabeth of Austria trod. In Vienna the Prince who had won her, quickly turned to woo elsewhere. [illegible] Moreover, [illegible] [illegible] and with them moments when agony must have [illegible] when she felt herself diademed not with a tiara, but with pain, when she would have bartered her regalia to be back again, a girl once more, in the peace of the great green wood.

It was then those excursions began which filled the time. From Iceland to the Aegean, from Trieste to Tunis, ceaselessly she wandered in search of that oblivion which an anarchist brought her a week ago. [illegible] meanwhile had been turned by destiny into Niobe. The [illegible] of her assassination has stung the world, yet the brutality of it is trite beside the mystery of the murder of Rudolph, her son.

The name of Wittelsbach is ill-omened enough, but that of Hapsburg is significant. Derived from Habichtsburg, it means a Vulture's Nest. Rudolph [illegible] [illegible] looked at him [illegible] saw beside the brilliance of the plumage the beak and talons of the bird of prey. The latter were ancestral and hereditary, and had he lived would have been transmitted and maintained. When life was struck from him, not by a bullet, as has been told, but by a bottle—which, parenthetically, crushed his skull—there ensued a general silence into which presently filtered the discernment that the House of Hapsburg was doomed, that vultures of another brood, birds of prey that nested not within the realm, but without, were already hovering at the frontiers, waiting but for the Emperor of Austria's death to batten on Austria's heart.

It would be consequent, as already noted, and it would also be in accordance with the traditions which Mrs. Southworth, Miss Corelli and other lady novelists have preserved and presented, to ascribe the tragedy of Rudolph's death to the malign influence of a family curse. But fiction and history differ. Even otherwise, and admitting the literary advantage of such a process, in this instance it would be defective. In the Wittelsbach gallery there is one portrait which as yet fate has left unmarred. It is that of Elizabeth's third sister, the least known of the original four.

The [illegible] who came to her found her not among the oaks of the forest, but in the tawdriness of the Naples Court. He, too, was a son of Bomba, a younger brother of the consort of Gaeta, yet in making her Countess of Trani it is rumored that he omitted to make her unhappy as well. Their union, tolerably effaced and entirely obscure, resulted in a girl who a few years ago married a Hohenzollern. But precisely as a family trait may skip a generation, so, too, may family fatality.

The gift of prophecy has gone, horoscopes have lost their meaning. What the future holds, what phantoms lie in wait for this particular descendant of an ill-omened house, none may foretell. Yet though her existence be more obscure than that of her mother, more effaced than that of her father, more insignificant than either, it will be serene in sweetness, if only by contrast with the tragic lives of those whose history is interconnected with her own and of which the assassination of an Empress resembles the climax.

EDGAR SALTUS.

EXTRADITION, BUT IT'S YET CONDITIONAL.

Governor Budd Acts in the Case of Botkin.

Complications Will Require Decision by the Supreme Court.

REPORTS IN HER FAVOR.

Question as to the Fact of Her Being a Fugitive.

Governor Budd has conditionally granted a writ for the extradition of Mrs. Ada C. Botkin as prayed for by the State authorities of Delaware. He announced this decision in the office of the Attorney-General yesterday afternoon, where he met by appointment Chief of Police Lees, Detective McVay of Delaware, Attorney-General Fitzgerald and George A. Knight, one of Mrs. Botkin's attorneys.

Under the laws of California the Governor's right to refuse to issue extradition writs is not subject to review by the courts. Neither has the Governor the right to call upon the Supreme Court for advice in issuing writs. Governor Budd believes that the weight of authorities are against the legality of the extradition of Mrs Botkin.

On the other hand, the sensational case in which she is the central figure is of such importance that he desires the Supreme Court to decide upon the legality of her surrender to the Delaware authorities; also to decide if the woman cannot be tried for murder in this State. He thinks the only way to get the matter before the Supreme Court, at least so far as the extradition is concerned, is to grant one and have it brought to the Court's attention by a writ of habeas corpus on Mrs. Botkin's behalf.

In rendering his decision Governor Budd said:

In the matter of Botkin the Governor of Delaware, on the [illegible] of August, issued a requisition on me as Governor of this State for the delivery and removal of Adelaide C. Botkin from California to Delaware, claiming her as a fugitive from the justice of that State and desiring therewith certain papers certified by myself [illegible]

[illegible]

Mr. Knight and the Attorney-General [illegible]

habeas corpus proceedings would, in addition to passing upon the writ's legality, decide the question as to whether Mrs. Botkin could be tried here for murder.

"We must by some means get a decision on that point," said the Governor. "If the court says Mrs. Botkin can be extradited, I can withdraw the writ until the other point is decided. If the court holds that she cannot be extradited the authorities here will be forced to try her on the murder charge, or at least on the felony charge of mixing poison with candy. I will issue the writ the day after to-morrow or at any time that may suit the convenience of Mr. Knight, Chief Lees and Attorney-General Fitzgerald."

Mrs. Botkin was informed of the Governor's action in the settlement of the extradition matter. She declined to be seen, [illegible] that she had no criti-

COUNTERFEITS WERE PRINTED IN THIS CITY

Most Deceptive Bills Ever Uttered.

GOVERNMENT EXPERTS AT SEA.

CLAIM THAT THE INKS AND PAPER ARE GENUINE.

Five Thousand of the Bogus Hundred-Dollar Bills Exchanged for the Gold of Kloudikers.

Special officers of the United States secret service, acting in conjunction with Chief Lees, have traced the origin of the $100 bills which are such excellent counterfeits of the silver certificates issued by the Government. The imitation is so close that it can be told from the genuine only by the application of the acids used by the officials of the Treasury Department.

The bills were made in this city, on Broadway, and the operators are under police surveillance. Copies of the bills have been turned over to Expert Kytka of the Police Department. He has taken enlarged copies of them. These photographs tend to show how skillful were the men who prepared the bills.

The person who uttered the bills struck off [illegible] of them and [illegible] them into the Klondike district. They were readily exchanged for gold dust, and their falsity was not discovered until the returning miners tried to pass them in Portland. Cash on them was refused, but the cautious bank officials agreed to accept them and sent them to the Treasury Department at Washington for collection.

The banks of this city, following the precedent of the [illegible] in the north, have refused to handle any bills of that denomination. The paper is said to be of Government make, as are also the [illegible] inks, with the exception of that with which the number is printed. This is of ordinary quality and [illegible] withstand the action of acids. The bills are the most dangerous with which the secret service officials have ever had to deal.

If your time will not permit you to go down to the big salesrooms of Benj. Curtaz & Son, 16-18-20 O'Farrell street, you can go into the art department of the Emporium and Golden Rule Bazaar and see the duplicate of the piano the "Report" is offering as a prize for the most popular women and girls engaged in legitimate employment. You will have no trouble in finding the prize. It [illegible] an artistic card from the pen of Theodore Kytka, the famous handwriting expert, and indicates that that gentleman not only knows how the pen has been used, but is mighty with the pen [illegible] One glance at the artistic [illegible] the "Daily Report" [illegible] prize emphasizes the fact that in [illegible] hands at least the pen is mightier than the sword.

SEAVER'S STORY STANDS A TEST.

Attorney for the Defense Cross-Examines the Informer.

[illegible]

COONEY'S TRIAL CALLED A FARCE

Geo. Knight Refuses to Prosecute The Ex-Notary.

Fair Heirs Do Not Care to Push the Case Against the Accused.

The trial of Notary James J. Cooney on the charge of perjury growing out of his connection with the Craven-Fair deeds commenced in Judge Wallace's court this morning.

In the trial of the celebrated Fair case before Judge Slack Cooney supported Mrs. Craven's statement that James G. Fair acknowledged the "pencil deeds" before him in his capacity of notary public.

At the outset of the trial this morning George Knight caused surprise when he announced that he did not desire to assist in the prosecution of [illegible]ney.

When the case was called Mr. Knight arose and, addressing the court, said: "I desire to withdraw from the prosecution of this case. I have consulted with District Attorney Barnes and told him that there was no use going on with the case, as there is no hope of conviction. The people I represent are thoroughly satisfied with the outcome of the civil proceedings, and they do not desire to prosecute the case. Mr. Hinkle is going on with this matter and he has never consulted with the police or myself. He knows nothing about the case, and I pronounce the whole affair a farce."

Judge Wallace here took exception to Mr. Knight pronouncing the trial a farce, and said that it should not be referred to in that way.

Mr. Knight, continuing, however, said: "It is a farce and there is no hope of a conviction. I therefore withdraw from the case." The attorney then left the court room, entrusting the prosecution of the case to Assistant District Attorney Hinkle.

Later it was learned that the Fair heirs have no hope that Cooney will be convicted and that they are not anxious to prosecute him, because they consider him merely a tool in the hands of others.

Cooney is represented by W. W. [illegible] and ex-Judge Denson. His father, ex-Judge Cooney, was also present in court and took an active interest in the proceedings.

The morning session was devoted to securing a jury. Nine jurors were sworn in, and as the panel was exhausted, an adjournment was taken until to-morrow morning, a special venire being ordered.

The jurors selected to serve are: Charles F. Hahn, 2125 Howard street; M. J. Kelly, 1513½ Mission street; J. [illegible] Gallagher, 1131 Treat avenue; John [illegible], [illegible] Clayton street; William H. Tilson, 617 Folsom street; N. Nason, [illegible] Twenty-[illegible] street; P. A. Smith, 514 Fourth street; M. [illegible], 1922 [illegible] street; Matthew Colligan, 317 O'Farrell street.

WILL OF DEBBIE TAYLOR.

Trial of a Contest Commenced by Judge Hebbard.

Judge Hebbard commenced yesterday the trial of a contest against the will of Debbie Margaret Taylor, who died on March [illegible]. The estate is valued at [illegible], and by the will the bulk of the property was bequeathed to E. H. Tucker and Miss Helen [illegible], both of this city. The contestants are [illegible] McDermott, maternal grandmother of the deceased [illegible]

[illegible]

FIRST STEP TO CONTEST WILL OF ADOLPH SUTRO

THESE CHILDREN CLAIM PART OF SUTRO'S ESTATE

Claiming to have been married by contract to the late Adolph Sutro the woman calling herself Mrs. Clara Kluge-Sutro has taken the first step toward [illegible] a contest for part of the millionaire's estate. She has filed an application to be appointed guardian of the two minor children, aged seven and five years, who she says were the fruit of her marriage with Sutro and whom she designates as Adolph Newton Sutro and Adolphine Charlotte Sutro.

In her petition Mrs. Kluge-Sutro says that the children's possessions at present consist of two blocks of outside lands worth $10,000, which Mr. Sutro conveyed to them while he was supporting them and their mother in the house he built for them at the corner of Steiner and Clay streets in this city, and she adds that they are also interested, as heirs at law, in the [illegible] estate.

The next step to be taken on behalf of the children will be to contest the Sutro will on the ground that these children were the legally recognized children of the [illegible] and that he failed to provide for them [illegible] will.

[illegible] Van R. Paterson, who represents the woman and her children, says the marriage with Mrs. Kluge was an annulment of the will according to the decisions of the Civil Code of California [illegible] a recognition of the marriage [illegible] only probable way of getting rid of [illegible] will, which is so objectionable to a majority of the heirs.

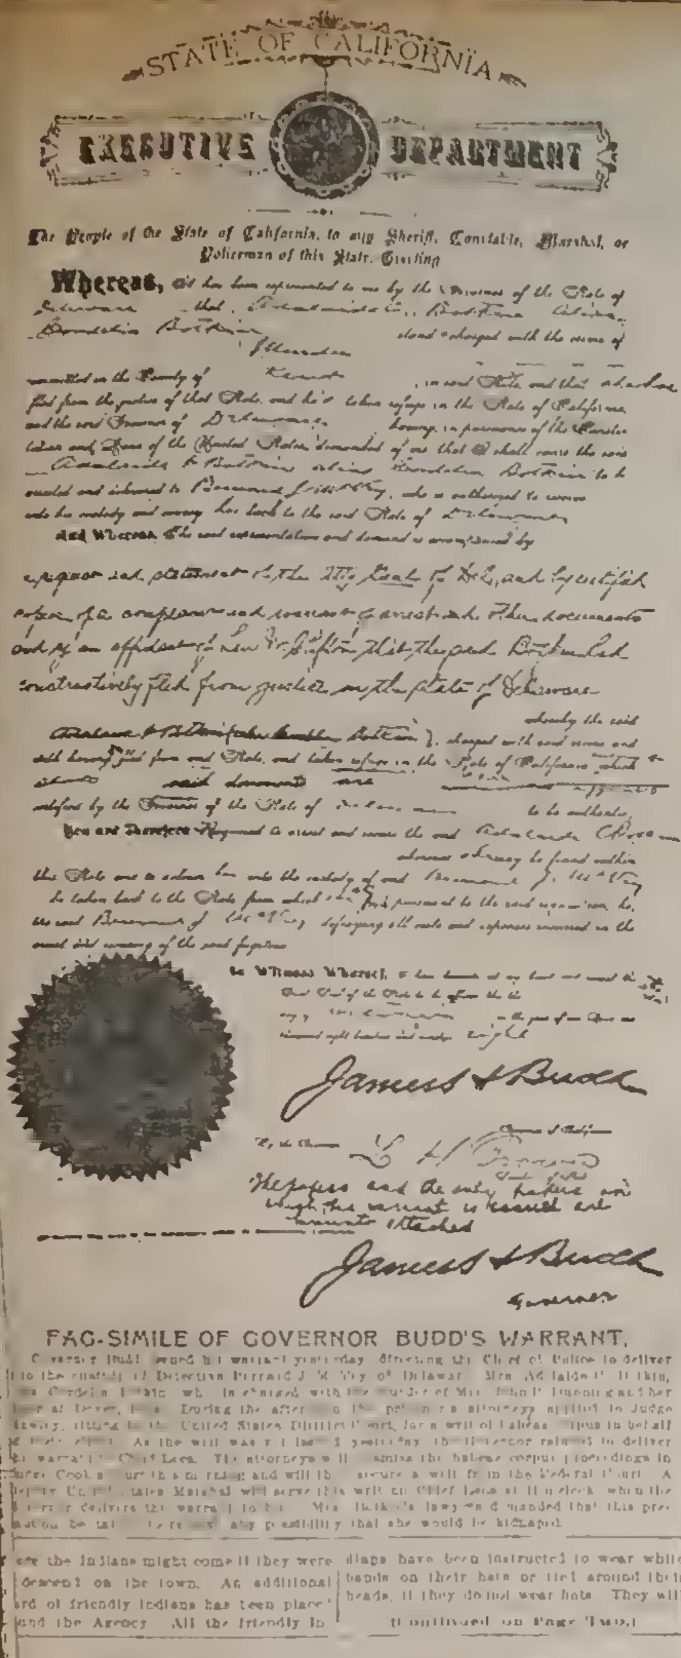
The claim of a contract marriage [illegible] on a written document which [illegible] yet been submitted to the court [illegible], but which, it is promised [illegible] at the trial. The legal adoption or recognition of the children by Mr. Sutro is altogether another matter. [illegible] says that Mr. Sutro took the little ones everywhere with him—on the street and in the Park, to the Cliff House—and with the pride of a fond parent introduced them as his offspring.

Judge Troutt will hear the application for letters of guardianship a week from Friday, November 4th.

CHECKS DRAWN FOR FORTUNES.

Checks for large amounts seem to be the order of the day, but even Mr. Thomas Lipton's large check in payment of import duties [illegible]

[illegible]



FAC-SIMILE OF GOVERNOR BUDD'S WARRANT.

Governor Budd issued his warrant yesterday directing the Chief of Police to deliver [illegible] to the custody of Detective [illegible] of Delaware. Mrs. Adelaide [illegible] Botkin, [illegible] Cordelia Botkin, who is charged with the murder of Mrs. [illegible] During the afternoon the prisoner's attorneys applied to Judge [illegible] for a writ of habeas corpus [illegible] As the writ was not issued yesterday the Governor refused to deliver the warrant to Chief Lees. The attorneys will [illegible] the habeas corpus proceedings [illegible] Federal Court. [illegible] United States Marshal will serve this writ on Chief Lees at [illegible] o'clock when the [illegible] delivers the warrant to him. Mrs. Botkin's lawyers demanded that this pre[illegible] that she would be kidnaped.

...the Indians might come if they were [illegible] on the town. An additional [illegible] of friendly Indians has been placed [illegible] and the Agency. All the friendly In[dians have been instructed to wear white] bands on their hats or tied around their heads, if they do not wear hats. They will

(Continued on Page Two.)

A RED RATTLE FOR THE CHIEF OF POLICE.

George A. Knight's Outbreak in the Botkin Case.

Lees and the Lawyer Engage in a Heated Controversy.

THE WARRANT ISSUED.

But the Governor Refused to Deliver It Till This Morning.

"Oh, give him a rattle—a red rattle—and let him play with it a while. This thing makes me sick. I'm weary of this continuous wrangling over small things."

That's the way George A. Knight broke out yesterday afternoon in Attorney-General Fitzgerald's office while Governor Budd was trying to prepare his warrant against Mrs. Botkin. The "him" referred to by Knight was Chief of Police Lees.

The Chief jumped into the fight like a two-year-old.

"Well, you can't make me tired, Mr. Knight," he yelled. His face flushed with anger and he pounded the arm of his chair.

"But I will, just the same," Knight roared. "I'll make you very weary before I get through with you. I won't stand any funny business. I tell you that flat. I'll show you, Chief Lees, before this case is over that you will have all you can attend to, and so will your star, too. You'll have to look out for that, I'm telling you."

Lees turned purple with rage. He was mad clear through.

"If you say, Mr. Knight," he shouted, and his voice was husky, so great was his wrath, "that I have ever contemplated, or do now contemplate anything underhand or improper in this case, you say what is an untruth."

"Oh, that's all right; that's all right," said Knight in a mollifying manner; "but this thing is childish."

The last remark upset the Chief again.

"I can take care of myself at any time, physically or any other way, and as for my star that will take care of itself, too," Lees shouted, shaking a threatening forefinger at the attorney. "You can't make me tired."

"Oh, I know you are my superior, both mentally and physically," Knight replied, making the retort courteous. "I'm sorry for what I said and I apologize. Your gray hairs entitle you to more respect than I have shown you."

(Continued on Page Two.)

POLITICA[L] TO[...]

THE PEOPLE'S OPPORTUNITY TO DOWN THEM.

Bosses and the Railroad Leagued Against Maguire.

For the First Time One Blow Will Cause Every Head to Fall.

TO TALK FOR EFFECT.

Southern Pacific Managers May Try to Start a Back-Fire of Oratory.

BY EDWARD H. HAMILTON.

If the people of California really desire to rid themselves of the political old men of the sea who have clung about their necks all these years they have a chance to do so at this election—the best chance they ever have had. For at last the disreputables are all on one side, and it requires but one heroic stroke to cut off all the heads.

Hitherto it has been different. In previous campaigns the railroad has not had all its hundred elements of corruption massed so that the public could get a fair swipe at them. If the Southern Pacific strung to the Republican candidates for Governor, Senator and Representatives to Congress, judicial officers and members of the State boards, there were still bosses who, for sake of local plunder or in order to retain party standing, clung to the Democratic party and weighted it. And it must be admitted in all frankness that the railroad has not always been Republican.

"They tell me y[...]

But at last the "associated villainies" and the common scoundrels are all together, and all are against Maguire and Phelan. Find a man who has betrayed his trust in office and I'll find you a man who is whispering against Maguire. Look up a lobbyist who has bargained for votes in Sacramento and you'll discover an anti-Maguire man. Hate Rainey as he may, Buckley joins with him in trying to defeat Maguire, and no matter how both may feel regarding Kelly and Crimmins and Curry, all are leagued in the common anti-Maguire cause. The mask is off with these scavengers of the slums of politics. Whatever they may think of Gage; however they may fear that he will not be a pliant tool like Waterman or Markham, they know that Maguire is their sworn foe, eager to crush them under his heel, and in fighting against him they are fighting for existence.

So the chance of a political epoch is in the hands of the common people. If California really wants to rid herself of the wens and cancers which have disfigured her politics, this is the opportunity and this the time. Should Maguire and Phelan and Healey be elected, there will be such a rush for tickets for Canada that the northways routes will require more men in the ticket offices, more trains on the tracks and greater watchfulness lest the sleeping-car maps and towels be stolen.

I have often doubted the sincerity of the masses on some political subjects. I have

AROUND THE WORLD.

Bachmann, the Cyclist, Has Reached Vienna,

And Has Won the Prize for Which He Was Striving.

A few months ago Sig. Bachmann, an Hungarian cyclist, halted at this city on his way round the world and very naturally dropped into the "Daily Report" office. Bachmann promised to write a letter for publication on his arrival in Vienna, and as will be seen by the following, he literally kept his word.

VIENNA, Sept. 28, 189[8].

Editor "Daily Report": According to my promise to you to let you know of my arrival at Vienna I write you, although it is more than a month since I arrived. The European climate and custom had so great an influence on me that after my arrival I got sick and am still under the weather. In order that you may use what I tell you for the paper I will write of my whole trip as it happened.

On the 17th of September, 1896, I left Vienna, crossed Austria, Germany, Holland, Belgium, France to Bordeaux; thence per steamer to London; thence to Southampton, thence per steamer to New York, Chicago, Omaha, Salt Lake City, Reno, Sacramento, San Francisco, thence by steamer to Sydney via Honolulu, Apia (Samoa Islands) and Auckland, New Zealand. From Sydney by wheel to Melbourne, Adelaide, thence per steamer to Colombo, Ceylon; from Colombo to [illegible] the principal city of Ceylon; thence [illegible] by steamer to Tuticorin, [illegible] Madras, Calcutta, Allahabad, Cawnpore, Agra, Mhow, Bombay.

Between Agra and Bombay I was attacked by one of the natives, who stabbed me in the right arm and which nearly cost me my life. By the aid of the medicines I carried with me I h[eal]ed the wound, and after seventeen days was out of danger. The reason for the attack was that between the 12th and 19th of March of last year there was a row in Bombay between the natives and the English militia.

From Bombay my route lay to Abyssinia, but the Consul-General advised against my going that way, so I took the steamer to Suez, Egypt; then wheeled to Ismailia, Zagazig, Cairo, [illegible], Damanhur, Alexandria, thence per steamer to Brindisi, Italy, Potenza, Naples, Rome, Venice, Trieste, [illegible], Agram, Croatia, [illegible], Budapest, Hungary, to Vienna, where I arrived on the 9th of August, 1898, and was received with great [illegible], having completed my tour of the world, visited the five grand divisions of the earth in [illegible] year, eleven months and fifteen days, which time was eighteen days in advance of the time given me. I carried off the prize of 10,000 gulden, or [illegible] about $4000, and a great [illegible] medal, with band and crown, which was given to me two days after [illegible] with great festivity. From the capital city of Hungary I also received [illegible] golden [illegible] as [illegible] became a citizen.

When this [letter] appears in your valuable paper I would ask that you send me some copies. With best [wishes], I am yours very truly,

SIG BACHMANN.

Detective McVey Thinks He Will Secure Mrs. Botkin.

The prosecution as well as the defense in the case of Mrs. Cordelia Botkin [illegible] of securing [illegible] decision from the courts upon the legality of the proceedings instituted to remove the prisoner to Delaware.

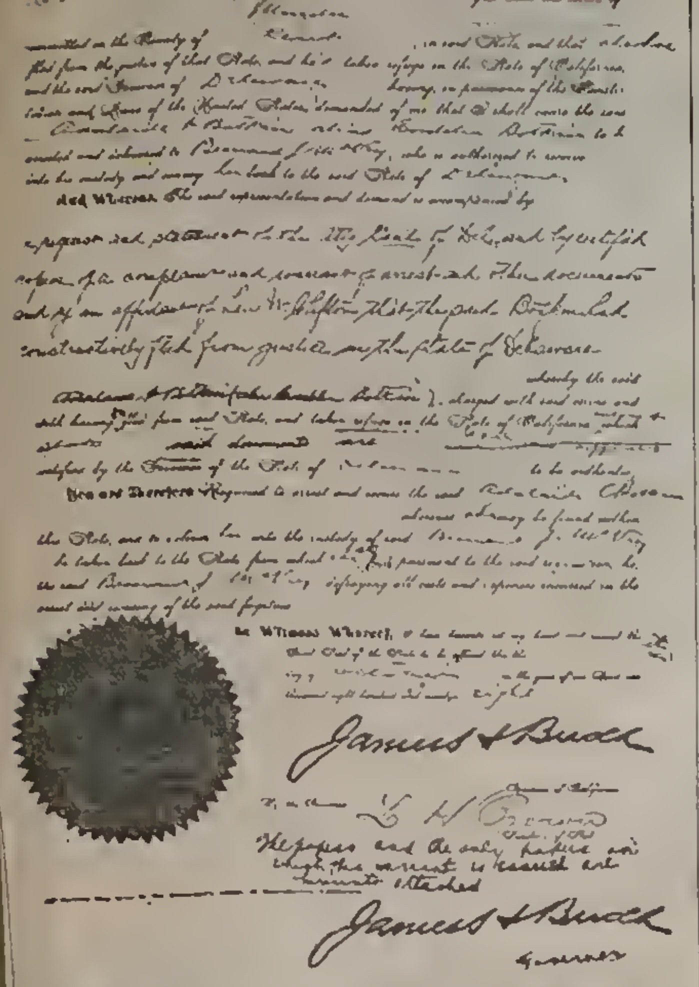
To the Supreme Court, now in session in Los Angeles, Acting District Attorney [illegible] yesterday made application for a writ of habeas corpus. He contended that Mrs. Botkin was being unlawfully withheld by Chief Lees from the custody of Detective McVey. The detention of the woman by Chief Lees was, Mr. Hosmer urged, illegal, in that the signing of the extradition papers by the Governor gave Detective McVey of Delaware the [illegible] control and custody of the prisoner, notwithstanding the habeas corpus proceeding.

The application which Mr. Hosmer presented to the court was signed by Detective McVey. He did not personally appear before the court, depending upon Mr. Hosmer to advance his claims. The [illegible] of the court gave consideration to the petition, but for some reason not given in the press dispatches from Los Angeles, denied the application. It is believed in the District Attorney's office that the petition was denied upon the ground that the writ pending before Judge Cook will determine the claims advanced by Detective McVey.

The proceedings before Judge Cook will be heard Monday. Should the writ be denied by Judge Cook the defense will [illegible] in the Supreme [Court] or in the Federal courts.

Doubtless, however, Detective McVey will be prepared to start East with Mrs. Botkin immediately after Judge Cook shall have rendered his decision. Should Judge Cook decide in his favor he will probably start [illegible] before the defense can secure a second writ.

According to Chief Lees, no further action will be taken in the prosecution until Judge Cook has rendered his [decision]. [illegible] He is confident that Judge Cook will give judgment in favor of [illegible] McVey. Judge Cook has [illegible] Judges Wallace and Seawell [illegible] during the hearing of the [illegible] proceedings. Acting District [Attorney] [illegible]



And Whereas ...

Now Therefore ...

In Witness Whereof ...

James H Budd

Governor

FAC-SIMILE OF GOVERNOR BUDD'S WARRANT.

Governor Budd issued his warrant yesterday, directing the Chief of Police to deliver to the custody of Detective Bernard J. McVey of Delaware Mrs. Adelaide C. Botkin, alias Cordelia Botkin, who is charged with the murder of Mrs. John P. Dunning and her sister at Dover, Dela. During the afternoon the prisoner's attorneys applied to Judge Rawley, sitting in the United States District Court, for a writ of habeas corpus in behalf of their client. As the writ was not issued yesterday, the Governor refused to deliver his warrant to Chief Lees. The attorneys will dismiss the habeas corpus proceedings in Judge Cook's court this morning and will then secure a writ from the Federal Court. A deputy United States Marshal will serve this writ on Chief Lees at 11 o'clock, when the Governor delivers the warrant to him. Mrs. Botkin's lawyers demanded that this precaution be taken, to remove any possibility that she would be kidnaped.

...ere the Indians might come if they were ... descend on the town. An additional ...rd of friendly Indians has been placed ...und the Agency. All the friendly Indians have been instructed to wear white bands on their hats or tied around their heads if they do not wear hats. They will

(Continued on Page Two.)

...kin Case.

Lees and the Lawyer Engage in a Heated Controversy.

THE WARRANT ISSUED.

But the Governor Refused to Deliver It Till This Morning.

"Oh, give him a rattle—a red rattle—and let him play with it a while. This thing makes me sick. I'm weary of this continuous wrangling over small things."

That's the way George A. Knight broke out yesterday afternoon in Attorney-General Fitzgerald's office while Governor Budd was trying to prepare his warrant against Mrs. Botkin. The "him" referred to by Knight was Chief of Police Lees.

The Chief jumped into the fight like a two-year-old.

"Well, you can't make me tired, Mr. Knight," he yelled. His face flushed with anger and he pounded the arm of his chair.

"But I will, just the same," Knight roared. "I'll make you very weary before I get through with you. I won't stand any funny business. I tell you that flat. I'll show you, Chief Lees, before this case is over that you will have all you can attend to, and so will your star, too. You'll have to look out for that, I'm telling you."

Lees turned purple with rage. He was mad clear through.

"If you say, Mr. Knight," he shouted, and his voice was husky, so great was his wrath, "that I have ever contemplated, or do now contemplate anything underhand or improper in this case, you say what is an untruth."

"Oh, that's all right; that's all right," said Knight in a mollifying manner; "but this thing is childish."

The last remark upset the Chief again.

"I can take care of myself at any time, physically or any other way, and as for my star that will take care of itself, too," Lees shouted, shaking a threatening forefinger at the attorney. "You can't make me tired."

"Oh, I know you are my superior, both mentally and physically," Knight replied, making the retort courteous. "I'm sorry for what I said and I apologize. Your gray hairs entitle you to more respect than I have shown you."

(Continued on Page Two.)

OPPORTUNITY TO DOWN THEM.

Bosses and the Railroad Leagued Against Maguire.

For the First Time One Blow Will Cause Every Head to Fall.

TO TALK FOR EFFECT.

Southern Pacific Managers May Try to Start a Back-Fire of Oratory.

BY EDWARD H. HAMILTON.

If the people of California really desire to rid themselves of the political old men of the sea who have clung about their necks all these years they have a chance to do so at this election—the best chance they ever have had. For at last the disreputables are all on one side, and it requires but one heroic stroke to cut off all the heads.

Hitherto it has been different. In previous campaigns the railroad has not had all its kindred elements of corruption massed so that the public could get a fair swipe at them. If the Southern Pacific swung to the Republican candidates for Governor, Senator and Representatives in Congress, judicial officers and members of the State boards, there were still bosses who, for sake of local plunder or in order to retain party standing, clung to the Democratic party and weighted it. And it must be admitted in all frankness that the railroad has not always been Republican.

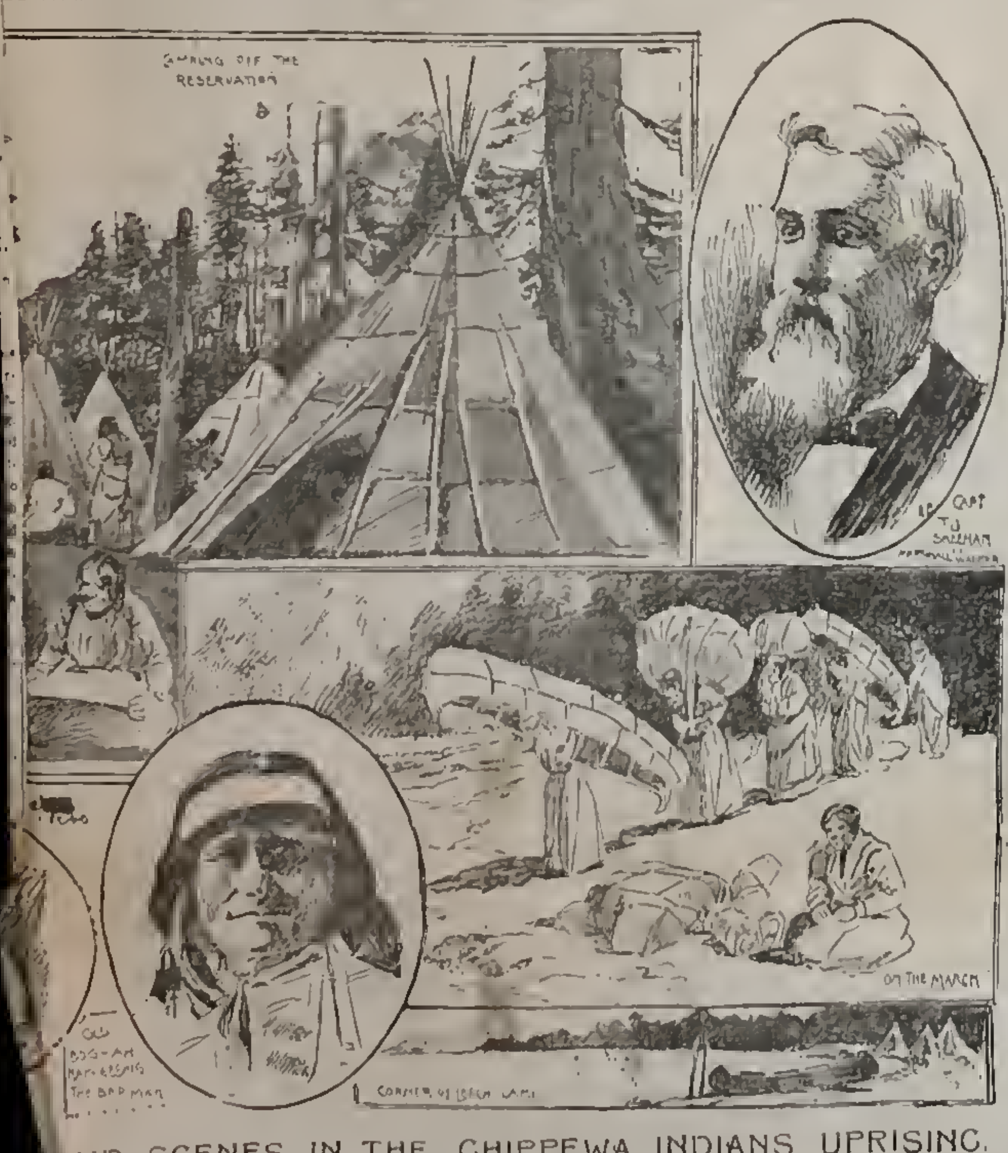
But at last the "associated villainies" and the common scoundrels are all together, and all are against Maguire and Phelan. Find a man who has betrayed his trust in office and I'll find you a man who is whispering against Maguire. Look up a lobbyist who has bargained for votes in Sacramento and you'll discover an anti-Maguire man. Hate Rainey as he may, Buckley joins with him in trying to defeat Maguire, and no matter how both may feel regarding Kelly and Crimmins and Curry, all are leagued in the common anti-Maguire cause. The mask is off with these scavengers of the slums of politics. Whatever they may think of Gage, however they may fear that he will not be a pliant tool like Waterman or Markham, they know that Maguire is their sworn foe, eager to crush them under his heel, and in fighting against him they are fighting for existence.

So the chance of a political epoch is in the hands of the common people. If California really wants to rid herself of the worms and cankers which have disfigured her politics, this is the opportunity and this the time. Should Maguire and Phelan and Henley be elected, there will be such a rush for tickets for Canada that the northways routes will require more men in the ticket offices, more trains on the tracks and greater watchfulness lest the dropping-car soap and towels be stolen.

I have often doubted the sincerity of the masses on some political subjects. I have waited too long for the "people to use their might" to put much faith in that uprising, except as an expression of editorial thunder. But if the decent, honest voters do not take advantage of this opportunity they will deserve to be over-taxed, over-ridden and generally misgoverned all the rest of their days. Defeat Maguire, beat Phelan, snow under Henley and the day of the boss



...AND SCENES IN THE CHIPPEWA INDIANS UPRISING.

...nd of Chippewa Indians at Leech lake, in Minnesota, is Chief Bug-Ah-Nah-Ge-Shig, who, with 200 of his fol... ...0 men of the Third U. S. A. Infantry, at Sugar Point, opposite Bear Island, which is in Leech lake. Min... ...aw-breakers wanted by the United States Marshal, and is one of the bad Indians, having killed eight of his ...n, the Marshal of Walker, distinguished himself as a brave man at the battle of Sugar Point and was wounded

FIFTH SECTION. THE NEW YORK HERALD. PAGES 1 TO 8.

NEW YORK, SUNDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1898.—[COPYRIGHT, 1898, BY JAMES GORDON BENNETT.] PRICE FIVE CENTS.

JOHN ELBERT WILKIE AND THE SECRET SERVICE IN THE WAR.

The Man Who Engineered One of the Most Fascinating Branches of Our Government's Operations Against Spain, Circumventing the Spanish Spies.

"AT ELEVEN O'CLOCK THAT NIGHT WE ARRESTED THE MAN IN HIS ROOM"

"AN EARNEST CONVERSATION WAS BEING CARRIED ON IN THE LIEUTENANT'S ROOM"

THE THIRD MEMBER OF THE PARTY SLIPPED THE LETTER INTO HIS POCKET

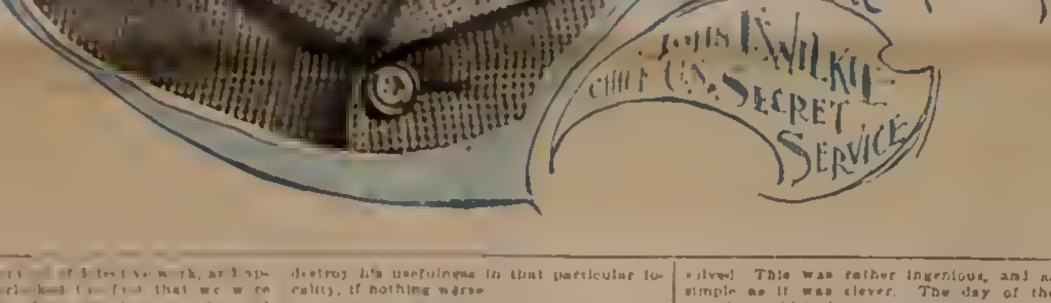
HOW OUR SECRET SERVICE MEN —RAN TO EARTH— THE SPIES OF SPAIN.

—A Peep Behind the Scenes.—

Chief of the United States Secret Service Tells of the Inside Working of His Department.

I assigned to the work an operative speaking all the Continental languages, thoroughly familiar with Austria, Germany and Spain, and otherwise especially well equipped for the task before him. He called upon the Doctor, [illegible] Germany, begged a private interview and then confided to him that he was anxious to do something for Spain. He alluded touchingly to the natural sympathy for his beautiful countrywoman, who was being so sorely tried. He had met Count L——, who was here on a political mission, and had spoken to him of his desire.

A Bit of Strategy.



[illegible] Washington que se ahorco o lo ahorcaron, y otro ante ayer en [illegible] por parte de [illegible]. "We [illegible] bad luck, for they have captured the two best spies [illegible] in Washington [illegible] hung, and the other day before yesterday in Tampa. There is extraordinary vigilance on the part of the [illegible]. [illegible] Ramon Carranza to Señor Don Jose Gomez Ymas, May [illegible]

By John Elbert Wilkie, Chief of the United States Secret Service.

T[illegible] [illegible] as the former Naval A[illegible] of [illegible] late S[illegible] was [illegible] gratifying [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] There are [illegible] many matters [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] work is [illegible] about which [illegible] write.

When it became ap[illegible] [illegible] with Spain was [illegible] [illegible] the advice of Secretary Gage and Assistant Secretary Vanderlip [illegible] an [illegible] force of the secret service [illegible] the Treasury Department. This was necessary [illegible] the regular force [illegible] [illegible] the government is maintained [illegible] an appropriation which may [illegible] drawn [illegible] [illegible] for expenses [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] became available the President made a [illegible] allotment of [illegible] for [illegible] use, and [illegible] weeks later increased this by [illegible] [illegible], it was estimated, would be sufficient to [illegible].

The [illegible] of the fact that there had been a special allotment for an addition to the secret service made it [illegible] necessary to a [illegible] for men. The applications during the first thirty days exceeded a thousand [illegible] the pressure for appointment became embarrassing, but the peculiar nature of the work [illegible] men would have to do made it essential that they should be thoroughly familiar with Spanish. This quickly [illegible] of [illegible] than [illegible] per cent of the applicants, [illegible] the remainder there were few who possessed the other qualifications—detective experience, rugged health, strength, courage and enthusiasm.

There's No Money in It.

It is morally certain that when the force was completed there was not a man among them who was there for what there was "in it." The pay being [illegible] a day and travelling and living expenses, the latter limited to $3 a day. With one exception they were under forty years of age. All of them fairly bubbled over with loyalty, were determined to make a record and were ready for any emergency that might arise. It may surprise a great many persons to know that the auxiliary force of the secret service during the war was smaller than the local staff of a large metropolitan newspaper, but as the men were unusually intelligent and reliable it was possible to satisfactorily cover the country with a comparatively small number of operatives.

Thanks to a patriotic public, the division was early supplied with much information relating to suspicious strangers. A realization of the danger to the country from these internal enemies [illegible] every one on the alert, until [illegible] fairly [illegible] [illegible]. Most of them were founded on trivial suspicion. [illegible] more than a [illegible] of the "suspects" reported [illegible] were [illegible] investigated. The greater [illegible] of these were found to be [illegible] [illegible] but only [illegible] [illegible] as to threaten what they [illegible] [illegible] they had [illegible] were [illegible] [illegible] that they were [illegible] making trouble for themselves.

[illegible] it was possible the men were kept at headquarters in Washington for some time [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] mysterious [illegible], there was an excellent opportunity to test [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], especially in the important matter of [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible]. They were [illegible] general idea of their duties, but [illegible] an [illegible] [illegible] was not always [illegible].

However, it is [illegible] that [illegible] failure. In that particular case I was [illegible] [illegible] from the start [illegible] the agent would have to work and explain [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] he reached his station, and had to be [illegible].

In Touch with Washington.

Each operative was provided with a cipher code for telegraphic [illegible], and when his territory had been assigned was expected to keep in constant touch with Washington. In my private office at headquarters I had a large map of the United States, mounted in a flat cabinet, and by means of small numbered flags attached to it [illegible] was able to locate every man on the force at a glance. [illegible], Washington, Newport News, Savannah, Jacksonville, Tampa, Key West, Mobile, New Orleans, Galveston, San Francisco and the army camps were the principal points of activity.

Tampa was a particularly lively district, for in addition to the Secret Service men in the field there a branch of the Military Information Bureau, under the jurisdiction of the War Department, was maintained, and during the latter part of the war was useful in looking after thefts of army stores, deserters and military offenders of all classes. Montreal was a good second in the matter of activity, though there were times when Washington led them all.

Occasionally, when the pressure was particularly heavy, it became necessary to detail the regular members of the division to run out certain lines of investigation, their expenses at such times being defrayed from the defence fund. Of the thousand or more "suspects" something over six hundred men and women were at one time or another under close surveillance for varying periods, among them professors, diplomats, doctors, merchants, cigarmakers, mariners, electrical experts, government employes of foreign birth and uncertain antecedents, capitalists, milliners, dressmakers, society women and servants. Every man in the service was required to make a detailed daily report covering his operations, and there were revealed a great many interesting things that had nothing whatever to do with the Spanish-American war.

Some Queer Applicants.

Most of the applications for appointment, which came from every State in the Union, and from England, Canada and Mexico as well, bore evidences of having been written by intelligent men actuated by a loyal ambition to serve their country. About half of them were addressed to the War Department, but there being no Secret Service in that branch of the government they were referred to the Treasury Department for consideration. Many of the writers confessed to an [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] work, and apparently overlooked the fact that we were dealing with a foe whose language was not our own, but among the hundreds and hundreds of letters there were many whose authors [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] general qualifications necessary for the work.

[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] age was [illegible] question. Another pointed out that [illegible] the fortunate possessor of "Spanish [illegible]" [illegible] work among the enemy with [illegible] safety. As an example of the queer applications received the following [illegible] well worth quoting:—

"I [illegible] for my services to the government [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] I am a man [illegible] [illegible] and travelled [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] my [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] them to so I get among all [illegible] I [illegible] language [illegible] german and the american or english [illegible] as for writing [illegible] can see for yourself."

The early establishment of a "crank" box was a necessity. Hardly a day passing without a letter or two from some irresponsible visionary or out and out lunatic. There were stacks of anonymous communications threatening death and destruction to every one connected with the "unholy" war, and scores of suggestions from demented persons who had inspired plans for the annihilation of all Spanish emissaries. Then there was a class of cranks with hallucinations that they were being dogged by Spanish spies, or had danger of assassinating the President and overturning buildings.

Cranks Were Numerous.

Where such letters were signed and it was possible to locate the writer the matter was always investigated, but in no instance was the author found to be a responsible person. Not all the cranks stopped at writing to the department. Many of them called at the office and were led gently away, introduced to the guards at the doors of the Treasury Building and thereafter refused admittance. One enterprising woman succeeded in getting in to see me, however, with a unique scheme to ascertain the identity of the leading Spanish agents in this country.

"This is my plan," she said enthusiastically, after introducing herself. "As soon as you engage my services I shall go to New York and look about among the theatres until I find where the most patriotic audiences gather. Then at one of the evening performances, when they are all cheering for the United States, I shall stand up in my seat and cry, 'Spain forever! Hurrah for Alfonso!' Of course I shall be arrested and the matter will get into the papers, and I shall be visited by the friends of Spain, who will be convinced that I am a sympathizer. So, gradually, I shall be able to worm my way into their confidence until I shall have gained all their secrets. Now won't that be lovely?"

The chances being that if she tried it the audience might not leave enough of her to sympathize with, and as she looked as if her children might need attention, she was advised to go home. She departed reluctantly, thoroughly convinced that the government was making a fatal mistake in declining her services.

When the "emergency men," as the temporary employes of the division were termed, were instructed in the use of the cipher code they were told that in communicating with headquarters they should use, instead of my name, "John Uhlen," which I had registered with the telegraph companies. This was simply a precautionary measure intended to protect the operatives by eliminating the chance that some one might discover the message was for the Secret Service, identify the sender as a member of the division, and destroy his usefulness in that particular locality, if nothing worse.

An Intercepted Telegram.

Out of this arrangement grew a curious incident. In the latter part of May a young Western newspaper correspondent, stationed in Washington, sent in his card, asking to see me on important and confidential business. When admitted he explained that a telegraph operator, whom he had known for years in the West and who had been transferred to the capital, had intercepted a cipher message from Montreal the night before, and believed it was from the Spanish headquarters to an agent here. We were particularly interested in the Spanish messages at that time, having possession of a cipher that was being used in some of their correspondence, and the newspaper man, knowing this, had suggested to his friend the operator that the suspected communication be submitted to our office.

He had tried to translate it, but was unable to succeed, and he wondered if we would have better luck. The copy of the mysterious message which he then produced and placed before me on the desk, was addressed to my alias, the original, from one of my men, being in a drawer at my side. Under the circumstances I felt moderately certain that we could get at its meaning, but without explaining to the correspondent I told him that if we did succeed in deciphering it, and the contents were of such a character as to permit of their publication, he should have a "scoop" on it. This satisfied him, and he went away.

A little later I called up the telegraph company and asked that the operator in question should be sent to the office for a moment. In a few minutes he was ushered in—a young, bright faced fellow, with plenty of color in his cheeks and an air of suppressed excitement. I only guessed that he felt his discovery had been of value to the government, and he was to be rewarded in some way. In reply to my question he detailed how he had received the message, and how, when it occurred to him that it might be from one Spanish agent to another, he had surreptitiously obtained a copy of it. The fact that it bore no local address had made it doubly suspicious, as it indicated that it was to be called for.

An Awkward Interview.

"Didn't it occur to you to see if the person to whom it was addressed was registered in the office with delivery directions?"

"No, sir."

"Well, if you had consulted your company's books you would have discovered that I am 'John Uhlen,' and that this is a government message."

The poor fellow's face was a study when he realized that he had held out an official telegram and had turned it over to a newspaper man. He appreciated the gravity of the offence in violating his oath as an operator, and felt that his position was as good as gone, under circumstances that would make it impossible for him to obtain employment with any company. He said nothing, but his eyes filled with tears.

"Have you a family?"

"No, sir, but I am supporting my old father and mother."

"Your motive was the best in the world," I said finally, "but your methods are open to criticism. Now, nothing shall be said to the company about this, but if in the future you catch any mysterious messages, just bring them straight to me without intrusting them to any outsider. If your newspaper friend had succeeded in translating this message it might have been awkward for all of us."

This was quite true, for the message in question detailed briefly, but completely, the capture of the Carranza letter. He gave me a grateful pressure of the hand, and the incident was closed.

Some Clever Ciphers.

Apropos of ciphers, there were several employed by the Spanish. There was a "figure" cipher which we were unable to translate, and there was another whose mystery we solved. This was rather ingenious, and as simple as it was clever. The day of the month on which the communication was written was the key. For instance, if the letter was dated on the 6th, the sixth letter of the alphabet, "f," was used in place of "a," "g" instead of "b" and so on. This gave a change for every day in the month.

Among the letters seized on the steamer Panama we found several in which, after completing what looked like an ordinary commonplace letter, the author had written the secret information between the lines in sympathetic ink, which developed only on being subjected to a temperature almost high enough to scorch the paper. There were a number of these from Mexico to suspected individuals in New Orleans, relating to the purchase of supplies to be shipped to the open ports of Cuba, and up to the time that the blockade was extended to include the whole island there was a large and constant movement of supplies from this country to Vera Cruz.

Some of the most delicate and interesting work of the department was that involving the "testing" of suspects. Given a clever operative, who could speak Spanish like a native, and the right opportunity, it was moderately certain that within a comparatively short time the subject of the investigation could be induced to declare himself. There were a few cases, however, where the conditions were peculiar and the accomplishment of the task decidedly difficult.

One of these, with a touch of comedy in it, was that of a certain German doctor in an Eastern city, whose social position was of the highest and whose reputation was the best. Several letters had been received warning us that the doctor was a most dangerous spy. He was not naturalized and before hostilities broke out had been an avowed friend of Spain. It was stated that last year he had gone abroad, ostensibly to visit Germany, but that as a matter of fact he had gone to Austria, and afterward to Spain, and now was certainly acting as an agent for the enemy.

Investigating the Doctor.

After sending to several of the writers of the warning letters and establishing the fact that they were reputable and responsible persons, arrangements were made for a careful watch upon the doctor. His associations were found to include no suspicious individuals, his actions were rational, and he seemed to be behaving himself like an ordinary mortal. The facts against him were that he was an outspoken advocate of Spain, writing and speaking in her behalf, openly denouncing this country for its part in the conflict, and expressing the hope that victory might rest with the Spanish arms.

Yet this was in a sense in his favor, for it seemed more than likely a secret agent would cloak his operations under a pretended friendship for this country. But he was an influential man, with many acquaintances in governmental positions, and if the charges were well founded would be a dangerous enemy, because he was so situated as to easily obtain very important information. It was therefore extremely desirable to fix his exact status. The question was whether he was doing more than employing mere moral force in behalf of Spain. Any one could obtain his friendly view of the Dons for the asking, but if he was engaged on a secret mission it would require exceedingly delicate work to ascertain the truth.

It chanced that the first week in May I had made a short trip to the West, and on the "limited" formed the acquaintance of a foreign gentleman, an Austrian, en route to Mexico. He had given me his card, a very formidable black bordered affair, identifying him as Count L——, of Vienna, an officer of the Society of Jesus. I had kept the pasteboard, and one day, while the case of the German doctor was under consideration, a glance at it in my desk suggested a plan which was soon given a trial.

[illegible] who has been so sorely tried. He had met Count L——, who was here on a political mission, and had spoken to him of his desire.

A Bit of Strategy.

The Count had told him of the great friendship of Austria for Spain, and had advised him that if he wished to serve her he could not do better than call upon the famous Doctor X, who was in a position to instruct him, because, as the Count had intimated to him in the strictest confidence, the Doctor was doing a little quiet secret work for Spain. The Count had written the doctor's name and address on one of his own cards. Here it was. Now would the good Doctor tell him how he could serve poor Spain? No mission would be too dangerous for him to undertake.

The Doctor was much agitated during his visitor's recital, which was carried on in a cautious whisper, and when it was finished was silent for a time. Finally he said that though he felt honored at the confidence displayed in his discretion, and would be glad to advise his friend, he himself dared do no more than write and speak for the downtrodden nation.

We were satisfied from the result of the test that the Doctor was not a spy, and thereafter disregarded the warnings concerning him. A curious sequel to the agent's call was that a few days later the Austrian Minister was obliged to deny a foolish story to the effect that his government was preparing to make a friendly demonstration in behalf of Spain. I fancy the origin of the rumor might have been traced to my friend the Doctor, who overestimated the Austrian Count's revelation to the nervous man who was so anxious to do something for an unhappy people.

Strangely enough, the two best spies to whom Lieutenant Carranza refers in his more or less famous letter to his uncle were not Spaniards. Both were of English birth, and neither even spoke Spanish. Both are dead—one destroyed himself in prison and the other fell a victim to deadly typhoid while incarcerated in Fort McPherson. The circumstances leading up to the arrest of these men are interesting in that they illustrate two widely different phases of the work of the agents of the emergency force of the federal secret service.

Shadowing the Former Minister.

One of the first men employed in the special investigation was a young New Yorker of good family and excellent social position. A long residence abroad had given him a fluent command of modern languages. He was the possessor of much natural shrewdness, and his courage was unquestioned. He was sent to Toronto immediately after the departure of Señor Polo y Barnabe, with instructions to keep headquarters advised of the movements of the former Minister's party, to look carefully after those who might connect with them in any way, and to do both without arousing suspicion.

He was fortunate in securing a room adjoining that occupied by Lieutenant Carranza, and as there was a connecting door, against which the head of his bed was placed, he was beautifully situated for his purpose. Early on the morning of Friday, May 6, an earnest conversation, this time in English, was being carried on in the Lieutenant's room. It lasted for an hour or more. The Lieutenant's visitor showed an intimate knowledge of the American navy and referred to his own services on the Brooklyn.

Carranza first satisfied himself that the man knew what he was talking about, and then arranged for him to go to Washington, where he was to secure certain information and forward it to Montreal, for which point the former Minister was to leave that afternoon. Instructions were given in the use of the code for telegraphing, and there was much further talk in a tone too low to be understood, but the stranger was finally heard to say, "Then I am [illegible] to this address [illegible]."

Capturing a Spy.

Carranza assented, and our agent, believing the visit was at an end, opened the door and stepped into the hall. He had timed his movements well, for Carranza was just bidding his visitor farewell. Together the secret service man and the stranger walked through the hall, the former asking a light for his cigarette as they passed down the stairway. At the door they separated. The suspect was shadowed to an obscure hotel, where it was ascertained that he had registered as "Alexander Cree" and that he was to leave the city that evening.

(CONTINUED ON PAGE THREE)

WITNESSES WERE BEHIND THE SCREEN.

Freeman and Murphy Heard Lawyer Pratt's Conversation.

OCTOBER 23, 1898.

Mrs. Abbie M. Bryant Says Pratt Offered Her a Bribe.

STRUGGLE FOR A PRIZE.

Developments in the Litigation Over William Murdock's $300,000 Estate.

Mrs Annie M Bryant of [illegible] Kearny street yesterday signed an affidavit in which she says that Delos Pratt, real estate agent, endeavored to induce her to testify falsely in the case of Mrs. Mary Helen Murdock against Adam Compton, W. P. Harrington and E. H. Burton, executors of the estate of the late William Murdock, who left an estate in Glenn county, this State, estimated to be worth $300,000.

William Murdock died three years ago, and among the first of the claimants to present a bill against his estate was Mrs. Murdock, who asked for payment of a note of which the following is a copy:

[illegible] OLIMPO, September 5, 1877.
Twenty years after date without grace, I promise to pay to the order of Mary Helen Murdock [illegible] one hundred thousand dollars for value received, with interest at 1 per cent a [illegible] from date until paid, both principal and interest payable only in United States gold coin.
[illegible] WILLIAM MURDOCK.

Payment was refused by the managers of the estate, and on the maturity of the note suit was begun in the Superior Court of Glenn county. Mrs. Murdock was called on to explain how she got the note and to show what consideration, if any, there was for its execution. In a deposition taken in the case Mrs. Murdock swore that the note was given in consideration of a debt due from William Murdock to Samuel Murdock, her husband's father. She further explained that it was understood that the money was to be for the benefit of her children, who are the grandchildren of Samuel Murdock.

Mr Pratt has taken part in the litigation on behalf of the estate, and Mrs. Bryant says that he offered to compensate her if she could "remember" that Mrs Murdock and L. F. Megginson had talked in her presence about the note being given to her [illegible] love and affection," and that they must [illegible] careful not to speak of the note until after William Murdock's death lest the other heirs should hear of it and make trouble. On the witness stand Mrs. Bryant said that though she never promised to [illegible] as Mr. Pratt requested, yet he expected [illegible] to do so. In support of her allegation that Pratt had approached her as she alleged she submitted to Notary Holland Smith two written documents, covering the points which she said Pratt told her she must in[illegible] in her testimony, in order to earn the reward which he was prepared to give her. [illegible] questioned by Attorney E S Pillsbury on behalf of the executors of William Murdock's will, Mrs. Bryant swore to exactly the opposite of what she said Pratt had written out for her. In the cross-examination by Attorneys W. M Cannon and Frank Freeman of Mrs. Bryant on the manner in which she was approached by Mr. Pratt she said that Pratt called and wanted [illegible] about the Murdock case.

[illegible]

Mrs Bryant said Pratt told her the money was to be paid by Mr. Wadsworth of the Wells-Fargo Bank on Mr Pillsbury's order; that it had all been arranged, and that all Pillsbury said was law and all right, and any money that was necessary he could take; that Pratt said other witnesses were to back her up, and gave the names of Young, Dunn and Turner, and Pratt said after the others had testified he would read their depositions and corroborate all they said; that he was to be the main witness, with most of the responsibility, and would have most of the money; that Pratt told her they all intended to maintain that the note was a forgery and that the job was put up by Mrs Murdock and Megginson, or that it was without valid consideration; that Mrs. Murdock had offered to settle for $20,000, but they didn't intend to let her have a cent, as they would rather spend the money for witnesses.

A note from Mr. Pillsbury's office to Pratt asking him to call on Mr. Pillsbury was produced by Mrs. Bryant. She testified that Pratt dropped it during one of his visits.

In the closing part of Mrs. Bryant's deposition there was a surprise, for she swore that during her last consultation with Pratt, on the 18th inst, Mr. Freeman and James Murphy were present, though Pratt did not see them.

Mr. Pillsbury—Where were Mr. Freeman and Mr Murphy?

Mrs. Bryant—They were behind a very large screen that I have in my room.

Mr. Freeman was not in the city yesterday, but Mr. Murphy corroborated Mrs. Bryant's testimony so far as it related to the conversation on the 18th inst.

E. S. Pillsbury scoffed at Mrs. Bryant's story when the matter was mentioned to him last night. "This whole thing is too flimsy and ridiculous to be seriously considered for a moment," said Mr Pillsbury. "It is simply preposterous that I would pick up a stranger to approach a lodging-house woman for the purpose of getting her to swear to anything of that kind. Besides, she is not of such great importance, as there are other witnesses who have information similar to what she said she could tell. I did not know Pratt, but Mr. McCarthy with whom he is associated said he was all right, and when he said he could ascertain what she knew of the Murdock note, and when he told me that he wanted to get even with Megginson, who was interested on the other side, I consented that he might make the attempt. He said it would be all right and that the woman would be a good witness unless the people who were interested in the note should offer her money, when she would probably forget all that she knew.

"I told him that if she broached the subject of money to drop her and have nothing to do with her. He represented that she had told him a straight story and was willing to give her deposition, so I had her subpenaed in the usual way. Of course it was a great surprise, the story that she told when she did appear, but it is one of those things that might happen to any attorney who is attempting in a proper way to ascertain what testimony there is to sustain his client's cause. It is evident that Mrs. Bryant is in with Mrs. Murdock and Megginson and that it is all part of a scheme to bolster up their plot to rob the estate of the dead man, Murdock. Such an outrageous scheme was never hatched before. They tried to keep it a secret until Murdock's death, but through their attempt to borrow money on the instrument he heard of it when he was in a hospital in this city, and insisted on getting up from his bed and going to Glenn county, where he said he would confront Mrs. Murdock and denounce the whole thing as a base forgery. He started and almost reached his destination, but he caught cold from the change of air and died of pneumonia within forty-eight hours. All this was testified to by Mr Lusk at the hearing in the probate court in Glenn county.

"It seems that Pratt did actually give the woman her note for the sum mentioned in her deposition. He said he considered it worthless and that it was only a joke to give it to her. I never knew that he wrote out what he said she told him, and he explains that by saying that he did it for his own protection, so that if she did not stick to her original story he would have the writing to show what she had told him in the first place. After considering the matter I came to the conclusion that Pratt was overzealous in his effort to obtain testimony to injure his enemy, Megginson, but I do not doubt that Mrs. Bryant told him the story as he represented it to me. All that talk about Mr. Wadsworth and the Wells-Fargo Bank is merely rubbish without a word of truth in it. Mr. Wadsworth assures me that Mr. Pratt never spoke to him about the matter and that he never spoke to any one about the Murdock case."

MRS. BOTKIN IS INDICTED.

THE ACCUSED MUST STAND TRIAL HERE.

A TRUE BILL TO BE PRESENTED TODAY TO JUDGE BELCHER.

No New Evidence of a Material Nature Given by the Many Witnesses That Were Heard.

[illegible]

[illegible] candy seals in the room occupied by Mrs. Botkin at the Victoria, Mrs. Birdie Pike, landlady of the Victoria, who found Mrs. Botkin carry to her room a box resembling that in which the candy was sent to Mrs. Dunning, Thomas Price, a chemist, who examined the candy in the box sent to Mrs Dunning and found it to contain arsenic, Theodore Kytka, a handwriting expert, who thought Mrs. Botkin had written the superscription on the box of candy and also the note contained in the box, Detective McVey of Dover, Del., who worked up the Eastern end of the case, Postal Inspector Kirch, who had expert knowledge of the postmark on the box of candy sent to Mrs. Dunning and Police Stenographer Herman, who took the depositions of all local witnesses.

LEES WILL NOT POSE AS A KIDNAPER.

Plain Truth About the Botkin Abduction Story.

OCTOBER 10, 1898.

Attorney Knight's Talk of a Tugboat Aroused the Chief's Ire.

A SCHEME THAT FAILED.

Supreme Court Will Pass on the Question of the Prisoner's Extradition.

[illegible]

FORGERS ON TRIAL.

Three Jurors Were Accepted This Morning.

Record of the Bank Swindlers, Becker and Creegan.

After a full morning's work the attorneys in the Becker-Creegan forgery case managed to find three acceptable jurors.

The names of the gentlemen whose answers met the approval of the prosecution and defense are George L. Humphrey, 27 [illegible] street, W. H. McDonald, 716 Larkin street, and M. Thorny, 716 [illegible] street.

Neither of the above named had any recollection of the former trial and outside of the defendants, and they had no acquaintance with Chief Lees or with any of his subordinates.

The second trial of the now celebrated case will be closely watched by the banking interests of the United States.

Charles Becker, who is accused of having done the pen work in the Nevada Bank forgery, is universally regarded as the most expert forger in the world. His marvelous skill has contributed to the success of nearly every great forgery [illegible] [illegible] and his fame as a forger is not equalled in the United States [illegible] of the principal cities of [illegible] and the continent. The police and detective authorities of the world have for years unsuccessfully sought to effect his capture.

Becker, however, in all his operations has managed to keep himself in the background so successfully that it is believed he never had suffered a conviction before his arrest in connection with the crime for which he is about to undergo his second trial.

James Creegan, his codefendant, was the financial backer of the coterie of swindlers and bank thieves that followed in the wake of Becker.

In this recent trial the prosecution is handicapped by a lack of evidence, independent of the testimony of the two accomplices, Dean and McCluskey. It was upon the testimony of the two last named that the former conviction was had, but as there was no evidence to corroborate their testimony the Supreme Court, applying the settled rule of law, was compelled to grant a new trial. Whether the prosecution will be able in this trial to corroborate the evidence given by Dean and McCluskey is a question. Chief Lees says he can, and it is certain that he has left no stone unturned in that regard.

This afternoon the defense having exhausted the statutory number of challenges, the entire jury was selected and the trial was begun at once.

OCTOBER 19, 1898.

ARGUED FOR MRS. BOTKIN.

McGowan Raises Some Intricate Law Points.

A DECISION WILL BE RENDERED SATURDAY.

FIVE JUDGES LISTEN TO THE ARGUMENTS FOR THE DEFENSE.

Chief Lees Says the Prisoner Must Stand Trial in This State if She Is Not Extradited.

Arguments were concluded yesterday in the habeas corpus proceedings of Mrs Cordelia Botkin. Superior Judges Cook, Seawell, Borden, Wallace and Troutt, sitting in bank, took the case under advisement and will render a decision on Saturday morning at 10 o'clock. Mrs. Botkin's attorneys are confident that their client will not be taken to Delaware and tried on the charges of poisoning Mrs. Dunning and Mrs Deane, as demanded by the [illegible] of that state.

Mrs. Botkin was [illegible] in mind and more confident in manner during her stay in Judge Cook's courtroom yesterday than during the day before, when she had occasional fits of [illegible]. She wore the same tailor-made gown of dark blue serge as then and was accompanied by her sister, Miss [illegible] Brown. Frank McGowan, one of her attorneys, was the principal speaker, and his argument for the defense was a rounding out of the case for both sides. Frequently during his speech, which occupied the time from 10:15 o'clock till after noon, one or more of the Judges questioned him on certain points presented, or conferred with each other as to their understanding of authorities and precedents.

As heretofore, the principal point discussed dealt with the fact of whether or not Mrs. Botkin is a fugitive from Delaware. McGowan said that the three main propositions of the prosecution were: First, the contention that the provision in the Constitution of the United States on the subject is to be construed liberally and in another sense than that appearing on its face; secondly, that this is a case of constructive flight and within the provisions of the Constitution, and that therefore Mrs. Botkin is amenable to the law of Delaware; thirdly, that the question was one of comity.

He cited numerous authorities against a liberal construction of the provision. He endeavored to show that the courts have been against extending the State power of extradition at all times. He declared that it would frequently work injustice and that any extension of the constitutional meaning would be the loophole for many acts of [illegible]. He said further that the law of the land was against such a thing as constructive presence.

He said that the Constitution sought to protect the rights of citizens. The real rule of construction is to determine the meaning of the lawmakers, and those who framed the provision could not have intended any meaning but that the flight from justice must be actual. He said that the opposing counsel after quoting but the dissenting opinion in the [illegible] case to support their side. This gave the defense little to combat and made their task easy. A dissenting opinion may be worthy of grave consideration, but it cannot have the weight of a majority opinion.

He urged that the main proposition for consideration was whether a person has not a legal right, which cannot [illegible] by a state, to demand in turn proof that he was in the State where the crime is said to have been committed. McGowan said this was not a question of presumption, but of fact. The flight from a State must be physical to put the accused within the constitutional provision. He summed up his argument by declaring that if Mrs. Botkin had been in Delaware after even the slightest intimation of the crime, she would then, and then only, be a fugitive from that state. That the Constitution was the highest authority on the subject of extradition and that no state could abrogate or increase the powers delegated to it by the Constitution in the matter of extradition.

The question of comity was disposed of by Judge Cook, who stated that they would listen to no arguments in that line.

Judge Wallace asked McGowan where the crime was committed. McGowan would not answer directly and said that this particular was not under discussion.

In conclusion he said that there was no warrant for any different construction of the Constitution than that known at the time the document was written, and that it would be an encroachment on the rights of the people to change this construction. Mrs. Botkin was not a fugitive, and he believed their honors would so decide.

Judge Cook said that owing to the mass of authorities necessary to look up there would be no decision until Saturday morning, when the five Judges would act upon the case.

Chief Lees said after court had adjourned that the granting of the writ of habeas corpus would not mean the liberation of the prisoner. "That would be nonsense and injustice," he said. "The return to the writ shows that a crime has been committed and that Mrs Botkin is charged with murder. The Judges must commit her even if they favor the defense in granting the writ. That would simply mean that she will not be extradited, but must stand trial for her crime here."

HAS NO HOPE FOR JUSTICE.

Mrs. Botkin's Husband Is Fearful of Her Extradition.

STOCKTON, October 18.—W. A. Botkin of this city, husband of Mrs Cordelia Botkin, is much chagrined over the action of Governor Budd in signing the extradition warrant after what he had previously stated in the matter.

"I do not believe they will get my wife back to Delaware," said he, "but if they decide to extradite her she might just as well be hung at once, for feeling [illegible] there will justify [illegible] in this case. The people of that State would [illegible] the penalty for the crime committed, and whether she might be [illegible] there [illegible] be convicted [illegible]."

Forgers on Trial.

The second trial of Becker and Creegan, the Nevada Bank forgers, was commenced in Judge Wallace's court yesterday. It is likely that the jury will be completed today. On a former trial both men were convicted. The Supreme Court on appeal granted a new trial. Chief Lees is confident of a conviction on the present trial and claims to have evidence which will supply all the requirements of the Supreme Court decision.

DRAWING TO A CLOSE.

Argument in the Noted Becker-Creegan Case.

The famous Becker-Creegan forgery case, which has been on trial before Superior Judge Wallace and a jury for more than three weeks, is drawing to a close. This, the second trial of the facts and circumstances in relation to the criminal conspiracy by which the Nevada Bank was defrauded of $[illegible] in gold coin, has attracted the attention of the entire [illegible] world, for Karl Becker, known to the police by the sobriquet of "The Dutchman," enjoys the reputation of being the greatest and most dangerous forger of bank paper in the world.

After the former trial and the sentence of the defendants to life imprisonment at Folsom penitentiary there was [illegible] rejoicing among the bankers, who felt that a great victory had been accomplished. The court then, however, [illegible] as it was upon the testimony of two accomplices, Dean and McCluskey, could not stand the scrutiny of the Supreme Court, and much to the chagrin of Chief Lees and the Pinkertons the defendants were granted a new trial. The familiar rule of law that a person cannot be convicted upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice had [illegible] saved the king of forgers and his friend Creegan from the doom of life imprisonment pronounced by Judge Wallace, and in the present case the prosecution entered upon the trial handicapped by the decision of the Supreme Court.

A serious effort has been made to corroborate the stories told by Dean and McCluskey, and it is seriously urged that the purpose has been accomplished. Some material changes have been made in the order of proof, points made before have been elaborated, and every possible effort made to build up a case in which it will be impossible to pick a flaw. Chief Lees [illegible] to be certain that the purpose has been accomplished, and [illegible], the chief witness, says that he has this time told a much stronger story than on the former trial.

Peter F. Dunne, attorney for the defendants, concluded a masterly analysis of the evidence at the morning session today. Mr. Dunne dissected the testimony of Dean and McCluskey bit by bit, showed many material points of difference in their stories, and argued therefrom that the witnesses for the prosecution had made an attempt to bolster up the prosecution's case. He showed that the present story of these witnesses was in some respects different from the testimony given at the former trial.

Attorney Ach will make the closing argument for the people this afternoon and the case will go to the jury tomorrow.

Becker-Creegan Case.

Theodore Kytka, handwriting expert, is [illegible] for the prosecution [illegible] the trial of Becker & Creegan [illegible] [illegible] Bank forger. [illegible] [illegible] plate of [illegible] handwriting [illegible] identified them as having been written by the same hand that [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].

MRS. BOTKIN MUST GO.

How the Prisoner May Be Taken to Delaware for Trial.

The enemies of Mrs. Botkin think they have at last discovered a way to circumvent the extradition process and take that interesting person to Delaware for trial.

The suggestion of the new scheme was found in the opinion of Judge Cook, or rather in that part of the opinion wherein the court suggested that there was power in the national government to make such a use of the mails as Mrs. Botkin is alleged to have made murder. Of course it is admitted that to that end an act of Congress [illegible], and as [illegible] forbidden by the constitution, any such act even if passed by Congress would be inoperative against Mrs. Botkin. However, the suggestion that the jurisdiction [illegible] such a misuse of the mails is in the United States has set the authorities to thinking, and to this effect.

It will be remembered that the box of poisoned candy had a message alleged to have been in the handwriting of Mrs. Botkin. Now a box of candy is included in mail matter of the fourth class and the Federal statute makes it a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine, to include any writing in mail matter of the fourth class. The statute is found in section [illegible] of the postal regulations, and is part of the act of Congress of March, 1889. The statute also provides that a violation may be prosecuted either at the place where the package was mailed or at the place of its destination.

It is contended therefore that a proceeding can be commenced in United States Court in Delaware against Mrs. Botkin for the alleged violation of the above section, and that as the criminal process of the United States Courts extends to every part of the country, Mrs. Botkin can be taken from this State to Delaware to be tried for the misdemeanor. Of course once within the State of Delaware it is familiar law that she can be arrested on process of the State courts for murder, for having found her within the jurisdiction of the State the courts will not inquire as to the manner of her coming provided she was not brought thither by fraud.

The Federal statute provides a fine of $10 for the particular infraction of the postal laws, now under consideration, and in ordinary circumstances, a person accused of having violated the law, would offer to pay the fine here and avoid the inconvenience of a forced trip to Delaware. It is pointed out, however, that Mrs. Botkin could not do that without admitting that she did mail the box of poisoned candy, and thus furnish the missing link in the evidence necessary to convict her of the murder of Mrs. Dunning. Should she do that, as a matter of course, she could be successfully prosecuted under section 27 of the Penal Code of California.

The only possible objection to the scheme above outlined arises from the question as to what view the Federal courts might take upon the question as to the place at which the misdemeanor charge, growing out of the violation of the postal laws, should be tried whether it should be tried here or in Delaware where the package was received. As to that question, as the language of the statute permits a prosecution at either place, it is presumed by the authorities that the courts would decide in favor of the place where the complaints were filed, which, if the plan is put into execution, would be Delaware.

GEORGE A. KNIGHT IS OUT FOR THE SENATORSHIP.

The following open letter was given out by Mr. Knight yesterday:

TO THE PUBLIC.

I take this method of announcing to the people that in the event of the success of the Republican party in the election of a majority of the members of the Legislature this fall, I will become a candidate for United States Senator.

I believe it is but fair to the voter that those who aspire to that exalted position should so declare their candidacy before the election of members of the Legislature so that the citizen may have some idea at least for whom he is voting.

Should I be chosen United States Senator, I only can pledge the people to be honest with them, loyal to my party and true to my individual sense of right and justice.

I am a McKinley Republican, and if elected to the Senate will assist in holding up the hands of that wise statesman and in sustaining his policy.

I believe that this nation has a greater destiny than its founders ever dreamed of, and that no man or organization of men should be permitted to obstruct its progress; that every foot of soil acquired by the valor and blood of the American soldier and sailor should be retained as a part and parcel of this great republic; and that American industry and American commerce should be extended to the four quarters of the globe.

I feel that the people of California, knowing me as they do, will give me the credit of being at least the proprietor of my own manhood and of being independent of the domination of any individual or influence that may be considered inimical to the interests and well-being of the State—if they have not this confidence in me, I do not desire their support.

It has been my practice in every national and State campaign for the past twenty years to stump the State in behalf of the Republican ticket, the success of which, in my estimation, is paramount to the individual aspirations of any man. No one should be elected to that high office unless he be the decided choice of the Republicans of this State were they permitted to vote upon such choice.

In any event I am a Republican and a Californian, and in public or private station will do all I can to further the harmonious interests of both.

San Francisco, October 24, 1898.

GEO. A. KNIGHT.

MRS. KLUGE FILES SUIT.

She Wants Some of the Sutro Estate.

Says the Ex-Mayor Was the Father of Her Children.

Mrs. Clara Kluge, the alleged contract wife of the late Adolph Sutro, has filed her first proceeding to obtain a share of the Sutro estate.

Ex-Judge Van R. Paterson, on behalf of Mrs. Kluge, filed a petition asking that she be appointed guardian of her two children, known as Adolph Newton Sutro and Adolphine Charlotte Sutro.

Mrs. Kluge alleges that the children are the offspring of Adolph Sutro, deceased, [illegible] they have an estate situated in the city and county of San Francisco and that the appointment of a guardian is necessary to protect their interests.

The property in which the children above named are at present entitled consists of [illegible] of the estimated value of [illegible]. It is alleged that the above described property was conveyed to them by Adolph Sutro during the period that he was maintaining Mrs. Kluge at the house which he built for her at [illegible] and Clay streets. Mrs. Kluge also alleges that the children have a [illegible] interest in the estate of the late Adolph Sutro.

In connection with the above application for [illegible] of guardianship, it is stated that within a few days Mrs. Kluge will file a contest of the Sutro will in behalf of the children, and that she will demand a [illegible] share of the estate. In the contemplated proceeding Mrs. Kluge will seek to establish her claim as the contract wife of Adolph Sutro and in any event will make a strong effort to establish the paternity of her children.

Last week, Manager Gillingham says that Mrs. Thrupp [illegible] $15 on the strength that she wanted to give a dollar to each one of the members of her company. She did not do that, he says, but kept the money instead.

SAID HE "HELD UP" THE LADIES.

Public Administrator Criticised by Judge Coffey.

OCTOBER 11, 1898.

Believed That Mrs. Curtis and Miss Muir Were Imposed On.

THEY PAID A BIG FEE.

Advised From the Bench That They Need Not Comply With Their Contract.

"Suggestion has been made to the Court that you are not to receive the commissions that have been awarded to you as administratrices of the estate of Jacob Z. Davis," said Judge Coffey yesterday to Mrs. Hella Curtis and Miss Lizzie Muir, who were mentioned in decedent's will as legatees to the entire estate.

The ladies remained mute and the Judge asked if his understanding was correct.

"That is substantially true," said Mrs. Curtis.

"Who is to receive the commissions for the work you have done?" asked Judge Coffey.

The ladies hesitated and gave no answer. This appeared to nettle the Judge.

"I consider it my duty to know what is going on in this department," he said, "and it is proper for you to state to whom the money is to go. When I made the allowance I naturally presumed that the persons named in the petition were the real beneficiaries. If that is not so I wish to be informed."

"Public Administrator Freese is to get the commissions allowed us," explained Mrs. Curtis.

"Is that true?" asked Judge Coffey, addressing Miss Muir.

Miss Muir said she so understood it; that she and Mrs. Curtis acted under advice of counsel and signed a contract with Mr. Freese, not deeming it incumbent on her to consult the Court.

"How much did you pay him?" asked Judge Coffey.

"We paid $5,000 and signed a contract to give him the balance of all fees allowed to us in the administration of the estate," said Mrs. Curtis.

Judge Coffey responded, somewhat [illegible]:

"That the Public Administrator has done nothing in this estate. He has never appeared, so far as I know. He has not secured anything and you did not owe him anything. I don't see why you should have paid him a cent, much less $5,000. If you were [illegible] the money is now simply [illegible] the [illegible] that he could keep his hands off. That is true it appears, but this is not the first case [illegible] in which this has been done. I was told that the Sencion estate is another instance."

Attorney J. F. Campbell tried to point out the [illegible] though he considered the contract to pay Mr. Freese for the fees that would be earned by Mrs. Curtis and Miss Muir invalid, yet he could understand their feelings. It was represented to them that the Public Administrator would rampage about the place and try to take possession of all their furniture and everything in the house if they declined to pay him the fees he might earn, and that he might wreck the estate if they did not accede to his demands. Mr. Campbell was not in the case at the time, or he would have attempted to protect them from the apparent coercion which led them to sign a contract which he believed to be void for want of consideration.

"How about that?" demanded Judge Coffey of Attorney G. H. Mastick. "You acted as counsel for these ladies when the contract was made. Did you sanction this transaction?"

"I believe in giving the devil his due," said Mr. Mastick. "The offer came from us. We were afraid the Public Administrator might try to interfere, and it would have embarrassed us."

"But Mr. Davis did not die intestate and the Public Administrator had no right to come in at all," said Mr. Campbell.

"Yet we considered danger and the annoyance of litigation," replied Mr. Mastick.

"No doubt you thought you were in desperate straits because you were held up," said Judge Coffey. "People always feel that way when they are held up, and no doubt you sidestepped, as everybody does, when thinking of the Public Administrator. But if it is so you think that if you had applied to the Court you would have been spared the annoyance and the expense.

"You have already paid the Public Administrator $5,000. Well, that is ten times as much as he would have received if he had actually served as special administrator, which was the most he ever could have [illegible] in this matter, and he could not have obtained that much in this court, as the ladies were entitled to letters of special administration, according to the tenor of the will. But that is not all about this [illegible] transaction, for I am told that the Public Administrator claims $1,650 additional that has been awarded to these ladies."

"That is the contract," said Mrs. Curtis.

"Well, the Court advises you that you ought not to pay the balance claimed. The Public Administrator will never sue for it, or if he does he will never obtain judgment; and if I were in your place I think I would bring an action to recover the $5,000 already paid. You are entitled to it, and such a suit would be the means of [illegible] the Public Administrator's office a [illegible] at good character of [illegible] that were before I knew of this transaction. It goes to show the danger of writing letters."

Mr. Mastick had applied for $5,000 as a fee in settling the Davis estate, and the legatees thought $3,000 was enough. All matters considered, the Court allowed $1,000.

GETTING READY TO FIGHT FOR A FORTUNE.

Mrs. Clara Kluge-Sutro Has Been Appointed Guardian of Her Minor Children.

Judge Troutt has granted the application of Mrs. Clara Kluge-Sutro to be appointed guardian of her minor children, Adolphine Sutro and Adolph Sutro Jr. She declares these children to be the offspring of the late Adolph Sutro, and this is the first step in enforcing their demands for a share of the estate millions. The claim will be bitterly fought.

FORGERY CASE WITH THE JURY.

Becker and Creegan in Suspense as to the Verdict.

The second trial of Becker and Creegan for forgery closed yesterday and the case was given to the jury, which retired and was locked up. The case has been gone over very thoroughly and every point has been warmly contested by opposing counsel. Attorney [illegible] closed his argument yesterday afternoon. In his charge to the jury Judge Wallace carefully reviewed the evidence [illegible]

[illegible]

The first trial resulted in a conviction. The Supreme Court granted a new trial, holding that the evidence of Creegan [illegible] insufficient to convict. A strenuous fight was made on the second trial [illegible] whether with success.

WITNESSES TO COME WEST.

Delaware Authorities Discuss Plans in the Botkin Case.

Relatives of the Murdered Woman Will Give Testimony Here.

WILMINGTON (Del.), November 14.—Detective [illegible] was in consultation with Attorney-General White, to whom he reported his efforts to have Mrs. Botkin, the alleged poisoner, extradited to Delaware. The proceedings were reviewed at length, and the trip of Delaware's witnesses to California was discussed. John P. Dunning also was closeted with the authorities for an hour.

It was decided that the witnesses will leave for California November [illegible] in a special car, the object being to arrive in San Francisco the evening prior to the beginning of Mrs. Botkin's trial. Detective [illegible] and Attorney-General White will accompany the witnesses, who will be J. H. Deane and Mr. Dunning, husbands of the victims, Miss Millington, Miss Bateman, Harry Pennington and William [illegible], who were affected by the poisoned candy, [illegible] and Dr. Bishop, attending physicians, and [illegible]. The trial is set for December 19, before Judge Carroll Cook.

Chico

1900

INDIAN BOY'S COMPLAINT

Claimant for Alfred Fuller's Property Institutes Suit

Special to the Herald.

OROVILLE, March 13.—The original complaint filed by Wm. Fuller, alleged heir to the estate of Alfred Fuller, has been filed in the Clerk's office. It embodies the same matter identically as appeared in Fuller's petition filed in this county, asserting his heirship, that is, that he was born in Tuolumne county and is the son of Alfred Fuller by an Indian woman, Juana, and that he was publicly acknowledged as such by deceased during his lifetime.

MRS. BOTKIN TO BE TRIED HERE.

OCTOBER 25, 1898.

JUDGES REFUSE TO EXTRADITE.

MRS. CORDELIA BOTKIN will not be taken to Delaware for trial on the charge of poisoning Mrs. Dunning and Mrs. D[illegible]. Five Superior Judges decided [illegible]

"fled" or the words "from which he has fled" have been employed at all? Why the words "and who flees" [illegible] condition was not intended?

If the word "fled" and the words "from which he has fled" were elimin[illegible]

[illegible]

THE JURY FAILED TO AGREE.

NOVEMBER 17, 1898.

Becker and Creegan Will Be Tried Again.

Three Citizens Who Refused to Find the Forgers Guilty.

David Brooks, Edwin Lang and E H Seaman Held Out

Judge Wallace Sets the Case for Retrial Monday Morning Next

[illegible]

By special request of the [illegible] the men accused of perpetrating the famous Nevada Bank swindle by means of a draft raised from $12 to $22,000 will be tried for the third time almost immediately. Judge Wallace has set Monday morning next. There are two cases however which stand in the way of an immediate trial, one of which is that of Walter Reiner, the young militiaman from the Tennessee regiment, and these will occupy the whole of next week, probably. As a consequence the Becker-Creegan case will be continued from day to day and may be expected to come to trial by Monday week, the 28th.

The sudden [illegible] of the case was by no means liked by H. T. McPike of counsel for the defense. Mr. McPike had been in court continuously for three weeks, and so had his partner, Peter F. Dunne. Their clients' business suffered, naturally, and Mr. McPike [illegible] a rest from criminal practice a while. Besides the defense is not over-anxious to have the case tried again before Judge Wallace. That fact was made plain by Mr. McPike, who gave notice that on Monday next he would be prepared to show cause why a transfer of the case to another department should be given.

Before the jury retired last night Judge Wallace's [illegible] charge [illegible] been transcribed by his [illegible] stenographer, Robert F. Gallagher, was read by special request. It dealt at length with the law concerning accomplices and [illegible] [illegible] not very clear to the minds of a layman [illegible], upon the technical construction of the law as applied to the case at bar hung the refusal of the three jurymen to find a verdict of guilty.

[illegible]

AMES IN THE BOTKIN CASE.

Famed New York Expert Employed by the State.

HE HAS EXAMINED THE DUNNING LETTERS.

SATISFIED THAT THE SUSPECTED WOMAN WROTE THEM.

Noted Witness in the Fair Will Contest Will So Testify on the Trial of the Accused.

Additional weight was given yesterday to the police presumption that Mrs. Cordelia Botkin sent to Dover, Del., the box of poisonous bonbons which caused the deaths of Mrs. J. P. Dunning and Mrs. J. A. Deane. Daniel Ames, the noted handwriting expert of New York, who was such an important factor in the Fair will case, has declared that the alleged double murderess wrote the note accompanying the drugged candy and that she was also the author of the anonymous letters which warned Mrs. Dunning of her husband's alleged marital infidelity in this city.

In Chief Lees' office at the Central Station yesterday afternoon Expert Ames made an exhaustive examination of the chirographical exhibits in the Botkin case. He arrived from New York in the morning, having been brought here as a witness for the prosecution, and immediately reported to Chief Lees. The photographs taken by Theodore Kytka, the San Francisco handwriting expert, of undisguised notes written by Mrs. Botkin were submitted to Ames and compared with those of the anonymous notes in Chief Lees' budget of documentary exhibits.

Ames, after a thorough inspection of both sets of photographs, is said to have made the unqualified statement that one hand penned them all. His conclusion in this respect corroborates powerfully the testimony given by Theodore Kytka before the Grand Jury, at the time Mrs. Botkin's indictment was being considered [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] say that she could not be extradited. Chief Lees and District Attorney [illegible] will undoubtedly seek to have her indicted by the Grand Jury as soon as [illegible] and California will be [illegible] to see their trial that [illegible] fair [illegible] and as sensational as that of Durrant.

The decision yesterday did not result in an order for Mrs. Botkin's release on [illegible] The counsel [illegible] in the writ—that of extradition [illegible] but the Judges refused to [illegible] order until the matter of jurisdiction [illegible] is adjudicated. This will be done on Saturday, when arguments will be heard from both sides.

Noon was the hour set yesterday for the handing down of the decision by the five Judges sitting in bank, and promptly at that time [illegible] Judges Cook, Seawell, Troutt, Borden and Wallace, took their seats on the bench in [illegible] courtroom. Mrs. Botkin, [illegible] faithful sister [illegible] Brown, was already present, as were [illegible] and District Attorney Hosmer, Chief Lees, Attorney Chamberlain [illegible] a hundred attorneys, detectives and [illegible] of the morbid.

[illegible]

A number of cases were referred to and the language of high tribunals was quoted to show that the presence of the accused in the demanding State at the time the crime was committed must have been real and the flight actual. The Supreme Court of the United States, the decision held, had always held this way and no court had ever held to the contrary. The dissenting opinion of one Judge in the case of State vs. Hall, in North Carolina, was [illegible] lightly by the Judges.

"To our minds," says the decision, "such [illegible] opinion is an absurdity and the opinion is supported by no sound reasoning." The decision concluded as follows:

[illegible]

...ated from the provisions of the statutes and constitutional article referred to, a qualification would be taken away which appears to have been inserted ex industria, for if respondent's interpretation were adopted such words would be meaningless. We have no more right to eliminate those words than we would have to insert words, and by so doing we would enlarge the terms of the Constitution as well as the statute in question.

In the very able and subtle argument of the District Attorney much stress was laid upon the fact that the advance of civilization, modern appliances, modern facilities for communication, etc., were so far advanced over those existing at the time of the adoption of the Constitution that a construction should now be put upon the provisions to meet present conditions. Such is not the law. It has always been a settled rule that in interpreting statutes or constitutional provisions the intention of the law-makers or the Constitution's framers should, if possible, be ascertained and such interpretation given as will carry out that intention. If the law or the Constitution is to be made to fit the times the Legislature or the people, not the courts, must make it.

If modern times require a different law than that which was sufficient in the times of our forefathers the people can establish it. The only power which is ultimately sovereign in this country is the people acting in the manner prescribed by the Constitution, and capable in that manner of passing any law whatever in the form of a constitutional amendment. The subjection of all the ordinary authorities and organs of this government to a supreme instrument expressing the will of the sovereign people and capable of being altered by them only is the basis of our Government.

It is true, as stated by the District Attorney, that modern [illegible] facilities make crime possible without the actual presence of the criminal [illegible] [illegible] The Constitution of the United States gives Congress [illegible] the undisputed right to define what shall be an unlawful use thereof, and to make such unlawful use criminal with such penalty as it shall fix, even to death penalty. Fraud perpetrated through the mails is now by act of Congress criminal and can be [illegible] in the Federal courts and [illegible] The sending [illegible] infernal machine can [illegible] be made criminal as can murder when committed by the use of its [illegible] and [illegible] the law the accused would be tried in a Federal court where [illegible] would issue to [illegible] all necessary witnesses.

A strict [illegible] in the absence of [illegible] statute as we have in this State, [illegible] better that the [illegible] of government not delegated to them.

...(illegible) and upon the higher law the anticipate dilatory legislatures by providing for the safety of the public. [illegible] Neither actual nor possible consequences should deter Judges from executing the law as it is plainly written.

"The argument ab inconvenienti, when used to bring about a modification of a well established principle of law, should be addressed to the lawmaker, whose province it is to provide a remedy for any evils growing out of its enforcement. Addressed to judges under such circumstances it is an invitation or a temptation offered to violate their sacred obligations in order to appease the public. * * Courts enforce laws, not simply to punish the guilty, but as well to protect the innocent. The law which fails to provide for the extradition of a guilty man must be understood and adhered to, because it may be invoked as a protection to the innocent, who are prosecuted without cause, against the annoyance, expense and invasion of personal liberty involved in being extradited."

The decisions all taken together, with their various shadings, amount to the establishment of this rule, that is, that he who was actually in a state at the time any act tending to the ultimate completion of a crime was done or who at any time after the completion of a crime has entered the state and left, whether voluntarily or involuntarily, may be returned to it for trial. But where he never has been within reach of the process of a state since the crime or some portion of it was committed he cannot be sent there.

Any other construction than this would subject every citizen, guilty or innocent, to the possibility of being removed from the state of his residence to a distant state upon the mere filing of a complaint in such other state charging a crime. All citizens would be at the mercy of their enemies, for under the Constitution as well as the statute of this State, which is in substantially the same language as the Constitution, it would be the duty of the Governor upon it being shown to him that a criminal charge had been made to order the arrest and removal of the person charged, for it has always been held that the question of guilt or innocence cannot be inquired into. Such a result was never contemplated either by the framers of the Constitution, Congress or the Legislature of this State; therefore words were added which made proof that the person charged had at some time been within reach of the [illegible] of the demanding state necessary before the liberty of the citizen could be [illegible].

The conclusion of the reading was greeted by silence for perhaps a minute. Mrs. Botkin, aware that all eyes were upon her, straightened up in her chair, and assumed the air of one deeply bored. She yawned and then made some laughing remark to her sister. Judge Cook remarked that, while the decision put aside the question of extradition, the Judges had not decided what disposition should be made of the prisoner. In other words, while the writ of habeas corpus was technically granted, no order for her release would be given.

Judge Cook said that he believed that an action lay against Mrs. Botkin under section 27 of the Penal Code, but in order to have the matter settled he desired further argument on that point. Attorney Knight was about to [illegible] explaining that their side did not care to argue jurisdiction at that time, but Judge Cook said:

"I must hear arguments before finally disposing of the matter. The Court does not know what order to make, whether to await the action of the Grand Jury, or the filing of a complaint."

Knight wanted to know why if Chief Lees believed there was sufficient cause he had not brought Mrs. Botkin before the Grand Jury or filed such a complaint?

District Attorney Hosmer asked the Court to set a day for argument, for Knight made a last [illegible] against this.

"We are [illegible]," he said, "that the Court should remand the prisoner. There are similar cases on hand now. Why not let Mrs. Botkin's case go the ordinary course?"

Judge Cook was still undecided. He said as much, and Knight replied that he wanted to take no technical advantage [illegible] right. Judge Wallace enlightened him to the effect that Mrs. Botkin [illegible] remanded to the custody of [illegible] without restriction the latter might take her to [illegible].

Knight was silent. Judge Cook ended the controversy by saying that he would continue the matter until Saturday, when he would hear arguments.

Chief Lees was disappointed at the decision. He said afterward that he would try [illegible] expressed opinion of the [illegible].

"I shall not, however," said the Chief, "[illegible] into the Police Court and put the State a burden of [illegible] The [illegible] would have to be brought here for the Police Court trial and then for the one in a higher court. I have done all I could to send Mrs. Botkin to the place where she committed [illegible] but as it has been decided [illegible] and [illegible] I shall not allow her to escape punishment.

"The defense have contended all along that she was not amenable to the laws of California. They contended this to the newspapers and before Governor Budd. Now they must abide by it. It is not my place to go before the Grand Jury. The District Attorney must attend to that. Mrs. Botkin will be tried at the expense of the people of California."

District Attorney Hosmer said that he had not made up his mind what to do. He was noncommittal. It was learned, however, that he had written to Delaware to find out if the witnesses there would come here to testify.

Attorneys Knight and McNab [illegible] jubilant after they left court. They said that they were prepared for any action on the part of the prosecution. They had won their contention and would wait for further developments.

Detective McVey, who has been lingering here to take Mrs. Botkin to Delaware, keenly feels the decision. He refused to talk on the subject. However, he visited the Federal building with a [illegible] in view of invoking the [illegible]

[illegible]

WILL NOT SHIELD MRS. BOTKIN

NOVEMBER 16, 1898.

Dunning Says He Will Have No Mercy on the Woman.

Does Not Shrink From the Ordeal in Court.

WILL TELL THE TRUTH.

Believes the Accused Will Not Spare Him When the Trial Begins.

PROSECUTION'S PLANS.

They Claim That the Prisoner Cannot Escape Through Any Technicality

WILMINGTON (Del.), November 16.—Attorney-General White had another conference to-day with John P. Dunning in relation to the trial of Mrs. Cordelia Botkin, and the men went over the evidence to be produced at the trial. The subpoenas have not yet arrived from San Francisco, but are expected Saturday. Then they will be served on the Delaware witnesses. Mr. Dunning to-day assured the Attorney-General and his friends that he had no hesitancy in going West. He said: [illegible]

[illegible]

Dunning expressed a firmer opinion than ever that Mrs. Botkin was responsible for the death of his wife, although he considered her trial in California a farce and that the only place where justice [illegible] to be done [illegible]

[illegible] California [illegible] it being intimated that the [illegible] was to [illegible] he had so far [illegible] as to what [illegible] to be brought out.

"Of course," he added, "she will not [illegible] and I am very willing that [illegible]"

[illegible] explained that the [illegible] allow Mrs. Botkin [illegible] No technicality [illegible] the women now [illegible] should she be acquitted the [illegible] for the murder of Mrs. [illegible] having gotten [illegible] This [illegible] the first [illegible] woman will [illegible] murder which [illegible] the same [illegible] of either of the [illegible] will not place her life in jeopardy [illegible]

[illegible] will be sent on in advance [illegible] with his Federal [illegible] any [illegible] or secure the release [illegible]

[illegible] White [illegible] a most [illegible] to try [illegible] of San Francisco [illegible] White would not state [illegible] would be

WITNESSES TO COME FROM DELAWARE.

NOVEMBER 16, 1898.

Fourteen Fares at the Expense of the State.

A Trifle Over $3000 for Railroad Fares and Meals.

Chief Lees Applies to Judge Cook for the Necessary Order.

The Auditor Will Now Draw Upon the Treasurer for the Amount

Mrs. Botkin's Trial Will Surely Open Without Hitch on Monday, the 5th of December.

That the trial of Mrs. Cordelia Botkin will commence on the day set, Monday, December 5th, is now assured beyond all reasonable doubt.

This morning Chief of Police Lees applied to Judge Carroll Cook for an order directing the Auditor to allow the payment of certain expenses incidental to the coming trial. Lees said that it was proposed to bring fourteen witnesses from the State of Delaware to California, and that their presence was absolutely necessary. Every means of transportation had been investigated, with the view of saving the State as much as possible, and it had been found that the cheapest and best plan would be to accept the proposal made by the Southern Pacific Company. The proposal was to bring the fourteen witnesses over for a total cost of $2,617.30, for railroad fares, and $160 for meals.

Judge Carroll Cook at once made the necessary demand upon the Auditor. It will now be Mr. Broderick's duty to issue a warrant upon the Treasurer, by which Chief Lees may draw the sum necessary for the expenses of the witnesses required. Their names are:

T. M. Gooden, J. B. Pennington, Harry Pennington, Josephine Bateman, Ethel Millington, Edith Clark, J. D. Deane, John P. Dunning, Dr. Lemuel Bishop, Dr. P. W. Downes, Dr. T. H. Wolf, H. C. White, B. J. McVey, Leila Deane.

It is [illegible] proposed on behalf of the [illegible] to question Judge Carroll Cook's jurisdiction to try Mrs. Botkin. George A. Knight considers that this is too good a point to be used at the present time. He has reserved his exception to all rulings of the court so far and will now await the outcome. Should Mrs. Botkin be convicted of the murder of Mrs. Dunning then the question of jurisprudence will be the strongest point made by the defense upon appeal to the Supreme Court. Should she be acquitted, there is an end of the matter.

Monday, December 5, Is the Day Fixed.

Settled by Arrangement of Counsel in Court To-Day.

Second Indictment of the Grand Jury Read to the Accused.

Pleaded Not Guilty Without Offering Any Technical Objection.

Expert Ames Has Identified the Handwriting in the Anonymous Letters and on the Slip of Paper.

Mrs. Cordelia Botkin appeared before Judge Carroll Cook this morning and pleaded to the second indictment of the Grand Jury charging her with the murder of Mrs. John P. Dunning.

The new indictment is precisely similar to the first [illegible] in one incidental particular. In the first indictment the murdered woman's name read as "Elizabeth Dunning"; in the second her true name, "Mary Elizabeth Dunning," appears. George A. Knight and Frank McGowan, her attorneys, were present in court and when Clerk Tuite had read the second indictment to their client they instructed her to plead. In the same calm tone as on the former occasion Mrs. Botkin pleaded "Not guilty." Without any legal preamble or fuss attorneys on both sides agreed that the case should be set for trial Monday, December 5.

So the fate of the woman charged with the deliberate poisoning of two innocent women will soon be decided. The latest arrival on the scene of action is Daniel Ames, the noted New York handwriting expert, who comes to assist the prosecution. Ames had a protracted interview with Chief Lees yesterday afternoon and examined every exhibit in the case. Photographs of acknowledged exemplars of Mrs. Botkin's handwriting were submitted to Ames and compared with the anonymous letters sent by some one to Mrs. Dunning some months previous to the murder.

Ames declared positively that the same hand penned all the documents, including the writing on the slip of paper which accompanied the poisoned candy. There is no doubt whatever in the expert's mind of the truth of his convictions.

The Delaware witnesses will arrive in a few days. Dunning, the murdered woman's husband; ex-Congressman Pennington, her father, and several others will be of the party. The trial is expected to occupy at least a month.

COSTS OF THE BOTKIN TRIAL.

Beginning of the Expenses to Be Incurred by This City.

Railroad Tickets for Witnesses Call for $3,207 in Cash at Once.

EXPERTS' AND JURORS' FEES.

Before the Case Is Ended the Outlay by the City Will Be Over $6,000

An important item of expense in the Botkin murder case has been authorized by Judge Carroll Cook on the application of Chief of Police Lees. Chief Lees filed an affidavit declaring that it is necessary to secure the attendance of a number of witnesses who are residents of Dover, Del., and that to do so the city of San Francisco would be required to pay in advance the traveling expenses of these persons. The names of the witnesses on Chief Lees' list is as follows:

T. M. Gooden, J. B. Pennington, Harry Pennington, Josephine Bateman, Ethel Millington, Edith Clark, J. D. Deane, John P. Dunning, Dr. Lemuel Bishop, Dr. P. W. Downes, Dr. T. H. Wolf, H. C. White, B. J. McVey, Leila Deane.

According to the estimate made by Chief Lees, it will cost $3,207 to buy the railroad tickets for these witnesses from Dover to San Francisco and return, and to defray their incidental expenses for sleeping cars, meals and the like, on the way here and back to their homes.

There are fifteen witnesses to be summoned, instead of thirteen, as at first announced, and the expense of keeping these persons at a hotel during their sojourn in this city will fall on the city treasury.

The money for transporting the witnesses is to be placed at the disposal of Chief Lees, who reported that he had investigated all the means of travel and had found that the offer of the Southern Pacific Company was the most advantageous to all concerned.

Estimates as to the final cost of Mrs. Botkin's trial have already been attempted, but none of the experts have been satisfied that they were able to give anything more than an approximate of the sum that will be drawn from the public treasury on this account.

The expenses of fifteen witnesses at the most moderate hotel in the city will not fall short of $50 a day, it is estimated, and if the witnesses are held here for cross-examination and for rebuttal testimony, as the lawyers usually consider necessary, it is safe to put that item at $1,000. The fees of local witnesses and experts in the analysis of poisons will probably take another $500; then there will be the per diem of the jurors, which is $24 a day in the aggregate, and if the case is prolonged to twenty days the jurors will receive $480. The shorthand reporter will come in for something like $700, or possibly more. The salary of the Judge and of the various court officers may be reckoned at not less than $500. This will give a total of more than $6,000 of expense in sight, with all contingencies of costs and fees on appeal, the maintenance of the prisoner at the public charge, and other incidentals to be considered hereafter.

F. Bell
March - 1908

THEN HE WOKE UP.

Son of Well Known and Wealthy Family Behind the Bars.

Fred Bell, a member of the family whose connection with "Mammy" Pleasant of litigation fame has kept their name for several years prominently before the public, was arrested Monday night on a charge of disturbing the peace. He appeared before Judge Cabaniss yesterday, who, after a long lecture on criminal law, dismissed the charge.

Last night young Bell, while drunk, imagined he was a deputy license collector. He visited a Japanese store at 630 Jackson and informing the proprietor that he was a license collector, demanded to see his books. The proprietor objected and Bell then created a disturbance. An officer was called and he was arrested.

CHILDREN WHO CALLED ADOLPH SUTRO "PAPA."

NOVEMBER 13, 1898.

ADOLPHINE SUTRO.

ADOLPH SUTRO JR.

Mrs. Clara Kluge-Sutro did not appear in Judge Troutt's court yesterday morning to press her application to be appointed guardian of her two children, whom she calls Adolph and Adolphine Sutro, declaring them to be the children of the late Adolph Sutro, to whom she says she was married by contract.

The children are particularly bright and well trained, which Mrs. Kluge-Sutro says was one of the reasons Mr. Sutro gave for his pride in them, but the most potent cause for his affection was his belief that they resembled him in their features. This he considered particularly noticeable in the [illegible] the girl and frequently commented on it with evident satisfaction.

Mrs. Kluge-Sutro alleges that Mr. Sutro never hesitated to acknowledge the children as his offspring, actually going so far as to deed them $20,000 worth of property, and that she bore to him the relation of wife from the time of the death of his first wife to the date of his death, and that in all this time no one questioned their marriage, since he treated her as his legal spouse.

She declares also that she has a written contract of marriage signed by both of them and made out in legal form. This document has been submitted to her legal advisers, Hodgens, Falvey & Sloss, and they have deemed it of sufficient validity to begin legal proceedings on her part to establish her title to part of the Sutro estate, or at least to establish the legitimacy of her children.

In addition to the claim that they have a right to share in Adolph Sutro's estate as pretermitted children of the testator it will be claimed on behalf of these minors that Sutro by his marriage with their mother legally annulled his will of 1882. It was a [illegible] four [illegible] after the making of the will that Sutro established his relations with the mother of these children, who, as she says, he permitted to call him "papa." Section 1298 of the Civil Code has the following provision:

If, after having made a will, the testator marries, and his issue of such marriage born either in his lifetime or after his death, and the wife or issue survive him, the will is revoked, unless provision has been made for such issue by some settlement, or unless such issue are provided for in the will or in such way mentioned therein as to show an intention not to make such provision; and no other evidence to rebut the presumption of such revocation can be received.

Section 1299 has a similar provision in regard to revoking of the [illegible] with [illegible] a wife, and declares that a will executed before marriage is revoked unless provision is made for her in a marriage contract or otherwise. This principle will be invoked by Mrs. Kluge-Sutro in her fight for part of the estate.

BECKER TEARS OFF THE MASK OF INNOCENCE AND MURDER SHINES IN THE FORGER'S EYE.

Threatens to Hurl an Ink Well at an Artist.

Something of the Career of the Criminal Now on Trial.

"If you don't stop that I'll throw this inkwell at you!"

It was Charles Becker, the most expert forger in the world, who hissed out that menace. It was in Judge Wallace's courtroom yesterday afternoon. The forger's face was in a blaze. The red streaks in his eyes showed murder.

He fingered a heavy inkstand—fingered it dangerously—and glared at an "Examiner" artist who sat a few feet from him sketching placidly.

"I tell you if you don't stop I'll throw this at you!" he repeated. Lawyer Henry Ach, who is prosecuting Becker, hurriedly moved back out of the line of fire. "There's going to be trouble here," he muttered. Several jurors sitting waiting to be called shifted uneasily. But the artist sketched right on.

Then H. C. McPike, who was examining jurors on behalf of the forger scoundrel, gave attention to the fact that his client was at last revealing to the jury his true character, and took a hand. He caught away the inkstand and went on with his questioning. But the tiger in Becker was aroused and he reached for the inkstand again.

"Can't you stop that fellow sketching?" he asked his lawyer. "If you can't, I'll throw this at him!"

This would never do for McPike. He has been playing off the forger as a case of injured innocence, and Becker has been doing his sweetest to [illegible] the part. But here he was ablaze with wrath, an assassin in his [illegible] attitude—quite such a man as might have been concerned in the murder of Mrs. "Joe" Chapman, the wife of his barely deserted pal, back in London in 1876. So McPike put in a plea.

"I am informed that some one in the courtroom is annoying my client very much," he complained. "An artist is here looking at him and sketching him. It annoys him a great deal."

"Of course that ought not to be done—you'd better desist," counseled Judge Wallace. "The defendant ought not to be disturbed."

"I believe the papers ought to give the prisoner a fair chance while he is on trial," McPike went on. "They ought not to print anything about him when they know that their publications will go to the hands of the jurymen. It is just like sending a letter to a juror."

"If you can get a Judge who can regulate the press you'll be doing well," cynically put in Attorney Ach.

"But he can regulate what's going on before him," persisted McPike.

So the artist was asked not to sketch the man whose photograph is probably in half the rogues' galleries of the world, and the jurors were given an extra caution not to be guided by anything they might read in the papers, and the incident closed. The murder look slowly faded out of Becker's face and he resumed that studied pose of calm thoughtfulness which he usually assumes in the presence of a jury.

The fellow studies unobtrusiveness in dress and general demeanor. He looks out [illegible] a refined and sublimated and [illegible] picture of John P. Irish. Yesterday he was attired in modest brown, plain white buttons in his cuffs, a quiet neck scarf [illegible] tied. There was before the devil in him flashed to his face just a trace of color under his pallid transparent skin. His thin hair, in which the gray had [illegible] streaked the native German blonde, was worn rather long and carefully brushed and parted. A straying mustache partly hid a mouth which seemed to be made up of [illegible] unkindly lines.

His favorite pose is that of the scholar at his desk, head leaning on one white hand, a long finger pressed against the cheek. Otherwise his hands are clasped in his lap, and he assumes an air of inoffensive nonchalance. He might be taken for an average retired merchant, who had given himself over to books or scientific fads. Of all in the courtroom he would have been one of the last to be picked as the villain of the trial that is [illegible] till the artist's sketching caused him to lose his poise and show the passionate deep [illegible] which underlies his affected calm.

Yet this man is the terror of financiers on two continents. He once testified in court that he was a professional forger, and that

The Hand That Has Forged Fortunes.

CHARLES BECKER, PRINCE OF FORGERS.

This criminal [illegible] for months the [illegible] yesterday [illegible] an "Examiner" artist sketching him in Judge Wallace's courtroom. [illegible] to [illegible] his features. Then in a moment of [illegible] "If you don't stop that I'll throw this ink well at you!"

his forgeries [illegible] And [illegible] years ago, when he had [illegible] uttered the forgery of a [illegible] Union Trust Company of New York. [illegible] his forgery of a [illegible] of the Bank of France the president of the great institution testified [illegible] the original.

About this man and his crimes a novel has been written, "The Two [illegible]." In the work [illegible] Folsom, published in Baltimore [illegible] entire chapter [illegible] Charles Becker [illegible] the Shaw in Germany [illegible] York with his [illegible] was ten years of age. That was in [illegible]

At school he [illegible] with his pen and he was apprenticed to an engraver. He soon could teach his master. At the age of twenty he [illegible] Clara [illegible] wanted a handsomer [illegible] he forged a check for [illegible] He was arrested, and Clara [illegible] father paid back the money and he escaped prison. But his sweetheart [illegible] him [illegible]

Then Folsom's book tells that [illegible] Becker and [illegible] Elliott [illegible] the Third National Bank [illegible] clean away with nearly [illegible] as [illegible] went to France, and there in the [illegible] [illegible] She had married a rich [illegible] Becker [illegible]

Then [illegible] to Florence, and then with [illegible] a [illegible] forger and Elliott [illegible] [illegible] These [illegible] arrested at [illegible] and sentenced to three years and [illegible] the [illegible] in the great jail at [illegible] [illegible] from the prison [illegible] and Becker also escaped [illegible] by leaving Joe Chapman asleep [illegible] them.

The fugitives made their way to England [illegible] Not long afterward the woman was found dead in the house. She had [illegible] and her money and jewels were gone.

In [illegible] Becker was back in America and married a pretty Brooklyn girl [illegible] It was in 187[illegible] that Becker forged a check for [illegible] drawn by the New York [illegible] [illegible] the money was secured and divided among a number of conspirators. Through the work of [illegible] in New York the conspirators were arrested [illegible] It was then, when questioned by Thomas [illegible] of this city, that he admitted that he was a professional forger with a [illegible] to his credit that he could not recall the number.

He went back to [illegible] and was accused of putting out [illegible] fraudulent French and Tunisian securities. [illegible] arrested, himself and his pals were not extradited. But when he came back to New York he [illegible] and went to work on an engraving of a [illegible] note of the Bank of France. He was caught red handed and sentenced to [illegible] years and [illegible] months in prison.

[illegible] how he raised a [illegible] Woolworth check from $12 to $22,[illegible] and [illegible] has often been told. Once convicted he was granted a new trial by the Supreme Court. [illegible] trial three jurors refused to join in the verdict of guilty. [illegible] is his third trial. Up to last evening [illegible] jurors had been accepted.

[illegible] California it was [illegible] yesterday afternoon that he let his villainous murderous instinct overcome his affected placidity.

CLEVEREST FORGERS KNOWN.

Two of the Principals in the Nevada Bank Robbery.

POLICE GET A CONFESSION FROM CREEGAN

"Squeals" on Becker at Last.

TRYING TO SAVE HIMSELF

CHIEF LEES SAYS NO INDUCEMENTS WERE OFFERED.

The Prosecution Is Now Confident That the Adept Bank Forger Will Be Again Convicted.

The Police Department is now more than confident that Charles Becker, the dangerous bank forger, will be convicted at his third trial for forging a $22,000 draft on the Nevada Bank. James Creegan, who was convicted with Becker on the first trial, has turned against Becker, and yesterday he told the police all he knew about the crime. The police refuse to give the details of Creegan's confession, as it would put the defense in possession of the new evidence before it is given in court. Creegan's testimony, added to that of Frank Deane, who turned State's evidence when the trio were arrested, and on whose testimony Becker and Creegan were once convicted, will undoubtedly send the notorious forger to prison for life.

Creegan has been one of Becker's partners for years and they have perpetrated many gigantic bank forgeries. Besides informing the police of the details of the Nevada Bank deal Creegan is believed to have "peached" on a number of other transactions in which he participated with Becker.

When Deane testified against his partners in the first trial Judge Wallace laid down the rules of evidence that an accomplice's testimony could not be considered unless it was corroborated. The evidence given by Deane, though almost unsupported, secured a conviction. The police now declare that Creegan has furnished all the necessary collateral links to make the chain around Becker so strong that nothing can prevent a conviction. Creegan is the only man who saw Becker raise the Woodland draft from $12 to $22,000, and he has placed the police in a position to secure all the corroborative evidence to establish when and where the work was done, the materials used and where they were obtained.

Creegan now occupies the "parlor" cell at the City Prison with Deane. He was taken to court yesterday, but did not return to the County Jail, where he has been the cellmate of Becker. During the afternoon, and again last night, the new witness had long conferences with Chief Lees. The Chief, however, would not disclose the purport of the interviews. Nevertheless he emphatically declared that the case against Becker had been greatly strengthened.

Becker declined to talk about Creegan's "squealing," saying only that he had no inkling that he would do so. The third trial of this famous case is set for Thursday morning.

Mr. Ach, attorney for the prosecution, was seen last night, and claimed that he did not know Creegan had turned State's evidence. "I heard the rumor this evening," he said, "but whether it is true I cannot say. As far as I know, there has been no inducement offered Creegan to give testimony against Becker, and as far as I am concerned I would prefer he did not turn State's evidence. I am firmly convinced that with an honest jury I can convict both Becker and Creegan."

Only rumors of Creegan's determination to turn State's evidence have reached Messrs. Dunne & McPike, the attorneys who have fought so long and hard to secure the acquittal of the two forgers. Peter F. Dunne, the senior member of the firm said:

"I am as much in the dark about this as anybody else. All I know about it is this: The trial of Becker and Creegan was set for this morning in Judge Wallace's court.

"After the proceedings in court to-day were concluded Becker was taken back to the County Jail, while Creegan was locked up in the City Prison.

"Soon after Becker reached the County Jail he sent for either Mr. McPike or myself to go and see him. Mr. McPike went to the jail and to him Becker confided his fears that Creegan intended to make a confession, his fears being based solely on the fact that Creegan had been taken to the City Prison instead of being returned to his old quarters in the County Jail.

"Creegan is a young man, not yet 40 years old, and believes that if he is convicted on this trial Judge Wallace will again sentence him to life imprisonment. He has now been in jail about three years and it is reasonable to suppose he would resort to almost any means to escape spending the remainder of his life behind iron bars.

"Becker is regarded by the police as the most dangerous man of the lot by far, and they would make almost any concession to the others in order to secure the conviction of Becker, and if they have promised Creegan his freedom in return for a confession it is a great temptation to a man in his position."

THE FORGER OF THE CENTURY.

Karl Becker Is Pursued by the Associated Bankers.

Four of His Accomplices Have Promised to Testify Against Him

Karl Becker, charged with forging a check for $22,000, which was accepted by the Nevada Bank and the Crocker-Woolworth Bank of this city, is a notable character among America's criminals. He is on trial in Judge Wallace's court. Becker possesses all the quiet dignity of a gentleman of the old school.

He is regarded by banking men as the most phenomenal forger of the century, and for this reason the members of the American Bankers' Association are using every endeavor to secure his conviction.

Originally there were three other defendants with Becker—Creegan, Dean and McKosker. Dean and McKosker confessed their guilt, and promised to help convict their associates. Becker and Creegan were convicted, but were granted a new trial. At the second trial the jury failed to agree. Last week, Creegan was induced to turn State's evidence. If Becker be convicted Creegan, Dean and McKosker will be liberated.

No visitor in Judge Wallace's court would pick out Becker as the superlatively expert forger of America and possibly of the world, yet bank managers yield to him the palm in this line of industry. They admit that no teller or accountant is proof against his wiles. As a character study, Becker is interesting. He looks like a prosperous business man, with a touch of the man of the world. His hair is almost white and somewhat thin, and is worn in an old fashioned manner. His face shows no signs of emotion; the lines never change, but the eyes are remarkable. They are everything. They are trained eyes, for Becker is an artist in the highest sense of the term.

The forged Nevada Bank check illustrates his peculiar genius. A less expert man would have made the three ciphers in the form, but he permitted them to "shade off" in color. This looked so natural that the money was paid without question. Becker is an engraver of the most exquisite taste and high ...

BECKER AGAIN ON TRIAL

For the Great Nevada Bank Conspiracy.

Karl Becker, who, if police records count for anything, is the greatest forger of the century, sat alone in Judge Wallace's court Thursday morning.

At a little distance and counted among the witnesses for the prosecution sat his former companion, James Judge Wallace, Before Whom Becker Is Being Tried.

Creegan, who since the last trial of the case has consented to turn State evidence and gain his freedom by helping the Pinkertons to send Becker to the penitentiary.

With the three accomplices, Dean, McCluskey and Creegan, on the side of the prosecution, Becker faces a in his career, for conviction certainly means a sentence to life imprisonment. It will be remembered that the first trial, which resulted in the conviction of both Becker and Creegan, was followed by sentences of life imprisonment.

CRITICAL POINT

Becker.

When the case was called, Attorney McPike, for the defense, demanded a for Karl Becker, saying that facts had come to the knowledge of the defense which made a separate trial essential.

SEPARATE TRIAL

Judge Wallace asked Attorney Ach, special counsel for the prosecution, if there was any objection on the part of the people. Hesitating a reply in the

[illegible]

GUILTY, SAYS THE PRINCE OF FORGERS

Karl Becker Gives Up His Fight.

WILLING TO GO TO PRISON

PLEA FOR A SENTENCE OF SEVEN YEARS.

The Bankers' Association and Chief Lees Consent to the Passing of This Short Sentence.

Karl Becker, "the prince of forgers," will go to prison for a term of seven years for his crime of forging a draft for $22,000 and passing it successfully on the Nevada Bank of this city. This cleverest of "crooks" rose before Judge Wallace yesterday morning when his name was called at the opening of his third trial and brought the proceedings to a sudden culmination by pleading guilty to the charge against him. Court frequenters stared at one another in surprise when the aged forger in a low voice announced that he had given up his battle for freedom and was willing to serve a term in the penitentiary for his crime.

Becker's plea was the direct result of the act of his associate in crime, James Creegan, who at the last minute turned traitor and agreed to turn State's evidence. Creegan's testimony strengthened by that of Dean and McCluskey, accomplices in the swindle, was without doubt sufficient to send the man who did the pen work to the penitentiary for the term of his natural life, and with such a fate staring him in the face Becker weakened, and after his counsel had effected a compromise with the prosecution he decided to plead guilty.

After the plea of the noted forger was entered upon the records Attorney Peter F. Dunne rose and on behalf of his client asked that the court take into consideration the advanced age of the defendant, his impaired physical condition, together with the circumstance that by his plea of guilty he had saved great expense to the city and county.

Attorney Ach, special counsel for the prosecution, seconded Mr. Dunne's request as did also Acting District Attorney Hinkle. All agreed that a seven years' sentence was sufficient and Judge Wallace said: "Very well, gentlemen, I will set this case for Friday for sentence."

The case of James Creegan will be taken up a week from Friday. It is thought by some that at that time the prisoner will be freed, while others are of the opinion that he will be forced to plead guilty and spend at least a year or two behind the bars of the penitentiary.

BOTKIN NEMESES NEAR THIS CITY.

Witnesses From Delaware Will Reach Here This Afternoon.

Detective McVey Is Positive That He Has Sufficient Evidence to Convict.

GRIEF OF MR. PENNINGTON.

Remainder of the Box of Poisoned Candy Is Brought With the Party.

[Special Dispatch to The Examiner.]

LOS ANGELES, December 4.—The doom of Mrs. Botkin is being carried to San Francisco in a luxurious manner on the Sunset Limited, which arrived this morning in the party of fourteen witnesses, the remaining portion of the box of poisoned candy which encompassed two deaths, the chemists who analyzed the deadly sweets, the letters from Mrs. Botkin to her lover, the handwriting in which is expected to show that she directed the box of candy, and much more evidence which State Detective B. J. McVey admits he has, but of which he declines to talk.

The old father of Mrs. Dunning, Mr. J. P. Pennington, would not talk about the case, but his face set grimly when he was asked if he thought he had enough evidence to convict.

Most of the people are fearful of San Fran...

[illegible]

BECKER CAN COME TO NO HARM.

Opinion of the Lawyers for the Defense.

Creegan Only Makes One Accomplice the More.

His Uncorroborated Testimony Cannot Be Heard by a Jury.

Peculiar Attitude of the Two Defendants in Court To-Day.

It Was Friday Last When the Officers of the Law Saw the Middleman at the County Jail.

Carl Becker, the Prince of Forgers, stands alone in his misery. He will be tried to-morrow for complicity in the Nevada Bank swindle. Though James Creegan is his nominal co-criminal, there is no doubt that if any one suffers it will be Becker alone. Becker, whose master hand that raised the draft on the Bank of Woodland from $12 to $22,000, occupies a cell in the County Jail alone. The last of his accomplices, Creegan, has gone over to the enemy and occupies sumptuous apartments in the City Prison, sharing the "parlor cell" with Dean, alias Seavers.

It was on Friday last that Becker first knew something was up. The officers of the law, under Captain Seymour, visited the County Jail and asked for Creegan. There was a long conversation, after which Creegan returned to the cell. After yesterday's proceedings before Judge Wallace, when to-morrow, Thursday, was set for the third trial, Becker rode back to the County Jail alone. He

CONTEST

[illegible]S GOLDEN WEST.

....

....

[illegible]LOT. One Vote.

[illegible] saw Creegan this morning in court for the first time since then.

Neither Henry Ach nor Chief Lees will [illegible] their knowledge of what has taken [illegible] statement has been made by [illegible] they say. But the fact that Creegan and Dean, the latter the first [illegible] turn State's evidence, occupy a [illegible] room together, is considered [illegible]. It is sufficient for Messrs. [illegible] & McPike, who are now that [illegible] will be a hard battle to fight when the case comes up again to-morrow [illegible] before Judge Wallace. They say, however, that any fair-minded jury will resent what has been done in this [illegible] and will refuse to convict one man [illegible] the testimony of all the accomplices who have deserted him one by one. That is the ground upon which they [illegible] their hope of acquittal.

It [illegible] which way the wind [illegible] the parties assembled to [illegible] this morning for the purpose of [illegible] out [illegible] to select a jury to-morrow [illegible] Becker and beside his attorney, Henry T. McPike. Henry Ach was present for the prosecution. Let the [illegible] Judge Wallace [illegible]:

"Where's the other prisoner? Where's Creegan?"

"Here," said some one, and Captain [illegible] emerged from the ranks of the [illegible] followed by the "middleman." Creegan's face wore a shamefaced look as he walked to a chair in [illegible]. For the jurors few [illegible] and made to take a seat beside Becker, or nearly so, as only McPike sat between. The selection of jurors occupied about an hour, after which an adjournment was taken until to-morrow.

Creegan had nothing to say, of course. Becker had little. The "Dutchman" said: "I first knew about this on Friday when the officers came and took Creegan away with them. I know all about it now. But I'll not give in. I'll fight this case to the end."

Mr. Dunne said that the matter came to him as a surprise. He had absolutely no inkling of it until yesterday at noon. He knew that Creegan had never been anxious to confess—to turn State's evidence. He had never expressed any desire to do so. But he supposed the prosecution had worked upon his feelings so, had offered so many inducements to him, that he had been tempted and fallen. Mr. Dunne did not think it would really hurt Becker much. It would only add one more to the list of accomplices, and accomplices cannot corroborate each other.

"Those are precisely my views," said Mr. McPike, Mr. Dunne's partner. "The law has been settled that uncorroborated accomplices cannot corroborate each other. The jury in the last case held that McCluskey and Dean were accomplices, and it was not found that either of them had been corroborated by one not an accomplice. Now, if Creegan is added to the list, how is the prosecution's case strengthened? The jury will find that Creegan, being also an accomplice, cannot be listened to any more than the rest.

"I would like to say one word. I don't know whether the Bankers' Association, the real prosecutor in this case, has sanctioned the turning of State's evidence by all these men. It is an unheard-of thing, especially in a case where the prosecution boasted of having a case that nothing could beat. I never heard the like, and it sets a very bad precedent."

Mr. McPike dropped into the humorous awhile. He said: "I have heard on the best authority that overtures are being made to Becker to confess. He is the last left, and the effect of the prosecution is to cinch Dunne and myself. If they do we will act at once. We'll turn State's evidence in our turn, and that will suffice to send Judge Wallace across the bay for ten years."

Chief Lees made a brief statement about Creegan's confession. He said: "To my knowledge Creegan has made no such confession as published in the morning papers. But if he has he has done it voluntarily. I am sure I have held out no inducements for any such confession. I say now as I have said before that I believe we have enough testimony now to convict these men without looking any further. It was a surprise to me to read that Creegan had confessed, and as I have said before I don't believe he has."

From all this it appears certain that the man the prosecution has aimed at from the first is Becker. It is considered that he is too dangerous a man to be at large. The police and the banks do not fear the accomplices, not even men like Dean, who stood calmly at the paying teller's desk at the Crocker-Woolworth Bank and waited while the stolen money was being counted out to him. It is the forger, the greatest in the world, they say, that they fear. Becker has the reputation of being so skillful as to defy scrutiny in his work.

BECKER IS SORE

Over the Treachery of His Pal Creegan.

Says the Latter Played Him False.

The Case of Becker Will Certainly Be Tried Thursday.

Karl Becker, the prince of forgers, sat alone in the dock in Judge Wallace's court Tuesday morning.

The fact that his codefendant, James Creegan, had joined the police forces under an agreement to turn State's evidence in exchange for immunity from punishment was told in Monday's "Report."

Creegan was taken into court Tuesday morning in charge of Captain of Detectives John Seymour and given a seat beside Frank Seaver and Joseph McCluskey, the other accomplices in the great

NEVADA BANK FORGERY.

Creegan declined to talk, though under pressure he admitted having made an arrangement by which his story of the crime will form a part of the people's case on the third trial of Karl Becker.

"Creegan has played me a contemptible trick," said Becker Tuesday morning. "This is only another illustration of the lengths to which the police department of this city will go to accomplish an object. I suspected that Creegan

HAD BEEN TAMPERED WITH

Last Friday. On that day Creegan received several visits from detectives and on Saturday he was taken from the county jail and it was several hours before he returned. When he came back I questioned him and he admitted that he had been having a talk with Seaver. I charged Creegan with treachery, but he strenuously denied having entered into any conspiracy with the prosecution.

"Yesterday Creegan was taken from the county jail and I now understand that he is quartered with Seaver at the city prison."

When the case was called Tuesday morning

BY MUTUAL CONSENT

A continuance was granted to Thursday morning, for which time 150 jurors have been summoned.

Henry Ach, special counsel for the prosecution, was jubilant Tuesday morning. He said: "There is now no doubt of the conviction of Karl Becker. Even without the testimony of Creegan I am satisfied we should have secured a conviction, but this turn in the case makes the result a certainty." [illegible] Dunne, chief counsel for the defendant Becker, declined to discuss the case.

THEY COME TO CONDEMN MRS. BOTKIN.

Witnesses Against the Alleged Poisoner Leave Delaware.

John P. Dunning Coming to San Francisco by Another Route.

PARTY ARRIVES SUNDAY.

Delaware's Attorney-General Says He Is Confident of Securing a Conviction.

[Special Dispatch to "The Bromlaw."]

WILMINGTON (Del.), November 29.—The party of Delawareans who will testify in the case of Mrs. Cornelia Botkin, charged with poisoning Mrs. John P. Dunning and Mrs. J. D. Deane of Dover, to be heard in San Francisco on December 5th, left here to-night at 7:25 o'clock.

Those who came from Dover were the Hon. John B. Pennington, father of the victims, Joshua D. Deane, husband of Mrs. Deane, who died as the result of eating the candy, Miss Ethel Millington, Miss Josephine Bateman, Miss Leila Deane, Dr. L. A. D. Bishop, Dr. Presley Downs and Ex-Postmaster T. M. Dunton. They were joined at the French station by Dr. and Mrs. Theodore Wolfe of Newark. Dr. Wells is the State chemist. Detective Bernard J. McVey and Harry Pennington, Attorney-General Robert C. White and Mrs. White also met the larger party at the station.

For an hour the party of State officials and witnesses were the cynosure of the eyes of a curious throng. They will go south from Baltimore, and will reach New Orleans on Thursday. They are scheduled to reach San Francisco by Sunday afternoon. The trip will be made in the Pullman car Monaco, which has been reserved for them.

John P. Dunning, the husband of one of the murdered women, was not with the party, but will go to San Francisco via Chicago.

"Do you think you will be successful in the West?" Attorney-General White was asked.

"We will be successful, no doubt," he said. "If we get a good jury and a good Court we will secure the conviction of Mrs. Botkin, for we have the case against her."

"Do you think the California authorities would hang Mrs. Botkin if she were convicted?" Mr. White was asked.

"I don't know whether they will hang her, but they surely should convict her. A fair field and no favors is all we ask there."

Mr. White stated that he had received word from Chief of Police Lees that there would probably be no trouble in drawing a good jury, as arrangements are being made for that process now. The only thing to interfere with a speedy trial, he thought, would be the efforts of the defense to place a large list of witnesses on the stand.

L. LAZAR AND THE POLICE.

One Juror Less in the Becker Case.

Already Accepted, He Is Excused by Order of Court.

Attorney McPike Omitted to Ask an Important Question.

Lazar Is Connected by Marriage With Heir Sergeant Lindheimer.

Work of Jury-Getting a Slow Process, but the Panel Will Be Completed by Monday.

The five jurors selected yesterday to try Karl Becker were reduced to four this morning through the discovery being made that one juror was rather too close to the Police Department.

When court adjourned yesterday the first [illegible] sworn in as jurors were J. T. Wh[illegible], [illegible] L. Lazar, J. P. Fl[illegible] and W. W. Griffen. Proceedings were resumed [illegible] to-day, and Henry T. McPike, Becker's counsel, [illegible] Judge Wallace [illegible]:

"May it please the court, I ask permission to put another question to [illegible] one of the jurors [illegible] yesterday."

The court [illegible] McPike turned to [illegible] and asked him:

"Did I ask you yesterday whether you were acquainted with any members of the Police Department?"

"You did not," answered Lazar.

"Well, I [illegible]?"

"Yes, I know one or two."

"Do you know Sergeant Lindheimer?"

"I do."

"Are you not related to him?"

"No."

"Are you not his brother-in-law?"

"I am not."

"How long have you known Sergeant Lindheimer?"

"Thirty-five years."

"Well, is not some relative of yours related to the Sergeant?"

"Yes. My brother's wife and his wife are sisters."

"Oh, that's it, is it?" said McPike.

Then turning to Judge Wallace the attorney asked that the juror be excused. This was done, and Mr. Lazar was set at liberty.

The work of jury-getting goes on slowly. By Monday morning, however, it is expected that the case will have got under way. Becker sits alone, never glancing at his erstwhile confederate, Creegan, but taking in every word of the examination of talesmen. Creegan looks at no one. He is simply [illegible] to turn State's evidence and [illegible] the time comes. As his testimony will be that of an accomplice, it remains to be seen whether it will materially assist the prosecution.

SEVEN YEARS IS HIS SENTENCE.

Charles Becker Ordered to San Quentin by Judge Wallace.

While in New York He Joined in a Plot to Commit Crime.

SCHEME WAS CARRIED OUT.

All the Participants Were Arrested, but Becker Is the Only One Sentenced.

Charles Becker, who pleaded guilty to the crime of forgery, has been sentenced by Judge Wallace to serve seven years in the State Prison at San Quentin. By good conduct in prison he may reduce the term of his service to less than five years. He was granted a stay of proceedings for twenty days in order to give him a chance to settle his business affairs before beginning his term of service.

Becker had obtained a world-wide reputation as a forger before coming to this city in 1895. The plot was hatched in New York city by Becker, James Creegan and A. H. Dean, alias Sievers. Becker was imported for the purpose of carrying out the scheme of the conspirators. Creegan supplied the capital, and Dean was engaged to do the work of "laying down the paper" after it was prepared.

A draft was obtained by Dean from the Bank of Woodland on the Crocker-Woolworth Bank for $12 and this was raised by Becker so that it appeared to call for $22,000. Dean deposited this draft at the Nevada Bank of San Francisco for collection. The paper passed through the Clearing-house and was honored by the Crocker-Woolworth Bank on which it was drawn. A few days after Dean drew his money from the Nevada Bank and went to [illegible]land with Creegan [illegible] a man named McCluskey [illegible] the [illegible] Dean and Creegan received the greater part of the money. Becker received less than $1,000.

All the men were arrested. McCluskey was acquitted and Dean turned State's evidence. Becker and Creegan were convicted, but were granted a new trial because of some irregularities. While a jury was being impaneled for a new trial Creegan turned State's evidence, and Becker withdrew his plea of not guilty on a promise that he would be lightly punished.

In passing sentence Judge Wallace said that the maximum punishment allowed by law was fourteen years, but that in this case he was [illegible] the extenuating circumstances. He remarked that an understanding had been reached [illegible] the district attorney, the special counsel [illegible] and it was agreed that seven years would be adequate punishment. While [illegible] Becker [illegible] court he was [illegible] disposed to go to [illegible] a [illegible] and be [illegible] than [illegible] years [illegible] punishment.

"THE DUTCHMAN" ADMITS HIS GUILT.

FORGER BECKER SUCCUMBS AND PLEADS GUILTY.

Sensation Furnished in the Famous Nevada Bank Case To-Day.

Weary of Long Confinement, With the Worry and Anxiety of Repeated Trials, the Old Man Gives In.

The Prince of Forgers has thrown up the sponge. Karl Becker, whose inimitable skill cost the Nevada Bank over $20,000, stood up before Judge Wallace in court this morning and acknowledged his guilt.

The collapse of this most remarkable case was due to a compromise. The Bankers' Association, the District Attorney's office and the police, weary of the protracted struggle to secure a conviction that would stick, sick of trials and retrials that only served to pile up the expenses higher and higher, made overtures to Becker on Saturday last to plead guilty, promising to use all the influence in their power to secure a light sentence for the forger. The forger, at first, steadfastly refused; but the long confinement in the County Jail had shattered his nerves and injured his health. The desertion of Creegan was the last straw that broke the old man's back.

The result was an arrangement whereby all parties agreed to ask Judge Wallace to pass a seven years' sentence. As he has been in jail for nearly three years, it will be just as though he suffered a ten-years penalty in all. Sentence was fixed for Friday next, at which time Judge Wallace will probably accept the suggestions of the parties interested and dispatch Mr. Becker to San Quentin for a period of seven years.

The arrangement was kept a profound secret. The jurors attended court as usual to-day. Becker took his place at the desk, with Peter F. Dunne on one side of him and Henry T. McPike on the other. Acting District Attorney Walter F. Hinkle was in the prosecuting attorney's chair; Henry Ach, special counsel employed by the Bankers' Association, sat beside him. The nine jurors already accepted to try the case occupied their places in the box.

Becker looked as usual pale and restless. He pressed a handkerchief to his lips from time to time. He uttered no word, showed no sign. What occurred was a complete surprise to all present except those in the secret. Judge Wallace came into court and called the case up, whereupon Peter Dunne rose.

"May it please your Honor," he said, "the situation of the case is precisely this. Taking into consideration the circumstances that have lately arisen, it has been deemed advisable that Karl Becker, the accused herein, should deny the prior conviction formerly admitted, with the full consent of the [illegible] and should plead guilty to the [illegible].

"He does so with the full consent of the [illegible] and all parties concerned in the [illegible] tion."

Judge Wallace turned to Becker, who stood up. "You understand what your counsel says?" he inquired. "You now deny the prior conviction you formerly admitted and you plead guilty to the charge of forgery?"

"I do," replied Becker, in an almost inaudible voice. Then he resumed his seat.

[illegible] rose again. "Now, with regard to the punishment to be inflicted I would call your Honor's attention to the fact that the defendant Becker has been in jail for three years. He is an old man, and his health is bad. I venture to suggest that if your Honor pass sentence of seven years, that would be [illegible] together with his three years' confinement credited, justice will be satisfied.

"The matter has been discussed by all parties concerned, and they are satisfied with this arrangement. On his part Becker consents to save the State a [illegible] amount of trouble and expense. This third trial would probably [illegible] in another disagreement, [illegible] three or four weeks spent on it, and [illegible] the trouble of trial and retrial [illegible] to say nothing of an appeal to the Supreme Court in case of conviction. Becker is a man in bad health and the District Attorney will read you [illegible] a communication from the City Physician who has been attending him."

[illegible] complied and read a letter [illegible] setting forth that Becker had been [illegible] He suffered from [illegible] [illegible] in the long confinement [illegible]

"I, too, wish to say a few words," put in Henry Ach. "I am the special prosecution in this case, employed by the banks of San Francisco and the Bankers' Association of America. I represent the Nevada Bank, where the $22,000 check was passed, and the Crocker-Woolworth Bank, upon which it was drawn. This whole matter was fully discussed on Saturday last, and Chief Lees and myself visited several bankers. We visited Mr. Crocker of the Crocker-Woolworth Bank, Messrs. Alvord and Brown of the Bank of California, Mr. Hellman of the Nevada Bank and Mr. Steinhardt of the Anglo-Californian Bank.

"The result of our conference was that it was agreed that if Becker would plead guilty and save us further trouble and expense, we would be satisfied, taking into consideration the fact that he has passed thirty-two months in jail, with a sentence of seven years' imprisonment. He is an old man now, over 61 years of age, and the banks fear him no longer."

Judge Wallace listened patiently to all these remarks, and then announced that he would pass sentence on Friday morning. Court adjourned then, and the incident was over. Becker [illegible] calmly, put on his hat and followed a deputy sheriff down stairs.

WHY BECKER GAVE IN

Would Have Beaten the Case Had His Health Held Out.

The man whose skill in penmanship has scared half the banks in Europe and America stood quietly talking to Sheriff Whelan in the office when the court proceedings were over. He showed no emotion whatever, he was the same quiet, courteous, affable old man. Becker has good manners, and he is pleasant to converse with, his Teutonic accent rather attracting than the reverse.

"I was going crazy up in that County Jail," he explained. "It was bad enough while Creegan was with me. But when he turned and left me, I didn't know what to do. On Monday night last, at the close of the day, when Creegan staid behind to chum with Dean, and I went to the County Jail alone, I tried six times to go to sleep. Six times I retired and six times I rose again, nervous and depressed.

"That was one reason why I resolved to take my medicine. Another reason was this. I've been three years in jail now. They'd never have convicted me, never. If they had, the Supreme Court would have reversed the case. But I'd have been tried and tried again, for I know the banks would never have let up. More and more expense. It would have been all right if Creegan had stood by, but he was a coward. We could have beaten the case sure. Creegan is a coward and a traitor.

"Perhaps, as I'm old and not very well they'll give me nice work over the bay. I can draw and paint, do anything like that.

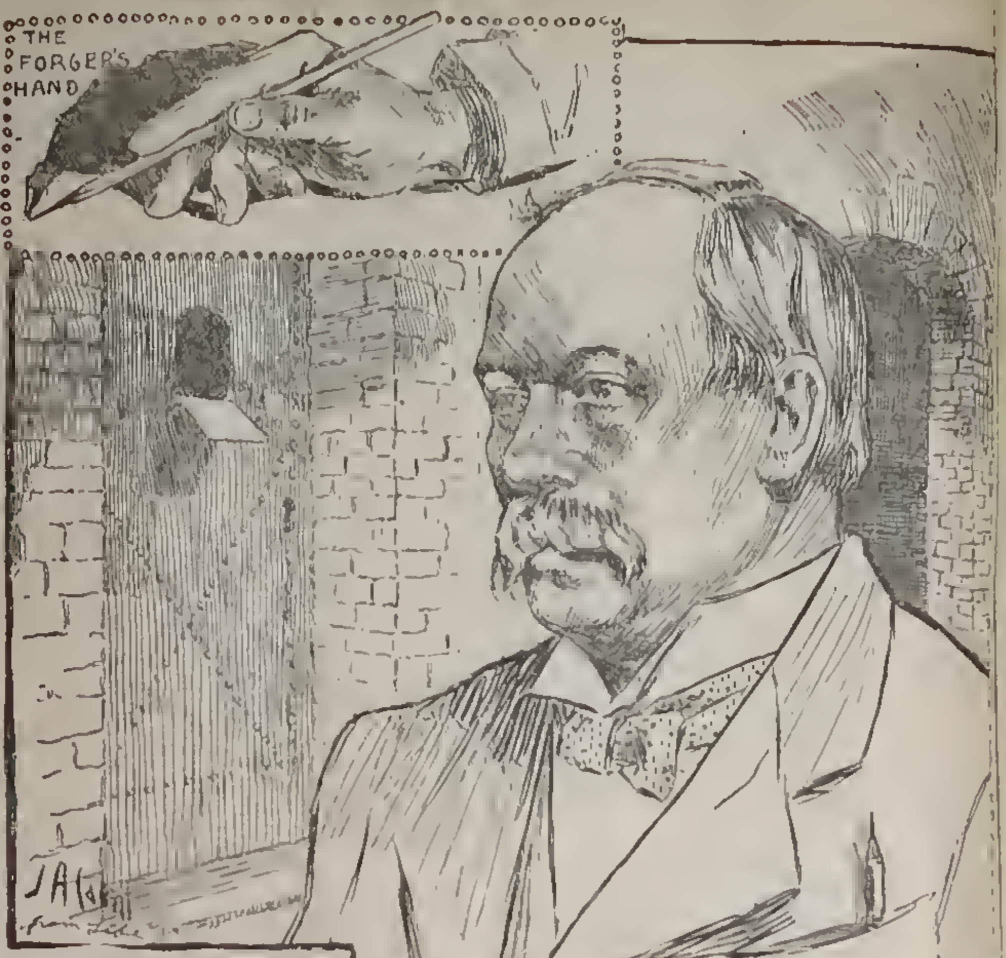
"Well, I'm glad it's over. I'm going to send for my dear wife, and she'll come at once. There is so much to arrange. Perhaps Mr. Dunne will fix it so that I won't go across before Christmas. Just think; I have to arrange all my affairs."

Becker talked freely of the forgery and of the persons concerned. He does not quite see what part Dean and McCluskey need have played in the matter. For himself, he knew only Creegan.

"Why, I never heard of Dean," he said. "I knew only Creegan. Dean says he met me in London. That is not true. He did not meet me, no one met me. I never met people. I always worked alone, in the background. I never let any one know me, or anything about me.

"McCluskey said he saw me in England. If he did, he did not know me. What do I know about McCluskey, or he about me? The fact is, when people make up their minds to turn State's evidence they tell a great deal more than the truth. They want to round out the story, tell it all, you know. And what they don't know they make up.

"Look at the trial. That chambermaid at the Galindo Hotel in Oakland, said I had given orders to have my door always locked. That. It was always [illegible]



BECKER GIVES UP.

He Makes Confession

FORGER BECKER PLEADS GUILTY.

(Continued from First Page.)

[illegible]

THE FATE OF CREEGAN

Will Probably Plead Guilty and Take a Light Sentence.

Creegan, the middleman, will probably have to follow the example of Becker and plead guilty. [illegible]

Weary of Long Confinement, With the Worry and Anxiety of Repeated Trials, the Old Man Gives In.

The Prince of Forgers has thrown up the sponge. Karl Becker, whose inimitable skill cost the Nevada Bank over $20,000, stood up before Judge Wallace in court this morning and acknowledged his guilt.

The collapse of this most remarkable case was due to a compromise. The Bankers' Association, the District Attorney's office and the police, weary of the protracted struggle to secure a conviction that would stick, sick of trials and retrials that only served to pile up the expenses higher and higher, made overtures to Becker on Saturday last to plead guilty, promising to use all the influence in their power to secure a light sentence for the forger. The forger at first, steadfastly refused, but the long confinement in the County Jail had shattered his nerves and injured his health. The desertion of Creegan was the last straw that broke the old man's back.

The result was an arrangement whereby all parties agreed to ask Judge Wallace to pass a seven years' sentence. As he has been in jail for nearly three years, it will be just as though he suffered a ten-years' penalty in all. Sentence was fixed for Friday next, at which time Judge Wallace will probably accept the suggestions of the parties interested and dispatch Mr. Becker to San Quentin for a period of seven years.

The arrangement was kept a profound secret. The jurors attended court as usual today. Becker took his place at the desk, with Peter F. Dunne on one side of him and Henry T. McPike on the other. Acting District Attorney Walter F. Hinkle was in the prosecuting attorney's chair; Henry Ach, special counsel employed for the Bankers' Association, sat beside him. The nine jurors already accepted to try the case occupied their places in the box.

Becker looked as usual, pale and restless. He pressed a handkerchief to his lips from time to time. He uttered no word, showed no sign. What occurred was a complete surprise to all present except those in the secret. Judge Wallace came into court and called the case up, whereupon Peter Dunne rose.

"May it please your Honor," he said, "the situation of the case is precisely this: Taking into consideration the circumstances that have lately arisen it has been deemed advisable that Karl Becker, the accused herein, should deny the prior conviction formerly admitted, with the full consent of the State, and should plead guilty to the charge.

"He does so with the full consent of the State and all parties concerned in the prosecution."

Judge Wallace turned to Becker, who stood up. "You understand what your counsel says?" he inquired. "You now deny the prior conviction you formerly admitted and you plead guilty to the charge of forgery?"

"I do," replied Becker, in an almost inaudible voice. Then he resumed his seat.

Dunne rose again. "Now, with regard to the punishment to be inflicted, I would call your Honor's attention to the fact that the defendant Becker has been in jail for three years. He is an old man and his health is bad. I venture to suggest that if your Honor pass sentence of seven years—that would be ten, together with his three years' confinement credited—justice will be satisfied.

"This matter has been discussed by all parties concerned, and they are satisfied with this arrangement. On his part Becker consents to save the State an immense amount of trouble and expense. This third trial would probably have resulted in another disagreement, after three or four weeks spent on it, and then the trouble of trial and retrial [illegible] through, to say nothing of an appeal to the Supreme Court in case of conviction. Becker is a man in bad health and the District Attorney will read your Honor a communication from the City Physician, who has been attending him."

Mr. Hinkle complied and read a letter from Dr. [illegible] setting forth that Becker had been very sick of late, [illegible] weak. He suffered from nervous [illegible] and insomnia and was rapidly growing worse in the [illegible] A man of 60 years of age, he [illegible] weighing 1?? pounds. His weight had reduced to 1?? pounds [illegible].

"[illegible] I say," said Mr. Hinkle, after he had read the letter, "that it is entirely [illegible] to the District Attorney's department, and the advice of Chief of Police Lees taken. The [illegible] is that the prosecution is satisfied with the arrangement as to plea and punishment proposed by Mr. Dunne."

"I, too, wish to say a few words," put in Henry Ach. "I am the special prosecution in this case, employed by the banks of San Francisco and the Bankers' Association of America. I represent the Nevada Bank, where the $22,000 check was passed, and the Crocker-Woolworth Bank, upon which it was drawn. This whole matter was fully discussed on Saturday last, and Chief Lees and myself visited several bankers. We visited Mr. Crocker of the Crocker-Woolworth Bank, Messrs. Alvord and Brown of the Bank of California, Mr. Hellman of the Nevada Bank and Mr. Steinhardt of the Anglo-Californian Bank.

"The result of our conference was that it was agreed that if Becker would plead guilty and save us further trouble and expense, we would be satisfied, taking into consideration the fact that he has passed thirty-five months in jail, with a sentence of seven years' imprisonment. He is an old man now, over 61 years of age, and the banks fear him no longer."

Judge Wallace listened patiently to all these remarks, and then announced that he would pass sentence on Friday morning. Court adjourned then, and the incident was over. Becker rose calmly, put on his hat and followed a deputy sheriff down stairs.

WHY BECKER GAVE IN

Would Have Beaten the Case Had His Health Held Out

The man whose skill in penmanship has scared half the banks in Europe and America stood quietly talking to Sheriff Whelan in the office when the court proceedings were over. He showed no emotion whatever, he was the same quiet, courteous, affable old man. Becker has good manners, and he is pleasant to converse with, his Teutonic accent rather attracting than the reverse.

"I was going crazy up in that County Jail," he explained. "It was bad enough while Creegan was with me. But when he turned and left me, I didn't know what to do. On Monday night last, at the close of the day, when Creegan stayed behind to chum with Dean, and I went to the County Jail alone, I tried six times to go to sleep. Six times I retired and six times I rose again, nervous and depressed.

"That was one reason why I resolved to take my medicine. Another reason was this: I've been three years in jail now. They'd never have convicted me, never. If they had the Supreme Court would have reversed the case. But I'd have been tried and tried again for I know the banks would never have let up. More and more expense. It would have been all right if Creegan had stood by, but he was a coward. We could have beaten the case sure. Creegan is a coward and a traitor.

"Perhaps, as I'm old and not very well, they'll give me nice work over the bay. I can draw and paint, do anything like that.

"Well, I'm glad it's over. I'm going to send for my dear wife and she'll come at once. There is so much to arrange. Perhaps Mr. Dunne will fix it so that I won't go across before Christmas. Just think; I have to arrange all my affairs."

Becker talked freely of the forgery and of the persons concerned. He does not quite see what part Dean and McCluskey need have played in the matter. For himself, he knew only Creegan.

"Why, I never heard of Dean," he said. "I knew only Creegan. Dean says he met me in London. That is not true. He did not meet me; no one met me. I never met people; I always worked alone, in the background. I never let any one know me, or anything about me.

"McCluskey said he saw me in Oakland. If he did, he did not know me. What do I know about McCluskey, or he about me? The fact is, when people make up their minds to turn State's evidence they tell a great deal more than the truth. They want to round out the story, tell it all, you know. And what they don't know they make up.

"Look at the trial. That chambermaid at the Galindo Hotel, in Oakland, said I had given orders to have my door always locked; that it was always locked. What nonsense! You see how my rooms were situated," and here the forger drew a diagram on the table. "It was never necessary for me to lock the door. The fact was, that one day I came home to lunch and found my door wide open, all my luggage exposed to any thief that came. I rang for the chambermaid and told her to be

(Continued on Page Ten.)

BECKER GIVES UP.

He Makes Confession and Ends the Trial.

Willing to Take Seven Years for the Nevada Bank Forgery.

FORGER BECKER PLEADS GUILTY.

(Continued from First Page.)

more careful, to lock my door when I went out. And from that she made up her story.

"Then that fellow Carlsen, at the hotel [illegible] [illegible] I wanted a room with a good light. [illegible] [illegible] room that [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] and I wouldn't have it. That's all.

"They said I always kept indoors [illegible] What lies! I was out all the time and every afternoon I was [illegible] on the street at the [illegible] [illegible] playing the races. Every day, I tell you.

"That's the way it is in trials. Make it up all the [illegible] But I could have [illegible] if my health had [illegible] way.

"Creegan was a coward as well as a traitor. What did he need with McCluskey [illegible]? I tell you that he [illegible] that he had [illegible] McCluskey [illegible] dirty work. That's the truth.

"[illegible] I never knew. Creegan told me that he could find a [illegible] [illegible] I didn't know [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] himself he [illegible]

"I hope [illegible] I hope [illegible] enough to pay half the expenses. [illegible] [illegible] everything [illegible] money. Creegan [illegible] pay his debt? He has a [illegible] property in New York that [illegible] He must pay.

"I don't [illegible] now. It is over. But I [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] hall and the kindly [illegible] [illegible] his [illegible]

THE FATE OF CREEGAN

Will Probably Plead Guilty and Take a Light Sentence

[illegible] will probably [illegible] the example of Becker and plead guilty. [illegible] will be let go and [illegible] McCluskey [illegible] and [illegible] But Creegan has [illegible] [illegible] him an absolute pardon. He would undoubtedly [illegible] [illegible] third trial [illegible] [illegible] District Attorney [illegible] Chief of Police [illegible] [illegible] light punishment [illegible] [illegible] in San Quentin.

"THE DUTCHMAN" ADMITS

FORGER BECKER SUCCUMBS AND PLEADS GUILTY.

Sensation Furnished in the Famous Nevada Bank Case To-Day.

Weary of Long Confinement, With the Worry and Anxiety of Repeated Trials, the Old Man Gives In.

The Prince of Forgers has thrown up the sponge. Karl Becker, whose inimitable skill cost the Nevada Bank over $20,000, stood up before Judge Wallace in court this morning and acknowledged his guilt.

The collapse of this most remarkable case was due to a compromise. The Bankers' Association, the District Attorney's office and the police, weary of the protracted struggle to secure a conviction that would stick, sick of trials and retrials that only served to pile up the expenses higher and higher, made overtures to Becker on Sunday last to plead guilty, promising to use all the influence in their power to secure a light sentence for the forger. The forger, at first, steadfastly refused, but the long confinement in the County Jail had shattered his nerves and injured his health. The desertion of Creegan was the last straw that broke the old man's back.

The result was an arrangement whereby all parties agreed to ask Judge Wallace to pass a seven years' sentence. As he has been in jail for nearly three years, it will be just as though he suffered a ten-years penalty in all. Sentence was fixed for Friday next, at which time Judge Wallace will probably accept the suggestions of the parties interested and dispatch Mr. Becker to San Quentin for a period of seven years.

The arrangement was kept a profound secret. The jurors attended court as usual to-day. Becker took his place at the desk, with Peter F. Dunne on one side of him and Henry T. McPike on the other. Acting District Attorney Walter E. Hinkle was in the prosecuting attorney's chair. Henry Ach, special counsel employed by the Bankers' Association, sat beside him. The nine jurors already accepted to try the case occupied their places in the box.

Becker looked as usual, pale and restless. He pressed a handkerchief to his lips from time to time. He uttered no word, showed no sign. What occurred was a complete surprise to all present except those in the secret. Judge Wallace came into court and called the case up, whereupon Peter Dunne rose.

"May it please your Honor," he said, "the situation of the case is precisely this. Taking into consideration the circumstances that have lately arisen, it has been deemed advisable that Karl Becker, the [illegible] herein, should deny the prior conviction formerly admitted, with the full consent of the [illegible], and should plead guilty to the charge.

"He does so with the full consent of the State and all parties concerned in the prosecution."

Judge Wallace turned to Becker, who stood up. "You understand what your counsel says?" he inquired. "You now deny the prior conviction you formerly admitted and you plead guilty to the charge of forgery?"

"I do," replied Becker, in an almost inaudible voice. Then he resumed his seat.

Dunne rose again. "Now, with regard to the punishment to be inflicted, I would call your Honor's attention to the fact that the defendant Becker has been in jail for three years. He is an old man and his health is bad. I venture to suggest that if your Honor pass sentence of seven years that would be ten altogether with his three years' confinement credited. Justice will be satisfied.

"This matter has been discussed by all parties concerned, and they are satisfied with this arrangement. On his part Becker submits to save the State an immense amount of trouble and expense. This third trial would probably have resulted in another disagreement, after three or four weeks spent on it, and then the trouble of trial and retrial all through, to say nothing of an appeal to the Supreme Court in case of conviction. Becker is a man in bad health and the District Attorney will read your Honor a communication from the City Physician, who has been attending him."

Mr. Hinkle complied and read a letter from Dr. Hereford, setting forth that Becker had been very ill [illegible] late, that he [illegible]. He suffered from [illegible] and bronchitis and [illegible] growing worse in the long [illegible]

"I, too, wish to say a few words," put in Henry Ach. "I am the special prosecutor in this case, employed by the banks of San Francisco and the Bankers' Association of America. I represent the Nevada Bank, where the $22,000 check was passed, and the Crocker-Woolworth Bank, upon which it was drawn. This whole matter was fully discussed on Saturday last, and Chief Lees and myself visited several bankers. We visited Mr. Crocker of the Crocker-Woolworth Bank, Messrs. Alvord and Brown of the Bank of California, Mr. Hellman of the Nevada Bank and Mr. Steinhardt of the Anglo-California Bank.

"The result of our conference was that it was agreed that if Becker would plead guilty and save us further trouble and expense, we would be satisfied, taking into consideration the fact that he has passed thirty-two months in jail, with a sentence of seven years' imprisonment. He is an old man now, over 61 years of age, and the banks fear him no longer."

Judge Wallace listened patiently to all these remarks, and then announced that he would pass sentence on Friday morning. Court adjourned then and the incident was over. Becker rose calmly, put on his hat and followed a deputy sheriff down stairs.

WHY BECKER GAVE IN

Would Have Beaten the Case Had His Health Held Out

The man whose skill in penmanship has scared half the banks in Europe and America stood quietly talking to Sheriff Whelan in the office when the court proceedings were over. He showed no emotion whatever, but was the same quiet, courteous, affable old man. Becker has good manners, and he is pleasant to converse with, his Teutonic accent rather attracting than the reverse.

"I was going crazy up in that County Jail," he explained. "It was bad enough while Creegan was with me. But when he turned and left me I didn't know what to do. On Monday night last, at the close of the day, when Creegan staid behind to chum with Dean, and I went to the County Jail alone, I tried six times to go to sleep. Six times I retired and six times I rose again, nervous and depressed.

"That was one reason why I resolved to take my medicine. Another reason was this. I've been three years in jail now. They'd never have convicted me, never. If they had the Supreme Court would have reversed the case. But I'd have been tried and tried again, for I know the banks would never have let up. More and more expense. It would have been all right if Creegan had stood by, but he was a coward. We could have beaten the case sure. Creegan is a coward and a traitor.

"Perhaps, as I'm old and not very well they'll give me nice work over the bay. I can draw and paint, do anything like that.

"Well, I'm glad it's over. I'm going to send for my dear wife, and she'll come at once. There is so much to arrange. Perhaps Mr. Dunne will fix it so that I won't go across before Christmas. Just think; I have to arrange all my affairs."

Becker talked freely of the forgery and of the persons concerned. He does not quite see what part Dean and McCluskey need have played in the matter. For himself, he knew only Creegan.

"Why, I never heard of Dean," he said. "I knew only Creegan. Dean says he met me in London. That is not true. He did not meet me, no one met me. I never met people; I always worked alone, in the background. I never let any one know me, or anything about me.

"McCluskey said he saw me in Holland. If he did, he did not know me. What do I know about McCluskey, or he about me? The fact is, when people make up their minds to turn State's evidence they tell a great deal more than the truth. They want to round out the story, tell it all, you know. And what they don't know they make up.

"Look at the [illegible]. That [illegible] at the [illegible] Hotel, in Oakland [illegible]

BECKER GIVES UP.

He Makes Confession and Ends the Trial.

Willing to Take Seven Years for the Nevada Bank Forgery.

Charles Becker, the forger, pleaded guilty before Judge Wallace yesterday morning of having raised a check from $12 to $22,000, which forged paper was afterward cashed at the Crocker-Woolworth Bank by Dean, alias Seaton.

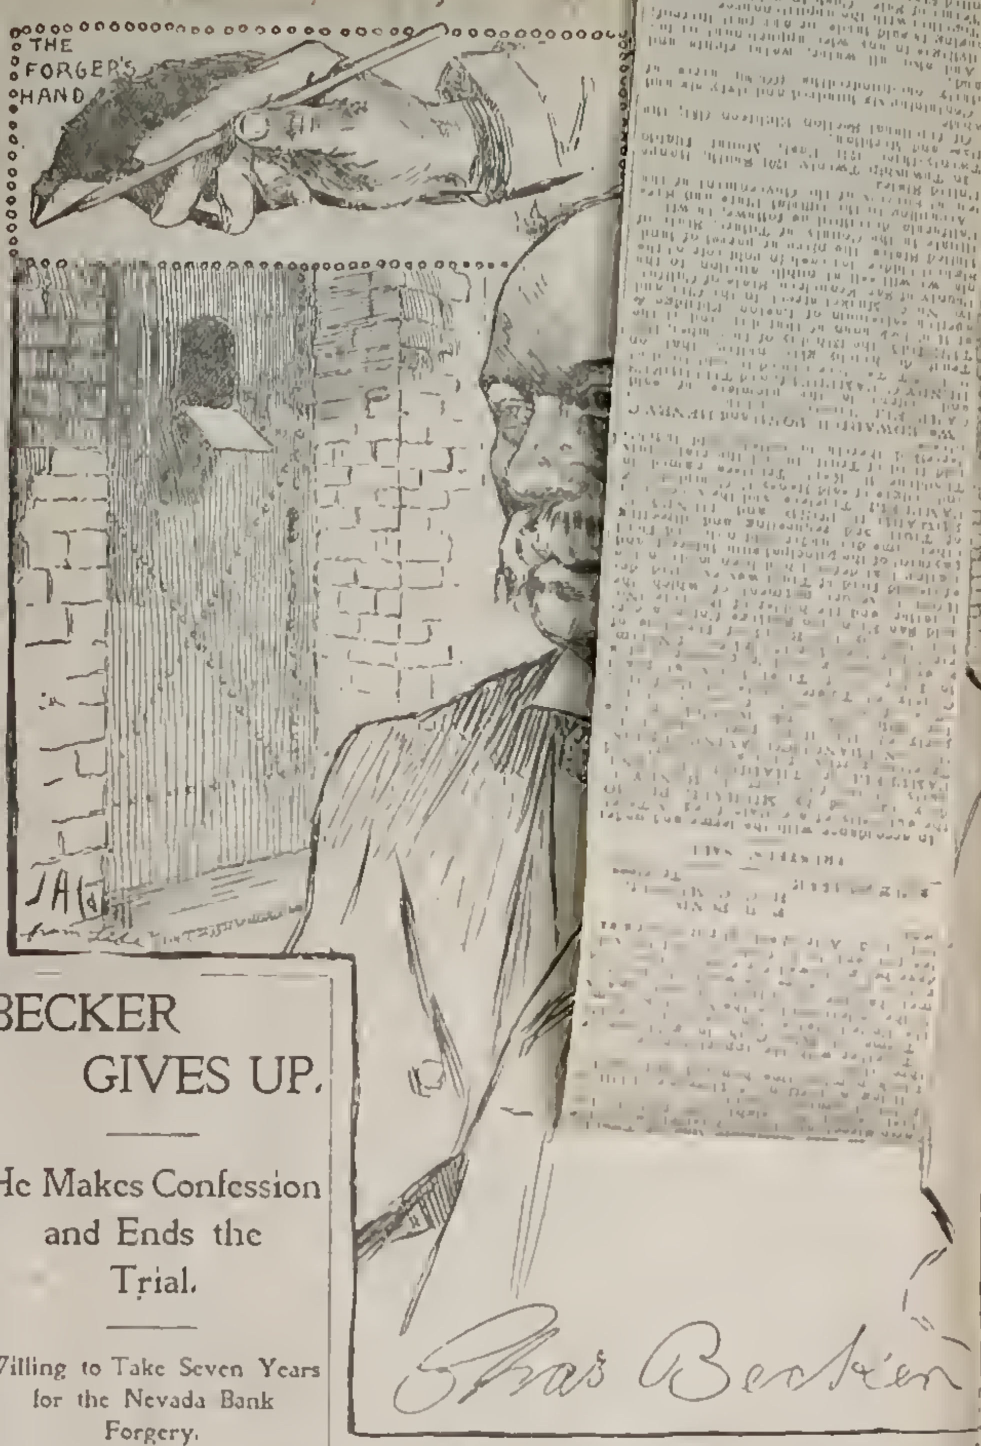
When court opened [illegible] the [illegible] veniremen summoned to complete the jury were called and the nine men already in the box had responded "present," when Peter F. Dunne, representing the defendant, addressed the Judge, saying: "With the consent of the State the defendant withdraws his previous plea of prior conviction and pleads guilty to the charge of forgery." Judge Wallace then asked the defendant if he understood the proposition of his counsel. The accused arose in his place beside his lawyers and said that the plea, as amended, was his. The old forger, apparently much broken both in health and spirits, resumed his seat and Dunne again addressed the Court, saying that Becker was an old man, being past 60 years of age. He had already been in custody for nearly three years on the charge for which he was on trial. Dunne said that he had consulted with attorneys for the State and they had agreed that a sentence of seven years, which with the three years already served would make a term of ten years, would be sufficient to meet the demands of justice.

A certificate from City Physician Hereford was read, in which he set forth that Becker during his imprisonment, had been reduced in weight from 195 to 155 pounds, his complexion was bad, his arteries were out of gear, his heart was not normal, he had malaria, his mind had been affected and from a joyous, buoyant, ??-pound forger, he had become a morose and irritable prisoner.

At the conclusion of the reading of this harrowing certificate Lawyer Ach, who is special prosecutor for the Bankers' Association and the Chief of Police, said that he had consulted with several members of the Bankers' Association and they had agreed that it would be better to have the prisoner plead guilty and receive a sentence of seven years.

Walter Hinkle of the District Attorney's office said that that department after consultation would favor the seven year sentence.

Judge Wallace accepted the amended plea, at which Becker appeared to be immediately relieved [illegible] from the [illegible] condition in which the [illegible] had placed him [illegible] found guilty under his original plea [illegible]



B[ECKER] [illegible] the picture in the [illegible] Jail yesterday [illegible] the [illegible] matters and took the greatest interest in what [illegible] the three [illegible] hairs on the top of this [illegible] portrait [illegible] very [illegible] countryman [illegible]

The [illegible] of forgers [illegible] been [illegible] he had not developed a [illegible] drawing [illegible] so I began to [illegible] that is why I am here.

Becker [illegible] as the picture progressed [illegible] Jane a little [illegible] are now [illegible] That [illegible] And [illegible] about the [illegible] the hands. They say that I have the [illegible] forger [illegible] Why a [illegible] himself [illegible] draw [illegible]

[illegible] San Quentin than I do after all, and [illegible] I have friends in the [illegible] who want to [illegible] him in the worst way. They will see him, too, if it takes ten years, and when they do [illegible] help him.

"If it hadn't been for his bungling [illegible] I wouldn't be here now. He worked this last [illegible] business wrong from start to finish. Do you think I would have run things the way he did if I had been engineering the affair? Do you think I would have had anything to do with that business on McCluskey? The agreement was that Creegan should work the thing himself, but he was too much of a cur to do it. The way the check was manipulated was a [illegible] bungle [illegible] anything about that man.

"I first met Creegan six years ago when I was keeping a saloon in [illegible] [illegible] well known [illegible] in the newspapers and one day this fellow came in to me and had a long talk. It was about a big deal to throw the Chemical National of New York for about a million dollars, but I wouldn't stand for it. There were weak points all through the scheme. Since then he has been mixed up with me several times, but the Nevada Bank business was the only one that he didn't take my advice about. I'm not [illegible] but some day Mr. Creegan will wish he had never been born.

"I don't believe that they are going to let Creegan get off without punishing him. It will be a pretty bad travesty of justice if they do.

"I've had all kinds of experts up against me in my time. Phrenologists, handwriting [illegible] and palmists have all had a turn. They are all in the business for the coin and will [illegible] anything that suits the part [illegible] employs them. This last trial [illegible] what [illegible] [illegible]

The Prince of Forgers has thrown up the sponge. Karl Becker, whose inimitable skill cost the Nevada Bank over $20,000, stood up before Judge Wallace in court this morning and acknowledged his guilt.

The collapse of this most remarkable case was due to a compromise. The Bankers' Association, the District Attorney's office and the police, weary of the protracted struggle to secure a conviction that would stick, sick of trials and retrials that only served to pile up the expenses higher and higher, made overtures to Becker on Saturday last to plead guilty, promising to use all the influence in their power to secure a light sentence for the forger. The forger, at first, steadfastly refused; but the long confinement in the County Jail had shattered his nerves and injured his health. The desertion of Creegan was the last straw that broke the old man's back.

The result was an arrangement whereby all parties agreed to ask Judge Wallace to pass a seven years' sentence. As he has been in jail for nearly three years, it will be just as though he suffered a ten years' penalty in all. Sentence was fixed for Friday next, at which time Judge Wallace will probably accept the suggestions of the parties interested and dispatch Mr. Becker to San Quentin for a period of seven years.

The arrangement was kept a profound secret. The jurors attended court as usual today. Becker took his place at the desk, with Peter F. Dunne on one side of him and Henry T. McPike on the other. Acting District Attorney Walter S. Hinkle was in the prosecuting attorney's chair, Henry Ach, special counsel employed by the Bankers' Association, sat beside him. The nine jurors already accepted to try the case occupied their places in the box.

Becker looked as usual, pale and restless. He pressed a handkerchief to his lips from time to time. He uttered no word, showed no sign. What occurred was a complete surprise to all present except those in the secret. Judge Wallace came into court and called the case up, whereupon Peter Dunne rose.

"May it please your Honor," he said, "the situation of the case is precisely this. Taking into consideration the circumstances that have lately arisen it has been deemed advisable that Karl Becker, the accused herein, should deny the prior conviction formerly admitted with the full consent of the State and should plead guilty to the charge.

"He does so with the full consent of the State and all parties concerned in the p[illegible]tion."

Judge Wallace turned to Becker, who stood up. "You understand what your counsel says?" he inquired. "You now deny the prior conviction you formerly admitted and you plead guilty to the charge of forgery?"

"I do," replied Becker, in an almost inaudible voice. Then he resumed his seat.

Dunne rose again. "Now, with regard to the punishment to be inflicted I would call your Honor's attention to the fact that the defendant Becker has been in jail for three years. He is an old man and his health is bad. I venture to suggest that if your Honor pass sentence of seven years—that would be ten altogether with his three years' confinement credited—justice will be satisfied.

"This matter has been discussed by all parties concerned, and they are satisfied with this arrangement. On his part Becker consents to save the State an [illegible] amount of trouble and expense. This third trial would probably have [illegible] in another disagreement after three or four weeks spent on it and then the trouble of trial and retrial [illegible], to say nothing of an appeal to the Supreme Court in case of conviction. Becker is a man in bad health, and the District Attorney will read your Honor a communication from the City Physician, who has been attending him."

Mr. Hinkle complied and read a letter from Dr. Hereford, setting forth that Becker had been very sick of late, [illegible] and weak. He suffered from [illegible] and [illegible] and was rapidly growing worse in the long confinement. A man of 60 years of age, he had entered prison weighing 178 pounds and the jail life had reduced it to 150 pounds [illegible].

"I wish to say," said Mr. Hinkle, after he had read the letter, "that this matter was gone over fully in the District Attorney's department, and the advice of Chief of Police Lees taken. The result is that the prosecution is satisfied with the arrangement as to plea and punishment proposed by Mr. Dunne."

"I, too, wish to say a few words," put in Henry Ach. "I am the special prosecutor in this case, employed by the banks of San Francisco and the Bankers' Association of America. I represent the Nevada Bank, where the $22,000 check was passed, and the Crocker-Woolworth Bank, upon which it was drawn. This whole matter was fully discussed on Saturday last, and Chief Lees and myself visited several bankers. We visited Mr. Crocker of the Crocker-Woolworth Bank, Messrs. Alvord and Brown of the Bank of California, Mr. Hellman of the Nevada Bank and Mr. Steinhart of the Anglo-Californian Bank.

"The result of our conference was that it was agreed that if Becker would plead guilty and save us further trouble and expense, we would be satisfied, taking into consideration the fact that he has passed thirty-two months in jail, with a sentence of seven years' imprisonment. He is an old man now, over 61 years of age, and the banks fear him no longer."

Judge Wallace listened patiently to all these remarks, and then announced that he would pass sentence on Friday morning. Court adjourned then, and the incident was over. Becker rose calmly, put on his hat and followed a deputy sheriff down stairs.

WHY BECKER GAVE IN

Would Have Beaten the Case Had His Health Held Out

The man whose skill in penmanship has scared half the banks in Europe and America stood quietly talking to Sheriff Whelan in the office when the court proceedings were over. He showed no emotion whatever; he was the same quiet, courteous, affable old man. Becker has good manners, and he is pleasant to converse with, his Teutonic accent rather attracting than the reverse.

"I was going crazy up in that County Jail," he explained. "It was bad enough while Creegan was with me. But when he turned and left me, I didn't know what to do. On Monday night last, at the close of the day, when Creegan staid behind to chum with Dean, and I went to the County Jail alone, I tried six times to go to sleep. Six times I retired and six times I rose again, nervous and depressed.

"That was one reason why I resolved to take my medicine. Another reason was this: I've been three years in jail now. They'd never have convicted me, never. If they had the Supreme Court would have reversed the case. But I'd have been tried and tried again, for I know the banks would never have let up. More and more expense. It would have been all right if Creegan had stood by, but he was a coward. We could have beaten the case, sure. Creegan is a coward and a traitor.

"Perhaps, as I'm old and not very well they'll give me nice work over the bay. I can draw and paint, do anything like that.

"Well, I'm glad it's over. I'm going to send for my dear wife and she'll come at once. There is so much to arrange. Perhaps Mr. Dunne will fix it so that I won't go across before Christmas. Just think; I have to arrange all my affairs."

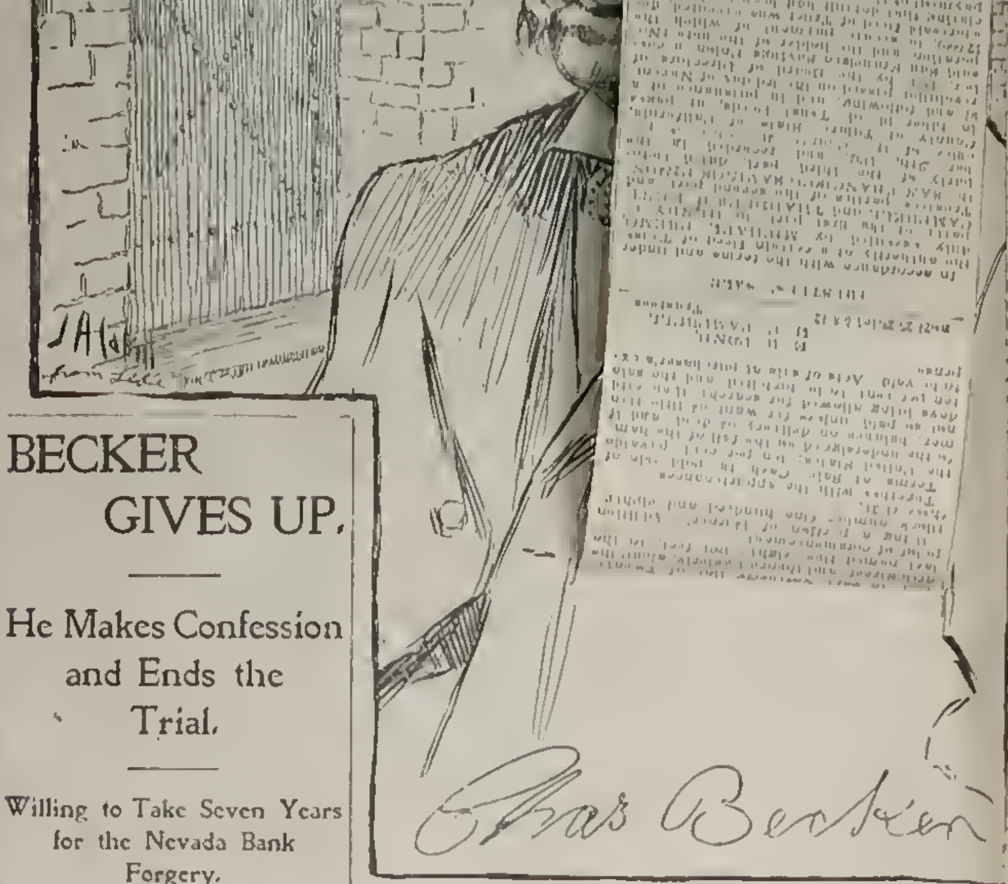
Becker talked freely of the forgery and of the persons concerned. He does not quite see what part Dean and McCloskey need have played in the matter. For himself, he knew only Creegan.

"Why, I never heard of Dean," he said. "I knew only Creegan. Dean says he met me in London. That is not true. He did not meet me, no one met me. I never met people; I always worked alone, in the background. I never let any one know me, or anything about me.

"McCloskey said he saw me in Oakland. If he did, he did not know me. What do I know about McCloskey, or he about me? The fact is, when people make up their minds to turn State's evidence they tell a great deal more than the truth. They want to round out the story, tell it all, you know. And what they don't know they make up.

"Look at the trial. That chambermaid at the Galindo Hotel, in Oakland, said I had given orders to have my doors always locked, that it was always locked. What nonsense! You see how my rooms were situated," and here the forger drew a diagram on the table. "It was never necessary for me to lock the door. The fact was, that one day I came home to lunch and found my doors wide open, all my luggage exposed to any thief that came. I rang for the chambermaid and told her to lock

(Continued on Page Ten.)



BECKER GIVES UP.

He Makes Confession and Ends the Trial.

Willing to Take Seven Years for the Nevada Bank Forgery.

Charles Becker, the forger, pleaded guilty before Judge Wallace yesterday morning of having raised a check from $12 to $22,000, which forged paper was afterward cashed at the Crocker-Woolworth Bank by Deane alias Searey.

When court opened the names of the veniremen summoned to complete the jury were called and the nine men already in the box had responded "present," when Peter F. Dunne, representing the defendant, addressed the Judge, saying: "With the consent of the State the defendant withdraws his previous plea of prior conviction and will plead guilty to the charge of forgery." Judge Wallace then asked the defendant if he understood the proposition of his counsel. The accused arose in his place beside his lawyers and said that the plea as amended was his. The old forger, apparently much broken both in health and spirits, resumed his seat and Dunne again addressed the Court, saying that Becker was an old man, being past [illegible] years of age. He had already been in custody for nearly three years on the charge for which he was on trial. Dunne said that he had consulted with attorneys for the State and they had agreed that a sentence of seven years, which with the three years already served would make a term of ten years, would be sufficient to meet the demands of justice.

A certificate from City Physician Hereford was read in which he set forth that Becker, during his imprisonment, had been reduced in weight from 1[illegible] to [illegible] pounds; his [illegible], [illegible] had; his arteries were out of gear, his heart was not normal, he had [illegible]; his mind had been affected and from a joyous, buoyant [illegible] forger, he had become a [illegible] and irritable prisoner.

At the conclusion of the reading of this harrowing certificate Lawyer [illegible], who is special prosecutor for the Bankers' Association, [illegible] said that he had conferred with [illegible] members of the Bankers' Association and they had agreed that it would be better to have the prisoner plead guilty and receive a sentence of seven years.

Walter Hinkle of the District Attorney's office said that the department after consultation would favor the seven-year sentence.

Judge Wallace accepted the amended plea at which Becker [illegible] immediately [illegible] condition in which [illegible] had placed him. [illegible] been found guilty under [illegible] admitting his prior conviction [illegible] have been liable to a sentence to life imprisonment. [illegible] the limit of imprisonment would be fourteen years. Sentence will be pronounced next Friday.

The case of James Creegan, one of Becker's accomplices, who turned State's evidence, was called and the Judge announced that he would set the time for a new trial next Friday.

When Becker returned to the County Jail he recovered his spirits considerably and was quite equal to the task of receiving and chatting with anybody that came to visit him. If he is tottering on the verge of the grave, with his intellect gone and his body a refuge for all the ills in the category, as alleged by the City Physician, he conceals his condition remarkably well. The fact is that Becker is sound and well both mentally and physically and just as capable of indulging in his favorite pastime of raising checks as he was twenty years ago, the testimony of Dr. Hereford notwithstanding.

The "Dutchman" doesn't like Creegan any more and seems to gather a [illegible] able satisfaction from the present condition of affairs.

"That black-hearted traitor [illegible] has jumped from the frying pan into the fire. For three years I have put up every cent of bail expenses for both of us, and, because I have no money now, he [illegible]. Well, he may get more of San Quentin than I do after all, and even if he doesn't I have friends in the [illegible] who want [illegible] him in the worst way. They will see him, too, if it takes ten years, and when they do [illegible] help him.

"If it hadn't been for his bungling [illegible] I wouldn't be here now. He worked this last [illegible] from start to finish. Do you think I would have run things that way had I [illegible] the affair? Do you think I would have had anything to do with that [illegible] McCloskey? The agreement was that Creegan should [illegible] thing [illegible] was too much of a [illegible] way the check was transferred was a [illegible]

[illegible]

I [illegible] that they are [illegible] Creegan get [illegible] will [illegible] punishing [illegible] traitor [illegible] just as if they d[illegible]

[illegible] had all kinds of [illegible] a [illegible] willing [illegible] They are all [illegible] anything that [illegible] them. This [illegible] their [illegible] was [illegible] Mr. [illegible] really [illegible] by them. The [illegible] they Creegan [illegible] and was [illegible] take the chance [illegible] to take them for him. He has [illegible] through [illegible] the country.

I can't say anything much about my future plans. [illegible] seem to be pretty well provided for without my help and beyond that I don't want to look at present. In the [illegible] years of my life [illegible] wasted. I might have been a useful member of society all that time [illegible] they wouldn't let me."

The old man smiled at the thought of his lost opportunities. He is really proud of his phenomenal record, and hates to think that his career has been blighted by the strong arm of the law.

"A world of patience, a heap of time and good luck—that's the secret of my success in my profession," said Becker. He ought to know.

BOTKIN CASE WITNESSES ALL THE WAY FROM DOVER.

SOME TASTED THE POISON.

Father and Husbands of the Victims Are Here.

DUNNING DROPPED QUIETLY INTO TOWN.

HE DESIRED TO KEEP OUT OF SIGHT UNTIL THIS MORNING.

It Is Supposed He Has Matters to Communicate That Have Not Yet Been Made Public.

Fourteen people from Delaware, eleven of them anxious to help send Cordelia Botkin to the gallows, arrived yesterday afternoon on the belated Sunset limited. The train was twenty-seven hours late, and had had some hazardous experiences. It had been wrecked in Louisiana, and the Dover people felt that Providence was not with them, and they feared on the way that some other victims might be indirectly charged to the fatal box of candy in the poisoning case. In Contra Costa county they missed the Judson explosion by only a half hour, but such fast time was their train making that the heavy jar passed unnoticed. Had this explosion derailed the engine again, the Delaware people, already somewhat fearful of the long and tedious journey into the wild and woolly West, would surely have considered themselves fated.

In another party, all by himself, arrived probably the most important witness in the case, John P. Dunning. It had been publicly announced, and, indeed, Dunning had himself wired to the Chief of Police, that he would not arrive in San Francisco until this morning. It had been hinted that Dunning was not yet on sufficiently friendly terms with his father-in-law to care to travel on the same train with the Doverians. This was afterward denied, though it was admitted that the overland journey would necessarily be unpleasant to Dunning and would make him prefer to travel by himself. It was also given out that he was obliged to stop in Chicago to confer with the Associated Press people who are his employers. In spite of all the elaborate explanations, however, Dunning arrived in San Francisco before any of the other witnesses. He slipped quietly into town yesterday morning, and though he is personally known to a thousand persons, no one knew that he was in San Francisco until an old acquaintance met him as he was coming out from a well-known down-town hat [illegible]. The man who recognized him was as surprised as Dunning himself. Dunning explained that he did not wish to have his arrival announced until this morning, and said that he had no desire to see the Delaware people at present. He would, he said, call upon them Tuesday.

Dunning stated that he intended to make a clean breast of everything he knew in the case. He hinted that he had something up his sleeve—something that had not been printed and that was not yet known. Those who know him best say that the something to which he refers is probably threats made by Mrs. Botkin, with his wife as their object, in the old days when Mrs. Botkin and Dunning were so thick. It is also said that he may have letters in which some reference is made by Mrs. Botkin to an approaching tragedy.

Dunning said that nothing in his past life could be exposed and make him more trouble than the exposures so far made have already done, and that he had decided to hold back nothing, as nothing could be done to injure him that had not already been done. At [illegible] today, he said, he would have an interview with Chief Lees and would tell him all that he knew. After that he would go to the hotel and see the people from Delaware. Why Dunning arrived a day ahead of his schedule and his particular desire for secrecy as to the time of his arrival are not known.

Never has such a group of witnesses crossed the continent on such an errand. The party, headed by John P. Pennington, father of the murdered women, who is a good deal of a patriarch, was conveyed by Detectives [illegible] and McVey, who said that he felt as though he were coming home, having been in California for several weeks only a short time ago. Next to Mr. Pennington in interest is Joshua [illegible], [illegible] of the murdered women, and [illegible] Deane, his daughter, a [illegible] child, a fresh faced [illegible] [illegible] girl of 11. Both Mr. and Miss [illegible] in knickerbockers, who brought the candy from the Postoffice, and Thomas M. [illegible], the Postmaster, who received it. These witnesses, with John P. Dunning, the husband of one of the murdered women, complete the chain of direct testimony, so far as the sender and the receipt of the candy is concerned.

There are, besides, a number of auxiliary witnesses. Most important, though not a witness, is Attorney-General Robert White of Delaware, who hopes to be some sort of special counsel in the case. Mr. White is accompanied by his wife. There is also Dr. Theodore Wolfe, the State Chemist, who analyzed the candy and found the arsenic. Dr. Wolfe is also accompanied by his wife. The other doctors in the party are Dr. Lemuel A. H. Bishop, who attended the women after their seizure, and Dr. F. S. Downes, who was called in consultation.

Except for the accident near New Orleans the party had a pleasant journey, and, in spite of their sad errand, rather enjoyed the trip across the continent. The children especially had a pleasant time and were laden with gaily painted bows and arrows purchased of Indians. Mr. Pennington, father of the murdered women, is not nearly so old in appearance as his years would lead one to expect. He appeared to be in good health.

None of the witnesses from Delaware have any new light on the case. All that they know has been exploited over and over again. They are merely prepared to swear to what has already been published in the newspapers. The father of the murdered women will have important testimony to offer concerning the receipt of anonymous letters by Mrs. Dunning. He was for long years a farmer, later a lawyer, then a politician and Congressman. He expressed the hope that the case would not be tried in advance by the newspapers and that the testimony would only be discussed as it was brought out. He wished to know where Mrs. Botkin was confined.

Joshua D. Deane, husband of Mrs. Deane, who ate of the poisoned candy, is a pleasant-faced man with mild manners. He said that Mrs. Dunning was dazed while she lingered between life and death, and he did not think that she realized that she had been poisoned. He said that, while at first he had blamed Dunning for his part in the affair, he now considered that he was more to be pitied than blamed. Dunning had told him, he said, that he would tell all he knew in the case, and that [illegible] [illegible] upon the newspaper man as their star witness. Deane said that while Dunning had lost some useful letters and important papers on his way home from Cuba, these were not absolutely essential, and other letters in Dunning's possession would do as well. Deane said that as soon as the circumstances leading to the death of the women were made known to Dunning he mentioned Mrs. Botkin's name and said that the writing was hers.

The doctors who have come out to testify are very anxious to get back, as they are not compensated for loss of time, and their absence is fatal to their practice. Dr. Downes especially was horrified to hear that two or three weeks would probably be consumed before a jury was impaneled. Dr. Downes and Dr. Bishop, as well as the state chemist, will testify as to the symptoms of the women and the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] found in the [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible]. This [illegible]

Chief of Police Lees, Assistant District Attorney Hosmer, Attorney-General White and John P. Pennington held a conference at the hotel, going carefully over the testimony which might be expected from the Eastern witnesses. Lees and Hosmer will decide later upon the points they wish from each witness and the order of the testimony. There is a strong desire to have the District Attorney-elect, ex-Judge Murphy, who is a noted prosecutor, take charge of this case, and it is very possible that this may yet be done.

It was reported yesterday that George A. Knight had withdrawn from the defense, and it was stated that he had had a serious disagreement with Mrs. Botkin. These things Mr. Knight denied last night, saying that while he would not take the lead in the actual conduct of the trial, owing to other business engagements, he would be in the case all through, assisting in the securing of the jury and in such other matters as his client and associates might desire.

When the Botkin case was called yesterday morning in Judge Cook's court the announcement was made from the bench that out of respect to the memory of the late Judge Hunt the trial would go over till 10 o'clock this morning, but, in order to save her early time, the venire of jurymen should be called at once.

Mrs. Botkin, accompanied by her sister and Attorneys Wheeler and Mc-Gowan, came into court heavily veiled, and through the short session carried on an earnest conversation with her legal advisers.

Assistant District Attorney Hosmer appeared for the prosecution. Chief Lees and District Attorney-elect Murphy were seated with him and all the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in the city. Candy makers, [illegible] [illegible], the counter girls and all the rest, [illegible] in a row behind them.

The names of [illegible] veniremen were called. About sixty of these were excused for various reasons. William [illegible] Harrison was released from duty [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

They are needed. There is also given to-day the Admiral [illegible], which is one of the best means for a plain garment which is always welcome in any wardrobe. Get the pattern at the San Francisco office or at the Oakland branch, [illegible] Broadway, corner of Ninth street.

It Is Supposed He Has Matters to Communicate That Have Not Yet Been Made Public.

Fourteen people from Delaware, eleven of them anxious to help send Cordelia Botkin to the gallows, arrived yesterday afternoon on the belated Sunset Limited. The train was twenty-seven hours late, and had had some hazardous experiences. It had been wrecked in Louisiana, and the Dover people felt that Providence was not with them, and they feared on the way that some other victims might be indirectly charged to the fatal box of candy in the poisoning case. In Contra Costa county they missed the Judson explosion by only a half hour, but such fast time was their train making that the heavy jar passed unnoticed. Had this explosion derailed the engine again, the Delaware people, already somewhat fearful of the long and tedious journey into the wild and woolly West, would surely have considered themselves fated.

In another party, all by himself, arrived probably the most important witness in the case, John P. Dunning. It had been publicly announced, and, indeed, Dunning had himself wired to the Chief of Police, that he would not arrive in San Francisco until this morning. It had been hinted that Dunning was not yet on sufficiently friendly terms with his father-in-law to care to travel on the same train with the Doverians. This was afterward denied, though it was admitted that the over-land journey would necessarily be unpleasant to Dunning and would make him prefer to travel by himself. It was also given out that he was obliged to stop in Chicago to confer with the Associated Press people, who are his employers. In spite of all the elaborate explanations, however, Dunning arrived in San Francisco before any of the other witnesses. He slipped quietly into town yesterday morning and though he is personally known to a thousand persons no one knew that he was in San Francisco until an old acquaintance met him as he was coming out from a well-known down-town bar. The man who recognized him was as surprised as Dunning himself. Dunning explained that he did not wish to have his arrival announced until this morning and said that he had no desire to see the Delaware people at present. He would, he said, call upon them Tuesday.

Dunning stated that he intended to make a clean breast of everything he knew in the case. He hinted that he had something up his sleeve—something that had not been printed and that was not yet known. Those who know him best say that the something to which he refers is probably threats made by Mrs. Botkin, with his wife as their object, in the old days when Mrs. Botkin and Dunning were so thick. It is also said that he may have letters in which some reference is made by Mrs. Botkin to an approaching tragedy.

Dunning said that nothing in his past life could be exposed and make him more trouble than the exposures so far made have already done and that he had decided to hold back nothing, as nothing could be done to injure him that had not already been done. At 9 o'clock today he said he would have an interview with Chief Lees and would tell him all that he knew. After that he would go to the hotel and see the people from Delaware. Why Dunning arrived a day ahead of his schedule and his particular desire for secrecy as to the time of his arrival are not known.

Never has such a group of witnesses crossed the continent on such an errand. The party headed by John D. Pennington, father of the murdered women, who is a good deal of a patriarch, was convoyed by Detective Richard McVey, who said that he felt as though he were coming home having been in California for several years only a short time ago. Next to Mr. Pennington in interest is Joshua D. Deane, husband of one of the murdered women, and Lela Deane, the daughter and only child, a fresh-faced bright-cheeked girl of 14. Both Mr. and Miss Deane will be witnesses. The girl is especially important as she partook of the poisoned candy and was made very ill by it, though she recovered without much difficulty.

Ethel Millington, another young girl and a companion of Lela Deane, is a daughter of a hotel-keeper at Dover, and was one of the porch party at the Pennington house the night the candy arrived. She also ate and was ill and on the stand she will tell of her experience.

Miss Josephine Bateman, the only woman witness of them all, is a school teacher in Dover and was made very ill from eating the candy—she also having been at the Penningtons' that night. Miss Bateman is an especially important witness because she afterward brushed her teeth and found several grains of arsenic, which, if swallowed, would have been sufficient to have caused death. All of these witnesses will testify to the sort of pains and [illegible] which followed the eating of the candy. The only theory upon which [illegible] could be based is that some of the candies were not poisoned, and they were fortunate in drawing some of these blanks. There are also in the party Harry Pennington, a lad in knickerbockers, who brought the candy from the Postoffice, and Thomas M. Booten, the Postmaster, who received it. These witnesses, with John P. Dunning, the husband of one of the murdered women, complete the chain of direct testimony, so far as Dover and the receipt of the candy is concerned.

There are, besides, a number of auxiliary witnesses. Most important, though not a witness, is Attorney-General Robert White of Delaware, who hopes to be some sort of special counsel in the case. Mr. White is accompanied by his wife. There is also Dr. Theodore Wolfe, the State Chemist, who analyzed the candy and found the arsenic. Dr. Wolfe is also accompanied by his wife. The other doctors in the party are Dr. Lemuel A. H. Bishop, who attended the women after their seizure, and Dr. P. S. Downes, who was called in consultation.

Except for the accident near New Orleans the party had a pleasant journey, and, in spite of their sad errand, rather enjoyed the trip across the continent. The children especially had a pleasant time and were laden with gaily painted horns and arrows purchased of Indians. Mr. Pennington, father of the murdered women, is not nearly so old in appearance as his years would lead one to expect. He appeared to be in good health.

None of the witnesses from Delaware have any new light on the case. All that they know has been exploited over and over again. They are merely prepared to swear to what has already been published in the newspapers. The father of the murdered women will have important testimony to offer concerning the receipt of anonymous letters by Mrs. Dunning. He was for long years a farmer, later a lawyer, then a politician and Congressman. He expressed the hope that the case would not be tried in advance by the newspapers, and that the testimony would only be discussed as it was brought out. He wished to know where Mrs. Botkin was confined.

Joshua D. Deane, husband of Mrs. Deane, who also ate the poisoned candy, is a pleasant-faced man with mild manners. He said that Mrs. Dunning was dazed while she lingered between life and death and he did not think that she realized that she had been poisoned. He said that while at first he had blamed Dunning for his part in the affair he now considered that he was more to be pitied than blamed. Dunning had told him, he said, that he would tell all he knew in the case, and they were counting upon the newspaper man as their star witness. Deane said that while Dunning had lost some useful letters and important papers on his way home from Cuba, these were not absolutely essential and other letters in Dunning's possession would do as well. Deane said that as soon as the circumstances leading to the death of the women were made known to Dunning he mentioned Mrs. Botkin's name and said that the writing was hers.

The doctors who have come out to testify are very anxious to get back, as they are not compensated for loss of time, and their absence is fatal to their practice. Dr. Downes especially was horrified to hear that two or three weeks would probably be consumed before a jury was impaneled. Dr. Downes and Dr. Bishop as well as the State chemist will testify as to the symptoms of the women and the amorphous arsenic found in the chocolates. Unfortunately there was no post-mortem examination and no autopsy. This link, which is an important one, is entirely missing, and the lawyers for the defense say that this alone would make it impossible to convict Mrs. Botkin. With this exception the chain of testimony is complete from the time when the Postmaster handed the package over to the Pennington boy to the time when the women died, as is supposed, from partaking of the contents.

Attorney-General White of Delaware, who has worked up the Eastern end of the evidence, hopes to be admitted to the case in some capacity as special counsellor.

The visitors were escorted by quite a guard of honor. Detective Ed Gibson went up to Tracy to meet them. Even farther down the road they were met by an agent of the railroad, who came to smooth the wounded feelings of the wrecked ones who had not been injured in the smash-up and to assure them of the railroad's distinguished consideration. At the ferry Chief Lees, Captain Seymour of the harbor police and Acting District Attorney Hosmer met the visitors and they were escorted to the Grand Hotel, which they will make their headquarters. In the evening

Chief of Police Lees, Assistant District Attorney Hosmer, Attorney-General White and John D. Pennington held a conference at the hotel, going carefully over the testimony which might be expected from the Eastern witnesses. Lees and Hosmer will decide later upon the points they wish from each witness and the order of the testimony. There is a strong desire to have the District Attorney-elect, ex-Judge Murphy, who is a noted prosecutor, take charge of this case, and it is very possible that this may yet be done.

It was reported yesterday that George A. Knight had withdrawn from the defense and it was stated that he had had a serious disagreement with Mrs. Botkin. These things Mr. Knight denied last night, saying that while he could not take the lead in the actual conduct of the trial, owing to other business engagements, he would be in the case all through, assisting in the [illegible] of the jury and in such other matters as his client and associates might desire.

When the Botkin case was called yesterday morning in Judge Cook's court the announcement was made from the bench that out of respect to the memory of the late Judge Borden the trial would go over till 10 o'clock this morning, but, in order to save necessary time, the venire of jurymen should be called at once.

Mrs. Botkin, accompanied by her sister and Attorneys Wheeler and McGowan, came into court heavily veiled, and through the short session carried on an earnest conversation with her legal advisers.

Assistant District Attorney Hosmer appeared for the prosecution. Chief Lees and District Attorney-elect Murphy were seated with him and all the witnesses from the city. Candymaker Haas, the counter girls and all the rest, were in a row behind them.

The names of 150 [illegible] men were called. About sixty of these were excused for various reasons. William [illegible] Harrison was excused from duty because he was not a citizen and Timothy Hopkins made a successful plea of non-residence. The balance of those excused either presented certificates of medical disability or gave evidence that they were national guardsmen or attorneys.

Judge Cook made a speech to those selected for jury duty and held out several [illegible] promises in the attempt to keep them from making excuses. He promised any juryman who would serve on the case exemption from jury duty till the balance of the year. As there are only twenty-five more days left in the present year and as the Botkin trial will last for fully two weeks his seductive offer did not attract the attention he thought it deserved.

New Patterns.

Many a waist of last season needs but the change of sleeve to make it exactly [illegible] for this year. It is not always easy to reduce their size and retain the proportions, but the newer modes may be an entirely different cut. There need not be any difficulty on this score, however, as the "Standard" publishes the very latest designs. Under the designation No. 521 will be found two designs in fitting these sleeves, and for the [illegible] blouse or the waist for either they are modest. There is also given today the Admiral [illegible] which is one of the [illegible] for a plain garment which is [illegible] in a wardrobe. Get the patterns at the San Francisco office or at the Oakland branch, [illegible] Broadway, corner of Ninth street.

O'ER A CONTINENT'S WIDE EXPANSE THEY COME TO TELL OF CRIME.

Preparations for the Botkin Trial.

Relatives From the Scene of the Tragedy.

If money and social [illegible] stand for [illegible] Mrs. Cordelia Botkin is going to have the [illegible] kind of a trial. She [illegible] getting a [illegible] and [illegible] give the [illegible] of [illegible] one [illegible] or another.

For when [illegible] Judge [illegible] Cook's [illegible]

[illegible]

THE ACCUSED AND THE PRINCIPAL WITNESSES [illegible]

John Dunning Arrives in the City.

Notable Panel Drawn in Judge Cook's Court.

[illegible] Altogether she seemed like a woman in mourning. She had little to say to Attorneys McGowan and Charles Wheeler of Humboldt, who are to present her case. George S. Knight did not come to speak in [illegible] woman's behalf.

Mrs. Botkin did not remain long in the courtroom, and as she went her way back to jail a mob of the curious strung along after her, eager, inquisitive, impertinent. The work of securing a jury will begin to-day.

COME TO GIVE EVIDENCE.

Witnesses Against Mrs. Cordelia Botkin Arrive From Delaware.

All of the principal witnesses in the case against Cordelia Botkin are now in the [illegible]. They [illegible] the worse for their [illegible] when the train [illegible]. John Dunning came to the city [illegible] advance of the main party.

The party with Detective McVey and Detective [illegible], who was sent as far as Tracy to [illegible] the witnesses, numbered sixteen persons. But eleven of these will be witnesses, as two of the ladies, Mrs. Wolf and Mrs. White, came to the coast only to accompany their husbands.

Quite the most interesting member of the party is John B. Pennington, ex-Congressman, ex-Attorney-General and ex-member of the historic Charleston convention of 18[illegible]. He is a practicing lawyer of Dover, Del., and in three days will have completed the [illegible] year of his life. He is the father of the late Mrs. Deane and Mrs. Dunning, and his youngest son, Harry, accompanies him, also as a witness. The [illegible] carried the box of poisoned candy from the Dover postoffice to his home. The old gentleman is not enjoying very good health, and all the attendant circumstances of his trip West, the only one he has ever made, have had a depressing effect. As to his testimony, he said:

"I am opposed to the publication of evidence in advance of a trial. I believe the trial should develop the facts. This was my idea when I was Attorney-General of Delaware, and I hold to it still."

Dr. [illegible] S. Bowen attended Mrs. Dunning on the last day of her illness. T. R. Wolf, [illegible] State Chemist of Delaware, and his evidence will be [illegible] character. The three ladies, Miss Bateman, Miss Ethel Millington and Miss Deane, the last a daughter of one of the murdered women, all partook of the poisoned candy and suffered more or less on that account. [illegible]

...illiam Grier Harrison is not a citizen of the United States," announced Judge Cook when the name of the eminent critic, playwright, pedestrian and marine insurance agent was called. The announcement caused a buzz as Harrison has played so large a part in San Francisco's life that it was generally supposed he was every inch an American. He remains true to the Queen, however, and all the "era of good feeling" cannot make a British subject acceptable as an American juror.

Harry Babcock gave his residence as San Mateo and Rudolph Herold put his Harbor Commissionership as a bar against jury duty. Colonel Macdonald was excused because of his heroic service in the militia, and both Timothy and E. W. Hopkins set up a plea of non-residence. So the list of notables had been well weeded out before the names of the jurors were called.

But Adam Grant was on hand, and ex-United States Senator A. P. Williams, who looks like Ben Harrison; Alexander G. Hawes, who was with old John Brown at Osawattomie, loomed pallid and distinguished-looking in the throng. W. E. Brown, long the confidential man of the great railroad magnates, was there also, and so was "Sam" Bigelow, but W. E. Dean answered never a word as his name was called.

CORDELIA A. BOTKIN

THE ACCUSED AND THE PRINCIPAL WITNESSES WHO WILL TESTIFY AGAINST HER

Among the others shouted for by the clerk were Rulla V. Watt, E. E. Eyre, W. S. Kittle, J. A. Donohue, C. H. Clinch, William Cluff, C. F. Bassett, D. N. Walter, Wendell Easton, N. K. Masten, H. N. Farnsworth, A. E. Castle, O. V. Baldwin, Vanlinge E. Buckingham, W. G. Deane, Harry N. Gray, B. M. Gunn, S. P. Buckbee, H. J. McAvoy, the undertaker, who seemed a bit gruesome in a murder trial, Vanderlynn Stow, Schaul [illegible], F. B. Sheldon, David Stern, Oliver Eldridge, S. F. Thorn, H. Shainwald, George Stone, Louis Glass, J. F. Meyers, Henry Boyle, M. Marcuse, Stewart Menzies, Max Goldman, James Elder, Thomas Magee, S. M. Hammond, Henry Meyer, George W. Beaver, H. N. Tilden, Henry S. Martin, soon to be Sheriff, Austin C. and Alfred J. Tubbs, George Newhall, I. G. Conrad, Alexander Hamilton, Arthur Moore and W. S. Goodfellow. And the others on the list seemed quite up to this general standard.

The proceedings in court were brief. "The witnesses in the case of The People vs. Botkin will be excused until Wednesday morning at 10 o'clock," announced the Judge. Then he declared that after the jury had been called the case would go over a day on account of the funeral of the late Judge Borden.

"Is there any objection in having the case stand over till to-morrow?" asked the Judge, formally.

"No objection," said Attorney Frank McGowan, rising from beside Mrs. Botkin with that sideways motion familiar to all who remember McGowan as the Senator from Humboldt.

"No objection," returned Deputy District Attorney Hosmer for the people.

Then the calling of the jurors went on, and at its close Judge Cook said persuasively:

"I will say to the jurors that, though they have been summoned as term jurors, if they are chosen in this case it will be the only service required of them. The case probably will only last a week or ten days. I am satisfied, from statements made to me by counsel for both sides that the trial certainly will not take over two weeks, and this service will excuse the accepted jurors from any further jury duty for a year. No excuses, except the statutory ones, will be accepted, and I certainly hope no juror will ask to be excused. Now, any of you who have legal excuses may step forward."

At once it seemed as if the entire crowd jumped to its feet. The jurors pushed forward in throngs. Many had procured doctors' certificates of bad health. Some had their certificates of service in the militia or as firemen, and some were represented by attorneys. There was a general struggle to get away, notwithstanding the Judge's honeyed bait. And of such is the average business man, who complains of the lax administration of the laws.

As for Mrs. Botkin, she appeared with her sister, Miss Dora Brown. Her dress was of sober black, relieved by a white shirt front and a white standing collar encircled by a black tie. A heavy black veil partly hid her features. Her black cloth hat was faced with black velvet and trimmed with black cock's feathers and black satin ribbons.

...ter. The three ladies, Miss Bateman, Miss Ethel Millington and Miss Deane, the last a daughter of one of the murdered women, all partook of the poisoned candy and suffered more or less on that account. Joshua D. Deane, the husband of Mrs. Dunning's sister, Thomas Gooding, Robert White, Attorney-General of Delaware, and Dr. L. H. Bishop, the family physician, complete the party of witnesses.

All were met at the depot by Chief Lees and Captain Dunlevy and Prosecuting Attorney Hosmer. They went to the Grand Hotel.

WITNESSES AGAINST MRS. BOTKIN AND THEIR EVIDENCE.

JOHN B. PENNINGTON, father of the late Mrs. Deane and Mrs. Dunning, the victims of the poisoned candy, will testify to the receipt of the candy and of the eating of it by his daughters, granddaughter and others.

HARRY C. PENNINGTON, son of John B. Pennington, will testify as to the receipt at the postoffice in Dover, Del., of the box of candy and its subsequent delivery by him to Mrs. Dunning.

JOSHUA D. DEANE, husband of one of the murdered women, will testify to their condition as the result of eating the candy, and will prove their deaths.

THOMAS GOODING, ex-Postmaster of Dover, Del., will testify that, as Postmaster, he handed a package to Harry C. Pennington, and will identify the wrapper of the candy box as that of the package so delivered.

MISS JOSEPHINE BATEMAN, MISS ETHEL MILLINGTON and MISS LEILA DEANE, daughter of the late Mrs. Deane, will all testify to the receipt of the box of candy and to the effects on themselves of partaking of the candy which the box contained, as well as to seeing Mrs. Deane and Mrs. Dunning eat the candy.

DR. P. S. DOWNS, physician of Dover, Del., who attended Mrs. Deane, will testify as to her condition, treatment for arsenical poisoning, etc., and death.

DR. T. R. WOLF, State Chemist of Dover, Del., will testify as to being called in to attend to those who ate of the candy; to the treatment prescribed, the evidence of poisoning and the fatal results of eating the candy.

DR. T. R. WOLF, State Chemist of Dover, Delaware, will testify as to his examination of candy left in the box and give toxicological evidence in regard to his analysis of the contents of the stomachs of the dead women.

ROBERT WHITE, Attorney-General of Delaware, will testify to the legal points involved in the bringing of witnesses, his examination of the facts in Delaware and kindred matters.

JOHN P. DUNNING, husband of one of the victims, will testify as to his acquaintance with Mrs. Botkin and his knowledge of her handwriting.

ALL IS READY FOR THE BOTKIN TRIAL

A Number of Witnesses in the Case From Delaware Arrive With Detective McVey.

John P. Dunning Will Give the Prosecution All the Assistance in His Power—Defense Expects an Acquittal—Mrs. Botkin in Court.

After a futile effort to extradite Mrs. Cordelia Botkin, accused of sending a box of poisoned bonbons to Dover, Del., which caused the death of two women, the authorities of California and Delaware, in order that justice may be done, have united to prosecute the defendant under the statutes of this State. This case, which is without a parallel in criminal jurisprudence, has attracted world-wide attention, first because of the enormity of the crime and second because of the possibility that a person may commit a dastardly murder and escape punishment because of a defect in our criminal laws. The trial of the accused woman is about to begin, but if the jury finds for conviction the jurisdiction of California will be denied, and the question carried to the Supreme Court for determination. The defense, relying upon the weakness of the prosecution, has not seen fit to raise this point until all evidence against the defendant has been submitted and passed upon by the jury. Beyond the legal technicalities the public has a deeper and an anxious interest in this celebrated case. A murderer sent an agency of death through the mails from this city and it accomplished its fiendish errand, and if it be proved that Mrs. Botkin posted the package and yet can escape punishment, every person having a known or unknown enemy need feel alarmed.

THE selection of a jury which is to decide whether or not Mrs. Cordelia Botkin is a modern Borgia or an innocent woman will begin this morning in Judge Carroll Cook's court. The Delaware witnesses are here to testify against the woman accused of poisoning Mrs. J. P. Dunning and Mrs. J. D. Deane. The case was set for yesterday, but court adjourned until 10 a. m. to-day out of respect for the late Judge Borden, whose funeral was held in the afternoon. Mrs. Botkin will be tried first for the murder of Mrs. Dunning.

John P. Dunning, husband of the murdered woman, has arrived in the city and will make a clean breast of his relations with Mrs. Botkin. He believes she is guilty and will not spare her or attempt to avoid unpleasant notoriety for himself. He declares that everything that could be said against him has been printed from one end of the country to the other, and he is indifferent to any comment which can now be made. Dunning did not arrive with the other Eastern witnesses. He came from Chicago by the Central route, while the others came from Delaware by the Southern route.

The Delaware witnesses reached the city at 4:15 last evening, and are now quartered at the Grand Hotel. They were due here Sunday, but their train was wrecked at Jennings, N. M., which caused a delay of twenty-seven hours. All the party are in excellent health, though somewhat fatigued by the long journey. The witnesses are: Ex-Congressman John B. Pennington, father of the victims; Joshua D. Deane, husband of one of the murdered women, and his motherless daughter, Leila; Miss Josephine Bateman, who ate some of the deadly bonbons and narrowly escaped the fate of Mrs. Deane and her sister; Ethel J. Millington, niece of the dead women, who was also made ill by eating the arsenic-laden candy; Harry Pennington, a nephew who carried the fatal package from the postoffice to his aunt; Drs. F. L. Downs and L. A. H. Bishop, who sought with all their skill to thwart the fiend's purpose; Dr. T. R. Wolf, State Chemist of Delaware, who found enough arsenic in the candy to kill a dozen persons; Postmaster Gooden of Dover and Attorney General R. C. White, who comes to assist in the prosecution of the alleged murderess. The party left Wilmington last Tuesday evening under the care of State Detective Bernard J. McVey, who came here several weeks ago to take Mrs. Botkin back to Delaware, but could not secure her extradition.

Detective Ed Gibson met the witnesses at Tracy and from there telegraphed for hotel accommodations for the entire party. Chief of Police Lees and Assistant District Attorney Hosmer met them at the ferry. On their arrival at this side the witnesses were immediately taken to the Grand. To-day the Eastern witnesses will be consulted by the Prosecuting Attorney, that he may familiarize himself with every detail of the testimony they are to give at the trial. Last night Mr. Hosmer, Chief Lees, Attorney General White and Detective McVey went over the case in a general way, and when the taking of testimony begins they will be prepared to present the strongest case possible.

When the party left Delaware ex-Congressman Pennington, who is well along in years, was not in the best of health and his relatives and friends feared the trip and its attendant hurry would be too great a strain upon his strength. Fortunately his indisposition was only temporary and he reached the end of the journey in better health and spirits than when he started. Mr. Pennington did not care to discuss the terrible fate of his daughters or the purpose of his visit here. He was deeply interested, however, in learning all he could about Mrs. Botkin, where she was imprisoned, her appearance, and the proceedings in court yesterday. The few expressions he made on the case indicate that he believes the accused woman is guilty and he hopes to see her convicted. He is familiar with the penal statutes of California and can see no reason why a speedy trial should not be had and exact justice meted to the defendant.

J. D. Deane, whose grief over the terrible death of his wife is undiminished, expressed himself with extreme bitterness.

"We all feel bitterly over this case and think the murderess of my wife and her sister should have been sent to Delaware for trial.

"We all want to get through with the case and return home as quickly as possible. Drs. Bishop and Downs have left their practice; Attorney General White had to turn his official and private affairs over to others and Dr. Wolf is forced to neglect his duties while out here. We hope the trial will not be delayed and that we can start homeward in ten days or two weeks, at the furthest."

John P. Dunning, whose wife is believed to have been the particular object of the alleged murderess' hate, has come prepared to be roasted by Mrs. Botkin's attorneys and by the newspapers.

He said last night: "I am here to give testimony in court and not to the newspapers. I have been in the newspaper business a great many years and often criticized people whom I believed ought to have talked for publication; but I know how it is, and even here among my friends, the men I worked with, I shall not give the substance of my evidence until I am on the witness stand. Then I shall tell all and the lawyers and the newspapers can say what they please about me. Everything evil that could be said has been printed from here to New York, and I am calloused to further attacks. I have not gone to the devil and I am not going there."

"When I left here last March I admit I was in a bad way, but I went to New York to get a fresh start. From there I went to Havana, where I was the Associated Press correspondent prior to the war. When hostilities were opened I went to Santiago and was all through the campaign and took as many chances as any correspondent. I underwent terrible [illegible] and was working to retrieve my [illegible] who had been summoned as jurors and a large number of curious individuals, who craned their necks to get a glimpse of the now famous poisoner. When Mrs. Botkin and her faithful sister, Dora Brown, passed through the corridors from the Sheriff's office to the court room they ran a gauntlet of inquisitive eyes, but neither was embarrassed or perturbed in the least. The defendant took a seat facing his Honor and beside her associate counsel, Messrs. McGowan and Wheeler. George Knight, chief counsel for the defense, was not in court, as he knew the adjournment was to occur.

CROSSED THE CONTINENT TO TESTIFY AGAINST MRS. CORDELIA BOTKIN.

Delaware Witnesses in the Dover Poisoning Case Arrive in Time for the Trial of the Accused Woman, Which Begins To-Day.

Mr. Botkin was not present at the proceedings yesterday. All the witnesses were excused until to-morrow.

Attorney Knight is confident that his client will be acquitted. He declares no delays will be asked and that the defense is anxious for a speedy trial. He outlined Mrs. Botkin's defense in a few words yesterday, saying:

"The defense will combat the corpus delicti. The prosecution cannot establish a case and the defendant will be acquitted. All the witnesses from Delaware and all those here cannot prove that Mrs. Dunning and her sister died from arsenical poisoning. The doctor may testify that the ante-mortem symptoms were similar to those where arsenic has been administered, but their opinion won't hang any one. They can't prove the charge. As for the handwriting, we won't pay much attention to that. The testimony of experts doesn't amount to much and especially when it comes to convicting a woman of murder. The whole case of the prosecution is flimsy and the taxpayers should never have been put to the $30,000 or $40,000 expense to try a case which must fail. The defense will not obstruct progress in securing a jury. We will be satisfied with any twelve ordinarily intelligent citizens."

Judge Cook and Attorneys Hosmer and Knight think the trial will not last over ten days.

George W. Gerhard, John L. Haskell, H. Keenan, F. W. Marvin, L. V. Merle, Henry S. Manheim, A. Pallies, H. A. Steffens, Edward A. Selfridge, F. Tillman Jr., Isaac Upham, C. M. Volkman, Francis L. Whitney, Isaac Hollard, John Hewston Jr., Frank S. Kelly and M. Kuhn.

Mr. Upham was appointed foreman by the court and the jury retired for the purpose of completing organization.

McGLADE AN INMATE OF THE CITY PRISON

Absconding Official Brought Back.

MAINTAINS STRICT SILENCE.

HIS BONDS FIXED AT TEN THOUSAND DOLLARS.

Unless More Charges Are Preferred Against Him He Expects to Be Released To-Day.

Accompanied by Sheriff Phillips and Detectives Charles Cody and Tom Gibson, Peter McGlade, the defaulting cashier of the Superintendent of Street's office, arrived here last night from Deming, N. M. After embarking from the Oakland boat the party entered a carriage and was driven to police headquarters.

McGlade did not appear to be worried, although he announced that he was fatigued on account of the long trip. After a few minutes' conversation with Chief Lees McGlade asked that he be allowed to get something to eat, as he was hungry. Chief Lees had no objections and the party went to a neighboring restaurant and had supper.

The news that the defaulting cashier had been brought back traveled with astonishing rapidity and in a brief space of time the restaurant was besieged with friends of the accused man. They advised him not to speak about the case, and assured him that he would not have to suffer the consequences of his crime. After partaking of a hearty meal McGlade was taken to the City Prison, where he was formally charged with forgery.

Deputy Sheriff Fitzgerald, who went to Port Costa to meet McGlade, remained with him in the prison for several hours. McGlade's brother also had a long conversation with him.

The disgraced official refuses to say anything for publication.

"I have nothing to tell you," he remarked to the reporters, who were waiting to interview him. "My attorney will be here to-morrow, and not until then will I speak of the charges that have been preferred against me."

McGlade's bonds have been fixed at $10,000. Unless additional charges are recorded against him he expects to be able to get the necessary bonds to-day. Sheriff Phillips, in telling how he arrested McGlade, said that he had received a dispatch from the police of this city, giving a good description of McGlade and asking that he be arrested if seen. Phillips, immediately after the receipt of the dispatch, went to the railroad depot, intending to search the incoming trains for the fugitive. Just as he reached the depot the train, which had arrived a few minutes before, was about to pull out.

The Sheriff jumped on the platform of one of the rear cars, intending to ask the conductor if McGlade was aboard the train. Just then he saw a man answering the description of McGlade emerge from behind the railroad building and quickly enter one of the cars. Convinced that he was the absconding cashier the Sheriff accosted him and asked him if he was not W. P. Russell, the name under which he was traveling.

"I guess it is all up," he nervously remarked. "That is the name that I have assumed."

"I'm the Sheriff of the county," replied Phillips, showing his badge of office; "you are badly wanted in San Francisco."

"Then I'm your prisoner," remarked McGlade, grasping the extended hand of the Sheriff.

McGlade was then escorted from the train and taken to prison. He announced his intention of coming back without making any fight. Phillips speaks of McGlade in the highest terms.

"He is a perfect gentleman," he declared. "I'm sorry that he is mixed up in such an affair."

At Port Costa Phillips and the prisoner were met by Detectives Cody and Gibson. He cordially greeted them, but refrained from discussing the case. It is likely that several more charges of forgery will be preferred against him to-day.

John P. Dunning Will Give the Prosecution All the Assistance in His Power—Defense Expects an Acquittal—Mrs. Botkin in Court.

After a futile effort to extradite Mrs. Cordelia Botkin, accused of sending a box of poisoned bonbons to Dover, Del., which caused the death of two women, the authorities of California and Delaware, in order that justice may be done, have united to prosecute the defendant under the statutes of this State. This case, which is without a parallel in criminal jurisprudence, has attracted world-wide attention, first because of the enormity of the crime and second because of the possibility that a person may commit a dastardly murder and escape punishment because of a defect in our criminal laws. The trial of the accused woman is about to begin, but if the jury finds for conviction the jurisdiction of California will be denied, and the question carried to the Supreme Court for determination. The defense, relying upon the weakness of the prosecution, has not seen fit to raise this point until all evidence against the defendant has been submitted and passed upon by the jury. Beyond the legal technicalities the public has a deeper and an anxious interest in this celebrated case. A murderer sent an agency of death through the mails from this city and it accomplished its fiendish errand, and if it be proved that Mrs. Botkin posted the package and yet can escape punishment, every person having a known or unknown enemy need feel alarmed.

THE selection of a jury which is to decide whether or not Mrs. Cordelia Botkin is a modern Borgia or an innocent woman will begin this morning in Judge Carroll Cook's court. The Delaware witnesses are here to testify against the woman accused of poisoning Mrs. J. P. Dunning and Mrs. J. D. Deane. The case was set for yesterday, but court adjourned until 10 a. m. to-day out of respect for the late Judge Borden, whose funeral was held in the afternoon. Mrs. Botkin will be tried first for the murder of Mrs. Dunning.

John P. Dunning, husband of the murdered woman, has arrived in the city and will make a clean breast of his relations with Mrs. Botkin. He believes she is guilty and will not spare her or attempt to avoid unpleasant notoriety for himself. He declares that everything that could be said against him has been printed from one end of the country to the other, and he is indifferent to any comment which can now be made. Dunning did not arrive with the other Eastern witnesses. He came from Chicago by the Central route, while the others came from Delaware by the Southern route.

The Delaware witnesses reached the city at 6:45 last evening, and are now quartered at the Grand Hotel. They were due here Sunday, but their train was wrecked at Jennings, N. M., which caused a delay of twenty-seven hours. All the party are in excellent health, though somewhat fatigued by the long journey. The witnesses are: Ex-Congressman John B. Pennington, father of the victims; Joshua D. Deane, husband of one of the murdered women, and his motherless daughter, Leila; Miss Josephine Bateman, who ate some of the deadly bonbons and narrowly escaped the fate of Mrs. Deane and her sister; Ethel J. Millington, niece of the dead women, who was also made ill by eating the arsenic-laden candy; Harry Pennington, a nephew who carried the fatal package from the postoffice to his aunt; Drs. F. L. Downs and I. A. H. Bishop, who sought with all their skill to thwart the fiend's purpose; Dr. T. H. Wolf, State Chemist of Delaware, who found enough arsenic in the candy to kill a dozen persons; Postmaster Gooden of Dover and Attorney General R. C. White, who comes to assist in the prosecution of the alleged murderess. The party left Wilmington last Tuesday evening under the care of State Detective Bernard J. McVey, who came here several weeks ago to take Mrs. Botkin back to Delaware, but could not secure her extradition.

Detective Ed Gibson met the witnesses at Tracy and from there telegraphed for hotel accommodations for the entire party. Chief of Police Lees and Assistant District Attorney Hosmer met them at the ferry. On their arrival at this side the witnesses were immediately taken to the Grand. To-day the Eastern witnesses will be consulted by the Prosecuting Attorney, that he may familiarize himself with every detail of the testimony they are to give at the trial. Last night Mr. Hosmer, Chief Lees, Attorney General White and Detective McVey went over the case in a general way, and when the taking of testimony begins they will be prepared to present the strongest case possible.

When the party left Delaware ex-Congressman Pennington, who is well along in years, was not in the best of health and his relatives and friends feared the trip and its attendant worry would be too great a strain upon his strength. Fortunately his indisposition was only temporary and he reached the end of the journey in better health and spirits than when he started. Mr. Pennington did not care to discuss the terrible fate of his daughters or the purpose of his visit here. He was deeply interested, however, in learning all he could about Mrs. Botkin, where she was imprisoned, her appearance, and the proceedings in court yesterday. The few expressions he made on the case indicate that he believes the accused woman is guilty and he hopes to see her convicted. He is familiar with the penal statutes of California and can see no reason why a speedy trial should not be had and exact justice meted to the defendant.

J. D. Deane, whose grief over the terrible death of his wife is undiminished, expressed himself with extreme bitterness.

"We all feel bitterly over this case and think the murderess of my wife and her sister should have been sent to Delaware for trial.

"We all want to get through with the case and return home as quickly as possible. Drs. Bishop and Downs have left their practice; Attorney General White had to turn his official and private affairs over to others and Dr. Wolf is forced to neglect his duties while out here. We hope the trial will not be delayed and that we can start homeward in ten days or two weeks at the farthest."

John P. Dunning, whose wife is believed to have been the particular object of the alleged murderess' hate, has come prepared to be roasted by Mrs. Botkin's attorneys and by the newspapers.

He said last night: "I am here to give testimony in court and not to the newspapers. I have been in the newspaper business a great many years and often criticised people whom I believed ought to have talked for publication, but I know how it is, and even here among my friends, the men I worked with, I shall not give the substance of my evidence until I am on the witness stand. Then I shall tell all and the lawyer and the newspapers can say what they please about me. Everything evil that could be said has been printed from here to New York, and I am calloused to further attacks. I have not gone to the devil and I am not going there.

"When I left here last March I admit I was in a bad way, but I went to New York to get a fresh start. From there I went to Havana, where I was the Associated Press correspondent prior to the war. When hostilities were opened I went to Santiago and was all through the campaign and took as many chances as any correspondent. I underwent terrible ordeals and was working to recover my former standing and was successful. My only desire was to return to New York, have my family with me and again be happy. This desire was all but fulfilled, when my wife was murdered. When the news reached me I was in Porto Rico. I returned home immediately. I went to Delaware and told the authorities everything I knew which had any bearing on the crime. Since August I have had several good offers to return to Cuba, but I refused in order that I might come here when needed and not be accused of attempting to shield a criminal with whom I had been formerly associated. It is true I wrote to Mrs. Botkin, but the charge, by innuendo, that I in any way conspired to murder my wife is the greatest injustice that could be done any man. I am subject to criticism, I know, but I am not going to let that deter me from facing here the worst chapter in my whole life. I want the murderer of my wife punished."

Mrs. Botkin appeared in Judge Cook's court yesterday neatly attired in a close-fitting black suit with a new black hat and heavy veil. Her manner did not in any way indicate that she was nervous or apprehensive as to the result of the trial which may condemn her as a double murderess. She trusts to her attorneys' assurance that she will be acquitted. Immediately after court was called Judge Cook announced that an adjournment until this morning would be taken in respect to the late Judge Borden, whose funeral service was to be held in the afternoon. The attorneys made no objection to the adjournment, and his Honor then ordered a roll-call of the special venire of 150 talesmen from whom twelve jurors are to be drawn.

The court room was filled with citizens who had been summoned as jurors and a large number of curious individuals, who craned their necks to get a glimpse of the now famous prisoner. When Mrs. Botkin and her faithful sister, Dora Brown, passed through the corridors from the Sheriff's office to the court room they ran a gauntlet of inquisitive eyes, but neither was embarrassed or perturbed in the least. The defendant took a seat facing his Honor and beside her associate counsel, Messrs. McGowan and Wheeler. George Knight, chief counsel for the defense, was not in court, as he knew the adjournment was to occur.

Mr. Botkin was not present at the proceedings yesterday. All the witnesses were excused until to-morrow.

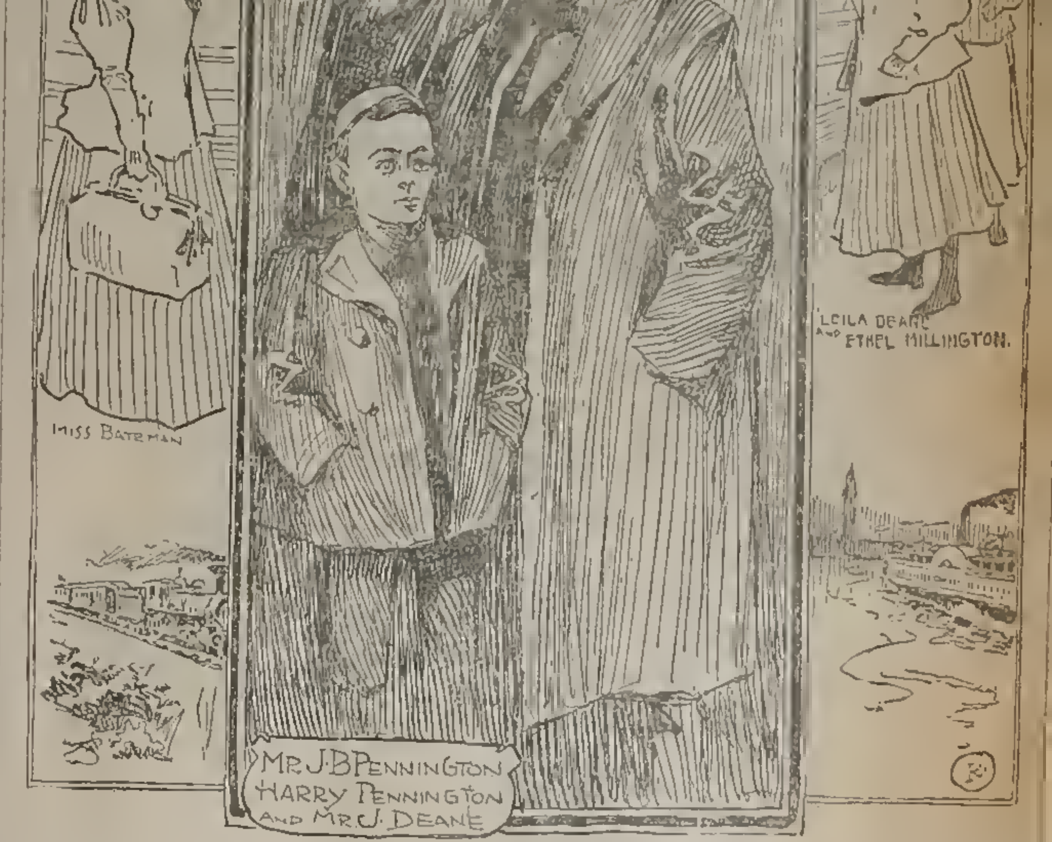
Attorney Knight is confident that his client will be acquitted. He declares no delays will be asked and that the defense is anxious for a speedy trial. He outlined Mrs. Botkin's defense in a few words yesterday, saying:

"The defense will combat the corpus delicti. The prosecution cannot establish a case and the defendant will be acquitted. All the witnesses from Delaware and all those here cannot prove that Mrs. Dunning and her sister died from arsenical poisoning. The doctor may testify that the ante-mortem symptoms were similar to those where arsenic has been administered, but their opinion won't hang any one. They can't prove the charge. As for the handwriting, we won't pay much attention to that. The testimony of experts doesn't amount to much and especially when it comes to convicting a woman of murder. The whole case of the prosecution is flimsy, and the taxpayers should never have been put to the $[illegible] or $[illegible] expense to try a case which must fail. The defense will not obstruct progress in securing a jury. We will be satisfied with any twelve ordinarily intelligent citizens."

Judge Cook and Attorneys Hosmer and Knight think the trial will not last over ten days.

George W. Gerhard, John L. Haskell, H. Keenan, F. W. Marvin, L. V. Merle, Henry S. Manheim, A. Pailles, H. A. Steffens, Edward A. Selfridge, F. Tillman Jr., Isaac Upham, P. M. Volkman, Francis L. Whitney, Duane Ballard, John Howston Jr., Frank S. Kelly and M. Kelm.

Mr. Upham was appointed foreman by the court and the jury retired for the purpose of completing deliberation.



CROSSED THE CONTINENT TO TESTIFY AGAINST MRS. CORDELIA BOTKIN.

Delaware Witnesses in the Dover Poisoning Case Arrive in Time for the Trial of the Accused Woman, Which Begins To-Day.

McGLADE AN INMATE OF THE CITY PRISON

Absconding Official Brought Back.

MAINTAINS STRICT SILENCE.

HIS BONDS FIXED AT TEN THOUSAND DOLLARS.

Unless More Charges Are Preferred Against Him He Expects to Be Released To-Day.

Cal — ... 6

Accompanied by Sheriff Phillips and Detectives Charles Cody and Tom Gibson, Peter McGlade, the defaulting cashier of the Superintendent of Streets' office, arrived here last night from Deming, N. M. After embarking from the Oakland boat the party entered a carriage and was driven to police headquarters.

McGlade did not appear to be worried, although he announced that he was fatigued on account of the long trip. After a few minutes' conversation with Chief Lees McGlade asked that he be allowed to get something to eat, as he was hungry. Chief Lees had no objections and the party went to a neighboring restaurant and had supper.

The news that the defaulting cashier had been brought back traveled with astonishing rapidity and in a brief space of time the restaurant was besieged with friends of the accused man. They advised him not to speak about the case, and assured him that he would not have to suffer the consequences of his crime. After partaking of a hearty meal McGlade was taken to the City Prison, where he was formally charged with forgery.

Deputy Sheriff Fitzgerald, who went to Port Costa to meet McGlade, remained with him in the prison for several hours. McGlade's brother also had a long conversation with him.

The disgraced official refuses to say anything for publication.

"I have nothing to tell you," he remarked to the reporters, who were waiting to interview him. "My attorney will be here to-morrow, and not until then will I speak of the charges that have been preferred against me."

McGlade's bonds have been fixed at $10,000. Unless additional charges are recorded against him he expects to be able to get the necessary bonds to-day. Sheriff Phillips, in telling how he arrested McGlade, said that he had received a dispatch from the police of this city, giving a good description of McGlade and asking that he be arrested if seen. Phillips, immediately after the receipt of the dispatch, went to the railroad depot, intending to search the incoming trains for the fugitive. Just as he reached the depot the train, which had arrived a few minutes before, was about to pull out.

The Sheriff jumped on the platform of one of the rear cars, intending to ask the conductor if McGlade was aboard the train. Just then he saw a man answering the description of McGlade emerge from behind the railroad building and quickly enter one of the cars. Convinced that he was the absconding cashier the Sheriff accosted him and asked him if he was not W. P. Russell, the name under which he was traveling.

"I guess it is all up," he nervously remarked. "That is the name that I have assumed."

"I'm the Sheriff of the county," replied Phillips, showing his badge of office, "you are badly wanted in San Francisco."

"Then I'm your prisoner," remarked McGlade, grasping the extended hand of the Sheriff.

McGlade was then escorted from the train and taken to prison. He announced his intention of coming back without making any fight. Phillips speaks of McGlade in the highest terms.

"He is a perfect gentleman," he declared, "I'm sorry that he is mixed up in such an affair."

At Port Costa Phillips and the prisoner were met by Detectives Cody and Gibson. He cordially greeted them, but refrained from discussing the case. It is likely that several more charges of forgery will be preferred against him to-day.

NINE JURORS WHO WILL TRY MRS. BOTKIN.

The Famous Trial Opened With a Rush This Morning.

George Knight Impaneled Jurors With Lightning Speed Prior to Taking His Leave of the Defense.

The Botkin trial opened this morning without fuss, without preamble of any kind. Despite the fact that Attorney Frank McGowan of counsel for the defense was engaged in the United States Circuit Court, the expected motion for a continuance was not made.

To the general astonishment, and contrary to the expressed opinion of the experts, the task of jury-getting proved an easy affair. No less than nine citizens were accepted at this morning's session to pass upon the question of the guilt or innocence of the woman accused of poisoning Mrs. John P. Dunning. Without a doubt, to-morrow morning will see the opening of the trial in earnest.

George A. Knight will retire from the case as soon as the jury is impaneled. He openly stated so this morning. The attorney says that his hands are full of business which must be disposed of between now and the 1st of January, and he feels confident that Mrs. Botkin's interests will be sufficiently well protected in the hands of Frank McGowan and Charles Wheeler. Mr. Knight's advice, however, in the selection of a jury, was considered of so great importance that he was prevailed upon to undertake this arduous task on behalf of the defense.

"I cannot help it," explained Mr. Knight, when asked his motives for retiring. "I have much to do, and my presence here will not be needed."

The galleries of Judge Carroll Cook's courtroom were thrown open to the crowd which gathered at an early hour. The arrival of the sixteen witness from Delaware had been announced in all the morning papers, and the spectators were all agog to get a peep at them. They were, for the most part, disappointed, however, for with the exception of John P. Dunning, the murdered woman's husband, R. C. White, Attorney-General of Delaware; ex-Congressman Pennington, Mrs. Dunning's father, and Doctor P. S. Downs of Dover, Del., who attended the parties stricken after partaking of the poisoned candy, the party did not show up. Judge Cook had made an order yesterday excusing witnesses until to-morrow.

John P. Dunning arrived with Chief Lees. Mrs. Botkin had already arrived, and it was necessary for Dunning to pass her chair in order to reach his own. There was no mutual recognition, however. Mrs. Botkin, attired in the black gown, hat and veil of yesterday, stared steadily in front of her. Dunning cast his eyes down and quietly followed Chief Lees to his place.

The next arrival was that of ex-Congressman Pennington, the father, accompanied by Dr. Downs. They were ushered into court by Detective McVey, returned once more to rail at San Francisco injustice. Mr. Pennington took a modest seat in the third row of spectators. Being an ex-attorney-general himself, he was thoroughly familiar with courtrooms and their procedure. He sat down quietly, adjusted his spectacles and quietly watched the faces of the talesmen as they answered the questions put to them.

About 10 o'clock Judge Cook entered the courtroom. George Knight and Charles Wheeler sat down besides Mrs. Botkin and her faithful sister, and announced that they were ready to proceed. Mr. Hosmer begged a moment's continuance pending the arrival of Attorney-General White. It was granted. Presently the Delaware official, a slight man, wearing glasses, arrived and was introduced to the court as assistant prosecutor in the case.

Clerk Tolle called over the names of the citizens summoned as talesmen. Quite a number of prominent merchants were among the list, and the average showed up pretty well. E. W. Hopkins did not answer, nor did Stewart Menzies, nor did James V. Coleman, nor George Newhall. There were enough and plenty present, however, so the case proceeded without further delay.

Wm. S. Kittle, an insurance man, was the first talesman examined by Mr. Hosmer. He was asked:

"In a case of poisoning, would your scruples prevent your returning a verdict where the punishment would be death?"

"No, sir."

"The defendant being a woman, would you try her as you would a man?"

"I would."

"Could you give this case a fair and impartial trial?"

"I could not. For three reasons. In the first place, I am a classmate of Mr. Dunning. I knew his wife very well, and—"

"That will do," put in George Knight. "We consent that Mr. Kittle be excused."

Excused by consent.

D. Bloch, the well-known merchant, was the next examined. He satisfied the prosecution, and then Mr. Knight put the following questions:

"Have you read about this case?"

"From what you have read, have you formed any opinion?"

"Would that opinion require evidence to remove?"

This last question tripped up Mr. Bloch, and he was challenged by George Knight. Mr. Hosmer, however, denied the challenge, and extracted a confession from the talesman to the effect that he would not permit his opinion to interfere with his impartial trial of the case. He would discard his opinion and would not require Mrs. Botkin to put in any evidence on her own behalf, provided that the prosecution did not establish a sound case against her.

Knight came back at Hosmer by making the millionaire talesman confess that he still had an opinion. But still he insisted that he could try the case fairly. Judge Cook took a hand and after a few questions bearing on the same subject disallowed the challenge. Mr. Bloch looked disappointed.

T. H. Chandler, another capitalist, got through his examination with credit. He satisfied both sides, and also, in response to a question from Mr. Hosmer, said he would convict on circumstantial evidence, providing it were strong enough. Passed.

A. E. Buckingham [illegible]

Dunning Passed Close to Mrs. Botkin As He Entered the Courtroom, But There Was no Sign of Salutation Between Them.

opinion, and it proved insurmountable. Excused.

The first twelve having been put through their paces, it was the prosecution's turn to say whether those talesmen remaining in the box should be accepted as jurors. A long consultation between Chief Lees, Mr. Hosmer and Attorney-General White resulted in the excusing of Mr. Quadt. It was then George Knight's turn. He did not waste a second.

"Excuse Mr. Bloch," he sang out. And the millionaire merchant gladly accepted his freedom.

Another consultation and Mr. Hosmer excused Mr. Levy. Knight expressed himself satisfied. Another long consultation, in which Chief Lees and Mr. Hosmer appeared to disagree. Finally, however, Mr. Hosmer said he was satisfied, and the following five were sworn in as jurors to try the case:

T. H. Chandler, 128 Market street.
A. E. Buckingham, 26 Montgomery.
J. F. Kennedy, 408 Montgomery.
S. K. Overgard, Market and Second.
Sam H. Daniels, Bank of California.

The seven vacancies were filled up by the following citizens: M. Marcuse, L. F. Farr, A. G. Hawes, Abe Jacobs, G. Amerup, Herman Shalnwald and W. B. Harrington.

M. Marcuse satisfied both sides.

L. F. Farr passed his examination successfully.

A. G. Hawes had expressed an opinion upon the case which disqualified him.

Abe Jacobs, a merchant tailor, had a brain clear of prejudice. Passed.

G. Amerup had an opinion. Excused.

Herman Shalnwald said he could not accept circumstantial evidence. He was so firm on this point that he had to be excused.

W. B. Harrington passed.

Once more it devolved upon both sides to exercise their peremptory challenges.

It was Mr. Knight's turn first. He expressed himself satisfied. Mr. Hosmer consulted with Detective Gibson a while. Then Chief Lees bent over and whispered in Mr. Hosmer's ear.

"Excuse Mr. Farr," he said finally.

"Challenge still with the people," said Judge Cook.

"Satisfied," said Mr. Hosmer, and the following three additional jurors were sworn in:

M. Marcuse, 125 Sansome street.
Abe Jacobs, 1200 Market street.
W. B. Harrington, California and Sansome streets.

Again the box was filled. J. K. Wilson had conscientious scruples against the death penalty. But, under certain circumstances, he would render a verdict which entailed such a penalty. Judge Cook denied Mr. Hosmer's challenge. The talesman passed.

J. F. Myers satisfied both sides.

Oliver Eldridge followed next. He had an opinion which it would take strong evidence to remove. After some discussion a challenge from Mr. Knight was allowed.

C. S. Russell objected to convicting accused persons upon evidence of a circumstantial character. Mr. Hosmer challenged, and Mr. Knight denied the challenge. After some questions from the bench it was found that the juror would convict upon circumstantial evidence provided that the evidence were strong enough. Challenge disallowed and Mr. Russell passed.

"We're satisfied," sang out George Knight when asked to challenge.

"Excuse Mr. Wilson and Mr. Russell," said Hosmer, "Satisfied with Mr. Myers." So J. F. Myers [illegible]

M'GLADE APPEARED IN COURT

Will Be Arraigned Friday on Charge of Forgery.

Judge Joachimsen Reduces Amount of Bond Required to $5,000.

Prisoner's Attorney Says The Bondsmen Will Qualify Before the Day Is Done.

McGlade's Friends Are Very Cordial but He Could Not Get $10,000 Bonds.

He Was Brought to This City Last Night and Slept in the City Prison.

Peter McGlade, defaulting bookkeeper of the Superintendent of Streets' office, appeared this morning before Police Judge Joachimsen in court.

His worry, his flight, the discovery of his crime, his arrest and return, which must have been trying experiences to McGlade, have left in his face no perceptible signs of care. In the courtroom he [illegible] passive, speaking only a syllable or two when friends grasped his hand and declared that the events of the past week had made no alteration of their regard for him. It was not [illegible] son brought McGlade to this city last night from Deming, Arizona, where he was captured. The party went to Chief Lees' office and thence to a restaurant for dinner. McGlade will not talk about his operations in the office of the Superintendent of Streets.

Sheriff Phillips of Deming came to San Francisco in the company of the detectives and the prisoner. He told how he found McGlade.

The police of San Francisco had sent by telegraph a careful description of the man. As soon as the dispatch reached him Phillips went to the railroad station. As he reached an east-bound train was pulling out. The sheriff jumped aboard, intending to walk through the train. At the same moment a man who fitted the description of McGlade walked out of the depot and entered one of the cars.

Phillips went to him and said:

"Are you W. P. Russell?"

He had been told that the fugitive was traveling under that alias.

"I suppose I am under arrest," he said. "I assumed that name."

Captor and captured shook hands and left the train together. McGlade did not attempt to resist being returned to San Francisco. Detectives Gibson and Cody met Phillips and the prisoner at Port Costa.

...nsel for the de-
...be United States
...ected motion for
...made.
...hment, and con-
...opinion of the
...y-getting proved
...s than nine citi-
...this morning's
...question of the
...woman accused
...n P. Dunning.
...norrow morning
...the trial in ear-

...l retire from the
...ry is impaneled.
...is morning. The ...hands are full of
...disposed of be-
...of January, and
...Mrs. Botkin's in-
...lly well protect-
...Frank McGowan
...Mr. Knight's all-
...lection of a jury.
...great importance
...upon to under-
...on behalf of the

...explained Mr.
...motives for re-
...to do, and my
...be needed."
...e Carroll Cook's
...n upon to the
...it an early hour.
...en witness from
...nounced in all
...d the spectators
...peep at them.
...ost part, disap-
...with the excep-
...g, the murdered
...E. White, Attor-
...re; ex-Congress-
...Dunning's fath-
...Downs of Dover,
...parties stricken
...poisoned candy,
...up. Judge Cook

Lees. Mrs. Botkin had already arrived, and it was necessary for Dunning to pass her chair in order to reach his own. There was no mutual recognition, however. Mrs. Botkin, attired in the black gown, hat and veil of yesterday, stared steadily in front of her. Dunning cast his eyes down and quietly followed Chief Lees to his place.

The next arrival was that of ex-Congressman Pennington, the father, accompanied by Dr. Downs. They were ushered into court by Detective McVey, returned once more to rail at San Francisco injustice. Mr. Pennington took a modest seat in the third row of spectators. Being an ex-attorney-general himself, he was thoroughly familiar with courtrooms and their procedure. He sat down quietly, adjusted his spectacles and quietly watched the faces of the talesmen as they answered the questions put to them.

About 10 o'clock Judge Cook entered the courtroom. George Knight and Charles Wheeler sat down besides Mrs. Botkin and her faithful sister, and announced that they were ready to proceed. Mr. Hosmer begged a moment's continuance pending the arrival of Attorney-General White. It was granted. Presently the Delaware official, a slight man, wearing glasses, arrived and was introduced to the court as assistant prosecutor in the case.

Clerk Tolle called over the names of the citizens summoned as talesmen. Quite a number of prominent merchants were among the list, and the average showed up pretty well. E. W. Hopkins did not answer, nor did Stewart Menzies, nor did James V. Coleman, nor George Newhall. There were enough and plenty present, however, so the case proceeded without further delay.

Wm. S. Kittle, an insurance man, was the first talesman examined by Mr. Hosmer. He was asked:

"In a case of poisoning, would your scruples prevent your returning a verdict where the punishment would be death?"

"No, sir."

"The defendant being a woman, would you try her as you would a man?"

"I would."

"Could you give this case a fair and impartial trial?"

"I could not. For three reasons. In the first place, I am a classmate of Mr. Dunning. I knew his wife very well, and—"

"That will do," put in George Knight. "We consent that Mr. Kittle be excused."

Excused by consent.

D. Bloch, the well-known merchant, was the next examined. He satisfied the prosecution, and then Mr. Knight put the following questions:

"Have you read about this case?"

"From what you have read, have you formed any opinion?"

"Would that opinion require evidence to remove?"

This last question tripped up Mr. Bloch, and he was challenged by George Knight. Mr. Hosmer, however, denied the challenge, and extracted a confession from the talesman to the effect that he would not permit his opinion to interfere with his impartial trial of the case. He would discard his opinion and would not require Mrs. Botkin to put in any evidence on her own behalf, provided that the prosecution did not establish a sound case against her.

Knight came back at Hosmer by making the millionaire talesman confess that he still had an opinion. But still he insisted that he could try the case fairly. Judge Cook took a hand and after a few questions bearing on the same subject disallowed the challenge. Mr. Bloch looked disappointed.

T. H. Chandler, another capitalist, got through his examination with credit. He satisfied both sides, and also, in response to a question from Mr. Hosmer, said he would convict on circumstantial evidence, providing it were strong enough. Passed.

A. E. Buckingham, real estate man, satisfied both sides.

E. J. Dunn was all right, but he said that in a case which depended upon circumstantial evidence only he would require the evidence to be very strong indeed before he would convict. Furthermore, he held a very strong impression as to the guilt of the defendant. This impression he promised to try to put aside. In reply to Mr. Knight, he said he did not think he could make a fair juror in the case. Mr. Knight challenged.

"I deny the challenge," said Mr. Hosmer. But it was no use. The talesman was too far gone in his opinion to be of use, so he was excused.

In this way, quietly and without sensation, the examination proceeded. J. K. Pryor was excused for cause. John Quadt passed. S. K. Overgard was similarly successful. So were Samuel H. Daniels, C. M. Levy and J. F. Kennedy.

Charles Brown had conscientious opinions against capital punishment. But when a hypothetical case was put before him it was found that his opinions on this subject were elastic. But he had an opinion, and it proved unsurmountable. Excused.

The first twelve having been put through their paces, it was the prosecution's turn to say whether those talesmen remaining in the box should be accepted as jurors. A long consultation between Chief Lees, Mr. Hosmer and Attorney-General White resulted in the excusing of Mr. Quadt. It was then George Knight's turn. He did not waste a second.

"Excuse Mr. Bloch," he sang out. And the millionaire merchant gladly accepted his freedom.

Another consultation and Mr. Hosmer excused Mr. Levy. Knight expressed himself satisfied. Another long consultation, in which Chief Lees and Mr. Hosmer appeared to disagree. Finally, however, Mr. Hosmer said he was satisfied, and the following five were sworn in as jurors to try the case:

T. H. Chandler, 128 Market street.
A. E. Buckingham, 26 Montgomery.
J. F. Kennedy, 408 Montgomery.
S. K. Overgard, Market and Second.
Sam H. Daniels, Bank of California.

The seven vacancies were filled up by the following citizens: M. Marcuse, L. F. Farr, A. G. Hawes, Abe Jacobs, G. Amerup, Herman Shainwald and W. B. Harrington.

M. Marcuse satisfied both sides.

L. F. Farr passed his examination successfully.

A. G. Hawes had expressed an opinion upon the case which disqualified him.

Abe Jacobs, a merchant tailor, had a brain clear of prejudice. Passed.

G. Amerup had an opinion. Excused.

Herman Shainwald said he could not accept circumstantial evidence. He was so firm on this point that he had to be excused.

W. B. Harrington passed.

Once more it devolved upon both sides to exercise their peremptory challenges.

It was Mr. Knight's turn first. He expressed himself satisfied. Mr. Hosmer consulted with Detective Gibson a while. Then Chief Lees bent over and whispered in Mr. Hosmer's ear.

"Excuse Mr. Farr," he said finally.

"Challenge still with the people," said Judge Cook.

"Satisfied," said Mr. Hosmer, and the following three additional jurors were sworn in:

M. Marcuse, 125 Sansome street.
Abe Jacobs, 1200 Market street.
W. B. Harrington, California and Sansome streets.

Again the box was filled. J. K. Wilson had conscientious scruples against the death penalty. But, under certain circumstances, he would render a verdict which entailed such a penalty. Judge Cook denied Mr. Hosmer's challenge. The talesman passed.

J. F. Myers satisfied both sides.

Oliver Eldridge followed next. He had an opinion which it would take strong evidence to remove. After some discussion a challenge from Mr. Knight was allowed.

C. S. Bassett objected to convicting accused persons upon evidence of a circumstantial character. Mr. Hosmer challenged, and Mr. Knight denied the challenge. After some questions from the bench it was found that the juror would convict upon circumstantial evidence provided that the evidence were strong enough. Challenge disallowed and Mr. Bassett passed.

"We're satisfied," sang out George Knight when asked to challenge.

"Excuse Mr. Wilson and Mr. Bassett," said Hosmer. "Satisfied with Mr. Myers." So J. F. Myers of 1017 Market street was sworn in as the ninth juror to try the case. A recess was then taken till 2 P. M.

There was widespread astonishment at the way things went. The greatest suavity, the finest politeness existed between counsel on both sides. Jurors were accepted after the briefest examinations ever heard in so important a case.

Dunning Passed Close to Mrs. Botkin As He Entered the Courtroom, But There Was no Sign of Salutation Between Them.

M'GLADE APPEARED IN COURT

Will Be Arraigned Friday on Charge of Forgery.

Judge Joachimsen Reduced Amount of Bond Required to $5,000.

Prisoner's Attorney Says That Bondsmen Will Qualify Before the Day Is Done.

McGlade's Friends Are Very Cordial but He Could Not Get $10,000 Bonds.

He Was Brought to This City Last Night and Slept in the City Prison

Peter McGlade, defaulting bookkeeper of the Superintendent of Streets' office, appeared this morning before Police Judge Joachimsen in court.

His worry, his flight, the discovery of his crime, his arrest and return, while they must have been trying experiences to McGlade, have left in his face no perceptible signs of care. In the courtroom he sat passive, speaking only a syllable or two when friends grasped his hand and declared that the events of the past week had made no alteration of their regard for him. It was not his old habit to be taciturn and gloomy, but the week which made no difference in the regard of his friends has made a difference in his own regard of himself.

The courtroom seemed to contain none who were not well disposed toward the prisoner. The men who arrested and the men who guarded him were his most affable companions. All officers of the court shook hands with McGlade before they set in motion the judicial machinery that may send him to the penitentiary.

On account of the gravity of the crime of which he is accused—forgery—the amount of his bonds had been fixed at $10,000. For some reason McGlade could not obtain sureties in that amount among his many friends. At least, there would have been delay, and the prisoner is very anxious to be free. He spent last night at the City Prison.

Attorney Metson, who represented the prisoner, persuaded Judge Joachimsen to reduce the amount of bonds required to $5,000. Metson declared that he would procure sureties to-day. Meanwhile, McGlade awaits in durance the order of release.

Detectives Charles Cody and Tom Gib-

BECKER, PRINCE OF FORGERS, CONFESSES HE IS GUILTY.

COURT ASKED TO GIVE HIM SHORT TERM.

Considerations Which Brought the Trial to a Close.

Bankers' Association Will Assist Him When His Term Expires.

MAY GET SEVEN YEARS.

Creegan Expected to Plead Guilty When Called, and Serve Two Years.

Charles Becker has pleaded guilty to the charge of forgery for raising a $12 check to $22,000, and has thrown himself on the mercy of Judge Wallace, before whom the case has been on hearing for a week. He will be sentenced Friday morning and expects to get seven years. A part of the agreement to have a plea of guilty made was that all the attorneys unite in asking Judge Wallace not to make the term longer than this.

Another part of the agreement, concerning which none of those directly connected with the case will make a positive statement, is that the Bankers' Association will support Mrs. Becker during her husband's imprisonment, bringing her from New York to California, so that she may see him often, and after he is released that they shall both be provided for during their lives.

Creegan, who had agreed to testify against Becker, it is stated upon pretty good authority, will also plead guilty and ask a light sentence, probably two years, from the Court. This will be two convictions to the credit of the Bankers' Association, and they can advertise this feature for its moral effect, while both men will be out of the way, there being no fear of Creegan alone. Creegan's case will be set in two weeks, and the trial will probably take place in January.

In his speech to the court yesterday morning, Attorney Henry Ach indicated that there was some understanding between Becker and those members of the American Bankers' Association who have been pressing the prosecution. Mr. Ach said that his clients were willing to have a short term of imprisonment imposed, and that they were satisfied they would never again have cause to regret Becker's restoration to liberty, that they believed he would hereafter refrain from crimes such as those which had brought him into notice as the most marvelous forger of the century.

Even before Mr. Ach had uttered these significant words there were rumors about the courthouse corridors that the members of the Bankers' Association were willing to help Becker in bringing his case to an end, provided he could be placed in such a position that they would be free from the danger of his facile pen. After the action in court, whereby he acknowledged his guilt, it was said that when his term is ended some arrangements will be made to enable him to live free from the temptations that so often beset a discharged convict. Besides, he is nearing that time in life when the skill and cunning of the human hand begin to wane, and after his liberation he would no longer be so dangerous to the commercial public by reason of any operations that he might be tempted to engage in.

When Judge Wallace took his seat on the bench yesterday morning the usual sightseers were in their places. Becker was more nervous than usual, but paid no attention to the jury or spectators. He took his place between his attorneys.

Attorney Dunne announced that owing to circumstances which had arisen since the trial began, his client desired to deny the prior conviction formerly admitted and enter a plea of guilty. Becker stood beside his attorney as the statement was made.

"You understand the statement made by your counsel," said the Court, "you now deny the prior conviction you formerly admitted and plead guilty to the charge of forgery."

"I do," said Becker.

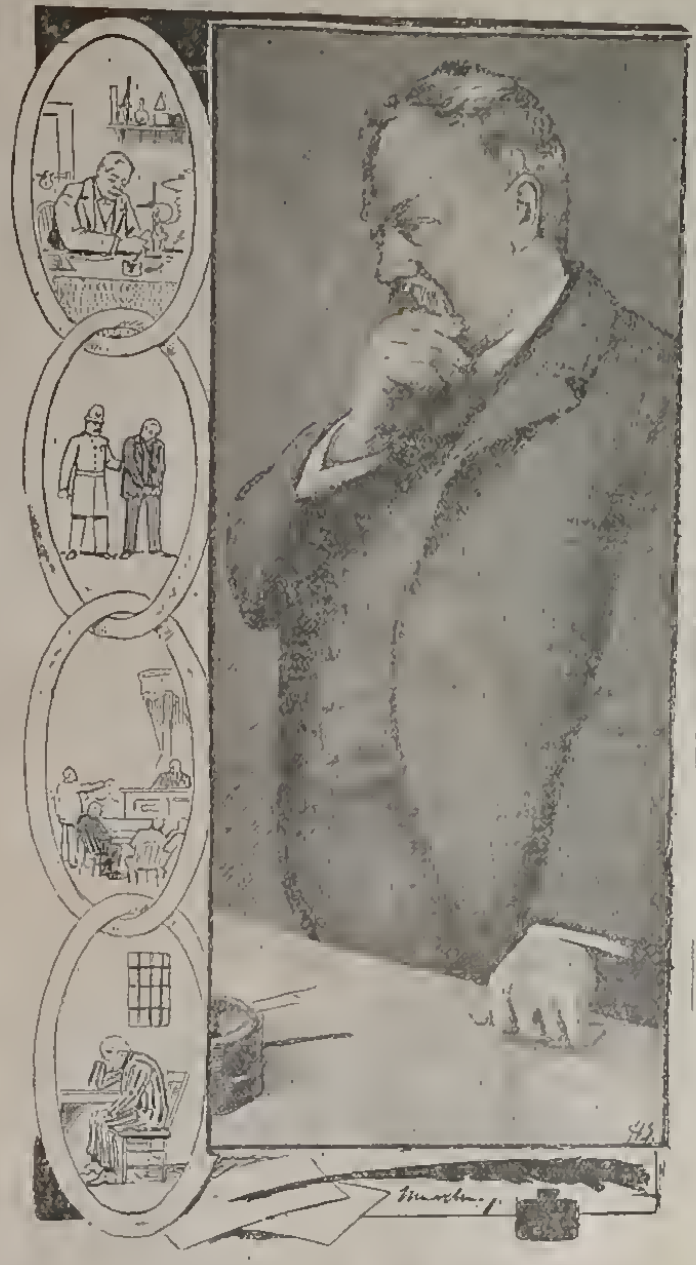
Then Attorney Dunne explained that this was with the free consent of the State, and suggested that as his client had already served three years in jail, a term of seven years in San Quentin might be considered adequate punishment, considering the age and the condition of his client's health.

Besides, Becker was saving the State a large expense for trials and retrials, disagreements of juries and appeals to the Supreme Court.

Deputy District Attorney Walter S. Hinkle read a letter from Dr. [Hereford], showing that in mind and body Becker is rapidly declining. To this Mr. Hinkle added his assurance that the plea of Becker and the conditions and sentence suggested would be satisfactory to the State.

Attorney Henry Ach added his assurance that the Bankers' Association was satisfied and had no further fear of Becker.

Judge Wallace announced that he would pass sentence next Friday. Creegan's case was set for December 13th, and court was [adjourned].



FORGER BECKER, WHO HAS ADMITTED HIS GUILT.

turns against me. Then, I am told he has about $24,000 in property, besides a good bank account. He was not asked to turn against me, but he did it of his own motion, and he had not been promised a thing. And at the same time he was dealing with the other side, he was with me every time I saw my attorneys and heard all that passed. When he says he saw me do the work he lies, because I was too smart to let anybody know how I did it.

"Much as I despise this man, I would not be mean enough to testify against him if he should be tried. The real reason I pleaded guilty was because I have been here three years already, and it would take at least three years longer to get through with trials and appeals to come. Now I can go to a decent prison and my wife can be here to see me frequently, and I know when I will get my liberty. Then I will find some way of making a living. I would never have been convicted if I had stood a dozen trials.

"McCloskey and Dean say they knew me. I never saw either of them. Dean is the fellow who managed the affair, and McCloskey came in afterwards. McCloskey's testimony was all false. He was a tool of Creegan. As soon as I saw him I suspected something. When he testified he admitted doing exactly the things which Creegan did. You see, this let Creegan out, for common sense suggested that the things were done by some one. I suppose McCloskey was paid for saying he did them.

"The testimony which was introduced to show that I spent ten days doing the work was absurd. It was only a matter of an hour or so.

"I want to give the Botkin case attorneys one pointer. If they use the same expert they used against me the prisoner will be acquitted."

Creegan refuses positively to make any statement of what he intends to do.

SAME HAND WROTE BOTH

The Evidence Expected to Convict Cordelia Botkin.

MRS. DUNNING'S FATHER TO BE A WITNESS.

ANONYMOUS LETTERS AND THE CANDY ADDRESSED BY ONE PERSON.

The Murdered Wife Directed to the Accused Woman's Home for Evidence Against Her Erring Husband.

Special Dispatch to the Chronicle.

DOVER (Del.), November 4.—Ex-Congressman J. Pennington, who is preparing to go to San Francisco in company with the score of witnesses for the prosecution of Mrs. Cordelia Botkin for murdering by poisoned candy his youngest daughter, Mrs. John P. Dunning, and Mrs. Deane, has information and evidence alone which can almost convict Mrs. Botkin. He has heretofore refused to make public any of his knowledge of the crime.

Mr. Pennington states that he recognized the handwriting upon the box of chocolates as that in the anonymous letters which began to come from San Francisco on July 17, 1897, telling of Dunning's life there. A letter which Mrs. Dunning received early in July of this year she carried to her father. It concluded: "By all means you ought to get a divorce."

"Father," said Mrs. Dunning, "if any more letters come from San Francisco don't let me see them." The next letter that came, which was intercepted by Mr. Pennington, was the last. It reached Dover July 16th, and it said: "If it is evidence that you need before applying for a divorce, you can find it at 927 Geary street, San Francisco, Cal."

Mr. Pennington found that Mrs. Cordelia Botkin lived at 927 Geary street. This letter three experts have since sworn was in the same handwriting as that on the poisoned candy parcel and on the same note inclosed.

M'VEY GOES EAST.

The Delaware Detective Leaves Without Mrs. Botkin.

The Delaware authorities have washed their hands of the Botkin case. Extradition having been denied, Detective E. J. McVey had made ready to appeal yesterday morning to the Federal Court for a writ of habeas corpus. Peremptory orders reached him, however, from the Delaware authorities to drop the case and return home.

"I shall leave to-night at 6 o'clock for Delaware," said he yesterday. "I believe the Federal Court would have granted me a writ of habeas corpus and the Superior Court would have been compelled to yield. The crime was not committed here, but in Dover. The postal authorities hold that that candy was in the possession of Mrs. Botkin until it was delivered in Dover. She could have recalled it at any time up to its delivery."

to a Close.

Bankers' Association Will Assist Him When His Term Expires.

MAY GET SEVEN YEARS.

Creegan Expected to Plead Guilty When Called, and Serve Two Years.

Charles Becker has pleaded guilty to the charge of forgery for raising a $12 check to $22,000, and has thrown himself on the mercy of Judge Wallace, before whom the case has been on hearing for a week. He will be sentenced Friday morning and expects to get seven years. A part of the agreement to have a plea of guilty made was that all the attorneys unite in asking Judge Wallace not to make the term longer than this.

Another part of the agreement, concerning which none of those directly connected with the case will make a positive statement, is that the Bankers' Association will support Mrs. Becker during her husband's imprisonment, bringing her from New York to California, so that she may see him often, and after he is released that they shall both be provided for during their lives.

Creegan, who had agreed to testify against Becker, it is stated upon pretty good authority, will also plead guilty and ask a light sentence, probably two years, from the Court. This will be two concessions to the credit of the Bankers' Association, and they can advertise this feature for its moral effect, while both men will be out of the way, there being no fear of Creegan alone. Creegan's case will be set in two weeks, and the trial will probably take place in January.

In his speech to the court yesterday morning, Attorney Henry Ach indicated that there was some understanding between Becker and those members of the American Bankers' Association who have been pressing the prosecution. Mr. Ach said that his clients were willing to have a short term of imprisonment imposed, and that they were satisfied they would never again have cause to regret Becker's restoration to liberty, that they believed he would hereafter refrain from crimes such as those which had brought him into notice as the most marvelous forger of the century.

Even before Mr. Ach had uttered these significant words there were rumors about the courthouse corridors that the members of the Bankers' Association were willing to help Becker in bringing his case to an end, provided he could be placed in such a position that they would be free from the danger of his facile pen. After the action in court, whereby he acknowledged his guilt, it was said that when his term is ended some arrangements will be made to enable him to live free from the temptations that so often beset a discharged convict. Besides, he is nearing that time in life when the skill and cunning of the human hand begin to wane, and after his liberation he would no longer be so dangerous to the commercial public by reason of any operations that he might be tempted to engage in.

When Judge Wallace took his seat on the bench yesterday morning the usual sightseers were in their places. Becker was more nervous than usual, but paid no attention to the jury of spectators. He took his place between his attorneys.

Attorney Dunne announced that owing to circumstances which had arisen since the trial began, his client desired to deny the prior conviction formerly admitted and enter a plea of guilty. Becker stood beside his attorney as the statement was made.

"You understand the statement made by your counsel," said the Court; "you now deny the prior conviction you formerly admitted and plead guilty to the charge of forgery."

"I do," said Becker.

Then Attorney Dunne explained that this was with the free consent of the State, and suggested that as his client had already served three years in jail, a term of seven years in San Quentin might be considered adequate punishment, considering the age and the condition of his client's health.

Besides, Becker was saving the State a large expense for trials and retrials, disagreements of juries and appeals to the Supreme Court.

Deputy District Attorney Walter S. Hinkle read a letter from Dr. Hereford, showing that in mind and body Becker is rapidly declining. To this Mr. Hinkle added his assurance that the plea of Becker and the conditions and sentence suggested would be satisfactory to the State.

Attorney Henry Ach added his assurance that the Bankers' Association was satisfied and had no further fear of Becker.

Judge Wallace announced that he would pass sentence next Friday. Creegan's case was set for December 19th, and court was adjourned.

When Becker was taken back to the County Jail he was in a most cheerful mood. He talked freely of his crime and the part taken by other people, but declined to state any terms on which he pleaded guilty, save that he was making the punishment shorter than by staying in a bad jail through so many trials and appeals. He was also saving expense and had reached the point where he had not a penny. His wife is to be brought here at once, and as he is very fond of her and she of him, this added to his cheerful mood. In fact, the jail officers declared that he was in better humor than at any time since he was first arrested. Instead of threatening to assault an artist who asked to sketch him, he [sat] for over an hour in one position and [offe]red suggestions and criticisms on the [re]sult.

"[A] great load is off my mind," he said. "[It] is all certainty now where there was [unc]ertainty before. I did not fear Creegan's testimony. That would amount to nothing. But I want to tell you what a skunk I think he is. I went in and paid all the expenses of our trials because he told me he had nothing. I broke myself doing it. Now I am without a penny, and he turns against me. Then, I am told he has about $24,000 in property, besides a good bank account. He was not asked to turn against me, but he did it of his own motion, and he had not been promised a thing. And at the same time he was dealing with the other side, he was with me every time I saw my attorneys and heard all that passed. When he says he saw me do the work he lies, because I was too smart to let anybody know how I did it.

FORGER BECKER, WHO HAS ADMITTED HIS GUILT.

"Much as I despise this man, I would not be mean enough to testify against him if he should be tried. The real reason I pleaded guilty was because I have been here three years already, and it would take at least three years longer to get through with trials and appeals to come. Now I can go to a decent prison and my wife can be here to see me frequently, and I know when I will get my liberty. Then I will find some way of making a living. I would never have been convicted if I had stood a dozen trials.

"McCluskey and Dean say they knew me. I never saw either of them. Dean is the fellow who managed the affair, and McCluskey came in afterwards. McCluskey's testimony was all false. He was a tool of Creegan. As soon as I saw him I suspected something. When he testified he admitted doing exactly the things which Creegan did. You see, this let Creegan out, for common sense suggested that the things were done by some one. I suppose McCluskey was paid for saying he did them.

"The testimony which was introduced to show that I spent ten days doing the work was absurd. It was only a matter of an hour or so.

"I want to give the Botkin case attorneys one pointer. If they use the same expert they used against me the prisoner will be acquitted."

Creegan refuses positively to make any statement of what he intends to do.

The Murdered Wife Directed to the Accused Woman's Home for Evidence Against Her Erring Husband.

Special Dispatch to the Chronicle.

DOVER (Del.), November 4.—Ex-Congressman J. Pennington, who is preparing to go to San Francisco in company with the score of witnesses for the prosecution of Mrs. Cordelia Botkin for murdering by poisoned candy his youngest daughter, Mrs. John P. Dunning, and Mrs. Deane, has information and evidence alone which can almost convict Mrs. Botkin. He has heretofore refused to make public any of his knowledge of the crime.

Mr. Pennington states that he recognized the handwriting upon the box of chocolates as that in the anonymous letters which began to come from San Francisco on July 17, 1897, telling of Dunning's life there. A letter which Mrs. Dunning received early in July of this year she carried to her father. It concluded: "By all means you ought to get a divorce."

"Father," said Mrs. Dunning, "if any more letters come from San Francisco don't let me see them." The next letter that came, which was intercepted by Mr. Pennington, was the last. It reached Dover July 16th, and it said: "If it is evidence that you need before applying for a divorce, you can find it at 927 Geary street, San Francisco, Cal."

Mr. Pennington found that Mrs. Cordelia Botkin lived at 927 Geary street. This letter three experts have since sworn was in the same handwriting as that on the poisoned candy parcel and on the same note inclosed.

M'VEY GOES EAST.

The Delaware Detective Leaves Without Mrs. Botkin.

The Delaware authorities have washed their hands of the Botkin case. Extradition having been denied, Detective E. J. McVey had made ready to appeal yesterday morning to the Federal Court for a writ of habeas corpus. Peremptory orders reached him, however, from the Delaware authorities to drop the case and return home.

"I shall leave to-night at 6 o'clock for Delaware," said he yesterday. "I believe the Federal Court would have granted me a writ of habeas corpus and the Superior Court would have been compelled to yield. The crime was not committed here, but in Dover. The postal authorities hold that that candy was in the possession of Mrs. Botkin until it was delivered in Dover. She could have recalled it at any time up to its delivery."

PEOPLE AT THE BOTKIN TRIAL ARE WONDERING WHAT CARD THE DEFENSE HAS UP ITS SLEEVE.

THE TEN JURORS ALREADY SELECTED TO TRY MRS. BOTKIN FOR MURDER.

TEN jurors to try Mrs. Cordelia Botkin were secured yesterday, and when the court adjourned until this morning because there were no more names in the jury box, the general question running through the curious throng, was:

"What has Knight got up his sleeve?"

For the attorney had acted all through the day with an air of easy confidence. There was none of that fierce fighting over technicalities which generally accompanies the trial of a desperate cause. The selection of jurors was phenomenally rapid. Those who remembered the slow processes of the Durrant case marveled most at the celerity with which jurymen were accepted.

Knight was smiling, affable and chatty throughout the day. There was never a sharp word for Prosecuting Attorney Hosmer. The points presented to the court were not argued with persistence or vehemence. No law book, except the Penal Code, was referred to in the remotest way. Nine jurors were selected in the morning, and Knight had used but one peremptory challenge out of the twenty allowed him by law. When the ten jurors had been accepted he had used but five of his challenges.

There was not the slightest trace in the lawyer's manner of oppression under the thought that a human life might be hanging on his efforts in selecting that jury. In fact, he was jocular. His aim seemed to be to rob the proceedings of solemnity. Possibly there was method in all this, for Knight has his own peculiar way of trying cases. But, method or no method, his manner kept that question going from tongue to ear, "What has he got up his sleeve?"

"It's a bluff," said Detective Gibson. "Knight was saying downtown last night that he would submit the case to the first twelve men called into the box, but you see he hasn't done it."

"He hasn't anything up his sleeve," declared Chief Lees, positively. "It is Knight's way, that's all. You see, these people think they have a great point on which they are going to throw us out of court. Just as soon as we show that Mrs. Dunning died in Delaware they will raise the issue that we have not proved the corpus delicti—the foundation of the offense—and that because of the death in Delaware the California court has no jurisdiction.

"But that point has been thoroughly looked into. While it is true that I was very much in favor of extradition and of having the case tried in Delaware, the defense will find that when they raise their issue of no jurisdiction they will not be able to throw us out of court. There is really nothing in all this air of confidence they are assuming."

If it was all a bluff, however, it was a good one, and no man ever went more jauntily or nonchalantly into a celebrated case than did George A. Knight into the defense of Mrs. Botkin. His "aisy ways" certainly added much to the interest and prepared people for all manner of unexpected and unforeshadowed developments.

Then, too, Knight sprung a surprise when he told several of those in the courtroom during the forenoon that he intended to retire from the case just as soon as he had completed the impanelment of the jury, leaving ex-Senator Frank McGowan and Charles Wheeler of Eureka to fight out the battle in their own sweet way. When asked at the close of the day's session why he was going to get out Knight replied with a twinkling eye:

"Why, you know I'm going to be the next United States Senator from California, and I've got to be out doing politics. I'll have to see these legislators who are coming in from Colusa and Yolo and San Berdoon. Then, too, my other business is pressing me. But Frank McGowan is engaged in the trial of a case in the United States Circuit Court, and if he isn't through by the time the jury is secured I can't desert the case till he gets back. Then I'll go."

But later Knight reconsidered his determination to leave the case. After court had adjourned he had a talk with Mrs. Botkin in the Sheriff's office. She begged and pleaded with him not to desert her in her hour of stress. She cried some, and grew quite dramatic, and—well, Knight couldn't resist a woman's tears, the Senatorship might go to Colonel Burns and his business to the devil, but he'd see the case of Mrs. Botkin through if it took his all.

"It's a hanged sight easier to get into a murder trial than to get out of it," sighed Knight after his interview with his client. "If she had paid me a fee for my services to date, I might quit with a clear conscience. But, as there has been no fee, I suppose a man is gallantly bound to defend a woman in her time of trouble. So I'm going to stick to the case to the end."

There were tales fluttering about the corridors that Knight wanted to retire because Wheeler and McGowan didn't like to try the case in his way. The Colonel candidate has a theory that most lawyers so overtry their cases that they try their clients to death. Most jurors think in the same way, but it is mighty hard to get the minds of lawyers inclined in that direction. Consequently, it may be possible that some little friction prompted Knight to try to get away from a feeless cause. In any event, he is back again and in again, and his oratory will make the echoes dance.

As for the case itself, it was inclined to drone prosily. Hosmer asked juror after juror the same questions, and Knight retorted in kind. There were not over three objections during all the time of questioning and in not one of these was there the slightest ring of a challenge to oratorical or legal combat. Men of some mark in the community came, were duly catechised, and either went their way rejoicing, or remained in reluctant discontent to try the case. Many showed the customary stupidity in their answers, until the hangers-on wondered how men with such little natural sense could make such large success of business affairs. But there was nothing enlivening in it all.

There were two occurrences which caused some talk, and only two. One was the entrance of Dunning, the other was the appearance in the case of Attorney-General R. C. White of Delaware. Out of one it was hoped to make a dramatic situation, but it petered out. As to the other, it has set some of the lawyers to talking about the rights of attorneys and their limitations.

Dunning and Mrs. Botkin had not met since he was off to Cuba and the wars. She was seated between her sister and Attorney Wheeler when he entered and passed close behind her, his coat brushing her hair, but she did not see him. He went over to a seat beside Chief Lees and sat down, his back to the jury-box, his face toward Mrs. Botkin. Still she seemed unaware of his presence. After a time Attorney Knight leaned over to her and whispered, "Isn't that Dunning sitting over by Chief Lees? I never have seen him, but that man looks like the pictures of Dunning I have seen in the newspapers."

Mrs. Botkin glanced up, caught Dunning's eye, gave him one sharp look, lowered her eyes and said:

"Yes, that is Mr. Dunning."

After this she partly turned her back on Dunning, rested her cheek on her black fan and did not look at him again. She did not mention him further, even to her attorneys. There was no glaring, no shuddering, no demonstration. So those who had hoped for a sensation when Dunning and the prisoner met had to rely on their imagination of what might have been in order to work up anything like a thrill.

As to Attorney-General White, he is a tall, spare man who wears spectacles and carefully brushes some scant side-locks over the bald expanse of his upper brow. He is anything but the typical Southern Democrat, either in speech or manner. It may be that he is a product of the recent Republican upburst in the South. In any event, he was introduced to the Court by Mr. Hosmer just after the first twelve jurors had been called into the box, and before the trial was formally opened by the reading of the complaint.

"I ask that Hon. R. C. White, Attorney-General of Delaware, appear in this case," said Hosmer.

"There is no objection so far as the defense is concerned," replied Knight, suavely, and the Delaware official took his seat beside [illegible] for the prosecution.

When the court assembled after the noon recess, Hosmer was late. Judge Cook snappily said the Prosecuting Attorney knew very well what time the court would be in session, and insisted that the examination of jurors proceed without him. So Attorney-General White was forced to examine a juror.

This act caused some talk among attorneys as to the right of a lawyer from another State to practice in a criminal case before the courts of California without a formal motion and admission as an officer of the court. It was talked of up and down the street, and even in the environs of the Supreme Court. A lawyer gave this opinion on the question:

"Holders of licenses from the Supreme Court of other States are admitted by the Supreme Court of this State to practice law, in accordance with a statute. By an act of the Legislature of 1895 no admissions to practice can be made except by the Supreme Court. By an "act of courtesy" Judge White has been permitted to take part in the Botkin case before the Superior Court, and while courtesy frequently has been extended, there seems to be no law for the procedure, the matter never having been tested. When it is considered that the trial of Mrs. Botkin will cost this city and county many thousands of dollars, it seems that too great a risk is being taken in permitting Judge White to appear without having been admitted by the Supreme Court."

When spoken to about the matter, Frank McGowan, one of Mrs. Botkin's attorneys, said he certainly would raise the point in the Supreme Court in case of a conviction by the jury.

As to the case, as it proceeded, it was found that most of the millionaires and leading merchants summoned to the trial had, by hook or by crook, evaded jury duty as usual. There were enough notables left, however, to keep up the interest, and the ten jurors secured showed intelligence beyond the common, though their united bank accounts may not foot up as heavy a figure as the cash of one of those who sneaked out of doing duty as a citizen.

The first twelve men called into the box were W. S. Kittle, D. Block, T. H. Chandler, A. E. Buckingham, B. J. Gunn, J. K. Prior, John Quadt, J. F. Kennedy, S. K. Overgard, Samuel H. Daniels, C. M. Levy and Charles Brown. Then came the reading of the complaint charging Mrs. Botkin with sending to Dover, Del., the box of poisoned candy which caused the death of Mrs. Mary Elizabeth Dunning, wife of John P. Dunning. During the reading Mrs. Botkin looked nervously at the jurors for an instant, as if trying to catch the expression of their faces, and then sunk her eyes into her lap, where her fingers moved restlessly.

Hosmer outlined his course of questioning with W. S. Kittle, the first juror, and stuck to it during the entire day.

"Have you any conscientious scruples against capital punishment?"

"The defendant being a woman, would you try her the same as you would a man?"

"Have you any prejudice against circumstantial evidence?"

"Could you try this case impartially and fairly?"

To these interrogatories Knight merely opposed an inquiry as to whether the juryman had formed or expressed an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of Mrs. Botkin. It was notable that those who had a fixed opinion considered the prisoner guilty. There was no leaning the other way, and Knight got rid of most of the objectionable ones on that ground.

Kittle had been in school with Dunning and knew his wife, so he was excused without question. Chandler, Buckingham, Levy, Quadt, Kennedy, Daniels and Overgard were passed so easily that the lobby began to wonder. There was a bit of struggle over Block, but Judge Cook disallowed Knight's challenge, and here were eight jurors in the box out of the first twelve, when the time came for peremptory challenges. Knight let Block go, and Hosmer excused Quadt and Levy.

"The defense is satisfied!" almost shouted Knight in a tone of such confidence that a man in the lobby whispered, "There's somethin' doin' in this case."

The prosecution expressed satisfaction after much consultation, and so here were five sworn jurors out of the first twelve called. Then three more were had out of the next seven, and by recess time nine were in the box all ready to sit in the case.

Those who had come and gone for one reason and another were: W. S. Kittle, D. Block, B. J. Gunn, J. K. Pryor, John Quadt, C. M. Levy, Charles Brown, L. F. Fogg, Alex G. Hawes, G. Amerup, H. Shainwald, J. K. Wilson, Oliver Eldridge, and C. F. Bassett. Some would not hang a woman, some opposed the death penalty for anybody, and some had fixed opinions. But things were going swimmingly.

There was more trouble in the afternoon, and only one juror was added to the list of accepted ones by the time the clerk announced that his box was empty. Some twenty-five or thirty estimable citizens had failed to appear to answer their names. They will be yanked into court this morning, and from them, it is confidently asserted by Knight, the jury could be completed.

Those who failed to pass in the afternoon were: William Frank, Arthur W. Moore, G. G. Wickson, W. S. Duval, William M. Weil, J. M. Moran, D. L. Farnsworth, Charles Mathias, H. T. Bush, E. J. Schultz, Rolla V. Watt, Jacob Gordon, J. H. Grady, recently candidate for Auditor; F. W. Wright and J. D. Hammond, an ordained minister, who pleaded his exemption. Jacob Heyman was the only one accepted.

The case will go on at 10 o'clock this morning.

TEN JURORS WHO ARE TO TRY MRS. CORDELIA BOTKIN.

The following jurors were accepted and sworn in the Botkin case yesterday, and it is expected that the jury will be completed early this forenoon:

T. H. CHANDLER, tea and coffee, 128 Market street.
AURELIUS E. BUCKINGHAM, real estate, 26 Montgomery street.
J. F. KENNEDY, art dealer and lumber merchant, 405 Montgomery street.
S. K. OVERGAARD, clerk, Market and Second streets.
S. H. DANIELS, teller, Bank of California.
M. MARCUSE, importer fancy goods, 125 Sansome street.
ABE JACOBS, tailor, 1200 Market street.
W. B. HARRINGTON, President Merchants' Club, California and Sansome streets.
JOHN F. MYERS, stove merchant, 1047 Market street.
JACOB HEYMAN, real estate, 11 Montgomery street.

MRS. DUNNING'S FATHER SEEKS JUSTICE ONLY.

John B. Pennington, the father of Mrs. Dunning and Mrs. Deane, attended both the morning and afternoon sessions of court.

"What do I think of Mrs. Botkin?" he repeated, in response to a question. "Well, I hardly know. I cannot say that I have had a sufficiently close inspection of the woman to form any opinion.

"It is a mistake for people to think that I have any personal feeling against Mrs. Botkin. I have none. I naturally feel antagonistic toward the person responsible for the death of Mrs. Dunning and Mrs. Deane, but it remains to be seen who that person is. The evidence so far presented is directly against Mrs. Botkin, but I am a lawyer, and the ethics of my profession, as well as my personal experience, bid me withhold judgment until the accused has had a fair and impartial trial.

"Whoever committed that crime should suffer the penalty prescribed by the law. I make no exception in regard to sex. If a woman is the offender she should be subjected to the same punishment as would be inflicted on a man.

"I am here merely in the capacity of a witness. I shall not return East until after the termination of the trial. The impression has gone abroad that I am seeking vengeance. This is incorrect. I want justice—not vengeance. If a verdict of conviction is reached, it is not my wish to see the prisoner in irons or to attend the execution.

"I have no fear about the trial being conducted in a fair and impartial way. If Mrs. Botkin is the offending party she will, in my opinion, be convicted as readily here as in Delaware."

Chief Lees said last evening that the Delaware witnesses would be the first to take the stand. The idea of the prosecution, he said, is to begin at Dover and let the story of the crime develop from that point. The evidence will begin with the receipt of the box of candy in Dover by ex-Postmaster Thomas Gooding.

Attorneys Knight, McGowan and Wheeler are anxious that there shall be no delay in the trial of the case. They says they are in readiness to proceed and will put in their case as soon as the testimony of the prosecution is submitted.

Mrs. Botkin is well satisfied with the men selected to decide her fate.

"They all appear conscientious and honest," she said, "and I ask nothing more than that twelve reliable men shall occupy the jury box."

THE YOUNG WOMAN WHO IS ON TRIAL FOR HER LIFE AND THE MEN ON WHOSE WORD HER FATE DEPENDS.

MISS DORA BROWN. MRS. CORDELIA BOTKIN. ATTORNEY CHARLES WHEELER. ATTORNEY GEORGE A KNIGHT. ATTORNEY-GENERAL ROBERT WHITE OF DELAWARE. DISTRICT ATTORNEY JOHN A HOSMER. CHIEF LEES. JOHN P. DUNNING

SO SIT THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS IN THE TRIAL OF CORDELIA BOTKIN.

By Edward H. Hamilton.

MRS. CORDELIA BOTKIN, on trial for her life, is as demure, as proper and gentle as if she had never broken a commandment or indulged in a thought beyond a Sunday-school. Clothed on with black, her modest eyes given mostly to the contemplation of her hands, and affecting that soft repose which belongs to the caste of Vere de Vere, she seems the type of injured innocence, a Christian and a martyr.

She doesn't even resent the starings of the brazen eyes of other women. She passes through the craning crowds which wait upon her coming and going, contained, collected and serene. No flush comes upon her cheek when the man who has played so tragic a role in the drama of her life throws a neglectful glance her way. To a stranger, coming suddenly upon that crowded courtroom, she would be some tender widow, just past the stormy overflow of her grief, waiting in patient sorrow the legal disposition of the estate of the dear departed.

Yet this woman, so seemingly the theme for pity and for tears, is believed by most of those who look upon her to be a moral monster—a modern Borgia, who did to death by secret poison two innocent people of her own sex—two who had never done her the slightest harm. If innocent, she looks the part. If guilty she is an actress of rare gifts when assigned to a role requiring composure. Perhaps if put to the test of questioning she will burst the bounds and flame out malignant, passionate, vixenish. That is what the great crowd waits to see.

Yesterday morning Deane and Dunning, the husbands of the two murdered women, came into court with Chief Lees. Deane soon went away. Dunning pulled a chair from the table assigned to the forces of the prosecution and placed it behind the station of the reporters. If Mrs. Botkin noted the presence of the two bereaved men she made no sign. She was not ruffled, uneasy or disturbed. Like the black omen of the poet she "sat and nothing more."

Deane gave a passing glance at the back of her head, and hurried on. As for Dunning, having fixed his position where he could catch the woman's profile and not have to face her, as he had at the time of his first appearance, he occasionally permitted his eyes to wander in her direction. But there was no knitting of the brows, no clutching of the hands, no evidence of a desire for revenge. Perhaps such things belong only to the theatre. In any event Dunning was placid, even languid. He evinces small interest in the selection of the jury, smiles occasionally at the sallies of the lawyers, shifts his position rarely—and chews gum.

"That's him!" whisper the ungrammatical loungers.

"That's her!" retort those who point the finger.

But these two central figures in what promises to be a case of sensations are as unsensational as two hydrants or two dollars. Yet women stand tiptoe on benches for hours just to look at them. Men stretch and twist their ungraceful, inquisitive necks to get a nearer view. The throng seems waiting for an outburst, recriminations, a "scene." The hours drag on, empty of sensations, melancholy, slow, but the crowd remains alert, tense, expectant.

Yesterday there was little to record. Before the case was called, Knight gave promise of making it a lively day. He began protesting to Hosmer about the retention on the jury of S. H. Daniels, the Bank of California exchange teller.

"This man is altogether too friendly with Chief Lees," complained the prisoner's lawyer in his emphatic way. "Lees used to work for Daniels' father, and now Daniels is continually entertained at Lees' house."

Hosmer retorted in low tones, and Knight burst out, exploding like a firecracker:

"He shan't sit in this case."

Then Knight and Lees wrangled over the matter and there was no sweetness and light in the tone of either. Again Knight explosively declared, "He shan't sit in this case!" But Daniels is still sitting.

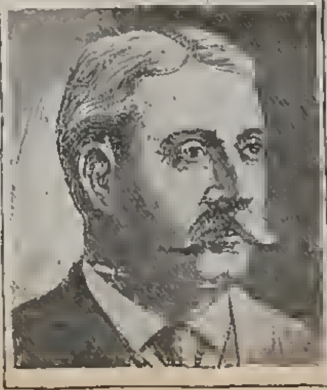
"The fact is," explained Lees, "that in 1850-53, when I was outside foreman in Donohue's old foundry, the father of Daniels was timekeeper there. Since then I have liked the son just as I liked the father, but, so far as I remember, he never has been at my house, and we are not at all intimate."

Knight was also inclined to be a bit testy with Hosmer at the start and Hosmer was only too ready to be crabbed in his turn. So ears pricked up in expectation of some hard hitting. But it was merely a flash i' th' pan; for the two attorneys soon got as cheery as the Cherrybel brothers, and though only one jury man passed the day's ordeal, there was no more querulousness.

When, on Tuesday night, ten jurors had been accepted and sworn it was supposed that the securing of the remaining two would be the matter of an hour or less. But the men of the original venire of 150 who answered to their names were either eager to get away or were not satisfactory to one side or the other, and a special venire of twenty-five had to be called for the afternoon. Of these, the one who was sworn was E. A. Kyle of Goldberg, Bowen & Co.

The morning heard the calling of some notable names and the making of many excuses. E. W. Hopkins was excused as a non-resident. Austin C. Tubbs and W. E. Deane for sickness, and James V. Coleman because he is an attorney as well as a professor, a capitalist and an author. H. E. Bothin did not answer at all, though his name was called Both-een, Both-in, Bo-thin, Both-un and Bothing. Stewart Menzies, the reformer, begged off on the ground that he is a Federal officeholder. He is Jury Commissioner for the Circuit Court. George Newhall, who drives four-in-hands, pleaded exemption on the ground that he is an active officer of a railroad. He has something to do with the Union-street cable line, which is nothing much to be proud of.

F. A. Hunter, a traveling insurance agent, and I. W. Hellman Jr., son of the great Nevada Bank capitalist, were the first two called to the box. But both had such opinions of Mrs. Knight's guilt that they were excused on Knight's challenges. George D. Clark passed muster, but Knight challenged him peremptorily. O. D. Baldwin had an opinion. Then when F. P. Sherman, the Sutter-street merchant, and Alexander Hamilton of Baker & Hamilton were announced as the last two names in the clerk's box, Knight offered to take them and let it go at that. But Hosmer would not have it so. It was found that under no circumstances would the gallant Hamilton vote to hang a woman on circumstantial evidence. So he went out on Hosmer's objection, and Sherman was peremptorily set down by the same side.



JUROR EDWARD KYLE.

Thus it became necessary to summon the twenty-five more jurymen on a special venire and to have them on hand for the afternoon. The crowd gathered long before the hour for opening court and fairly spewed itself through the door. One woman brought her little girl. All glued their eyes to Mrs. Botkin, and one stout, flabby female who sat near the prisoner stared at her piteously all the afternoon. The prisoners' dock, disagreeably suggestive as it is, filled with old men, bewhiskered like a Populist convention.

On the special venire appeared the names of William H. Mills and J. C. Stubbs of the Southern Pacific. Stubbs paid no attention whatever to the summons, but Mills sent out Attorney Lake of the railroad's law department to say that he was ill. Hotel men predominated. William B. Hooper of the Occidental, Colonel Young of the Russ and Manager Warren of the Palace all being on the list.

H. L. Dodge and Mr. Warren were the first called. Dodge didn't suit Knight, and Warren would not hang a woman. E. Fretwell, a banker, with a chrysanthemum, was peremptorily challenged by Knight, and Hosmer similarly let out Isaac Baer. Then Knight found that Fred Bowman was not on the assessment roll—the first time that point had been raised—and peremptorily challenged Brittsford P. Flint, the wool merchant, and C. T. Spader, a real estate broker.

Then came Thomas S. Williams, a tailor. He could hardly hear Hosmer, but Knight wanted him on the jury, and shouted so loud that a steam pipe could have heard him. Williams replied easily, but when Judge Cook asked, "Do you think you could hear the witnesses?" the tailor sat looking straight ahead, blank and empty. He hadn't caught a syllable, and so he had to go.

"Foote and I have had that old fellow on a number of juries, and he will not bring in a verdict of guilty on any kind of evidence," said Knight afterwards. "But he's got too deaf to be of use any more."

At last Colonel J. S. Young of the Russ House and E. A. Kyle were passed and accepted. It seemed that the agony of jury getting was over. But just as the relief sigh and the usual anticipatory shuffle went round, up jumped Young and said dramatically:

"I ought to say that the proper questions have not been asked me. I have read a great deal of this case and I have expressed an opinion about it."

"Have you talked with anyone who is to be a witness in the case?" asked Judge Cook, eager to retain the juror.

"I have," promptly replied Young.

It seems that Detective McVey of Delaware is at Young's hotel and has been talking to him about the evidence, so Young was excused and the trouble resumed. G. Lederer, Peter Schlegel, Louis S. Haas and Lemuel Wadham, the expert, were excused for one cause and another, and Samuel Bernstein was announced as the last [illegible] on the venire free.

"Are you opposed to the death penalty?" asked Hosmer.

"I am."

"I don't think he [illegible]," interjected Knight. "Now, Mr. Bernstein, do you not believe in hanging people for murder? When a cruel, desperate, deliberate murder has been proven, do you believe in hanging the murderer?"

"No."

"I think he did understand you," was Knight's apologetic comment.

The Court ordered the summoning of ten more jurymen and the case went over until this morning.

One Witness Cannot Come.

WILMINGTON (Dela.), December 7.—United States District Attorney Vandegrift to-night decided that Walter Morris, who was summoned to San Francisco to testify in the Botkin case, cannot go. He is subpenaed to testify in the case of United States Senator Kenney, who is now being tried for conspiring with William N. Boggs to misapply the funds of the First National Bank of Dover. Attorney-General White, who is now in San Francisco, to-day telegraphed for Morris to come on. Mr. White will be notified of the action of Mr. Vandegrift.

15
51

HOSMER DEMANDS THE LIFE OF MRS. CORDELIA BOTKIN AND FORESHADOWS THE PROOF OF THE WOMAN'S GUILT.

LAWYER HOSMER'S ARRAIGNMENT OF MRS. BOTKIN.

The Pitiless Opening Statement of the Prosecution.

By Edward H. Hamilton.

"THIS thing is a farce, and I'm not going to hang around here any longer!"

Joshua D. Deane left this declaration sizzling in a trail behind him as he stormed out of Judge Cook's courtroom yesterday morning. Deane was the husband of one of the women killed by the poisoned candy. His anger was aroused by the postponing of Mrs. Botkin's trial until Monday next.

Deane had entered the courtroom late, accompanied by little Harry Pennington, the boy who carried the box of poisoned candy from the Dover postoffice to the home of the Penningtons, where Mrs. Deane and Mrs. Dunning ate and died. Taking a seat beside Dunning, Deane frequently leaned over to comment on the statement of the prosecution's case, which the assistant and dramatic, clear and logical, Hosmer was making to the jury.

The necessary twelfth juror was secured at the fourth attempt. He is H. J. Burns, an elderly capitalist, who resides at 3345 Seventeenth street. Then Clerk Tolle, who has a sort of bitch-and-kick declamation, went through the long indictment by file and page, and Assistant District Attorney Hosmer took his station before the jury to make his opening statement.

The Oblong Package in the Mail.

If the Court please, and gentlemen of the jury: In support of the indictment which you have just heard read, we expect to show you a state of facts about as follows:

In the evening mail which arrived at Dover, in the county of ..., in the State of Delaware, on the ninth of August, 1898—the mail arriving from the ... and west about six o'clock in the evening—was contained a package, which will be ... in this case, oblong in shape, with postage prepaid upon it, and bearing the ...

...ting and retching pains in the stomach, and that Mrs. Dunning was also taken sick during the night, and that in the morning a doctor was summoned to attend them. We expect to show that Leila Deane was sick also in the morning, as was Harry Pennington, both of whom had eaten of the candies the night before.

As Hosmer reached this point those who watched Dunning saw an agony catch and rend him. Some have insisted that his manner indicated heartless unconcern; but none could criticise on that score when the ...

HOSMER'S STATEMENT DID NOT SURPRISE MRS. BOTKIN.

Mrs. Cordelia Botkin heard nothing new yesterday in the statement for the prosecution made by Assistant District Attorney Hosmer to the jury. In speaking of the matter at the conclusion of the court session, she said:

"Mr. Hosmer's statement was very much what I expected it would be. There was nothing startling or new in what he said, for it has been said over and over and printed so many times. I have for weeks been familiar with the so-called evidence against me, and I was not worried in the least at hearing a recitation of it in court.

"I find going to court an extremely trying ordeal, but would it not be for any woman similarly unfortunately situated? I am glad to get away from all these curious people and to go back to the place where I am now staying. It is heavenly in comparison to the City Prison."

The question was then asked by Mrs. Botkin whether Mr. Dunning would get a divorce, and Mrs. Botkin replied that if it were not for the child he would.

Those who faced Mrs. Botkin declared that at this time a look of great weariness came into her eyes. The slight wrinkles under them seemed to deepen. Otherwise there was no change in her posture or expression. Then came the story of the purchase of the candy.

How She Bought Chocolates at The Haas Store.

We expect to show that Mrs. Botkin returned to San Francisco on the 20th of July and went to the Victoria Hotel. That the next day she told the landlady she was sick and had her meals sent to her room; that the next day she complained of the same thing.

We will prove that the same day a woman, believed to be Mrs. Botkin, went to the candy store of George Haas & Son on Market street, in the Phelan Block; that the cars running along Hyde street pass the Victoria Hotel, then down to Pine to Jones, then to O'Farrell and run on O'Farrell to Market street, near the Haas store. We will show that this person who went to the candy store seemed to be in a hurry, and on several occasions asked the young lady waiting on her to hurry up; that she asked for chocolates; that she did not want a box bearing the name of Haas & Son, but wanted the fancy kind; that the young lady went to the other side of the store and took out a box exactly similar in character to the one received by Mrs. Dunning; that she returned to the other part of the store and partly filled it with candy; that the request was made that the box should not be filled, as the customer wanted to put something else in it; that the box was only partially filled, and that instead of charging the regular price of 50 cents, the young lady charged but ... cents, and fearing that she may have done wrong took the precaution to ask another clerk if she would have done the same thing under the same circumstances.

Hosmer began looking into a small memorandum-book and getting a fact here and a date there from that, as he said:

How Mrs. Botkin Purchased the Handkerchief.

We expect to prove that about the same time of the year Mrs. Botkin was in the City of Paris dry-goods store, and there spoke about certain handkerchiefs. We expect to show that handkerchiefs of that character were sold to Mrs. Botkin, and that the cost mark was the same as that on the handkerchief received by Mrs. Dunning in Delaware.

We expect to show that there was mailed on the 4th of August at the ferry postoffice a package similar in shape to that delivered to Mrs. Dunning in Delaware. We will show that the postmark on the package delivered to Mrs. Dunning was that which was placed on fourth-class matter, and was mailed at the ferry postoffice station, D, in this city.

We will show by the clerk, Dunnigan, that the package was placed in the pouch that left that day for the East. The clerk noticed the package because of the similarity of the name, Dunning, to his own. We expect to show that a package, to reach Dover on the 9th, would leave San Francisco on the 4th.

Next came the interview held with Mrs. Botkin by an "Examiner" correspondent shortly after she had learned of the death of Mrs. Dunning and Mrs. Deane. When it came to her declaration about letting the man die and sparing the mother for her child, the courtroom almost gasped, but Mrs. Botkin did not flinch. This is how the tale ran on:

Her Confessions Made to "The Examiner."

We will prove that Mrs. Botkin went to Healdsburg, that while there the death of these two ladies was reported through the press, that, at the time, she was called upon by a reporter of "The Examiner" and questioned in regard to her connection with Dunning. We expect to show that she was greatly agitated, that she told of her intimacy with Dunning, and that she made a statement to Miss Livernash, the reporter, something to the effect:

"Why did I not let the man die and spare the mother to her child?"

We expect to show that she said some one might have forged her handwriting, that she also said to Miss Livernash that poison was said to permeate in candy, that she left Healdsburg and went to Stockton, that she spoke of her correspondence with Dunning, that she spoke of Dunning as being her affinity. That then, when something was said about Dunning having had a wife living, that she said: "Well, I would say I never intended to marry him." She said that after a while, if they should come together, that then people might have a suspicion that she had something to do with the death of his wife. She also said that Dunning, the candy having come from California, would suspect her of being the person who sent it.

From this the statement of the prosecution's case worked argumentfully to its close. There was the statement of the drunken son, the comparison of the handwriting of Mrs. Botkin with the writing on the wrapper of the fated candy box, the analysis of the candy made here by Professor Price—and then the dramatic demand for death; a life for a life.

"Jack Dunning Loves My Mother."

At Stockton she met Mr. Botkin and demanded that he make a statement to the papers that they had lived apart at his instance and not at her own. Her son then came in under the influence of liquor and in the discussion of the case said: "Jack Dunning loves my mother," and also said something to the effect that he would marry her if he would. She said her life had been one of pleasure and that she would not let anything stand in the way of getting anything she wanted, though she would hesitate at murder.

We expect to show by Mr. Dunning, who had received a number of letters from her, that the anonymous letters that were sent to Delaware to Mrs. Dunning were in the handwriting of Mrs. Botkin. We expect also to show that the note in the candy box and the name on the outside of the package were in the handwriting of Mrs. Botkin, no attempt being made to disguise the writing.

We expect to show that after the candy reached here from Delaware that an analysis was made by Professor Price, who, taking some eight pieces of candy and subjecting them to a test found in six of them traces of arsenic, that in some pieces he found as much as five to seven grains, that the lethal dose of the poison is from two to three grains.

Gentlemen of the jury, if we prove these facts to you, we shall expect at your hands a verdict of murder in the first degree.

There was just one brief touch of thrill in the closing sentence, though Hosmer did not attempt to make it specially impressive. Then, by general consent of counsel, but much to the angry disgust of Joshua Deane, the case was postponed until Monday.

When asked whether there were any surprises in the prosecution's opening statement, Mr. Knight replied:

"No, there was nothing new. It is the same old story. We have known just what they would try to prove all along."

... by the handwriting and it was satisfied— Mr. Knight—Now, if the Court please, I ob...

ONE POINT IN HER DEFENSE.

No Post-Mortem Examination in Case of Dover Victims.

Mrs. Botkin's Attorneys Will Probably Make Much of That Fact.

BOTH BODIES EMBALMED.

No Reference Was Made to This in the Opening Argument of the Prosecution.

One fact in connection with Assistant District Attorney Hosmer's opening argument in the Botkin case has given rise to some speculation as to a point the defense may probably attempt to make.

Lawyers who have watched this extraordinary case remarked yesterday that Mr. Hosmer said nothing in his opening argument about the result of any post-mortem examination that may have been held in the case of Mrs. Dunning or Mrs. Deane.

The question has been asked whether or not this was an oversight on the part of the prosecution.

Mr. Hosmer's reason for not mentioning anything about a post-mortem examination is probably not an oversight, for the reason that there was no post-mortem examination.

The bodies of the two victims of the poisoner—wherever that poisoner may have been—were embalmed very soon after death. It is understood that the embalming was by the usual process of injecting into the veins a solution containing arsenic. As the poison that is alleged to have caused death was arsenic, the embalming, prior to a post-mortem examination, of course destroyed the value of any evidence that might have hinged upon such an examination.

It is believed that the defense will endeavor to make capital out of the failure to hold a post-mortem examination. In any event, there will be a stubborn fight in regard to the kind of arsenic found in the candy and the kind alleged to have been purchased by Mrs. Botkin. To just what extent the neglect to hold post-mortem examinations may figure in this contention remains to be seen.

PROBLEM OF NATIONAL MOMENT INVOLVED IN THE BOTKIN CASE

State Supreme Court Receives Harper's Petition for a Writ of Prohibition.

Call — Dec-11-18[illegible]

The Issues Now Raised in the Great Case Discussed by Attorney General Fitzgerald and Judge Carroll Cook.

The effort made by W. L. Harper to secure from the Supreme Court of this State a decision that will determine whether or not Mrs. Cordelia Botkin can be tried in California for the crime of which she has been accused has excited general public interest. The questions that have been raised by Harper's petition to the State appellate court are of more than local or State interest. They possess a national importance.

In brief Harper has asked the Supreme Court of this State to decide whether or not a person can, under certain conditions, commit any crime and be free from punishment under the laws of the United States. In the momentous questions raised by Harper the personality of Mrs. Botkin plays no part. The fate of the woman and even the horrifying crime of which she is accused are matters of comparatively small concern.

If the woman, under the laws of this State and of the United States, is to escape an actual trial the people, not only of California, but of the nation, are vitally interested to know the fact. If it is possible for an assassin to operate under cover of State and national laws Harper and the public-spirited citizens who are supporting him wish to know the situation, in order that they may, through legislative action, seek a remedy.

This purpose is, in brief, the meaning of Harper's petition to the Supreme Court. There is, as a matter of course, another incidental interest in the action. The alleged trial of Mrs. Botkin will cost the people of this State many thousands of dollars. It is certainly a matter of unwise civic policy to expend this money uselessly, and Harper, supported by I. J. Truman, Treasurer-elect; Asa R. Wells, Auditor-elect, and many members of the Merchants' Association, seeks to have the Supreme Court of the State decide whether or not Mrs. Botkin is being prosecuted under a legal indictment.

While this point is not as important as that which questions the adequacy of American laws to punish any one for a grievous offense it is still of great moment. Both these questions have called forth a general expression of public interest and concern.

Harper's petition did not receive a hearing yesterday, for the simple reason that a quorum of the Supreme Court was not present to consider it. The application for a writ of prohibition was duly presented to the appellate court, and was read by Justices Beatty, Van Fleet and Harrison. Consideration of the matter was necessarily postponed, as the full court was not in attendance.

The trial of Mrs. Botkin before Superior Judge Cook and a jury will therefore proceed to-morrow morning. It is likely to be suspended, however, at any time during the day. As already indicated, the problems raised by Harper's petition have called forth the serious discussion, not only of lawyers, but of laymen. This discussion, which may result in the modification of State and Federal laws, is of exceptional interest. The first contention that was made yesterday was that since the indictment against Mrs. Botkin accused her of having committed murder in this city, the courts of this county necessarily have jurisdiction. The petition of Harper meets this contention with the assertion that no true indictment has been found, the allegation being made that nothing has been advanced to show that Mrs. Botkin actually committed a crime in this city or State.

This position is met by perhaps the most important assertion of those who are concerned in trying Mrs. Botkin for murder. The laws of this State provide that a person may be tried here for an offense part of which was committed in California. This is the entire basis of the assumption that Mrs. Botkin's trial is real. The point, however, in the opinion of prominent lawyers and business men should be judicially determined.

Attorney General Fitzgerald of this State believes that Mrs. Botkin is legally on trial, yet he also believes that the issues raised by her trial should, in the interests of public justice, be determined without delay. Judge Cook, the defendant in Harper's petition, considers that he has a right to proceed. Attorneys are divded in opinion, but all concede that the question is one of the greatest moment to the State and to the nation.

Louis P. Boardman, who has instituted the proceedings before the Supreme Court on behalf of Harper, outlined yesterday what he believed to be every issue raised by his client's petition. Mr. Boardman said:

"The questions that are presented to the Supreme Court in the petition I filed this afternoon were discussed by me with several prominent citizens, and the matter of the advisability and apparent necessity of raising the question of jurisdiction of the Superior Court was well considered before any action was taken.

"I have not been over-zealous in the matter. I was prompted, I may say, to a certain extent in what I have done, by the manifest exigencies of the case as expressed by these gentlemen. I did not file the petition for the purpose of gaining notoriety—I care nothing for that. I am solely interested in the important principles that are involved in the determination of the questions that arise in this case.

"It has come to my knowledge that certain assertions have been made that there has been collusion between myself, the persons I represent and the attorneys for Mrs. Cordelia Botkin.

"I suppose this has been prompted by the indifferent manner in which Mrs. Botkin's attorneys have conducted her defense, which has led the public to believe that there is some 'star' play to be made somewhere in the trial of the case that will demonstrate the ridiculous position of the Superior Court and the authorities in their endeavors to convict Mrs. Botkin of a murder said to have been committed in this State. There is absolutely no foundation for any statement that there has been any collusion or association between myself and the attorneys for the prisoner.

"I can state positively that they possessed no knowledge either by suggestion or insinuation that any such proceeding had been contemplated. The proceeding that was commenced yesterday has been made public and every element in its character is shown by the paper itself."

"A friend of mine this afternoon approached me in slight consternation, saying that he had heard that contempt proceedings might be instituted in the Superior Court to punish me for a manifest attempt to trifle or meddle unwarrantably with its exclusive jurisdiction. I cannot believe that these statements are anything but idle rumors. The question of being in contempt of the Superior Court for filing in the Supreme Court a document to contest legally the jurisdiction of a lower court is simply preposterous.

"The questions that are presented in this application for a writ of prohibition may be stated to be as follows:

"The first question that is presented for consideration is the right of a citizen and taxpayer to question the jurisdiction of a court in a public criminal prosecution where the people at large are plaintiffs and which will involve the expenditure of a large sum of public money. The proceeding by prohibition is as old as the common law, and the weight of judicial opinion is that where there is a serious question of jurisdiction the question of jurisdiction may be raised even by a stranger to the litigation ought to be restrained.

"The next question presented is as to the remedy of prohibition being a proper one. It has been held by the Supreme Court of this State that prohibition is the proper remedy to arrest the trial of a criminal action, where the indictment for any reason does not sustain the jurisdiction.

"With these preliminary propositions disposed of, we come then to the main [illegible] involved herein, and that

This proceeding simply seeks to have that matter settled and determined.

"In the points and authorities filed with the petition I have shown legal authority for the position sought to be maintained. It is plain to my mind there is ample authority in the books of text and judicial decision to sustain the intervention of the Supreme Court to determine at once this most important question.

"There is no reason why any one moved by his sense of public interest should be censured in any quarter for undertaking a proceeding which has for its object the subserving of the public good."

Judge Carroll Cook, who is trying the case of Mrs. Botkin on the murder charge, when seen last night at his home, was disinclined to talk about the petition made to stop the trial, as the matter had not yet come to him officially, and would not until the Supreme Court had passed upon it. From his remarks, however, it was gathered that he has no doubt of the jurisdiction of the Superior Court in the case, and that the higher court would so rule.

"The question of the jurisdiction of the State courts," said Judge Cook, "was practically settled at the time when Mrs. Botkin was before me on a writ of habeas corpus during the extradition proceedings. It will be remembered that Assistant District Attorney Hosmer went to Los Angeles while the Supreme Court was sitting in bank. He went before that body and set forth every question which could be raised as to the jurisdiction of the courts here. He applied for a writ of habeas corpus also, but did not claim that the courts had no jurisdiction. He simply stated the facts of the case, that Governor Budd had issued a warrant for Mrs. Botkin, who was held by the authorities on the charge of murder. He set forth in full the circumstances that part of the deed was committed here and part in Delaware. The declaration of the facts would have determined jurisdiction in advance of any trial. At 2 o'clock that afternoon the Supreme Court denied the writ. This was an admission that the Superior Court has jurisdiction.

"I am inclined to think that the petition to stop the trial will not be granted by the Supreme Court. That body would not issue a writ of prohibition in any case unless application was first made to the court which the applicant seeks to prohibit. The question of jurisdiction has not been raised on the indictment, and I do not see why it was brought up at this stage of the proceedings unless delay is the prime object.

"Section 27 of the Penal Code provides expressly for the case in point and reads: 'The following persons are liable to punishment under the laws of this State: All persons who commit in whole or in part any crime within this State.'

"The petition will not stop proceedings at all, and the case will go on until such a time as the Supreme Court issues a writ of prohibition, if it does so at all.

"As far as punishing the authors of the petition or rebuking them in any way, I do not think that I will follow such a course. The whole matter will be settled by the Supreme Court, which will decide the question of jurisdiction."

Charles Heggerty, one of the attorneys for Mrs. Botkin, discussed the application for a writ of prohibition at some length.

"I feel morally certain," he said, "that the Supreme Court will inform Attorney Boardman that there is nothing in the application whatever. I consider it a direct interference with the trial. It is a reflection on the trial Judge, the District Attorney, the Chief of Police and the attorneys for the defendant, and practically charges that they are by collusion taking part in a murder trial which is practically a farce. I believe it is trifling with the courts.

"The charge, expressed or implied, that the attorneys for the defense are in league with the applicants for the writ is preposterous. Nobody connected with the defense would ever be a party to such a proceeding. It is singular that the application was not made before Chief Lees spent the $3800 to bring the witnesses all the way from Delaware. The defense could not raise the question of jurisdiction unless evidence is put in to show that the women were never murdered in San Francisco but that the deed was committed in Delaware.

"If this application to stop the trial be granted by the Supreme Court, it will amount to a practical acquittal for Mrs. Botkin. You may be sure that had we, her attorneys, thought for a moment that there was anything in such a petition we would have made it long ago. Section 27 covers the point, and there is no possible ground to object to the trial of the case unless, as I say, the evidence shows conclusively that the crime was committed in Delaware and not in San Francisco, as the indictment states. To say that we were allowing the trial to proceed with the intention at the last moment of questioning the jurisdiction of the court would be unfair to our client, whom we have promised to serve to the best of our ability. It must be remembered that she is kept confined in jail, and the ethics of our profession would require us to raise the point if there were anything in it at the very commencement of the proceedings, but this we positively cannot do. We are perfectly satisfied that the Superior Court has jurisdiction."

Attorney General Fitzgerald has followed the case closely, but has not given it sufficient thought to be prepared to make a statement. He consented, however, to give a purely informal interview, but says it might be somewhat different should he make a careful study of the laws to the premises. His opinions are as follows:

"The Superior Court refused to issue the papers which would give Detective McVey the privilege of taking Mrs. Botkin back to Delaware and one of the Judges who sat in the council which [illegible] should I be standing just across the State line and should a man in the opposite State shoot and kill me, there is a possibility that he would escape punishment, even if the crime were witnessed by a dozen persons. On the other hand, our law of 'any part of the crime' might cover it, but the United States laws offer absolutely no remedy."

M'GLADE STILL IN THE JAIL.

Used Friends' Names on Laborers' Bogus Demands.

Now He Cannot Get Bail and is Deserted.

SCANDALS ANTICIPATED

Grand Jury Will Investigate, as Various Persons Are Under Suspicion.

Peter McGlade, the former head bookkeeper of the Street Department, is still in the City Prison for the reason that he can not secure bail in the sum of $10,000. His friends refused yesterday to assist him in any way, and with the Mayor, Chief of Police and Grand Jury demanding a thorough investigation and a determined prosecution his hopes of freedom dwindled away.

Mayor Phelan sent the following communication to the Supervisors' Finance Committee, and as a result Expert Chris Newman was instructed to examine the Street Department books and report thereon:

December 8, 1898

To the Finance Committee of the Board of Supervisors—Gentlemen: I desire to call your attention to the fact that numerous demands for July and August, issued by the Street Department and audited by your committee, are fraudulent, and P. W. McGlade, Deputy in the Street Department, is under arrest, charged with the crime of forgery, in connection with these irregularities. I have already apprised the Grand Jury of the facts, but also suggest that your committee, having the power to send for persons and papers and administer oaths, investigate the affairs of the office of the Superintendent of Streets and employ your experts to that end. Respectfully submitted, JAMES D. PHELAN, Mayor

In the afternoon A. J. Rich, Chairman of the Grand Jury Committee on Street Department, conferred with the Mayor. Presiding Judge Belcher was present, and it was agreed that the Grand Jury take up the McGlade case for the purpose of indicting.

McGlade was arraigned in the Police Court, and at the request of his attorney the preliminary examination was continued till next Friday.

The last batch of bogus demands discovered Thursday was a shock to McGlade's friends. It transpired yesterday that he used their names to get the money, and not only the names, but addresses. In doing so he described his stepbrother, H. Swords; his companion, T. Dwyer, a clerk in the Tax Collector's office, C. Murphy, a friend, and William McGee, another friend, who is a chief clerk in Wells, Fargo & Co.'s express, and others as underground sewer men in the Street Department. Some of them felt it might be a reflection on themselves, as people might think they got the money or had a knowledge of McGlade's work. None of them, however, worked or drew a dollar from the Street Department, as far as is known. Then the name of Chas. Derham was forged and he was an intimate friend of McGlade. They all protested their ignorance of what was going on. So they have turned against him.

That McGlade had one or more accomplices now appears certain. McGlade left on a Saturday and something wrong was then suspected. Nothing was said about it till the following Wednesday, when the Mayor was notified. In the meantime it was thought that McGlade had got out of the country, and it was not known till Thursday morning that he had stopped at Los Angeles and spent his money. These facts are understood to have a bearing on the expert's and Grand Jury investigation of the Street Department's books.

Again it was discovered that the monthly demands, which should have been signed by the Superintendent of Streets, were stamped with his name and signed by a deputy. It is believed by some officials, too, that disputed signatures will be pronounced by experts to be genuine. A comparison of the forgeries and genuine signatures shows the forgeries to have been so cleverly done as to defy detection. The Treasurer stated he would pay again on the forged signatures, which puzzled the Auditor, financial experts, the Treasurer and Supervisors' clerks.

The Issues Now Raised in the Great Case Discussed by Attorney General Fitzgerald and Judge Carroll Cook.

The effort made by W. L. Harper to secure from the Supreme Court of this State a decision that will determine whether or not Mrs. Cordelia Botkin can be tried in California for the crime of which she has been accused has excited general public interest. The questions that have been raised by Harper's petition to the State appellate court are of more than local or State interest. They possess a national importance.

In brief Harper has asked the Supreme Court of this State to decide whether or not a person can, under certain conditions, commit any crime and be free from punishment under the laws of the United States. In the momentous questions raised by Harper the personality of Mrs. Botkin plays no part. The fate of the woman and even the horrifying crime of which she is accused are matters of comparatively small concern.

If the woman, under the laws of this State and of the United States, is to escape an actual trial the people, not only of California, but of the nation, are vitally interested to know the fact. If it is possible for an assassin to operate under cover of State and national laws Harper and the public-spirited citizens who are supporting him wish to know the situation, in order that they may, through legislative action, seek a remedy.

This purpose is, in brief, the meaning of Harper's petition to the Supreme Court. There is, as a matter of course, another incidental interest in the action. The alleged trial of Mrs. Botkin will cost the people of this State many thousands of dollars. It is certainly a matter of unwise civic policy to expend this money uselessly, and Harper, supported by I. J. Truman, Treasurer-elect; Asa R. Wells, Auditor-elect, and many members of the Merchants' Association, seeks to have the Supreme Court of the State decide whether or not Mrs. Botkin is being prosecuted under a legal indictment.

While this point is not as important as that which questions the adequacy of American laws to punish any one for a grievous offense it is still of great moment. Both these questions have called forth a general expression of public interest and concern.

Harper's petition did not receive a hearing yesterday, for the simple reason that a quorum of the Supreme Court was not present to consider it. The application for a writ of prohibition was duly presented to the appellate court, and was read by Justices Beatty, Van Fleet and Harrison. Consideration of the matter was necessarily postponed, as the full court was not in attendance.

The trial of Mrs. Botkin before Superior Judge Cook and a jury will therefore proceed to-morrow morning. It is likely to be suspended, however, at any time during the day. As already indicated, the problems raised by Harper's petition have called forth the serious discussion, not only of lawyers, but of laymen. This discussion, which may result in the modification of State and Federal laws, is of exceptional interest. The first contention that was made yesterday was that since the indictment against Mrs. Botkin accused her of having committed murder in this city, the courts of this county necessarily have jurisdiction. The petition of Harper meets this contention with the assertion that no true indictment has been found, the allegation being made that nothing has been advanced to show that Mrs. Botkin actually committed a crime in this city or State.

This position is met by perhaps the most important assertion of those who are concerned in trying Mrs. Botkin for murder. The laws of this State provide that a person may be tried here for an offense part of which was committed in California. This is the entire basis of the assumption that Mrs. Botkin's trial is real. The point, however, in the opinion of prominent lawyers and business men should be judicially determined.

Attorney General Fitzgerald of this State believes that Mrs. Botkin is legally on trial, yet he also believes that the issues raised by her trial should, in the interests of public justice, be determined without delay. Judge Cook, the defendant in Harper's petition, considers that he has a right to proceed. Attorneys are divided in opinion, but all concede that the question is one of the greatest moment to the State and to the nation.

Louis P. Boardman, who has instituted the proceedings before the Supreme Court on behalf of Harper, outlined yesterday what he believed to be every issue raised by his client's petition. Mr. Boardman said:

"The questions that are presented to the Supreme Court in the petition I filed this afternoon were discussed by me with several prominent citizens, and the matter of the advisability and apparent necessity of raising the question of jurisdiction of the Superior Court was well considered before any action was taken.

"I have not been over-zealous in the matter. I was prompted, I may say, to a certain extent in what I have done, by the manifest exigencies of the case as expressed by these gentlemen. I did not file the petition for the purpose of gaining notoriety—I care nothing for that. I am solely interested in the important principles that are involved in the determination of the questions that arise in this case.

"It has come to my knowledge that certain assertions have been made that there has been collusion between myself, the persons I represent and the attorneys for Mrs. Cordelia Botkin.

"I suppose this has been prompted by the indifferent manner in which Mrs. Botkin's attorneys have conducted her defense, which has led the public to believe that there is some 'star' play to be made somewhere in the trial of the case that will demonstrate the ridiculous position of the Superior Court and the authorities in their endeavors to convict Mrs. Botkin of a murder said to have been committed in this State. There is absolutely no foundation for any statement that there has been any collusion or association between myself and the attorneys for the prisoner.

"I can state positively that they possessed no knowledge either by suggestion or insinuation that any such proceeding had been contemplated. The proceeding that was commenced yesterday has been made public and every element in its character is shown by the paper itself."

"A friend of mine this afternoon approached me in slight consternation, saying that he had heard that contempt proceedings might be instituted in the Superior Court to punish me for a manifest attempt to trifle or meddle unwarrantably with its exclusive jurisdiction. I cannot believe that these statements are anything but idle rumors. The question of being in contempt of the Superior Court for filing in the Supreme Court a document to contest legally the jurisdiction of a lower court is simply preposterous.

"The questions that are presented in this application for a writ of prohibition may be stated to be as follows:

"The first question that is presented for consideration is the right of a citizen and taxpayer to question the jurisdiction of a court in a public criminal prosecution where the people at large are plaintiffs and which will involve the expenditure of a large sum of public money. The proceeding by prohibition is as old as the common law, and the weight of judicial opinion is that where there is a serious question of jurisdiction the question of jurisdiction may be raised even by a stranger to the litigation sought to be restrained.

"The next question presented is as to the remedy of prohibition being a proper one. It has been held by the Supreme Court of this State that prohibition is the proper remedy to arrest the trial of a criminal action, where the indictment for any reason does not sustain the jurisdiction.

"With these preliminary propositions disposed of, we come then to the main proposition involved herein, and that is, the question of the place of the legal and actual commission of the alleged crime of murder and the place of jurisdiction for trial. The question of whether or not the State of Delaware or the State of California has jurisdiction to try this case has never yet been considered or determined.

"The extradition proceeding which was taken and decided in the Superior Court previous to the filing of this indictment determined only one legal proposition and that was; that the authorities of both States having conceded that the crime was committed in the State of Delaware, and the accused person having been in the State of California at the time of the commission of the alleged murder; whether this condition of conceded facts was sufficient under the constitution and laws of the United States to sustain the interstate rendition of the accused person as a fugitive from justice.

"The one point decided by Judge Carroll Cook and his fellow-Judges sitting in bank was that the strict and inflexible provisions of the constitution and laws of the United States could not be construed to include such a case. In this decision the Superior Court followed the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

"The ultimate relief sought by this proceeding of prohibition is to determine the actual jurisdiction of the Superior Court to try this case. The jurisdiction of trial is either in the State of California or in the State of Delaware. This point and question has not been decided or determined by any court.

case of Mrs. Botkin on the murder charge, when seen last night at his home, was disinclined to talk about the petition made to stop the trial, as the matter had not yet come to him officially, and would not until the Supreme Court had passed upon it. From his remarks, however, it was gathered that he has no doubt of the jurisdiction of the Superior Court in the case, and that the higher court would so rule.

"The question of the jurisdiction of the State courts," said Judge Cook, "was practically settled at the time when Mrs. Botkin was before me on a writ of habeas corpus during the extradition proceedings. It will be remembered that Assistant District Attorney Hosmer went to Los Angeles while the Supreme Court was sitting in bank. He went before that body and set forth every question which could be raised as to the jurisdiction of the courts here. He applied for a writ of habeas corpus also, but did not claim that the courts had no jurisdiction. He simply stated the facts of the case, that Governor Budd had issued a warrant for Mrs. Botkin, who was held by the authorities on the charge of murder. He set forth in full the circumstances that part of the deed was committed here and part in Delaware. The declaration of the facts would have determined jurisdiction in advance of any trial. At 2 o'clock that afternoon the Supreme Court denied the writ. This was an admission that the Superior Court has jurisdiction.

"I am inclined to think that the petition to stop the trial will not be granted by the Supreme Court. That body would not issue a writ of prohibition in any case unless application was first made to the court which the applicant seeks to prohibit. The question of jurisdiction has not been raised on the indictment, and I do not see why it was brought up at this stage of the proceedings unless delay is the prime object.

"Section 27 of the Penal Code provides expressly for the case in point and reads: 'The following persons are liable to punishment under the laws of this State: All persons who commit in whole or in part any crime within this State.'

"The petition will not stop proceedings at all, and the case will go on until such a time as the Supreme Court issues a writ of prohibition, if it does so at all.

"As far as punishing the authors of the petition or rebuking them in any way, I do not think that I will follow such a course. The whole matter will be settled by the Supreme Court, which will decide the question of jurisdiction."

Charles Heggerly, one of the attorneys for Mrs. Botkin, discussed the application for a writ of prohibition at some length.

"I feel morally certain," he said, "that the Supreme Court will inform Attorney Boardman that there is nothing in the application whatever. I consider it a direct interference with the trial. It is a reflection on the trial Judge, the District Attorney, the Chief of Police and the attorneys for the defendant, and practically charges that they are by collusion taking part in a murder trial which is practically a farce. I believe it is trifling with the courts.

"The charge, expressed or implied, that the attorneys for the defense are in league with the applicants for the writ is preposterous. Nobody connected with the defense would ever be a party to such a proceeding. It is singular that the application was not made before Chief Lees spent the $3500 to bring the witnesses all the way from Delaware. The defense could not raise the question of jurisdiction unless evidence is put in to show that the women were never murdered in San Francisco but that the deed was committed in Delaware.

"If this application to stop the trial be granted by the Supreme Court, it will amount to a practical acquittal for Mrs. Botkin. You may be sure that had we, her attorneys, thought for a moment that there was anything in such a petition we would have made it long ago. Section 27 covers the point, and there is no possible ground to object to the trial of the case unless, as I say, the evidence shows conclusively that the crime was committed in Delaware and not in San Francisco, as the indictment states. To say that we were allowing the trial to proceed with the intention at the last moment of questioning the jurisdiction of the court would be unfair to our client, whom we have promised to serve to the best of our ability. It must be remembered that she is kept confined in jail, and the ethics of our profession would require us to raise the point if there were anything in it at the very commencement of the proceedings, but this we positively cannot do. We are perfectly satisfied that the Superior Court has jurisdiction."

Attorney General Fitzgerald has followed the case closely, but has not given it sufficient thought to be prepared to make a statement. He consented, however, to give a purely informal interview, but says it might be somewhat different should he make a careful study of the laws in the premises. His opinions are as follows:

"The Superior Court refused to issue the papers which would give Detective McVey the privilege of taking Mrs. Botkin back to Delaware and one of the Judges who sat in the council which made this decision has consented to try the case. So far as I can see the Superior Court of this State has a right to try this case after the indictment by the Grand Jury.

"The law provides that a person may be tried in this State for a crime any part of which is committed in this State. According to the evidence submitted two persons died in Delaware from poison, bought in this State, concealed in a package of candies in this State and mailed from this city. This is the case presented. So far no one has attempted to disprove this much of it and a layman can readily see that a portion of the alleged crime was committed in this State and the Superior Court accordingly has jurisdiction to try the case.

"Of course later developments may put everything in a different aspect, but so far there is apparently nothing which will prevent the Superior Court of this State from trying and passing judgment on the case.

"As far as the Federal laws are concerned, I will state positively that they offer no remedy, should the defense prove that this case is beyond the jurisdiction of the State courts. It is evidently something which has been forgotten and each State has been left practically to make its own laws for the punishment of criminals. Of course, should murder be committed in the District of Columbia or on any of the United States reservations, such as the Presidio here, for instance, the case would be tried in the Federal courts.

"As the laws are now, however, on Laborers' Bogus Demands.

Now He Cannot Get Bail and Is Deserted.

SCANDALS ANTICIPATED

Grand Jury Will Investigate, as Various Persons Are Under Suspicion.

Peter McGlade, the former head bookkeeper of the Street Department, is still in the City Prison for the reason that he cannot secure bail in the sum of $10,000. His friends refused yesterday to assist him in any way, and with the Mayor, Chief of Police and Grand Jury demanding a thorough investigation and a determined prosecution his hopes of freedom dwindled away.

Mayor Phelan sent the following communication to the Supervisors' Finance Committee, and as a result Expert Chris Newman was instructed to examine the Street Department books and report thereon.

December 8, 1898.

To the Finance Committee of the Board of Supervisors—Gentlemen: I desire to call your attention to the fact that numerous demands for July and August, issued by the Street Department and audited by your committee, are fraudulent, and P. W. McGlade, deputy in the Street Department, is under arrest, charged with the crime of forgery, in connection with these irregularities. I have already apprised the Grand Jury of the facts, but also suggest that your committee, having the power to send for persons and papers and administer oaths, investigate the affairs of the office of the Superintendent of Streets and employ your experts to that end. Respectfully submitted, JAMES D. PHELAN, Mayor.

In the afternoon A. J. Rich, Chairman of the Grand Jury Committee on Street Department, conferred with the Mayor. Presiding Judge Belcher was present, and it was agreed that the Grand Jury take up the McGlade case for the purpose of indicting.

McGlade was arraigned in the Police Court, and at the request of his attorney the preliminary examination was continued till next Friday.

The last batch of bogus demands discovered Thursday was a shock to McGlade's friends. It transpired yesterday that he used their names to get the money, and not only the names, but addresses. In doing so he described his stepbrother, H. Swords, his companion, T. Dwyer, a clerk in the Tax Collector's office; C. Murphy, a friend, and William McGee, another friend, who is a chief clerk in Wells, Fargo & Co.'s express, and others as underground sewer men in the Street Department. Some of them felt it might be a reflection on themselves, as people might think they got the money or had a knowledge of McGlade's work. None of them, however, worked or drew a dollar from the Street Department, as far as is known. Then the name of Chas. Derham was forged and he was an intimate friend of McGlade. They all protested their ignorance of what was going on. So they have turned against him.

That McGlade had one or more accomplices now appears certain. McGlade left on a Saturday and something wrong was then suspected. Nothing was said about it till the following Wednesday, when the Mayor was notified. In the meantime it was thought that McGlade had got out of the country, and it was not known till Thursday morning that he had stopped at Los Angeles and spent his money. These facts are understood to have a bearing on the expert's and Grand Jury investigation of the Street Department's books.

Again it was discovered that the monthly demands, which should have been signed by the Superintendent of Streets, were stamped with his name and signed by a deputy. It is believed by some officials, too, that disputed signatures will be pronounced by experts to be genuine. A comparison of the forgeries and genuine signatures shows the forgeries to have been so cleverly done as to defy detection. The Treasurer stated he would pay again on the forged signatures, which puzzled the Auditor, financial experts, the Treasurer and Supervisors' clerks.

MRS. BOTKIN'S NEW DEFENSE.

She Will Deny That She Ever Purchased Poison.

ADMITTED THE FACT ONLY TO HER HUSBAND.

DRUG CLERK GREY'S TESTIMONY AND THE REGISTER ARE IN THE WAY.

The Prisoner's Story About Bleaching Hats Would Not Stand the Test of Evidence From Experts.

The defense in the Botkin case has decided to deny that Mrs. Botkin purchased two ounces of arsenic at the Owl drug store on June 1, 1898. Indeed, the defense will deny that Mrs. Botkin bought any arsenic at all, and Frank Grey's story will be disputed in toto. Just how his testimony is to be disproved the attorneys refuse to disclose, but an important part of the defense will be in the absolute denial that Mrs. Botkin was the woman who purchased the poison on June 1st, giving her name, according to the drug store register, as "Mrs. Bothin," and her residence as the corner of Hyde and California streets.

The discovery of the record of the poison sale and the subsequent admissions and denials form an interesting chapter in the Botkin case. It was on September 4th that the significant entry was found in the Owl drug store's "poison book." Previous to this time Mrs. Botkin had stoutly denied that she had ever purchased any poison. The day the discovery was made Mr. Botkin called upon his wife, and, after leaving her, was interviewed by a reporter. To the newspaper man he said that Mrs. Botkin admitted that she made the purchase of arsenic at the Owl drug store. The fact, she said, had entirely escaped her memory. She went on to say, according to her husband, that she bought the poison at that particular store, because she knew the clerk, Frank S. Grey, and had been accustomed to trade with him when he was at the Baldwin pharmacy. She further said that she hoped Mr. Grey would recollect that she was accompanied by a lady friend at the time. She reiterated the statement that she made to Clerk Grey at the time—that she wished the arsenic for the purpose of bleaching straw hats. Mrs. Botkin further said that she could produce two reputable witnesses to prove that she used the poison for the purpose mentioned. The names were withheld.

Though Chief Lees questioned Mrs. Botkin long and severely on the question of whether she had purchased any poison or not, she absolutely refused to make any admission on the subject. Mr. Botkin said, however, that his wife had admitted to him with the utmost frankness that she had purchased the arsenic. She expressed the deepest regret that she had not recalled it and had not mentioned it to Chief Lees at the time she made her statement to him. She said that she chatted with Grey while the poison was being weighed and wrapped up and that between remarks about other things she told him that she wanted the arsenic for bleaching straw hats, and though he recommended substitutes she replied that she had used arsenic before and was familiar with its properties. Upon that the clerk sold her the poison without further parley. She gave her true name and address and the clerk wrote both down. As soon as the package was tied up, Mrs. Botkin and her husband—she and her friend—went straight to her apartment at the Hotel Victoria and there she prepared a solution of the arsenic and proceeded to bleach her hats. She further stated that she was watched during the bleaching process by two friends, both of whom would testify or make affidavits to the fact.

The day after these remarks were made by Mrs. Botkin to her husband, Frank Grey, the drug clerk, went to the City Prison to identify the prisoner, whom he had already correctly described. Mrs. Botkin did not know that he was coming, and in spite of the fact that she said she knew him well she did not recognize him when he entered the room. She looked up inquiringly at Detective Gibson as though she expected an introduction to the visitor. The introduction was not forthcoming, and Grey identified Mrs. Botkin positively as the woman who had purchased the poison. He knew her because George Beck, another clerk in the store, knew her personally and once spent an evening with Dunning in Mrs. Botkin's apartments, and returned full of tales of the orgies in the Geary-street apartment. Although Mrs. Botkin had told her husband that it would not be necessary for Clerk Grey to come and identify her, as she did not deny having bought the poison, an interview with her attorneys changed all that, and the next day Grey called and identified her.

Mr. Botkin did not admit the purchase of the poison to any one except her husband, and since he cannot be forced to testify against her, her admissions concerning the purchase of the poison will not hurt her case particularly. After Clerk Grey's discovery one of Mrs. Botkin's attorneys said that the fact was not new to him, as he had known all along that poison had been purchased by her. It was not until yesterday that it was announced that Mrs. Botkin would deny the poison purchase, and would assert positively that the clerk must be mistaken, since she purchased no poison on that date or any other.

What has led to this change of heart and the utter disappearance of the story of the bleached straw hats is not known. To her husband, Mrs. Botkin said that she returned home immediately from the drug store, made a solution of the arsenic in the way to which she was accustomed and then cleaned her hats. Now the hats, the arsenic and the two witnesses have disappeared. Whether it was found that the process of preparing the arsenic solution is a very difficult one, or whether the witnesses who are supposed to have been present at the rejuvenation of the hats are not forthcoming, is not known. At any rate, the attorneys for Mrs. Botkin do not consider it safe for her to admit that she purchased the poison on that day, considering especially the fact that the arsenic purchased was powdered and the poison found in the candy was also pulverized or caked, but still amorphous and not in crystals.

It is not known what witnesses will be introduced by the defense to disprove the story of Clerk Grey. It is presumed that there will be an attempt to show that the poison was purchased by some one else, who gave a name similar to Mrs. Botkin's and an address identical with hers in order to throw suspicion upon Mrs. Botkin. It is argued by the defense that it is absurd to suppose that a woman contemplating murder would purchase the poison at a store at which she was known and in such a peculiarly open way. It is possible also that the defense found the bleaching theory impossible to maintain and so decided to abandon it early and brave out the matter on other lines.

Prominent chemists and manufacturers of straw goods in San Francisco say Mrs. Botkin's statement that she bought the arsenic to bleach a straw hat is an absurdity.

Thomas Price, analytical chemist, said: "If Mrs. Botkin can bleach a straw hat with arsenic she is in possession of a secret that no practical chemist on earth knows. Arsenic is not a bleacher; it is impossible, from the very nature of arsenic, to bleach a hat with it."

Dr. C. B. Teubner of G. Leipnitz & Co., chemists and druggists, said: "Mrs. Botkin's story is the veriest nonsense. Arsenic has only the feeblest bleaching properties, and it would be utterly impracticable to use it for bleaching straw. It might be employed by adding another acid, say sulphuric acid, or by applying extreme heat, but the conditions attending such employment would be absolutely beyond Mrs. Botkin's power to create. She might as well talk of bleaching her hat with wood as with arsenic. A bleaching agent acts by decomposing the pigment, and the active part of this agent is nascent oxygen. Sulphurous acid, oxalic acid and peroxide of hydrogen are the usual bleaching agents. Arsenic is sometimes used to clarify the complexion, but in that instance it is not a bleacher; it acts by destroying the red corpuscles in the blood."

Henry L. King, who has been in the business of manufacturing straw goods for forty years, said: "I never heard of arsenic as a bleacher, and if it had ever been employed for the purpose I would know it."

Mrs. King, who is associated with her husband in business, said: "When I read Mrs. Botkin's explanation of why she bought the arsenic I said it was absurd."

K. M. Sheridan, proprietor of the Pacific Straw Works, said: "I never heard of arsenic as a bleaching agent in the hat business. I use oxalic acid to bleach with. Some hatters use sugar of lead."

David C. Braid Jr., proprietor of the Atlantic Straw Works, said, "Arsenic is not used in bleaching straw hats. I use oxalic acid altogether, and ninety-nine druggists out of a hundred would tell a woman who wanted to buy arsenic to bleach a hat with that she didn't know what she was talking about."

At the office of the Excelsior Straw Works the statement was vouchsafed that arsenic was unknown as a bleaching agent.

HE DESIRES TO SAVE MONEY IN THE TRIAL OF MRS. BOTKIN.

The writ of prohibition sued out yesterday in the Supreme Court by W. L. Harper, a public-spirited citizen who is alarmed at the probable cost and possible futility of the trial of Mrs. Cordelia Botkin, has been productive of a broad grin, at least among the legal fraternity. Mr. Harper is a collector of bad debts and has an office in the "Call" Building—or rather a desk in the joint waiting-room of two or three attorneys, one of whom is Louis P. Boardman, the attorney in the prohibition "proceedings." Mr. Harper ingenuously remarked that he heard the attorneys discussing the probable cost of the Botkin trial and the extreme likelihood of the defense raising the question of jurisdiction after all the money had been expended, and he as a taxpayer had suffered to the extent of one-hundredth of 1 per cent by the expenditure. After reflecting upon the devious ways of the law he consulted I. J. Truman and Asa R. Wells, office-holders-elect. Both gentlemen shook their heads and declared it should not be; and then the call was made for some man, to step into the breach and stop the fearful waste of public moneys. The Arnold Winkelried was not wanting, and so Mr. Harper, with the aid of Louis P. Boardman, the astute young lawyer who made a trip to Washington, D. C., and obtained a modicum of fame in the Durrant case, and further helped by the counsels of a newspaper reporter, compiled the petition and the copy for the story which was published six-fold in two columns of a morning paper.

George Knight's only objection to the application for the writ of prohibition is based on the possibility that people may think he was interested in it and infer that he felt anxious for his client's chances on any but technical grounds.

"This writ is farcical," said he. "As well serve a writ on the Governor-elect to compel him to file a bill of particulars as to his actions in the coming four years of his term of office. I do not know whether the Supreme Court will put the document in the waste-paper basket or return it in an envelope to Mr. Harper. Mr. Boardman and his obliging citizen-debt-collector may perhaps break into the prosecution, but they shall not burglarize the defense."

The petition for the issuance of the writ recites the proceedings had in the case thus far, including the order of court for the expenditure of $3,000 to bring witnesses from Delaware, and alleges that before a conclusion can be reached something like $20,000 of public moneys will have been expended. The petitioner sets forth that he is a taxpayer of the city and county of San Francisco, and alleges that the crime with which Mrs. Botkin is charged was, if committed at all by her, committed in the State of Delaware and not in this State; hence he declares that the courts of no county in California can have jurisdiction of her case.

In the points and authorities presented by Attorney Louis P. Boardman there is a pricking of the claim on which the prosecution is said to rest its argument that the court has jurisdiction. Section 27 of the Penal Code in reciting who may be arrested says:

"Any person or persons who commit wholly or in part any crime in this State."

This, Mr. Boardman alleges, is being read by the attorneys for the prosecution and many others as though it were worded:

"Any person or persons who commit any crime wholly or in part in this city."

Mr. Boardman did not consult Mr. Knight "wholly or in part" in the case or in any other fashion. He believes the Supreme Court will grant the writ.

MRS. BOTKIN POSING IN THE COUNTY JAIL.

MERELY SEEKING NOTORIETY.

Attorney and Bill Collector Trying to Break Into the Botkin Case.

The attempt of a young attorney to get into the glare of notoriety caused a slight ripple yesterday on the surface of the Botkin case. The prosecution has no use for the services of the young man, the defense scorns his assistance and both sides confidently predict that the Supreme Court will frown on what they call his unwarranted interference in a case with which he has no concern. Louis P. Boardman, who broke into the Durrant case, is the attorney who seeks to participate in the big case now on trial, and his chosen mode of entry is through a writ of prohibition. The application for such a writ was drawn up by Boardman and presented to the Supreme Court in the name of W. L. Harper, a bill collector, whose office address is the same as that of his attorney.

Harper, in the role of a citizen and taxpayer, alleges that the city and county has no jurisdiction in the Botkin case, for the reason that the crime charged was committed in Kent county, Delaware. He asserts that the expenditure of $3000 for the transportation and maintenance of Delaware witnesses was illegal and that further proceedings will involve the wrongful expenditure of a large sum of money. It is contended that any judgment rendered would be null and void. Harper asks for an alternative writ of prohibition commanding the Superior Court and Judge Carroll Cook to desist from proceeding with the trial until further order from the Supreme Court, and that they show cause why they should not be absolutely restrained from going on with the trial.

It is contended by Harper that he is acting for a number of business men, who object to the city and county being put to a great expense before the question of jurisdiction has been decided. The petition is now in the hands of Chief Justice Beatty and will probably be passed upon Monday morning.

Assistant District Attorney Hosmer said yesterday: "The application for a writ of prohibition is causing the prosecution no alarm. I have no doubt that it will be denied. I cannot see how such a writ can come in at this time. The code says a writ of prohibition is to issue only when there is no plain, speedy and adequate remedy at law, and that it must be applied for by a party beneficially interested. If the parties seeking this writ desired to save expense, why did they not act when Mrs. Botkin was arraigned and it was known that witnesses were to be brought from Delaware? Why did they wait until the prosecution's case had been outlined in an opening statement?"

Chief of Police Lees expressed himself vigorously. "This is a job on the part of the defense," he said. "They seek to wear out the prosecution. If the writ were granted, the case might be tied up for several months. Our Delaware witnesses would grow weary and return home. Some of them, thinking we were a lot of fakers, might refuse to come here when the trial was resumed, and we could not compel their attendance. As to the expenditure of the city and county money, the utmost economy is being observed, and there is an understanding that the State is to reimburse the city and county. If the applicants for a writ of prohibition are acting for the people, why did they not consult with either the District Attorney or the Attorney-General? We tried to have the question of jurisdiction determined before proceeding to trial, and failed. The present application will meet with the same fate."

The prosecution called attention to the case of Fitch against the San Francisco Board of Supervisors, in which the Supreme Court declared that Fitch, acting as a ratepayer, was not an interested party. Under that ruling Harper is not an interested party and therefore can hardly hope to secure a writ of prohibition.

The defense talked even less kindly of the interveners.

"I never heard of such a thing," said George A. Knight, chief counsel for Mrs. Botkin. "It is absurd. There is no law for such a proceeding. It is an outrage, and an attorney who has a regard for his standing should not do such a thing. The defense has nothing whatever to do with the application. It is a useless procedure and I trust that the petition will be thrown out of court."

EXPERT TESTIMONY AGAINST BECKER.

Theodore Kytka Identifies Handwriting on the Raised Check as That of the Notorious Forger.

All the testimony has been presented in the Becker and Creegan case, and the prosecution is confident that the noted forgers will be convicted.

The important witness put on the stand yesterday was Theodore Kytka, the handwriting expert, who testified that the forged writing on the raised check was the work of Becker. He based this conclusion on a minute comparison with known writing of the forger. The defense made no effort to combat any testimony except that of Kytka, and then it was content with a brief attack on the value of expert testimony.

Judge Wallace set the argument for November 10th, with the understanding that only one attorney speak for each side and that the time be limited to two hours for each argument.

FINDLEY ROBBED HIS COUNTY.

Short in His Accounts for a Large Amount.

Stole Anywhere From Fifteen to Fifty Thousand.

HIS SAFE IS OPENED.

Five Hundred and Odd Dollars All It Contained.

OFFICERS IN THE DARK.

Have No Clew to His Whereabouts—Has Had a Week's Start.

Tax and License Collector Samuel M. Findley of San Luis Obispo, whose disappearance was exclusively chronicled in "The Examiner," is a defaulter and a fugitive from justice. The amount of his embezzlement is not definitely known. On forcing his safe it was ascertained that he was short at least eleven thousand dollars, but a hasty examination of the records by the County Clerk indicates that he may have stolen as much as $50,000. No clew as to the whereabouts of the missing official has been discovered. It is now nine days since he took his departure from the county seat.

SAN LUIS OBISPO, November 28.—Samuel M. Findley, the Tax and License Collector of San Luis Obispo county, is, upon the face of his own books, a defaulter in the sum of more than $11,000, and the amount may, and very likely will, reach a sum much larger, $50,000 being the extreme figure. That he is an absconder and a fugitive from justice there can now be no doubt. To-day's developments in the case are such as to leave no question of his guilt.

As stated in these dispatches yesterday, much depended upon the opening of the safe in Findley's office. If there should be found therein sufficient money to answer the demands of his receipt stubs, then there might be a possibility that Mr. Findley was an honest man. But the safe was empty.

At an early hour this morning, Chairman F. C. Mitchell of the Board of Supervisors, District Attorney F. A. Dorn and Harry Maxwell, special agent of the Fidelity and Deposit Company, undertook the difficult task of forcing the large safe in the Tax Collector's office. There was no way of getting into the safe except by cutting, and it took several hours. Finally the hinges were turned and the big door was pried open. In the cash box the searchers found the sum of $514.07. There was $400 in gold and the rest was in silver, checks and subsidiary coin.

Harry Maxwell, the special agent of the Fidelity and Deposit Company, spent the afternoon to-day checking over Findley's tax stubs in an endeavor to find the amount of the shortage. On November 10th, Findley deposited with the County Treasurer about $11,000. On the 15th he deposited $5,000, and on the day before his departure he placed $[illegible] in the Treasurer's vaults. This all amounted to about $19,5[illegible]. Deducting this amount from the sum total of the stubs on Findley's file he should have had in his safe the sum of $11,[illegible]. The amount actually found there was $514.07. This leaves a shortage on the face of Findley's own accounts of $11,3[illegible].

The full amount cannot be ascertained until the books have been thoroughly gone over and probably not then. In the Tax Collector's office three cash books were kept, one by Deputy Nellie Nesbitt, one by Deputy [illegible] Scott and the other by Mr. Findley. The two deputies kept the stubs for their collections on separate [illegible] and Mr. Findley [illegible] [illegible] the deputies [illegible] cash and [illegible] stubs which [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Findley's file [illegible]

Mr. Maxwell says: "When I was here on November 1[illegible] Findley, in the presence of his deputies, [illegible] that he would [illegible] day, [illegible] County Treasurer the amount of his collections. To show how well he kept his agreement, he made only three deposits."

"The Examiner" correspondent to-day held by telephone an interview with Charles Palmer of San Miguel, who was reported to have rode with Findley to San Francisco. A new phase was brought out, and it may throw some further light on the absconder's movements. Palmer said:

"I cannot say that Findley went all the way to San Francisco. I talked with him on the train and asked him where he was going. He said that everything was very quiet with him, and as he had little to do he was going to San Francisco to spend a vacation of a few days. When the train arrived at Fourth-street station, San Jose, I alighted. Findley repeated that he was going to San Francisco. I did not see him get off the train, but he might have alighted at the central depot at San Jose and taken the Niles train to catch either a Sacramento train east-bound or a south-bound train on the Valley road."

When Findley purchased his valises here he also secured, beside underclothing, a suit of clothes, several white shirts, handkerchiefs and other apparel. He was asked by the merchant what he intended to do with the valises. He said he would put his license books in one and carry his collections in the other. As a matter of fact, he did not take the license books with him, but left them locked in his safe, and they were not discovered until it was opened to-day. This fact, together with his statement on the train that there was no work in his office, tends further to show the guilty intent in his departure.

The Board of Supervisors met in special session at 4 o'clock in this city to-day. The purpose of the meeting as set forth in the call, signed by Supervisors F. C. Mitchell, P. R. Willot, J. B. Kesler, F. Moore and F. H. Smith, was "to inquire into the official conduct of S. M. Findley, to investigate the business and affairs of his office, to appoint and employ experts, to provide ways and means of conducting the office and to appoint a Tax Collector to fill the vacancy caused by said Findley's ceasing to be an inhabitant of this county and State."

A lively session of the board was held, Deputy Nellie Nesbitt and Harry Maxwell being examined. Mr. Maxwell declared positively that Findley is a defaulter in the minimum amount, as shown by his own accounts, for more than $11,400.

Supervisor Willot said: "It has now come under my personal knowledge that, while out ostensibly collecting licenses, Findley has been collecting taxes, which I have no doubt he did not turn in."

Mr. Maxwell said that he would place the probable range of Findley's defalcations at from $15,000 to $50,000. The gentleman stated that Findley could easily while out license collecting, on the plea of accommodation, have taken out the tax bills of heavy and prompt taxpayers, collected the same, mailed the receipts and kept the money. Findley also attended to all the mail, and could have pocketed large amounts on mailed checks.

Miss Nesbitt said that experts could not work for three weeks, as the work is far behind.

The board was in a quandary as to an appointment and adjourned to look over Findley's books.

At the evening session of the Board more startling figures than those of the day were brought out by County Clerk Whicher, who, during the interim occurring between the two meetings, had been industriously at work in the Tax Collector's office. Mr. Whicher figures that Findley is fully $50,000 short in his accounts. A portion of his figures are comparative, but they seem conservative. After a careful examination he credits Findley with $80,000. Now the amount of the tax rolls charged last year was $231,807.88, and on the first half $166,590.39 was paid at a like date with this. Mr. Whicher says that at a most conservative estimate $130,000 should be paid on the first half this year. There being only $80,000 credits, leaves Findley, on these figures, $50,000 in arrears.

The Supervisors appointed an expert to thoroughly investigate Findley's accounts.

A REPROACH ON CALIFORNIA JUSTICE.

The trial of Mrs. Botkin will be one of the celebrated cases of the decade, and will turn the attention of the whole country to our methods of administering justice in California. The murder, by whomsoever committed, was one of the most extraordinary in the history of crime, and was entirely novel in conception; the wicked product of a depraved imagination. Under all circumstances, poisoning is the most hideous and treacherous of crimes, but in the present case the poisoner has discovered a means of immeasurably widening the sphere of danger.

We have no desire to condemn anybody in advance of trial, or forestall the verdict of the jury, but it is proper to say that California rests under the imputation that justice cannot be done where a woman is concerned, and that female murderers almost invariably go scot free. Now, if a woman is guilty—we do not say that Mrs. Botkin is guilty—she should be punished to the full measure of her crime. This reproach on California justice must not continue to be justified, and the efforts of the prosecution to find the criminal should be unremitting and thorough. If that course is followed, we feel certain that the jury will do its duty.

THE FAIR ESTATE.

Mrs Craven of Forged Pencil Deed Fame, Again Seeking to Get Money Out of the Estate. Effectually Squelched By Judge Slack, at this Late Day She Appears as the Bogus Widow. A Plot to Extort.

The time will come when justice will not be trifled with, and forgers and perjurers will get their just deserts in the State's Prison. It is becoming quite of frequent occurrence that when a wealthy man, widower or bachelor, dies for some female to bob up and declare herself to be the widow of deceased, yet in every case the striking fact is proved that no legal evidence of marriage existed as every legitimate married woman has. The honest, pure matron has her marriage license, can tell when and where she was married, and the record will prove it. The pure woman who loves honor and decency never is found after a rich man's death trying to extort money from his estate on the subterfuge that she is his widow by a forged contract or otherwise. Bold, bare-faced creatures care not for the feelings of the living or the memory of the dead so long as there is a chance to get money. Such vultures are always in evidence.

The latest attempt of Mrs. Craven to get $240,000 out of the Fair estate is a bold move and will not work. It will be remembered that Mrs. Craven, under the so called pencil deed, tried to obtain possession of the property of the estate at Sansome and Pine, which resulted in a lengthy trial in the superior court. The Judge, C. W. Slack, decided that the pencil deed was a rank forgery and that the notary had committed perjury. We believe the notary whose signature appeared on the acknowledgement of the deed was indicted by the grand jury some time previous to that trial. It is in evidence that during the trial of the former case Mrs. Craven advanced her claim as the widow of James G. Fair and produced an alleged marriage contract that purported to be acknowledged before a deaf notary, and Judge Slack took no stock in it. In his conclusions he saw forgery and perjury had been committed. A conspiracy existed to extort money from the estate. The case was a vile plot at best and the decision of the impartial and honorable judge was just. There was no appeal and her attorneys let the judgment stand. Now the audacity of Mrs. Craven to set herself up as the widow by contract and to ask for $5,000 per month from the estate, the order to date from Senator Fair's death, is without parallel. It's a fraud. Mrs. Craven seeks evidently to create complications by this suit, hoping that the heirs of the Fair estate will present her with a sum of money so as to enable an early distribution of the estate. But we are certain she reckons without her hosts. The heirs of the estate look upon her as a fraud. She is not the widow of the late James G. Fair, and has no claims whatever on the estate.

The grand jury should pay attention to this bogus widow and scrutinize that contract of marriage which Judge Slack threw out of court. The pencil deed forgery should not be lost sight of. If the pencil deed was a forgery the marriage contract is a forgery, for the late Senator Fair was far too shrewd a man in his life time to place such a weapon of danger, damage and destruction in the hands of any woman as a marriage contract with himself as one of the principals. Matrimony is honorable, hence if he had desired to have any woman bear his name he would have published it to the world and have it gone on record. The effrontery in which the ex-school principal glaringly takes a new tack to get money out of the estate is astounding.

KARL BECKER RECEIVES HIS SEVEN YEARS.

Judge Wallace Follows the Wishes of Counsel.

His Honor Gave the Old Forger a Momentary Scare.

Talked as Though He Would Pass a Heavier Sentence.

Defended His Policy of Severity as a Deterrent to Crime

Painter M. J. Gallagher Sent to San Quentin for Four Years for Grand Larceny

Karl Becker received his expected sentence of seven years from Judge Wallace this morning. The Prince of Forgers had an uncomfortable quarter of an hour before sentence was pronounced, for from the remarks made by the Court it looked as though his Honor would decline to follow the suggestion of the attorneys in respect to the punishment and would inflict the maximum penalty of fourteen years. In the end, however, Judge Wallace decided not to set up his individual opinion against that reached by both prosecution and defense, and so Becker received the light sentence held out to him as an inducement to plead guilty.

The old man is manifestly breaking up. As he sat beside his counsel in court this morning it was noticed that his once healthy countenance was devoid of even a vestige of color. Deep furrows lined his brows, his cheeks were hollow and his once clear, bright eyes were dull and drawn. He was palpably nervous, too. The horrors of solitary confinement had told upon him, indeed. So long as he had Creegan for a companion in the County Jail, just so long the aged forger held out in defiance of the enemy. But, on Monday week last, when Becker saw Creegan leave his side to share a comfortable abode with Dean, then the old man realized that he had been deserted, that he had been left to fight his weary battle alone. It was too much for him; the man's iron nerve gave way, and when he had suffered the tortures of solitude for one or two nights, with no companion save the thoughts of his wrecked life, he was ready and willing enough to listen to the overtures made him.

"I could not stand it," he explained. "I was going crazy."

He had nothing to say when asked by the Court to show cause why judgment should not be pronounced upon him. He stood in respectful attitude while Judge Wallace glided briefly over the history of his crime, and the proceedings in court from the time of the filing of the Grand Jury indictment in May, 1896.

"The prosecution and defense have come together in this case," said Judge Wallace, "and have suggested seven years as a fitting punishment. Of course I'm not bound by any such agreement. The Bankers' Association, too, represented by counsel here, has asked for this sentence. But I cannot regard the Bankers' Association as the prosecutor here. It is the State, and the State only, that prosecutes."

Judge Wallace spoke of the annoyance that it gave him to pass sentence upon his fellow man. Then came Becker's bad time. Judge Wallace said that he had always held the idea, and held it still, that when men of the [illegible] criminal class came up before him it was his duty to impose such a sentence as would insure the community against an early repetition of the offense.

"The object of a criminal [illegible] is to repress crime [illegible] [illegible] from its commission. [illegible] have been severe in [illegible] think justly so. There is no doubt a large list of men who have been sent [illegible]

[illegible]

Pages 13 to 24. — The [masthead partly covered] — Pages 13 to 24.

SAN FRANCISCO, [covered] DECEMBER 11, 1898.

HIS PEN MADE AN[covered] MADE HIS FORTUNE.

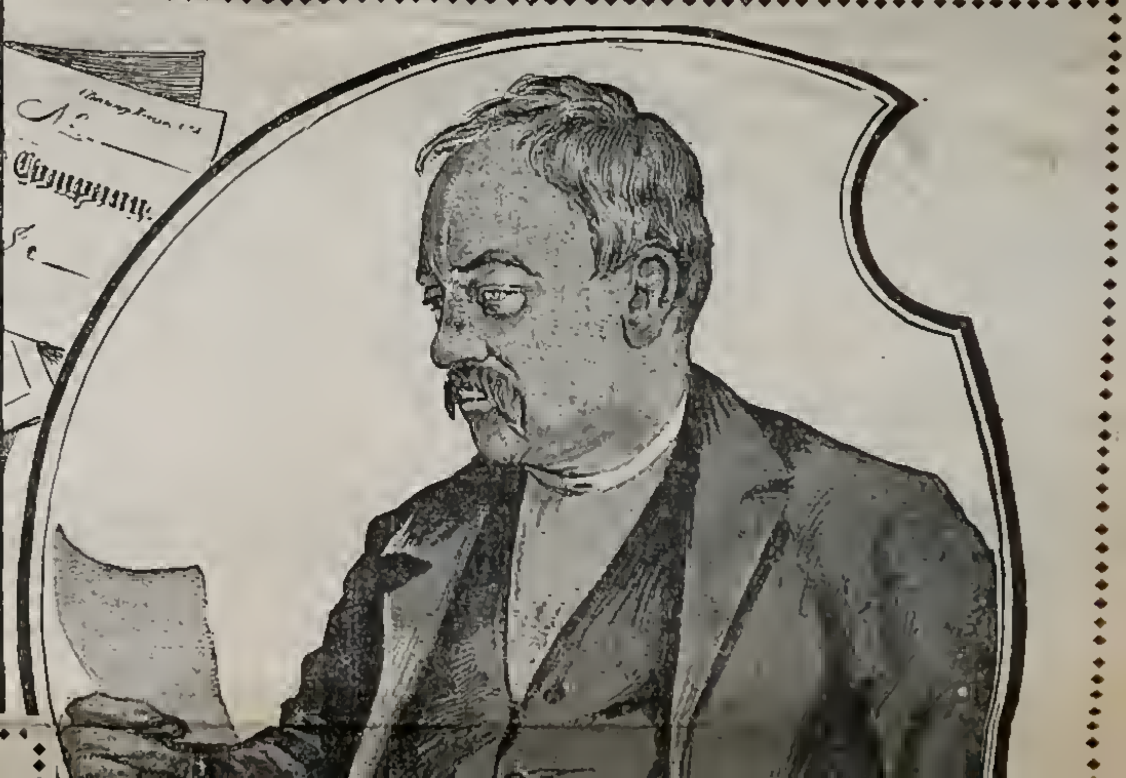
Canadian-Pacific Railway Co.'s Royal Mail Steamship Line.
JAPAN AND CHINA.
And Canadian-Australian Royal Mail Steamship Company's Line.
Compagnie Generale Transatlantique.

THE HAND AND MAGIC BRUSH

REVELATIONS BY CHARLES BECKER, PRINCE OF FORGERS.

Personal Story of Charles Becker, the Most Skillful Forger of the Century.

He Operated on Two Continents and the Cunning of His Hand Was Feared Everywhere.



Pages 13 to 24.— EDITORIAL SECTION —Pages 13 to 24.

SAN FRANCISCO DECEMBER 11, 1898.

HIS PEN MADE AN[redacted]MADE HIS FORTUNE.

[redacted]rles Becker, the [redacted]orger of [redacted]ry, [redacted]nents and the Cun- [redacted]Was Feared [redacted]re, is shown in my penmanship; but no touch can be lighter than mine in engraving or painting in a signature. You see, a sable brush, or even a camel's-hair brush, is very different from a pen, and when I take up a brush I seem to feel that difference clear to my finger tips."

[redacted]

HIS PEN MADE AND UNMADE HIS FORTUNE.

(Continued From Page Thirteen.)

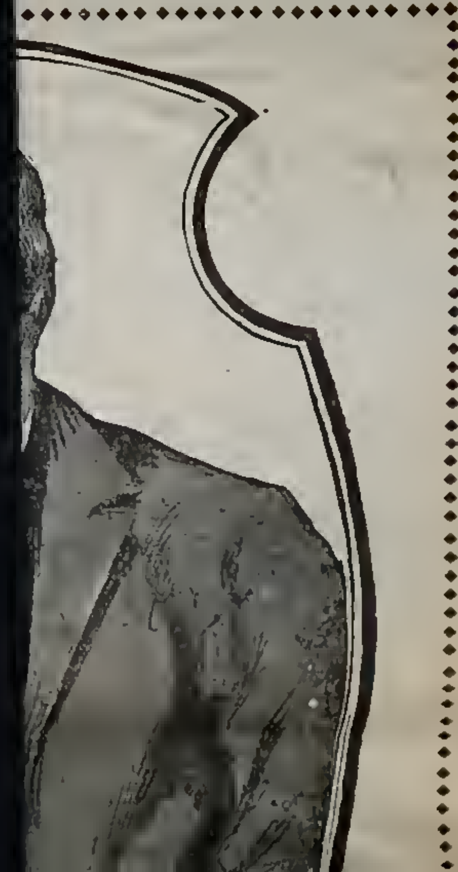
With a sneer Becker referred to a so-called safety device used by some bankers who stamp over the figures in a draft or check with a sort of file-like appliance, abrading the paper so that it would seem difficult to make a change. "All that is necessary for a good workman to do if he wishes to alter the figures is to press the notches down with his thumb nail, and then he can change things to suit himself," said Becker. "He wouldn't use a steel eraser or a pen, of course, but with a little acid and a soft brush he would touch the paper gently, using an ordinary magnifying glass in order to avoid the jagged lines cut by the die. After necessary changes have been made on the face of the paper those harmless little indentations may be restored by the use of an ordinary match cut with a jackknife so that the end would look like a little pyramid. That would be all that would be needed, for the paying teller, seeing the indentations all right, would usually take it for granted that the paper was genuine. If he tried to look at it through his microscope the person who laid it down would have to get out as soon as possible."

Not Troubled by Greed.

Excessive greed for gain has never seemed to be Becker's besetting sin. If the record of his doings has been correctly stated, for he has on occasion turned a trick merely to accommodate a friend, as he related yesterday. "One of my friends had been monkeying with a piece of paper of his own. He had obtained a certificate of deposit that represented more than he could afford to lose, yet he thought to make it double. By the clumsy use of acid while they were trying to raise it the paper was absolutely ruined. They had made a good copy, but had not inserted the amount or the signature when another drop of acid burned a hole in the upper corner of the copy near the date. Then they asked me for advice. It looked as if luck was against them, so I advised them to give up the plan to do anything further, but to be satisfied to get back the original amount. The rest was easy sailing, for I copied the cashier's name and painted in the same figures that appeared in the original; but that acid mark on the copy was still in the way, so I held the paper over a candle and burned that part of the date line right off. When they took the mutilated copy to the bank, pretending that it had met with an accident, and asked for a new certificate, the cashier laughed and said it was lucky his signature had not been obliterated, for in that event they might have been compelled to file a bond in order to get their money. He made out a new certified check and destroyed our copy. My friend thought it was rather clever to fool a man on his own signature. Well, there was nothing actually wrong in that, for only the amount honestly due was collected, and I was happy to think that I was able to serve my friend without injuring any one else. Such chances don't come every day."

Story of the Crime.

The forgery of which Becker stands self-convicted was a hazardous as well as an expensive undertaking. According to the story of the detectives, the capital for the job was supplied by James Creegan, who owns about $50,000 worth of real estate in New York city. A. H. Dean, alias Seavers, was in the scheme, and a man called McCosker, alias McClusky, had something to do with it. Dean came to San Francisco and opened an account with the Nevada Bank. He had offices in one of the big buildings in the business center of the city



REVEL[redacted]

Charles Becker's conf[redacted] all over the world. He has [redacted]

REVELATIONS BY C[redacted]

Charles Becker's confession to the crime of forgery w[redacted] all over the world. He has traveled much, and wherever he[redacted] from police authorities Becker is credited with having floated[redacted]

CHARLES BECKER, the guest of the American Bankers' Association, the ward of the associated capital of the United States, whose future welfare is to be guarded and insured by the commercial trusts and syndicates of the country, spent a quiet day at the County Jail yesterday. He was preparing for the journey to the State prison, which he is soon to take, but he is not without hope of gentle treatment, with a reasonable expectation of a pardon after serving a part of his term, since he has manifested his contrition and has pledged his word of honor to abandon the making and uttering of forged paper.

Becker is a remarkable man, for he is the most skillful forger of the age, and therefore has so completely commanded the consideration of the bankers that they are determined never again to let him be placed in such a position that he may be tempted to recur to the employment of his consummate skill in creating spurious checks and drafts.

Because of his success in terrorizing the commercial interests of the nation by his clever and all but undetectable ——, Becker has been assured of light punishment for the crime to which he has pleaded guilty. His wife has been sent for in order that she may comfort his days of imprisonment by dwelling near him, and her traveling expenses, as well as the cost of her support during his incarceration, will be provided for by some person other than Becker himself. The identity of this good Samaritan has not been disclosed, and Becker is too modest to make the revelation. A hint of where the funds came from may be found, however, in the suggestion that after Becker gets clear of the State prison he is to be placed in such a position that he will be sure of a comfortable livelihood for the remainder of his life, provided he keeps his agreement to give up his career as the premier forger of the century.

Bankers Will Help Him.

With many it is held to be a Christian duty to assist ex-convicts who manifest a disposition to lead a better life, and no one can censure the bankers if they extend a helping hand to one who proclaims his desire to reform and who promises to sin no more in this particular way. This is all the more praiseworthy, considering the intimate business relations that for years have existed between Becker and his new-found friends. Involuntary as those relations may have been on the part of the bankers, they were nevertheless of a substantial nature, for Becker declares that many of his cleverest products have so passed muster that he never heard of any complaints concerning them, and that neither he nor, so far as he knew, anybody else had been arrested for them. He likes to think that his work is so perfect that the victims give up in despair of discovering the real culprit.

No wonder that Becker's companions in jail look up to him as a superior being, and that he has the best that the prison can afford, for a man who is worthy of the confidence of so many eminent financiers and who is in a position to command a pension for merely agreeing not to ply his dangerous craft after he has served his term is not to be met with every day, out of jail or in.

The first intimation of any kind of agreement between Becker and his former prosecutors was given by Attorney Henry Ach the morning that Becker pleaded guilty to a charge of forgery. Mr. Ach said that as special counsel for the prosecution representing the American Bankers' Association, he was willing to have a light sentence imposed if Becker would consent to a withdrawal of the record of prior convictions, and that he and Chief of Police Lees were satisfied that the[redacted] again have cause to[redacted] through any act on Be[redacted] believed he would kee[redacted] up the career that has[redacted] miliar to all whose dut[redacted] deception in commercia[redacted]

"It is true that I[redacted] give up my forme[redacted] former methods of[redacted] said Becker to an[redacted] porter. "My intent[redacted] my time in the Stat[redacted] go into some quie[redacted] and behave myself[redacted] should during the[redacted] that are allotted[redacted] business settles it[redacted] nothing in this ki[redacted] matter how succe[redacted] man may be, and[redacted] proves what I say,[redacted] what I have bee[redacted] seems to me, now[redacted] thinking over the[redacted] could have earne[redacted] more by devoting[redacted] gitimate business.[redacted] see that the man w[redacted] —that is, the one[redacted] paper—generally c[redacted] little end of the b[redacted] does the work do[redacted] per. I never laid[redacted] my life, and it co[redacted] get that part of[redacted] handled. For fu[redacted] $8,000 out of that[redacted] the New York Li[redacted] pany. I was entit[redacted] least, but I learne[redacted] over that the oth[redacted] up between them,[redacted] that it went for th[redacted] You would be surp[redacted] how little I got o[redacted] check that was pl[redacted] vada Bank. I'll no[redacted] some day I may fe[redacted] some particulars[redacted]

"I haven't made u[redacted] shall settle down af[redacted] but hard work will b[redacted] with me by that time[redacted] is to start a little sta[redacted] thing of that kind, and[redacted] that nobody shall ha[redacted] reason to doubt my c[redacted] My years of experience[redacted] to make checks that i[redacted] bring the money over[redacted] be strange if I hadn't a[redacted] ed how to prevent th[redacted] Now, I pretend to k[redacted] and my plan is so sim[redacted] bankers of this count[redacted] on to it long ago, but[redacted] I tell them about it I[redacted] be willing to do some[redacted] my intention to let the[redacted] about this plan for pr[redacted] of checks, without as[redacted] advance. They will so[redacted] them, and I suppose[redacted] kindly disposed to me[redacted] show a disposition to as[redacted] fully accept their help[redacted] for myself and wife."

Loves th[redacted]

At the mention of his[redacted] the great tenderness[redacted] woman who has stood[redacted] his trials. "She is a[redacted] faithful and true, and c[redacted] I can give her," said[redacted] here during my first i[redacted] remained if we had no[redacted] do better for both of us[redacted] former home in New Y[redacted] married twenty-seven y[redacted] very happy together[redacted] anniversary occurred w[redacted] Jail awaiting my case[redacted] ago. One night my w[redacted]

[redacted] owns about $50,000 worth of real estate in New York city. A. H. Dean, alias Seavers, was in the scheme, and a man called McCosker, alias McClusky, had something to do with it. Dean came to San Francisco and opened an account with the Nevada Bank. He had offices in one of the big buildings in the business center of the city and seemed to be a speculator of considerable means, his deposits fluctuating as he drew out or deposited money. One day he went to Woodland in this State and there bought a draft on the Crocker-Woolworth Bank for $12. Returning to this city he delivered the draft to Creegan, who handed it to Becker, and the latter did the work of raising the figures to $22,000.

When Dean again obtained possession of the check he went to the Nevada Bank and asked to have that amount placed to his credit. The draft was passed through the Clearing-house in the usual way, was honored by the Crocker-Woolworth, and Dean's account was credited with the sum called for. Nearly two weeks later Dean appeared in the bank and presented his check for $20,000, having in the mean time drawn out some small sums to keep his account looking as if it were "alive." There was no question about his identity, and as he apparently had more than enough on deposit to cover his demand the gold was counted out to him and he carried it away. Creegan and McCosker were waiting with a carriage near at hand and the three went to Oakland, where a partial distribution was made, Becker, it seems, receiving a very small dividend. They all got away, but Dean and McCosker were caught in Minnesota and brought back. Dean offered to turn State's evidence in order to avoid heavy punishment, and as Becker was considered the most dangerous of the quartet Dean's offer was accepted. McCosker was tried and the evidence was declared insufficient as to his connection with the crime.

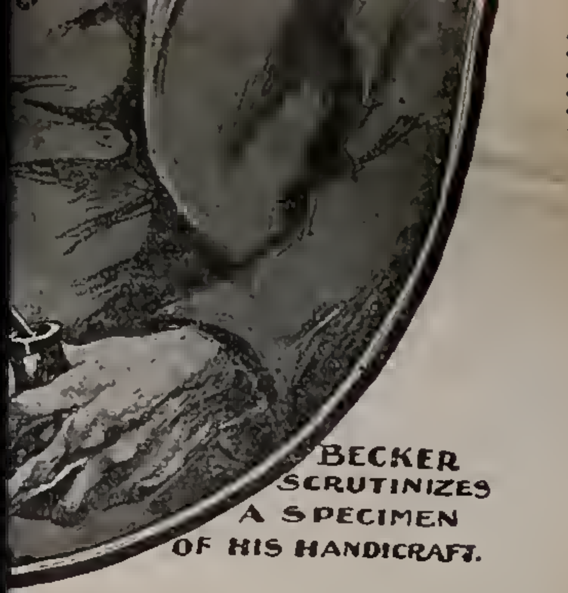
The Game of Hide and Seek.

Then began a game of hide and seek with Becker and Creegan. They were apprehended just as they were about to start for Mexico, having actually purchased their tickets for that sunny clime. Because they were paying bills in $20 gold pieces minted at San Francisco while everybody around them used nothing but currency they fell under suspicion, and this actually was the clew that led to their arrest. On their return to this city Becker and Creegan were tried and convicted, but were granted a new trial because of a technical flaw in the proceedings. Before a jury could be selected for the second trial Creegan offered to join Dean in making a confession, Becker being still the main point of attack on the part of Attorney Henry Ach, who was the representative of the American Bankers' Association in the prosecution. Beleaguered thus on all sides by those who were his confederates in the crime, Becker still maintained a bold and defiant attitude, for he did not believe they could establish his guilt by the testimony of accomplices to the satisfaction of twelve jurors when he would make it appear that the one who got the least from the transaction was likely to be the most severely punished, and having received an intimation that a plea of guilty and a promise of reform on his part would bring a light sentence and an assurance of comfort hereafter, he readily decided to throw himself on the mercy of the court.

Becker, Dean and Creegan are still in jail. Becker has been sentenced by Judge Wallace to serve seven years in the State Prison, which by good conduct may be reduced to four years and nine months. Creegan is to be sentenced to two or three years next week, and Dean is to be released. McCosker was let go as soon as the jury failed to convict, but he has been available as a witness against his colleagues at both trials.

"The details of Becker's compact with the Bankers' Association have not been given to me, but I suppose they are satisfactory to both sides," said Detective Ben Bohen of the District Attorney's office. "But there is one thing I want to say for Karl Becker, and that is that I have implicit faith in his keeping his contract. Whatever he promises he will carry out. On that I am willing to stake whatever reputation I may have as a judge of human nature."

[redacted]



BECKER SCRUTINIZES A SPECIMEN OF HIS HANDICRAFT.

[redacted]sing a check the operator [redacted]peculiarities to crop out. [redacted] for it is like painting [redacted] [redacted]roduce some of your own [redacted]trait. But I haven't any- [redacted] experts, for they have a [redacted]g, I suppose, and they are [redacted]sidered by the average [redacted] all by the judges. I look [redacted]t as I do on spiritualists [redacted]eep themselves before the [redacted] their own horns."

[redacted]ised the Check.

[redacted] check was drawn in [redacted] the amount perforated in [redacted]12$," the dollar mark be- [redacted]h side of the figures [redacted]he original perforations [redacted]rforations, carefully put- [redacted]k at the end in the usual [redacted]forations were closed by [redacted] surfaces of these minute [redacted]ed to correspond with the [redacted]pe of the paper. So per- [redacted]pulation that it was not [redacted] half-dozen or more men [redacted]eck, and to-day the naked [redacted] the fabrication. It is only [redacted]ing glass that the changes

[redacted]that he has no idea how [redacted] "produced." Naturally [redacted] it incumbent on him to [redacted]ich might possibly have [redacted]oses of others more [redacted]he is not inclined to trust [redacted] regard to important his-

[redacted]of these cases are never [redacted] the banks where they oc- [redacted]cker. "You will under- [redacted] and tellers hate to have [redacted] they have been taken in, [redacted]but little about getting [redacted]think they can locate the [redacted] make plenty of noise, as [redacted] Just to illustrate, I may [redacted]bank that was caught for [redacted]ear never squealed about [redacted] The detectives were not [redacted] maker of the paper, and [redacted]ager considered it their [redacted]rs the rest of the com- [redacted]ing about it. Of course, [redacted]m a business standpoint [redacted] common sense view, for [redacted]e no good to raise a row. [redacted]e been laughed at if they [redacted] frequency with which [redacted]ed. I have sometimes [redacted]y arrange those things in the banks, but that is one of their secrets that I could never find out."

His Conspicuous Position.

In the County Jail Becker feels his importance among his less conspicuous confreres. He dresses quietly, as becomes a man of his dignity, and betrays the habits of a man accustomed to studious work by discarding his necktie and collar. He wears a golf cap, which is usually pulled down on his forehead, and from time to time his dark brown eyes dart sharp glances at the person with whom he is in conversation. Never for a moment does he lose his self-poise, and no one has ever been able to catch him off his guard.

There is a touch of pride in Becker's make-up because of his personal resemblance to Bismarck, his great fellow-countryman. The size and shape of the head, the contour of his face, the droop of the mustache and the overhanging eyebrows are somewhat Bismarckian in appearance. But Becker goes further, for he has made a study of hands and he finds that the iron chancellor had digits almost identical with his own.

"That was one of the signs of Bismarck's great capacity for work," said Becker. "It is nothing new to say that work is another name for genius, but it is as true now as when first spoken. I have noticed that only men with heavy muscular, even stocky, fingers are successful in any undertaking where faithful and laborious attention to details is required. That is the secret of whatever success I have attained. I have tried to master every part of my business, and whatever I considered worth attempting I thought was worth doing well. That was why nobody ever complained that I botched my work.

"Speaking of hands, reminds me of a mistake so many artists make in pretending that skillful manipulators of spurious paper have delicate, slender hands. It shows that such artists have not studied their trade, or they would know that fine fingers never do fine work. Men with slender hands are more given to planning and laying out jobs for others.

"If you go into a jewelry factory you will find the general manager with fingers like a bird's claws, and the man who does the most delicate work will have a fist like a prize-fighter, and every finger will show vitality and strength. Just look at that paw of mine. It wouldn't be heavier if I were a blacksmith, and that characteristic

(Continued on Page Twenty-one.)

REVELATIONS BY CHARLES BECKER, PRINCE OF FORGERS.

Charles Becker's confession to the crime of forgery was a notable event in last week's criminal calendar, for Becker is known to detectives and banking officials all over the world. He has traveled much, and wherever he went left samples of his handiwork in the shape of spurious drafts and checks. According to accounts from police authorities Becker is credited with having floated over $1,000,000 worth of bogus paper.

CHARLES BECKER, the guest of the American Bankers' Association, the ward of the associated capital of the United States, whose future welfare is to be guarded and insured by the commercial trusts and syndicates of the country, spent a quiet day at the County Jail yesterday. He was preparing for the journey to the State prison, which he is soon to take, but he is not without hope of gentle treatment, with a reasonable expectation of a pardon after serving a part of his term, since he has manifested his contrition and has pledged his word of honor to abandon the making and uttering of forged paper.

Becker is a remarkable man, for he is the most skillful forger of the age, and therefore has so completely commanded the consideration of the bankers that they are determined never again to let him be placed in such a position that he may be tempted to recur to the employment of his consummate skill in creating spurious checks and drafts.

Because of his success in terrorizing the commercial interests of the nation by his clever and all but undetectable [illegible] Becker has been assured of light punishment for the crime to which he has pleaded guilty. His wife has been sent for in order that she may comfort his days of imprisonment by dwelling near him, and her traveling expenses, as well as the cost of her support during his incarceration, will be provided for by some person other than Becker himself. The identity of this good Samaritan has not been disclosed, and Becker is too modest to make the revelation. A hint of where the funds came from may be found, however, in the suggestion that after Becker gets clear of the State prison he is to be placed in such a position that he will be sure of a comfortable livelihood for the remainder of his life, provided he keeps his agreement to give up his career as the premier forger of the century.

Bankers Will Help Him.

With many it is held to be a Christian duty to assist ex-convicts who manifest a disposition to lead a better life, and no one can censure the bankers if they extend a helping hand to one who proclaims his desire to reform and who promises to sin no more in this particular way. This is all the more praiseworthy, considering the intimate business relations that for years have existed between Becker and his new found friends. Involuntary as those relations may have been on the part of the bankers, they were nevertheless of a substantial nature, for Becker declares that many of his cleverest products have so passed muster that he never heard of any complaints concerning them, and that neither he nor, so far as he knew, anybody else had been arrested for them. He likes to think that his work is so perfect that the victims give up in despair of discovering the real culprit.

No wonder that Becker's companions in jail look up to him as a superior being, and that he has the best that the prison can afford, for a man who is worthy of the confidence of so many eminent financiers and who is in a position to command a pension for merely agreeing not to ply his dangerous craft after he has served his term is not to be met with every day, out of jail or in.

The first intimation of any kind of agreement between Becker and his former prosecutors was given by Attorney Henry Ach the morning that Becker pleaded guilty to a charge of forgery. Mr. Ach said that as special counsel for the persons [illegible] representing the American Bankers' Association, he was willing to have a light sentence imposed that [illegible] Becker's request to a withdrawal of the record of prior conviction, and that he and Chief of Police Lees were satisfied that the bankers would never again have cause to fear injury or loss through any act on Becker's part, that they believed he would keep his promise to give up the career that has made his name familiar to all whose duty is to guard against deception in commercial paper.

"It is true that I have resolved to give up my former course and my former methods of gaining a living," said Becker to an "Examiner" reporter. "My intention is to serve out my time in the State Prison and then go into some quiet little business and behave myself as an honest man should during the remaining years that are allotted to me. This jail business settles it with me. There's nothing in this kind of a life, no matter how successful or expert a man may be, and my experience proves what I say, for they all know what I have been able to do. It seems to me, now that I have been thinking over the matter, that I could have earned a great deal more by devoting myself to some legitimate business, for it is plain to see that the man who does the work—that is, the one who makes the paper—generally comes out of the little end of the horn. The man who does the work doesn't place the paper. I never laid down a check in my life, and it costs a great deal to get that part of the transaction handled. For instance, I got only $8,000 out of that $64,000 check on the New York Life Insurance Company. I was entitled to $16,000 at least, but I learned after it was all over that the other fellows split it up between them, pretending to me that it went for the 'get-away-fund.' You would be surprised if I told you how little I got out of this $22,000 check that was planted with the Nevada Bank. I'll not say just now, but some day I may feel inclined to give some particulars of that affair.

"I haven't made up my mind where I shall settle down after serving my term, but hard work will be out of the question with me by that time, and so my intention is to start a little stationery store or something of that kind, and I will live such a life that nobody shall have even a shadow of reason to doubt my complete reformation. My years of experience have taught me how to make checks that look all right and that bring the money every time, and it would be strange if I hadn't at the same time learned how to prevent the raising of checks. Now, I pretend to know this very thing, and my plan is so simple that I wonder the bankers of this country have not dropped on to it long ago, but they haven't, and if I tell them about it I think they ought to be willing to do something for me. It is my intention to let them and the world know about this plan for preventing the raising of checks, without asking any reward in advance. They will see the value of this to them, and I suppose they will feel more kindly disposed to me. If that is so and they show a disposition to assist me, I shall gratefully accept their help in making a living for myself and wife."

Loves His Wife.

At the mention of his wife, Becker showed the great tenderness that he feels for the woman who has stood by him through all his trials. "She is a dear, good woman, faithful and true, and deserves the best that I can give her," said Becker. "She was here during my first trial and would have remained if we had not thought she could do better for both of us by returning to our former home in New York. We have been married twenty-seven years and have been very happy together. Our silver wedding anniversary occurred while I was in the County Jail awaiting my examination, two years ago. One night my wife came to the jail with a big basket and the jailer asked her if she had brought something good to eat. She burst into tears and, uncovering the basket, showed him the lot of silver service that her relatives and mine had sent us in commemoration of the event. I felt sorry for her, but it couldn't be helped. We'll spend some happy years together yet, I hope."

In anticipation of the joy of the future, Becker seemed to grow cheerful, notwithstanding the fact that he is a self-confessed forger, with a term of years in the State Prison before him.

Like many men who have been connected with big criminal operations, Becker has his own ideas of the ethics that ought to control an aristocrat of the fraternity. He holds small operators in contempt, and would be ashamed to have anything to do with a $1,000 or $5,000 deal, as that would not yield sufficient to go around among his confederates and leave any dividend for himself. He is vigorous in his denunciation of those who manufacture spurious currency for general circulation and gives his reasons in a forcible manner.

"Counterfeiting is low and mean, of course, and nobody will try to defend it, for it is a sneaking kind of business, and I have always despised it," he said. "You see it is too much like petty larceny or picking pockets. That's how I feel, and anybody who thinks on the subject will have the same opinion, for the poor people are the ones who suffer from the work of the counterfeiter, while the man who goes and lays down a check for $20,000 or so is sure to be dealing with bankers or some other rich persons who can stand it without feeling that it hurts them, just as the banks that took the Woodland check wouldn't suffer any serious inconvenience if they had to pay that much ten times over. They're are able to stand it, as I say; but the counterfeiter catches some poor devils who can't really afford to lose the money.

"The other day I was reading that somebody was trying to float a counterfeit $100 note, but I doubt it, and investigation will show that the particular note in dispute was printed from an old plate, or that it has been marred by too much handling. That is my way of figuring out the proposition, for so far as my knowledge goes there have never been any large notes counterfeited. There are several reasons why this is so. In the first place, the danger of detection would be greater, for any one who is offered a big note is sure to carefully scrutinize it, and once the bogus nature of the product was known the whole plate would be worthless, as people would be on their guard and the paper couldn't pass any more. But it is different with bills of the $5 or $10 denomination, for you might publish in the papers every day full descriptions of the counterfeits and yet they would continue to circulate, because merchants and their clerks are so busy that they do not take the time to examine every bit of paper that is handed to them in the course of trade.

"This is more the case back East than on the Pacific Coast, where coin is so generally in use. In the Eastern States you don't often see anything except currency, and it takes a detective to tell the bad bills from the good. Of course there are thousands of spurious national bank notes in circulation and so long as they are not detected they pass from hand to hand and serve the purpose of money just as well as the genuine, but at last the wear and tear on the inferior paper or defective ink will begin to show and then it is that the poor man gets stuck with it."

Counterfeiting Affects the Poor.

Becker was asked to explain why he thought the loss in counterfeit money is apt to fall on poor than on rich men.

"Oh, that's easy enough," he replied; "for you see the rich man has plenty of chances to get rid of the flimsy. If he or one of his clerks should discover a bad bill in the till do you suppose he would nail it to the counter? Not much. The merchant would put it in the middle of a fat roll of notes and it would go out to some customer in the regular course of business. If it should be detected at the time the merchant would quickly hand over a good bill in place of the bogus one and the counterfeit would go into the middle of another big roll, and this would be kept until it would find its way into the possession of some unfortunate wretch who was not able to protect himself, and he would be lucky if he escaped prosecution for having tried to pass a counterfeit, when as a matter of fact he couldn't tell the difference between good and bad money if both kinds were placed on the counter in front of him. That's why I despise counterfeiters and their dishonorable methods. But you see it's different with the other way of doing business, where the value of the paper is raised and where it is never intended to be put in general circulation so that poor people might be victimized. The only persons concerned in such a transaction are the capitalists, and they have enough money to meet the loss without inconvenience."

Becker seemed to avoid using the word "forgery" and employed other expressions to convey his meaning. He spoke of "laying down a check," or "raising the value," or the like, plainly manifesting a pride in his ability to perform feats in penmanship which seemed impossible to ordinary individuals. He said that it would be a simple thing for him to simulate the boasted bills of the Bank of England or the United States treasury notes, but declared that he had always been deterred from such a course by the conscientious scruples already mentioned.

"How about that Bank of France note for 10,000 francs that you were caught making and which the French officers in New York declared to be perfect, so far as the work had progressed?" was asked.

A Dummy Counterfeit.

Quickly Becker replied: "Oh, that was not intended to be a counterfeit in the ordinary sense of the word. That bill was never to have been circulated. It was simply to have been a dummy that would not have not gone out of the safe of the man for whom I was making it. You see, he was a rich man and he wanted to show it to another rich man when the usual time for inspection of funds came round. That's all there is to that transaction. To be sure, that 10,000-franc affair had a strange history, but I have forgotten most of the particulars, all, in fact, except what I have just told you. But even that was an unlucky piece of business, for it was the only case in which I had to do time, except the present one."

"Then it may be inferred that many of your efforts in this line have been successful and have caused no serious inconvenience to yourself?"

"Oh, dozens; yes, dozens," was the quiet answer, with a significant and sweeping gesture.

Becker added that the raising of checks was not exactly in his line, but that he had usually operated with original paper. "When I wanted something my plan was to make the check suit the circumstances, and I seldom took anything drawn by another. That was how I turned out that $64,000 check in New York. I could have used any of a hundred old checks that were at my disposal, but for a job like that I preferred clean paper. In that case I engraved the body of the check and then filled in the rest to fit the requirements of the transaction. You see, in raising a check, it would be hard to get the exact form that would be necessary at that particular moment."

Becker has been a great traveler and has left samples of his handiwork wherever he has gone, for all banks and all checks looked alike to him when the question of forgery was under consideration. He was accused of having put out $800,000 in spurious paper in Florence, Italy, and was arrested in Turkey for an extensive venture in the funds of the Sultan, but he escaped from prison and made his way to England, where he favored the Britishers with his most exquisite productions, for he was impartial in his dealings. France and Spain also paid tribute to his genius, and most of all his adopted country yielded liberally to his demands. He was born in Germany sixty years ago and that is the only field that he seems to have neglected.

Recurring to the forgery in this city by which a Woodland Bank check was raised from $12 to $22,000, Becker was asked how he had managed to write in the amount so that it passed through the Nevada Bank, the Crocker-Woolworth Bank and the Clearing House without detection.

Something of an Artist.

"Oh, that amount was never written in; it was painted," said the forger, with a touch of conscious power in his tone. "Nobody could have written on that paper, for it is made by the so-called Safety Paper Company, and I think, by the way, that I am entitled to that prize of $1,000 that they have been advertising they would give to anybody who could raise a check that was made out on their paper. They were correct in the statement that nobody could make an alteration with a pen on their paper but I didn't want to use a pen, I preferred a camel's-hair brush," and Becker, smiling grimly at the recollection of his victory over mechanical difficulties, added: "Did you ever notice that when a check is laid down that way it is always a complicated and safe-guarded piece of paper, as the bankers think? Well, that's so, anyhow. The more safeguards a check is supposed to have the easier it is to pass it. Nobody would think of accepting a plain piece of paper for a large amount of money without subjecting it to a close scrutiny, but if it has a pretty tint, is on 'safety' paper, with an engraved vignette, and above all, if the figures are stamped or perforated, the banker takes only a glance at it and lets it go through. They seem to forget that it is as easy to fill up holes in a piece of paper as to make them.

"My experience is that to make a check 'go,' about all that is necessary is to make it look like money. This takes some knowledge of commercial usage and the habits of business men in general. For instance, in making the row of ciphers on that $22,000 check, I let the figures decrease in size slightly as they went. That is a natural tendency in manuscript, and it gave the check the 'look' I was trying to produce. If the figures had been stiff and precise, nobody would have accepted the paper.

"There were many other points to be considered, of course, but these will show the general outline of a successful operation. The raising of this check did not occupy much of my time, and I didn't use any acids or crow-quill pens, as some of those wiseacre experts seemed to think. With my heavy hand, a pen would have gone right through the paper, but when I take a brush my touch is lighter than a feather. Those experts try to make people think they know a great deal about the 'characteristics' of a man, and pretend that in raising a check the operator allows his own peculiarities to crop out. That is ridiculous, for it is like painting a picture of another man and suggesting that you would introduce some of your own features in the portrait. But I haven't anything against the experts, for they have a right to get a living, I suppose, and they are not seriously considered by the average jurors, and not at all by the judges. I look on them somewhat as I do on spiritualists and the like, who keep themselves before the public by blowing their own horns."

How He Raised the Check.

When the raised check was drawn in Woodland it had the amount perforated in the paper thus, "12," the dollar mark being placed on each side of the figures. Becker filled in the original perforations and made new perforations, carefully putting the dollar mark at the end in the usual manner. The perforations were closed by paper pulp and the surfaces of these minute "plugs" were painted to correspond with the general color or tone of the paper. So perfect was the manipulation that it was not discovered by the half-dozen or more men who handled the check, and to-day the naked eye cannot detect the fabrication. It is only under the magnifying glass that the changes may be seen.

Becker admits that he has no idea how many checks he has "produced." Naturally he never deemed it incumbent on him to keep a record, which might possibly have served the purposes of others more than his own, and he is not inclined to trust to his memory in regard to important historical data.

"The majority of these cases are never known outside of the banks where they occur," explained Becker. "You will understand that cashiers and tellers hate to have anybody know that they have been taken in, and so they say but little about getting stuck unless they think they can locate the culprit. Then they make plenty of noise, as is quite natural. Just to illustrate, I may mention that one bank that was caught for twelve checks in a year never squealed about it to the public. The detectives were not able to turn up the maker of the paper, and as the bank's manager considered it their own private business, the rest of the community heard nothing about it. Of course they were right from a business standpoint as well as from the common sense view, for it would have done no good to raise a row, and they would have been laughed at if they had confessed the frequency with which they had been duped. I have sometimes wondered how they arrange those things in the banks, but that is one of their secrets that I could never find out."

His Conspicuous Position.

In the County Jail Becker feels his importance among his less conspicuous confreres. He dresses quietly, as becomes a man of his dignity, and betrays the habits of a man accustomed to studious work by discarding his necktie and collar. He wears a golf cap, which is usually pulled down on his forehead, and from time to time his dark brown eyes dart sharp glances at the person with whom he is in conversation. Never for a moment does he lose his self-poise, and no one has ever been able to catch him off his guard.

There is a touch of pride in Becker's make-up because of his personal resemblance to Bismarck, his great fellow-countryman. The size and shape of the head, the contour of his face, the droop of the mustache and the overhanging eyebrows are somewhat Bismarckian in appearance. But Becker goes further, for he has made a study of hands and he finds that the iron chancellor had digits almost identical with his own.

"That was one of the signs of Bismarck's great capacity for work," said Becker. "It is nothing new to say that work is another name for genius, but it is as true now as when first spoken. I have noticed that only men with heavy muscular, even stocky, fingers are successful in any undertaking, where faithful and laborious attention to details is required. That is the secret of whatever success I have attained. I have tried to master every part of my business, and whatever I considered worth attempting I thought was worth doing well. That was why nobody ever complained that I botched my work.

"Speaking of hands, reminds me of a mistake so many artists make in pretending that skillful manipulators of spurious paper have delicate, slender hands. It shows that such artists have not studied their trade, or they would know that fine fingers never do fine work. Men with slender hands are more given to planning and laying out jobs for others.

"If you go into a jewelry factory you will find the general manager with fingers like a bird's claws and the man who does the most delicate work will have a fist like a prize-fighter and every finger will show vitality and strength. Just look at that paw of mine. It wouldn't be heavier if I were a blacksmith, and that characteristic

(Continued on Page Twenty-one.)

BECKER SCRUTINIZES A SPECIMEN OF HIS HANDICRAFT.

MAY BE THAT AN AUTOPSY HAS BEEN HELD.

Reported That a Surprise Will Be Sprung in Botkin Case.

DECEMBER 12, 1898.

Spot in the Prosecution Which Defense Has Claimed Is Weak.

FIRST OF THE WITNESSES

He Will Be Harry C. Pennington, Who Was an Employee in the Dover Postoffice.

Everybody who is watching the Botkin case is expecting surprises, and it was reported yesterday that the newest surprise would be sprung upon the defense.

The story is that under the direction of Chief Lees the bodies of the persons whose deaths are charged to Mrs. Botkin have been exhumed and autopsies held. Chief Lees says no such thing has been done and nothing of the sort is anticipated, since the embalming fluid which was used after death would make an autopsy valueless.

The first witness will be Harry C. Pennington. He is a brother to Mrs. Deane and Mrs. Dunning, the two women who died from eating poisoned candy. Pennington will take the stand at the opening of court this morning and will be asked to testify to the receipt of the package of candy at the postoffice in Dover, Del., and its subsequent delivery by him to Mrs. Dunning.

Following this will be the story of John P. Pennington, the father of the two dead women. He will describe how, after the delivery of the candy, it was eaten by Mrs. Dunning, Mrs. Deane, his granddaughter and others, and how their sickness and death followed.

Joshua H. Deane will describe the effect of the candy upon his wife and others and tell of their subsequent death. It is probable that the direct and cross examination of these three witnesses will consume the first day of the trial, and that the entire trial of the case will be concluded inside of two weeks. The attorneys on each side make this estimate of time, and the verdict of the jury is expected before Saturday of next week.

While advantage has not yet been taken of any technicalities it is known that Attorneys Knight and McGowan, representing Mrs. Botkin, are relying more on the neglect to perform an autopsy than on any other single point. It is maintained by her counsel that there is no evidence that a court can accept that any persons died from the effects of eating poisoned candy.

On the other hand, Assistant District Attorney Hosmer will maintain, as outlined in his opening address, that he will establish beyond any doubt that Mrs. Botkin purchased the candy and poison; that the [illegible] package was received at the Dover postoffice; that it was delivered to Mrs. Dunning; that Mrs. Dunning, Mrs. Deane and several others all in good health—ate of the contents of the box; that they all became sick with symptoms of poisoning; that death followed these symptoms; that afterwards an analysis of the candy showed it to be filled with arsenic. With all this Attorney Hosmer wonders why a demand should be made for technical proof of death.

The question of the jurisdiction of the court to try the case will not be raised unless Mrs. Botkin should be found guilty by the jury. The defense would not wish to go into the case with an adverse ruling on this question, as it can be raised at any time, either when motion is made for a new trial or in a proceeding before the Supreme Court on appeal. It is not necessary that this plea be made during the course of the trial.

"We do not expect the necessity to arise," say Attorneys Knight and McGowan, "for our questioning the court's jurisdiction. We have no idea or thought at this time of relying upon technicalities. We consider that the lack of facts in the testimony which the prosecution will offer will be in itself sufficient to acquit."

All the Delaware witnesses spent yesterday car-riding or calling upon San Francisco acquaintances. In the afternoon [illegible] of them visited the Park or Cliff House. In the evening some attended the Howard-street Church. Dr. Wilson, pastor of the church, came to California from Delaware, having been a resident of Dover for a number of years while he was Presiding Elder of that district.

WILL SHIELD NO CULPRITS.

Superintendents of Streets Ambrose Insists on Justice.

Superintendent of Streets W. F. Ambrose called on Mayor Phelan yesterday to notify him that he was doing all in his power to unearth and prosecute the author of the forgeries in his office.

"I am tired of being misrepresented in [illegible] matter," he [illegible] "It seems to be the general impression that I am not taking an active interest in clearing up the mystery of these forgeries, but I want to say right here that I will not [illegible] until I have brought the culprit to justice, no matter who he is. If Mr. McGlade is guilty he must pay the penalty to the fullest extent of the law. I am in earnest in this matter, and under no circumstances will I stand for any trifling.

"The first I heard of McGlade's shortage was on the Monday before his arrest, when the brokerage firm of Hier & Hergenberger notified me that he had drawn $1,100 from them on bogus tags. He did not report for work that morning, so I put another bookkeeper in his place. The next day, while my bookkeeper was going over the accounts with the Auditor the forgeries were discovered. I then notified the Mayor. McGlade's arrest followed.

"There were times when it was impossible for me personally to inspect the warrants. While my arm was hurt as the result of an accident, some months ago, Mr. Charles Derham, in whom I have implicit confidence, was empowered to affix my signature to demands. To-morrow night Mr. Derham and myself will tell the Grand Jury all we know about the case so far as the genuineness of signatures is concerned."

The Grand Jury will to-night begin its investigation of the McGlade shortage. Detectives Gibson and Eagly, who have been collecting material for the prosecution, were busy yesterday serving subpenas on the employes at the City Hall, members of the Finance Committee of the Board of Supervisors and others who were in any manner connected with the handling of the forged warrants and bogus demands.

If the Grand Jury indicts McGlade there will be no need of the preliminary police court examination scheduled for Friday morning, as an indictment would bring the case into the Superior Court without further delay.

In case the forgery charges fall through, there is another matter in which McGlade will be held in custody. Hier & Hergenberger, the brokers at 1150 Market street, have an affair to settle with him to the extent of $1,100.

A BARON WORKED AS A LABORER.

DECEMBER 12, 1898.

Moving a Safe, W. F. Falkenberg Was Injured.

Impossible to State Whether He Will Recover or Not.

Was Once the Manager of the Late Senator Fair's Farms.

Had Also Held Other Good Positions of Trust and Responsibility.

Of Late Met With Many Reverses and Was Forced to Accept What Was Offered.

At about noon to-day W. F. Falkenberg, the claimant to the title of baron, and who was severely injured last evening while employed in moving an office safe on Bush street, underwent an operation at the French Hospital, whither he had been removed.

In so far as present indications may be taken it is believed the injured man will recover, though until the critical period has passed no definite conclusion can be reached in this respect.

Falkenberg's story is an interesting one and romance fills an important part throughout it all. Born and reared in affluence, of noble blood and entitled to bear a title, he has met with many reverses, and finally had reached such a stage as to be employed merely as a common laborer. For many years he had been connected with the late Senator Fair and held many important positions. He was the manager of the Fair farms near Knights Landing and at one time was the manager of the San Diego Water and Light Company. It was noticed that at frequent intervals he left the State, and upon his return accepted various positions. Since the death of Senator Fair he has fared poorly indeed. Last evening he formed one of a party of six men who were engaged in removing a safe from the building at 325 Bush street. The safe was being lowered from the third story of the building by sliding it down on scantlings. While some of the men retarded the descent of the vault by means of a rope the Baron was placed in front with a crowbar. The safe got beyond the control of the men and as a result Falkenberg was crushed. He was taken to the City Front Receiving Hospital, where it was ascertained that his arm had been badly crushed and his right leg fractured. At the hospital he refused to permit the surgeons to amputate his arm, but asked that Messrs. [illegible] and Charles Fair and Dr. T[illegible] be summoned. When they arrived instructions were given to remove [illegible] to the French Hospital, where his arm was amputated.

Falkenberg was born in Quebec and is [illegible] years of age. He is the son of Baron Falkenberg, who for twenty-six years was Consul for Sweden and Norway at Quebec and was also interested in trading. He states that his mother was born in New York of well-to-do parents. Two sisters in London and a brother, whose whereabouts are unknown to the injured man, constitute the rest of the family.

M'GLADE TO BE INDICTED FOR FORGERY.

Grand Jury Agree That He Is the Guilty One.

The Indictment to Be Returned in Court on Friday.

THAT SCHOOL DEFICIT

A Striking Statement of the Department's Demoralized Finances Is Presented.

The Grand Jury agreed last night that Peter McGlade, former bookkeeper in the office of the Superintendent of Streets, should be indicted, and an adjournment was taken until Friday afternoon, when unless something unforeseen happens an indictment will be presented to Presiding Judge Belcher.

Numerous witnesses were examined, including Supervisors, clerks in the Supervisors' office, employes of the Street Department and Superintendent of Streets Ambrose. The charges submitted were for nineteen forgeries for sums aggregating $1,650. Expert Kytka testified that the body of all demands was in McGlade's handwriting, and also his signatures. As there was no record of the bogus demands in the books of the Street Department, it was shown that Ambrose could not have detected the swindles, and consequently he was not held responsible.

M'GLADE IS INDICTED.

The Grand Jury Charges Him With Committing Forgery.

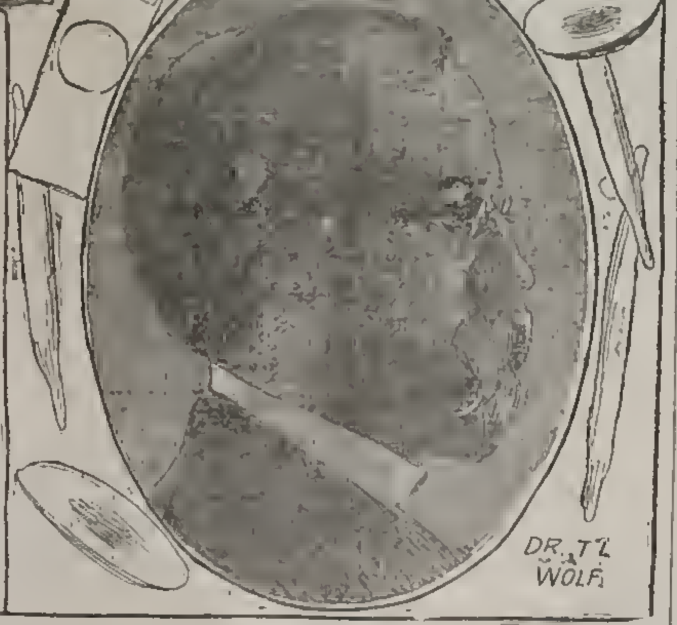
Peter McGlade, the former bookkeeper of Street Superintendent Ambrose, must stand trial in the Superior Court on a charge of forgery. An indictment was found against him by the Grand Jury last night after examining a number of witnesses, the principal ones being Expert Kytka, Supervisor Haskins, Deputy Street Superintendent Charles Derham, Detective Thomas Gibson and Deputy Auditor D. J. Leary. Twenty-three witnesses were subpenaed, all of whom were connected with the offices of the Board of Supervisors, the Superintendent of Streets and the Auditor, but after sufficient evidence had been presented to show the routine through which warrants must pass before reaching the Treasurer the remaining witnesses were excused.

The most important testimony was that given by Kytka, the handwriting expert connected with the Police Department, who informed the Grand Jury that there were five forged signatures on each demand, the name of the fictitious laborer being forged twice. He exonerated the deputies in the office of the Superintendent of Streets from all connection with the swindle, and stated that those employes in that department whose names appeared on the dummy demands had conclusively proved to his satisfaction that their purported signatures were forgeries.

The Grand Jury found itself powerless to carry out its desire to indict the members of the School Board on a felony charge. City Attorney Lane, who was instructed on Monday night to examine the law governing the sins of omission and commission of the Board of Education, reported last night that the offense of violating the one-twelfth act was not a felony, and that, although it constituted malfeasance in office this offense was only a plain misdemeanor. In view of this advice the Grand Jury was prevented from taking the action that it desired.

THEODOR F. KYTKA,
The handwriting expert who testified in the Botkin case.

HOW A POISONER'S VICTIMS SUFFERED AND EXPIRED.



DOCTORS AND THE CHEMIST TESTIFY.

No Longer Cool and Unconcerned, Mrs. Botkin Listens — Dunning's Story To-Day.

MRS. BOTKIN is sad. She looks old and weary and troubled. In spite of all that has been written into her face in the past few weeks, most of which existed merely in the minds of the writers, she was unconcerned enough until the Delaware testimony began to disturb the calm of her mind. Yesterday she looked as though the previous night had been a sleepless one. Under her eyes were deep circles and new wrinkles. For once Mrs. Botkin looked her age. Often when the testimony came home with especial force, particularly when the pathetic death scenes about the beds of Mrs. Dunning and Mrs. Deane were being painted by physicians who were also friends, Mrs. Botkin's eyelids, which are heavy and thick and white, fell and curtained her eyes.

The papers no longer hold Mrs. Botkin's attention. And all this in spite of the fact that since the trial proper began Mrs. Botkin's name has not once been mentioned. For all that the witnesses have said, Mrs. Botkin might be a mere spectator at the trial. This is a peculiar case in that it runs backward. The facts of the deaths, the scenes of the deathbeds, the immediate causes that led up to the Dover end of the tragedy, have all been shown. Yesterday was spent in a close scrutiny of the symptoms of the women who died, in an investigation of the chemical analysis of the candy and in tracing the fatal box of sweets on its second transcontinental journey. The connection of Mrs. Botkin with the tragedy is yet to come. All this requires time and patience. It seems as though every step so far had been taken in regular sequence and every minor detail carefully proved. If the prosecution has a vulnerable heel it would seem to be in the matter of proving the cause of death. The medical testimony on that particular point leaves something to be desired. Dr. Bishop, who was the family physician of the Penningtons, never suspected arsenic until it was too late for his suspicions to bear any fruit. Even to the Coroner's jury he talked of ptomaines, and when asked yesterday what cause of death he assigned in the death certificate, which even the law of peaceful Delaware is said to require, he could not remember. There was no examination of the stomachs, so far as has been shown by the testimony, and no autopsy. The point is whether these legal technicalities are absolutely necessary to show the cause of death in a case where the victims exhibited all the symptoms of a poison which was afterward found in food of which they had partaken. The defense bent all its efforts to proving that it was only after Dr. Wolf's analysis that the doctors suspected arsenic [illegible] Dr. Bishop, though [illegible] Dr. Downes. The former contradicted himself several times and [illegible] edge that he [illegible] correctly [illegible] [illegible]

Professor Wolf is a pedantic man, with a high, shiny forehead—a man fond of his profession and used to lecturing. He embroidered the opportunity and reveled in technical details which were Greek to most of his hearers. In anticipation of these sonorous words and unfamiliar phrases, the regular shorthand reporter had an opportune indisposition and an unhappy recruit was sworn in to take his place. This man struggled with arsenious oxide and five-syllabled acids until the perspiration stood out on his forehead. No one could have convinced him that it was the coldest day of the season.

The scene had shifted from the almost pastoral Dover home, with its colored servants, its corn fritters and its colored inmates. This time the testimony was of death-bed scenes and dying struggles, and of a suspicion, at first scarcely credited, that made its way into a community where the stocks and the whipping post keep offenders in meek awe of the law, and where all the murders and crimes of the State do not afford constant employment for a detective force which consists of two men. Delaware may be behind the times, but there are certain compensations. And doctors who measure the day from "sun time to that time" proved that they could be tender nurses even if they did graduate before the day of the microscope and knew less of the cultivation of bacteria than many a layman.

The day was enlivened by a few passages-at-arms between opposing attorneys. Knight was particularly insistent as to the sort of arsenic found in the candy, and the difference between crystallized and amorphous arsenic.

"The witness has answered that once," said Hosmer, crustily.

"He has not answered it!" yelled Knight, fiercely; "and you know he hasn't. What is more, you don't want him to answer it."

Hosmer's angry expostulations were lost in Judge Cook's censure.

At another time Dr. Bishop's irritation, he had been pestered beyond belief by a cross-examination which was particularly galling, showed itself in a tart remark, which was aimed at Knight, and which that gentleman promptly resented. Dr. Bishop said that when arsenic had been used in embalming an autopsy could give no satisfaction to anyone and would only afford hope for the ingenuity of the opposing counsel. Knight was on his feet in a moment and the doctor hurriedly said that he did not intend his remark to apply to any particular attorney.

At another time Knight said sententiously, "We are on trial for the murder of Mrs. Dunning," making himself particeps criminis and at the same time seeking unsuccessfully to exclude testimony in regard to the condition of Mrs. Deane. Unlike the Durrant case, the testimony concerning this double crime comes in together, for the stories of the double death are inextricably mingled. A great deal of attention was given to the cross-examination of Dr. Wolf [illegible] to make him [illegible] that he found [illegible] crystals in the candy [illegible] [illegible]

a flushed and anxious face, cold extremities and a cold perspiration on her body. He remained with her until her death, which occurred the afternoon of that day. The lips were livid and afterward purple, and after death there was a puffiness about the face. He was asked what, in his opinion, was the cause of death, and he answered the question indirectly by saying that all these symptoms were indicative of arsenical poisoning.

Dr. Bishop also attended Mrs. Dunning, but, as she was not so ill, he thought she would recover, and so devoted all his attention to Mrs. Deane. Just before Mrs. Deane died Mrs. Dunning came into the room to see her, but Mrs. Dunning was so weak that she had to lie down and be carried back to her room and put to bed. The doctor then went to his home, next door. About midnight he was called by Mrs. Dunning's nurse, who informed him that her feet were cold. Mrs. Dunning was sleeping lightly, but awoke and wanted to know what he was doing there. He told her he had just come in to see how she was. He remained all night and gave her stimulants at intervals, but the heart action steadily diminished. The pulse was not irregular, but was very weak. At 8 o'clock, at the suggestion of Mr. Pennington, Dr. Downes was called in. The pulse then ranged from 96 to 100. There was a cold perspiration on the forehead and all the symptoms that Mrs. Deane had exhibited. These symptoms increased, and Mrs. Dunning died at 5 o'clock that evening. The body had the same swollen appearance at the extremities and also about the abdomen. The treatment of the morning was continued after the consultation.

"With your knowledge, what would you say caused the death of Mrs. Dunning?" asked Hosmer.

"The symptoms were those of arsenical poisoning [illegible]."

"Did they cause her death?"

"I believe it did."

"Have you any doubt about it?"

"I have not."

The box of candy then became the object of inquiry and [illegible] of taking five chocolates [illegible] Dr. Wolf, the State chemist, for analysis. He went to Newark, where Wolf is professor of chemistry in Delaware College, and [illegible] He was accompanied by [illegible] of the college and [illegible] The witness [illegible] Wilmington [illegible] evening [illegible] Dr. Wolf [illegible] [illegible] neutralize the poison, and then mucilaginous drinks to allay further absorption. He did not discover that the patients were suffering from arsenical poisoning until the morning of the day on which Mrs. Deane died. The day before Mrs. Deane had told him she had eaten candy, and he had asked if any of it was colored green.

Knight [illegible] [illegible]

"Why did you not ask for the chocolate creams, then?" asked Knight.

"I don't know," said the witness, doggedly. "None of us is perfect."

"Did you not testify on Monday, August 15th, before the Coroner's jury that if the candy had been subjected to heat ptomaine might have developed and you did not know what had caused death?"

"I did."

"Why do you say now that it was arsenical poisoning?"

"I trust the chemist."

"If he were out of the way and of the reports you could not know positively what had caused death?"

"I would still believe from the symptoms that it was arsenical poisoning."

Knight again asked as to what cause had been given in the death certificate, and the witness said he could not remember whether or not he had given death certificates in the cases of Mrs. Deane and Mrs. Dunning.

"Did you suggest to Dr. Downes that the patients were dying of arsenical poisoning?"

"I advanced that theory."

"Why did you not act on it?"

"We were in the dark. We were not as wise as some people might have been," answered the witness, sarcastically.

"As you and Dr. Downes stood by Mrs. Dunning's deathbed you were still in the dark?"

"We saw considerable light before she died."

"Was it luminous enough to see arsenic?"

"Not quite then. I was nearly convinced, but not quite sure."

The witness said he advanced the theory of arsenical poisoning at the inquest. He was positive that arsenic had caused the deaths of the women.

"When you found that out why did you not use remedies for that poison?" asked Knight.

"It was too late then," answered the witness.

Dr. Bishop said it was he who urged Mr. Pennington to have an inquest. They did not want it as Mrs. Pennington was ill. The doctor, however, insisted and the defense wished to know why the physician insisted on an inquest if he was sure of the cause of death.

The witness did not know why a postmortem had not been held, and said that [illegible] of the [illegible]

[illegible] examination the witness [illegible] bottles had been [illegible] them would have [illegible] The defense amused itself by asking some questions as to the [illegible] Dr. Bishop [illegible] of the internal organs [illegible] were affected [illegible] Asked as to [illegible] said that a [illegible] called him. He [illegible] to have [illegible] knowledge [illegible] as he did not know that [illegible]

Dr. Downes testified further that when he was called in it was too late to give any antidote.

Dr. T. R. Wolf, a graduate of Heidelberg and Leipsic, and now State chemist of Delaware, then went on the stand and [illegible] had examined candies from the box sent to Mrs. Dunning. He examined three pieces, making several tests with each one. On opening the candies he found hard white lumps, some large and some small. In the three candies there were twelve grains of arsenic, eleven and a half grains in the amorphous form and one-half grain in the powdered form. The witness [illegible] to all [illegible] there [illegible] powder [illegible] [illegible] the inquest and found lumps [illegible] found when the analysis was made.

A bottle containing broken pieces of candy, showing lumps of arsenic, was admitted in evidence over the objections of the defense. There were [illegible] showing the results of the several analysis at different stages.

In the cross-examination Knight was as hopelessly out of his depth as the other had been. He asked how many [illegible] These gentlemen remembered little of their work with the [illegible] ever did any and the cross-examination was confined strictly to the layman's side of the analysis and left Marsh's test and charcoal reduction strictly alone. The defense asked if the chemist found any evidence that the candies had been opened, and he replied that he found no evidence of a break, though there were some cracks and the chocolates were slightly crushed. The witness did not discover any crystallized arsenic, though he testified that moisture was sufficient to change crystallized arsenic to the amorphous form. He was sure, however, that the arsenic used in this case was in lump form and powdered. The largest lump found was about the size of a pea. Knight was curious to know how large arsenic lumps came.

"Sometimes as large as your head," replied the witness, dropping the technicalities calculated to impress the unlearned.

"You don't know how big my head is sometimes," was the retort. In response to a question Dr. Wolf stated that arsenic had no taste.

Attorney-General White of Delaware identified the box, candy, wrapper, handkerchief and note. By way of cross-examination Knight said:

"Feeling well, are you, General, today?"

"Very well, thank you," responded the surprised witness, stiffly.

"No further questions," said Knight.

Bernard J. McVey, State Detective of Delaware, told of receiving articles of evidence from John D. Pennington, bringing them across the continent and turning them over to Chief Lees. On cross-examination McVey stated that no one had been allowed to see the articles while he was bringing them from Delaware.

Chief of Police I. W. Lees testified that he had received the articles consigned to the care of Detective McVey by Pennington. Afterward he had the various exhibits in the case photographed. He gave eight pieces of the candy to Professor Thomas Price for purposes of analysis. Later Professor Price and Dr. Wolf were allowed to break open two pieces of the candy, part of which they carried away for further analysis. The witness identified the wrapper, box and other articles, including the envelopes containing the anonymous letters. On cross-examination he said that his handwriting experts were Eisenschimmel, Ames and Kytka. He had been present when they examined the writings.

The box of candy was then offered in evidence. Knight objected, but the Court admitted it, saying that if it was not connected with the defense he would entertain a motion to strike it out.

At the conclusion of the testimony of Chief Lees an adjournment was taken until 10 o'clock this morning.

THE DEATH CERTIFICATE.

Arsenical Poisoning Given in Dover as the Cause.

A telegram was sent to Delaware last night to ascertain the cause of death as given in the certificate. The answer was as follows:

WILMINGTON (Del.), December 13.—The cause of death was arsenical poison, according to the certificate and verdict of the Coroner's jury.

TWO WORDS ENOUGH.

Collector Harper's Foolish Petition Is Speedily Denied.

Two words from the Supreme Court, written yesterday, put the end that was expected to a stupid attempt to break into the Botkin case. The attempt was made last week by L. P. Boardman, an attorney, and W. L. Harper, a bill collector, and took the form of a petition for a writ of prohibition directed to Superior Judge Cook. The avowed purpose was to have the Supreme Court pass upon the matter of jurisdiction, and, possibly, save the State further expense. Harper's interest was alleged to be that of a taxpayer. The Supreme Court did not deem the matter worthy of an opinion. Justice McFarland, for the court sitting in bank, tersely indorsed the request, "Petition denied."

DOCTORS AND THE CHEMIST TESTIFY.

No Longer Cool and Unconcerned, Mrs. Botkin Listens — Dunning's Story To-Day.

MRS. BOTKIN is sad. She looks old and weary and troubled. In spite of all that has been written into her face in the past few weeks—most of which existed merely in the minds of the writers—she was unconcerned enough until the Delaware testimony began to disturb the calm of her mind. Yesterday she looked as though the previous night had been a sleepless one. Under her eyes were deep circles and new wrinkles. For once Mrs. Botkin looked her age. Often when the testimony came home with especial force, particularly when the pathetic death scenes about the beds of Mrs. Dunning and Mrs. Deane were being painted by physicians who were also friends, Mrs. Botkin's eyelids, which are heavy and thick and white, fell and curtained her eyes.

The papers no longer hold Mrs. Botkin's attention. And all this in spite of the fact that since the trial proper began Mrs. Botkin's name has not once been mentioned. For all that the witnesses have said, Mrs. Botkin might be a mere spectator at the trial. This is a peculiar case in that it runs backward. The facts of the deaths, the scenes at the deathbeds, the immediate [illegible] that led up to the Dover end of the tragedy, have all been shown. Yesterday was spent in a close scrutiny of the symptoms of the women who died, in an investigation of the chemical analysis of the candy and in tracing the fatal box of sweets on its second transcontinental journey. The connection of Mrs. Botkin with the tragedy is yet to come. All this requires time and patience. It seems as though every step so far had been taken in regular sequence and every minor detail carefully proved. If the prosecution has a vulnerable heel it would seem to be in the matter of proving the cause of death. The medical testimony on that particular point leaves something to be desired. Dr. Bishop, who was the family physician of the Penningtons, never suspected arsenic until it was too late for his suspicions to bear any fruit. Even to the Coroner's jury he talked of ptomaines, and when asked yesterday what cause of death he assigned in the death certificate, which even the law of peaceful Delaware is said to require, he could not remember. There was no examination of the stomachs, so far as has been shown by the testimony, and no autopsy. The point is whether these legal technicalities are absolutely necessary to show the cause of death in a case where the victims exhibited all the symptoms of a poison which was afterward found in food of which they had partaken. The defense bent all its efforts to proving that it was only after Dr. Wolf's analysis that the doctors suspected arsenic, and it succeeded fairly in showing it in the case of Dr. Bishop, though not with Dr. Downes. The former contradicted himself several times and seemed to have no knowledge that he had diagnosed the cases incorrectly, though his treatment showed plainly that he had had a wrong idea of the case all along. [illegible] We are none of us perfect." The little country doctor was [illegible] uncomfortable. It is hard enough to admit errors in private, let alone confess them in public. [illegible] nothing [illegible] was the trouble, Dr. Bishop tried to make up in testiness what [illegible] [illegible]

[illegible]

Professor Wolf is a pedantic man, with a high, shiny forehead—a man fond of his profession and used to lecturing. He embraced the opportunity and reveled in technical details which were Greek to most of his hearers. In anticipation of these sonorous words and unfamiliar phrases, the regular shorthand reporter had an opportune indisposition and an unhappy recruit was sworn in to take his place. This man struggled with arsenious oxide and five-syllabled words until the perspiration stood out on his forehead. No one could have convinced him that it was the coldest day of the season.

The scene had shifted from the almost pastoral Dover home, with its colored servants, its corn fritters and its soft-voiced inmates. This time the testimony was of deathbed scenes and dying struggles, and of a suspicion, at first scarcely credited, that made its way into a community where the stocks and the whipping post keep offenders in check and of the law, and where all the murders and crimes of the State do not afford constant employment for a detective force which consists of two men. Delaware may be behind the times, but there are certain compensations. And doctors who measure the day from "tea time to bed time" proved that they could be tender nurses even if they did graduate before the days of the microscope and knew less of the cultivation of bacteria than many a layman.

The day was enlivened by a few passages at arms between opposing attorneys. Knight was particularly insistent as to the sort of arsenic found in the candy, and the difference between crystallized and amorphous arsenic.

"The witness has answered that once," said Hosmer, crustily.

"He has not answered it!" yelled Knight, fiercely, "and you know it hasn't. What is more, you don't want him to answer it."

Hosmer's angry expostulations were lost in Judge Cook's censure.

At another time Dr. Bishop's irritation—he had been pestered beyond belief by a cross-examination which was particularly galling—showed itself in a tart remark, which was aimed at Knight, and which that gentleman promptly resented. Dr. Bishop said that when arsenic had been used in embalming an autopsy could give no satisfaction to anyone and would only afford scope for the ingenuity of the opposing counsel. Knight was on his feet in a moment and the doctor hurriedly said that he did not intend his remark to apply to any particular attorney.

At another time Knight said sententiously, "We are on trial for the murder of Mrs. Dunning," making himself particeps criminis, and at the same time seeking unsuccessfully to exclude testimony in regard to the condition of Mrs. Deane. Unlike the Durrant case, the testimony concerning this double crime comes in together, for the stories of the double death are inextricably mingled. A great deal of attention was given in the cross-examination of Dr. Wolf, in an attempt to make him say that he found arsenic crystals in the candy, but these attempts came to nothing. The only point proved was that arsenic in lumps and in pulverized form was found, both being forms of amorphous arsenic. As the poison was bought at the Owl Drug Company [illegible] amorphous [illegible] the skirmishing over [illegible] came to nothing.

The morning opened with John H. Pennington still on the stand undergoing cross-examination. He said that he did not touch the contents. After he took charge of the box of candy it was out of his possession only once, to the time when it was turned over to McVay [illegible] to San Francisco [illegible] a flushed and anxious face, cold extremities and a cold perspiration on her body. He remained with her until her death, which occurred the afternoon of that day. The lips were livid and afterward purple, and after death there was a puffiness about the face. He was asked what, in his opinion, was the cause of death, and he answered the question indirectly by saying that all these symptoms were indicative of arsenical poisoning.

[illegible]

Dr. Bishop also attended Mrs. Dunning, but, as she was not so ill, he thought she would recover, and so devoted all his attention to Mrs. Deane. Just before Mrs. Deane died Mrs. Dunning came into the room to see her, but Mrs. Dunning was so weak that she had to lie down and be carried back to her room and put to bed. The doctor then went to his home, next door. About midnight he was called by Mrs. Dunning's nurse, who informed him that her feet were cold. Mrs. Dunning was sleeping lightly, but awoke and wanted to know what he was doing there. He told her he had just come in to see how she was. He remained all night and gave her stimulants at intervals, but the heart action steadily diminished. The pulse was not irregular, but was very weak. At 8 o'clock, at the suggestion of Mr. Pennington, Dr. Downes was called in. The pulse then ranged from 96 to 100. There was a cold perspiration on the forehead and all the symptoms that Mrs. Deane had exhibited. These symptoms increased, and Mrs. Dunning died at 8:45 o'clock that evening. The body had the same swollen appearance at the extremities and also about the abdomen. The treatment of the morning was continued after the consultation.

"With your knowledge what would you say caused the death of Mrs. Dunning?" asked Hosmer.

"The symptoms were those of arsenical poisoning," answered the witness.

"Did that cause her death?"

"I believe it did."

"Have you any doubt about it?"

"I have not."

The box of candy then became the subject of inquiry and the witness told of taking the chocolate creams to Dr. Wolf, the State chemist, for analysis. He went to Newark, where Wolf is professor of chemistry in Delaware College, and left the candies with the chemist. He was accompanied by a [illegible] of the college and Dr. [illegible] never off the box. The witness went on to Wilmington. When he was returning to Dover on the evening of the same day Dr. Wolf got aboard the same train and said to the witness: "You were right, doctor. There is any quantity of arsenic. I examined three pieces of the candy." The arsenic [illegible] in hard [illegible]

Knight began his cross-examination by asking if the death certificate [illegible] required in Delaware. On receiving an affirmative reply he asked:

[illegible]

neutralize the poison, and then mucilaginous drinks to allay further absorption. He did not discover that the patients were suffering from arsenical poisoning until the morning of the day on which Mrs. Deane died. The day before Mrs. Deane had told him she had eaten candy and he had asked if any of it was colored green.

"Why did you not ask for the chocolate creams then?" asked Knight.

"I don't know," said the witness doggedly. "None of us is perfect."

"Did you not testify on Monday, August 15th, before the Coroner's jury that if the candy had been subjected to heat ptomaines might have developed, and you did not know what had caused death?"

"I did."

"Why do you say now that it was arsenical poisoning?"

"I read the chemist."

"If he were [illegible] and all [illegible] you could not know positively what had caused death?"

"I would still believe from the symptoms that it was arsenical poisoning."

Knight again asked as to what cause had been given in the death certificate, and the witness said he could not remember whether or not he had given death certificates in the cases of Mrs. Deane and Mrs. Dunning.

"Did you suggest to Dr. Downes that the patients were dying of arsenical poisoning?"

"I advanced that theory."

"Why did you not act on it?"

"We were in the dark. We were not as wise as some people might have been," answered the witness, sarcastically.

"As you and Dr. Downes stood by Mrs. Dunning's deathbed you were still in the dark?"

"We saw considerable light before she died."

"Was it luminous enough to see arsenic?"

"Not quite then. I was nearly convinced but not quite sure."

The witness said he advanced the theory of arsenical poisoning at the inquest. He was positive that arsenic had caused the deaths of the women.

"When you found that out why did you not use remedies for that poison?" asked Knight.

"It was too late then," answered the witness.

Dr. Bishop said it was he who urged the Penningtons to have an inquest. They did not want it as Mrs. Pennington was ill. The doctor, however, insisted and the defense wished to know why the physician insisted on an inquest if he was sure of the cause of death.

The witness did not know why a postmortem had not been held, and said that was the duty of the Coroner, not of the doctor.

On redirect examination the witness [illegible] that [illegible] bodies had been embalmed a postmortem would have little weight as the embalming fluid contained arsenic. The defense annoyed [illegible] by asking some questions as to the [illegible] affected by arsenic. Dr. Bishop [illegible] that all the internal organs [illegible] the [illegible] were affected [illegible] the [illegible] question as to what organs [illegible] Asked as to [illegible] he said that a [illegible] him. He [illegible] his knowledge [illegible] he did not know that [illegible] affected the [illegible]

[illegible] was a much better [illegible] He testified that he was called [illegible] for consultation over [illegible] Mrs. Dunning. From her [illegible] that she had [illegible] At the inquest [illegible] the candy open [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] evidence that the candy had been [illegible] and he [illegible] that [illegible] there were [illegible] and the [illegible] were [illegible] [illegible] crystals [illegible] there was sufficient to change crystallized arsenic [illegible] He was [illegible] however [illegible] the arsenic used in the [illegible] The largest [illegible] was about the size of a pea [illegible] was [illegible] as [illegible] arsenic lumps [illegible]

[illegible] as large as your head," replied the witness, dropping his technicalities [illegible] the [illegible] learned.

"You don't know how big my head is sometimes," was the retort. In response to a question Dr. Wolf stated that arsenic had no taste.

Attorney-General White of Delaware identified the box, candy wrapper, handkerchief and note. By way of cross-examination Knight said:

"Feeling well, are you, General, to-day?"

"Very well, thank you," responded the surprised witness, stiffly.

"No further questions," said Knight.

Bernard J. McVay, State Detective of Delaware, told of receiving articles of evidence from John P. Pennington, bringing them across the continent and turning them over to Chief Lees. On cross-examination McVay stated that no one had been allowed to see the articles while he was bringing them from Delaware.

Chief of Police I. W. Lees testified that he had received the articles consigned to the care of Detective McVay by Pennington. Afterward he had the various exhibits in the case photographed. He gave eight pieces of the candy to Professor Thomas Price for purposes of analysis. Later Professor Price and Dr. Wolf were allowed to break open ten pieces of the candy, part of which they carried away for further analysis. The witness identified the wrapper, box and other articles, including the envelopes containing the anonymous letters. On cross-examination he said that his handwriting experts were Eisenschimmel, Ames and Kytka. It had been proved when they examined the writings.

The box of candy was then offered in evidence. Knight objected, but the Court admitted it, saying that if it was not connected with the defense he would entertain a motion to strike it out.

At the conclusion of the testimony of Chief Lees an adjournment was taken until 10 o'clock this morning.

THE DEATH CERTIFICATE.

Arsenical Poisoning Given in Delaware as the Cause.

A telegram was sent to Delaware last night to ascertain the cause of death as given in the certificate. The answer was as follows:

WILMINGTON (Del.), December 14.—The cause of death was arsenical poison according to the certificate and verdict of the Coroner's jury.

TWO WORDS ENOUGH.

Collector Harper's Foolish Petition Is Speedily Denied.

Two words from the Supreme Court, written yesterday, put the end that was expected to a stupid attempt to break into the Botkin case. The attempt was made last week by L. P. Boardman, an attorney, and W. L. Harper, a bill collector, and took the form of a petition for a writ of prohibition directed to Superior Judge Cook. The avowed purpose was to have the Supreme Court pass upon the matter of jurisdiction, and possibly, save the State further expense. Harper's interest was alleged to be that of a taxpayer. The Supreme Court did not deem the matter worthy of an opinion. Justice McFarland, for the court sitting in bank, merely indorsed the request, "Petition denied."

NO DELAY MARS THE COURSE OF EVENTS IN THE BOTKIN CASE.

JOSHUA D. DEANE.

JOHN P. PENNINGTON.

MISS LEILA DEANE

MISS JOSEPHINE BATEMAN

DOVER PEOPLE ON THE STAND.

Several Who Partook of the Poisoned Candy Tell of After Effects.

SOMETHING of Eastern dispatch, instead of the accustomed delays of California murder cases, appears in the progress of the Botkin case. A third of the Delaware testimony is in already, and at the present rate the case should be finished before the end of the year at the worst. Knight's cross-examination, though come as a witness, though urged to do so by the prosecution.

Other questions showed the drift of the defense. For one thing, Knight asked every witness at length as to his or her symptoms after eating the candy. Some of them had burning pains and some of them had no pains at all. Harry Pennington testified that he had a great desire for water to quench his internal fever. Mr. Deane testified that believe it came from the Pennington garden."

"Did you experience any feeling of sickness after partaking of the supper?"

"I did not."

Mr. Deane said that his wife had spells of vomiting and retching all day Wednesday and all Wednesday night. Thursday morning these spells almost ceased. She was perfectly conscious, but taking no interest in what was going on about her, although she answered questions. Her body was like ice, but she seemed to be in a great deal of pain. She kept saying, "Fan me, I am burning up. There is a perfect fire inside of me." This kept up until just a few moments before her death. Her features showed great pain and suffering.

The witness did not know of Mrs. Dunning's illness until the morning of August 10th. He was in her room several times, and found her suffering in the way his wife was suffering. His daughter was also ill, and he attended her himself during her illness. Deane did not see the candy until after the death of his wife and Mrs. Dunning.

On cross-examination Deane said that Dr. Bishop, the family physician of the Penningtons, was first called in at 7 o'clock on the morning after his wife was taken ill.

"Did the physician examine the bottles and phials about the room?" asked Knight.

Hosmer objected, and Knight said, "Supposing strychnine was found?"

"Supposing it wasn't found," retorted Hosmer. "The question is not proper cross-examination."

The question was allowed, and Deane answered that there had been no such examination.

"What did the doctor say was the matter with Mrs. Deane?" asked Knight.

"He said she was suffering from cholera morbus."

"Did he say it was from eating corn fritters?"

"He did not."

The witness testified that the doctor had also diagnosed the cases of Mrs. Dunning and Leila Deane as cholera morbus.

John B. Pennington was the next witness. He said that on August 9th, after supper, he had lain down a little while and then went out on the porch, where there was a family gathering. Mrs. Dunning had the box containing candy in her hand. The witness was out during the early part of the evening. Shortly after he returned the family retired. About 12 o'clock he heard Mrs. Deane retching and vomiting. The next morning Mrs. Deane was still sick, and Mrs. Dunning was also sick. The witness told briefly the story of the illness and death of the two women. The morning of the day on which Mrs. Deane died Pennington said he went into Mrs. Dunning's room and asked her where she had put the box of candy which she had received. He found the box, incased loosely in the wrapper, lying on top of a secretary. The witness identified the wrapper, box and handkerchief. The handkerchief was offered in evidence, but, Knight objecting, it was temporarily withdrawn.

The witness told of comparing the address on the wrapper with that on an envelope in his possession. He told of anonymous letters received by Mrs. Dunning from San Francisco. The contents of the letters were not gone into, but two of the envelopes were introduced for purposes of identification. One was addressed to "Mrs. John Dunning," and was postmarked June 13, 1897. The other was to "Mrs. John P. Dunning," and bore date of July 3, 1897. The witness said there was another letter, received a few weeks before the one addressed to "Mrs. John Dunning," but that it had been lost or destroyed. When the second letter came Mrs. Dunning gave it to the witness and asked him to intercept such communications in the future.

[illegible] the case should be finished [illegible] the end of the [illegible] close and omitting no point that might cloud the issue, is not galling. The Dover people make good witnesses. The only one who was not up to specifications yesterday was Thomas M. Gooden, ex-Postmaster of Dover. He was one of those witnesses who are perfectly certain of a particular thing, but whose memories, when tested, prove weak on every point save the one desired to be emphasized. Gooden could identify the Dunning package without looking at it, but he could remember nothing about the other mail for the Pennington family that passed through his hands upon that night or any other night, nor could he remember what other packages, if any, came to Dover people in that evening mail in August.

Otherwise the witnesses held out very well, telling plain, unvarnished tales, and agreeing on all main particulars. The defense paid much attention to finding out whether the women who died might not have eaten something besides the candy on the evening of August 9th which might have caused the sickness from which they subsequently died. There was close questioning about the fish, the corn fritters, the scrambled eggs, the coffee and the bread which composed the meal in the Dover home, but it was difficult to trace any particular article, as each of the Pennington family seemed to have hupped on a different thing. Several of the members of the [illegible] of the fish and had have [illegible] of that dish. Others had [illegible] the corn fritters. Mr. Deane seemed to be the only person who ate heartily of all the viands and was not ill.

Finding that the cook was a colored woman named Rosie the defense sounded all the witnesses to see whether or not there had been some trouble between Rosie and Mr. Pennington. Mr. Deane became somewhat indignant at this line of questioning. He replied with dignity that they had always been fortunate in having good cooks. Mr. Pennington, the father of the women who died, made a particularly good witness, being careful and deliberate in spite of the fact that he is a lawyer and lawyers do not generally make good witnesses. As long as he lives the events of that terrible day will live in Mr. Pennington's memory, and he is able to give a clear and succinct account of them. Had it not been for him, it might yet have been believed that the two women died of cholera morbus. He it was who thought of the candy, sent it to be analyzed and discovered that a poisoner had been at work. Although an old man Mr. Pennington's memory is as good as ever it was. Asked if he had had the water, the pipes or the cooking utensils in his house examined he said that he had not, unless subsequent, continuous use of the same articles, without any bad results, might be taken to prove their cleanliness. Mr. Pennington considers that he owes his life to a lifelong habit of chewing tobacco. If he had not had his mouth full of the weed he would probably have accepted Mrs. Dunning's invitation to share the candy.

In the light of what happened afterward Mr. Pennington's account of what Mrs. Dunning said to him as he came out on the porch that balmy August night was pathetic. "See, papa," she said, "what a nice box of candy I have and I don't know who sent it. Won't you have a piece?"

One important bit of evidence from the standpoint of the defense was the fact, dropped by Miss Ethel Millington, and hitherto unmentioned, that there was another person on the porch that night—one who ate candy but was not made ill. Little Elizabeth Dunning ate candy from the ill-fated box and never felt a qualm, but it is said that she nibbled at the hard chocolates which, happily, were innocuous. The other young girl was Miss Clark of Trenton. Her name was caught up eagerly by the defense and inquiry into her physical condition will doubtless be made by the supporters of Mrs. Botkin. Detective McVey says that he understood that Miss Clark was [illegible] but that he refused to and some of them had no pains at all [illegible] toward fever. Mr. Deane testified that his wife seemed to be burning up inside and asked continuously to be fanned, though her body was like ice to the touch. Leila Deane and Ethel Millington testified that they had no pain at all, only languor, accompanied by headache and nausea. Ethel Millington testified that she did not vomit, though she was nauseated. From this diversity of symptoms Knight will probably attempt to prove, by means of expert medical testimony, that the candy eaters were not poisoned by arsenic at all, since they did not all exhibit the well-known symptoms of arsenical poisoning.

The defense was jubilant over the testimony of Miss Bateman, who testified that she picked arsenic crystals from her teeth, and that in the candy she ate was a gritty substance which did not dissolve in water. From this will be drawn several deductions favorable to Mrs. Botkin.

In brief, the witnesses so far called told of the arrival of the box in Delaware, the eating of the candy, the illness that followed, the deaths of two of those who ate, the subsequent investigation of the ingredients of the candy, and the comparing of the address with the anonymous letters.

When court adjourned Mr. Pennington was still on the stand. Most of the Delaware testimony is in, except the medical and chemical showing, and, most important of all, Dunning's story of the woman and the crime.

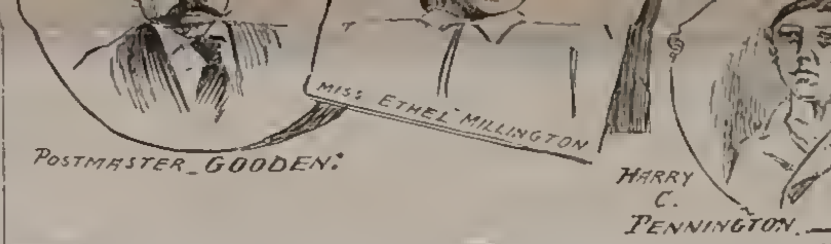
There is nothing particularly exciting in this murder trial. Only the testimony of Dunning and Mrs. Botkin offer even a chance for a sensation.

Meanwhile, devoid of any sensation, with testimony that is but a repetition of what has already been published, and sometimes a little short of that, the trial drags along sleepily. People come from curiosity, merely, and crowd the courtroom until there is not a particle of air that has not been used three, four, five times. They might as well stare at a graven image as Mrs. Botkin, for she never smiles nor frowns, nor exhibits the slightest emotion. The only time when she even bends her head is when she consults with her attorneys, Messrs. McGowan, Wheeler and Knight. At other times she is perfectly passive, quiet and immobile. She never varies her black raiment, though yesterday a tiny knot of purple violets from the prison yard was fastened to the waist of her tailor gown. Occasionally she casts her eyes up at the poor little bait of the cheap cotton handkerchief, or idly eyes the faded pink box of candy—that candy that no one ever desires to taste. It would take a good deal of a sweet tooth to make any one nibble at that fatal box. It stands around, passing from the hands of Detective Ed. M. Gibson to that of the witnesses, and its contents are quite safe from larceny.

Mrs. Botkin was supported by two of her sisters. Miss Dora Brown had indulged in some new millinery and a becoming lawn tie about her neck. Mrs. S. C. McClure of Healdsburg, evidently an older sister, was quietly dressed in black and was accompanied by her husband.

Not the slightest hint of the interference of a person named Boardman came yesterday to ruffle the serenity of the courtroom. It was as though that young person had never existed. The first motion made by Knight was that all the witnesses should be excluded from the courtroom. This was granted, the Judge making the order apply to witnesses on both sides. That the statement freely made in some papers that Mrs. Botkin will be the defense's only witness is untrue was shown by the flutter which the Judge's order caused among people not known to be witnesses. Exceptions to the rule were made in the cases of Attorney-General White of Delaware, Chief Lees and Miss Brown, Mrs. Botkin's sister. The Delaware witnesses were led in their exile by Dunning, who thereafter paced the hall impatiently, smoking long and black cigars. Thereafter the witnesses were admitted one by one, coming in with the sheepish air of students up for examination and walking in before the crowded courtroom as though the ordeal was not exactly pleasant.

The first witness was Thomas M.



Gooden, Postmaster of Dover, Del., at the time when the package arrived. He said that on August 9th the 5.55 mail brought an oblong package addressed to Mrs. John P. Dunning. One of the distributors called Gooden's attention to the package, which he placed in the Pennington box. At this point the wrapper of the box was produced by Mr. Hosmer, and the witness, scarcely glancing at the wrapper, identified it. The wrapper went into evidence as the people's first exhibit.

On cross-examination Knight devoted himself to testing the witness' memory.

"How is it that you remember this package so well?" asked the attorney.

"Because I handled it three times," was the answer.

The witness said Pennington only received an ordinary amount of mail, and that the package for Mrs. Dunning was the only one placed in his postoffice box on that day.

"Could you not be mistaken?" queried Knight.

"No," answered Gooden, "I remember the package well."

The witness went on to say that Dover was a place of between 3500 and 4000 inhabitants and that there were about 250 lock boxes in the Postoffice.

"Just state one other package that came that day or the day before," urged Knight.

"I can't, sir," replied the witness.

The Postmaster could not remember whether he handled other packages that night or not. He could not remember any one else who had any mail, though he thought that Samuel W. Hall probably had some. He did not see the package taken from the pouch which came out of the West, but he presumed that it must have come out of the pouch, because all the mail on the distributing table must have come out of that pouch, there being no other place for it to come from. As the Postmaster left the stand he did not seem to be altogether pleased with himself.

Harry Pennington, a grandson of John P. Pennington, says he is 16 years of age, but looks three years younger. He spoke so low that it was all the Jury, let alone the eager auditors in the back of the room, could do to hear him. The boy, who is a half orphan, lives in Wilmington, but was spending the summer with his grandfather. It was his duty to go after the mail every evening after supper. On this particular night he went to the Postoffice between 6.30 and 7 o'clock. He found a small package in the box, addressed to Mrs. Dunning, and carried it home to her. The family was on the porch, and Mrs. Dunning immediately opened the box and passed the candy about. The boy identified the box, the wrapper, the poor, cheap rag of a handkerchief and the note of pretended affection. He testified that the little Dunning girl took some of the hard chocolates. He, himself, took some chocolate peppermints and a chocolate cream. Miss Millington and Miss Bateman came, and they also were offered candy, and accepted it. They remained on the front porch until about 8.15 o'clock, when Miss Millington and Miss Bateman went away. Mrs. Deane and Leila went out to make a call, and Mrs. Dunning, her little girl and her nephew went for an evening stroll. They returned about 9 o'clock, the boy going up stairs almost immediately. The candy was not passed around again that night. The witness was not sick until the next morning at breakfast time, when he had a dull headache and a great desire for water. These symptoms, with vomiting and purging, continued for a day and a half. The boy was attended by Dr. Bishop, and thought his medicine was in the form of a pill.

Leila Deane was the next witness. She also had had her doubts about the fish and had made her supper off scrambled eggs and corn fritters. She identified the box and said that when it arrived she tried to make out the postmark, but could only decipher "Francis." She identified the note and thought the handkerchief was similar to the one in Mrs. Dunning's box. She ate one soft piece of chocolate and two or three hard pieces of chocolate caramel. With her mother she went out to spend the evening, returning about 10 o'clock. They went into the parlor and played a game of parchesi. No one ate any more candy that night, so far as the girl saw. The witness was taken sick on Wednesday morning. When she got up she felt too ill to dress and went back to bed again. On Thursday morning she managed to get down stairs, but was not able to sit up. She vomited a great deal and had a blinding headache.

"My mother was taken sick," said the witness, "about midnight on Tuesday night. She vomited all night and all day Wednesday. I did not know Mrs. Dunning was sick until Wednesday morning. I did not see her until Thursday morning. By Saturday morning I was all right."

Miss Josephine Bateman, teacher in the public school of Dover, was next called to tell of her experience with the poisoned candy. She testified that on the evening of August 9th she was on her way to visit a friend, and as she was passing the Pennington home Mrs. Dunning called her in. The witness examined the wrapper and identified it, also the box and handkerchief. Miss Bateman took one piece of candy—a chocolate cream with a pecan on top.

"What happened after that?" asked Hosmer.

"I left the Penington place and began to eat the candy as I went along the sidewalk. As I was finishing the candy my teeth encountered something hard, and I took three hard lumps from my mouth and threw them on the ground. Afterward I found a foreign substance in my gums and removed it with my finger. The substance was arsenic, but I did not know it at that time."

"What effect, if any, did the candy have upon you?"

"My gums and lips were ulcerated the next day. I was very sick, having pains in my stomach and back. I felt languid and nauseated. I was sick all day Wednesday and languid all day Thursday."

Miss Bateman thought it rather surprising that a friend should write such a note on a small piece of paper. She said that there was no taste to the lumps she found. They were merely of a gritty nature. In size they were a little larger than the head of a pin. They were something like a piece of rock salt, and at first she thought that there had been some foreign substance in the sugar from which the candy was made.

Miss Bateman said the symptoms of her illness were similar to those of cholera morbus, and the feeling like seasickness.

At this point an adjournment was taken until 2 o'clock.

Ethel J. Millington, daughter of a Dover hotel-keeper, was the first witness of the afternoon. She testified that she called at the Pennington house about 7 o'clock on the evening of August 9th, and on the invitation of Mrs. Dunning took a chocolate cream and ate it. She had supper at her father's hotel, and it was not followed by any ill effects. The next day she became sick and was sick all day. She was nauseated, and was so weak she had to remain in bed.

Joshua D. Deane, husband of one of the victims of the poisoner, next took the stand. The witness said that he was a merchant doing business in Dover. He and his wife and daughter made their home with the Penningtons. He was at home on the evening of August 9th and took supper there.

"Of what did that supper consist?" asked Hosmer.

"Trout, scrambled eggs, corn fritters, bread and butter and coffee."

"What was the condition of the fish?"

"I purchased it myself. It was fresh and not long out of water."

"Was the corn from which the fritters were made canned corn?"

"It was not. It was green corn, and I

[illegible] Dunning gave it to the witness [illegible] was not shown to Mrs. Dunning.

"How many envelopes were received?" asked Knight.

"One besides the two offered in evidence. The first one was searched for among Mrs. Dunning's effects, but it was not found. I did not see its contents, but talked with Mrs. Dunning about it."

The witness said he made no examination of the candy, but after the burial of his daughters gave pieces to Dr. Bishop to have them analyzed. As to the phial of arsenic brought back he could not give the size of the crystals, as he had not examined them closely.

Knight returned to the letters and brought out the fact that Pennington had compared the address on the wrapper with that on the envelope addressed to "Mrs. John P. Dunning." The witness declared that they were written by the same person.

Pennington was still undergoing cross-examination at 4 o'clock, when an adjournment was ordered until 10 o'clock this morning.

DECEMBER 14, 1898.

McGLADE IS INDICTED FOR RANK FORGERIES

Grand Jury Finds Two Charges.

AMBROSE TELLS HIS STORY

SCHOOL BOARD INVESTIGATION FINALLY DROPPED.

Adjournment Will Probably Be Taken on Next Friday Afternoon—Attorney Dunne Files His Report.

Call

Peter McGlade, defaulting deputy of the Street Department, the man who betrayed the implicit trust of his friend and employer, Superintendent of Streets Ambrose, and robbed the city of hundreds of dollars by means of fraudulent and forged warrants, was last night indicted by the Grand Jury upon a charge of forgery. The indictment included two counts, one for forging the name of T. B. McGinnis, a deputy in the office of the clerk of the Board of Supervisors, the other for forging a warrant upon the City and County of San Francisco. After bringing the indictment the jury wound up its evening's session by deciding to meet on Friday afternoon for the purpose of requesting Judge Belcher to declare it adjourned.

The Jury's investigation into the case of McGlade was neither a matter of difficulty nor of much time. Detective Thomas B. Gibson, who has had charge of the case, had his testimony so arranged and his witnesses so well rounded up that all the evidence to be taken was in hand within an hour, and half of the twenty-six witnesses who had turned up in answer to subpenas were dismissed without being heard. Supervisors Haskins, Rivers and Rottanzi of the Finance Committee were the first heard, but their evidence was of no importance. They were followed by Superintendent of Streets Ambrose.

Mr. Ambrose made a frank, open statement of every phase of the case of which he was cognizant. It was the first time that he had consented to speak fully of what he knew of McGlade and his transactions, and his plain statement convinced the jury, were it not already convinced, that the Superintendent and his office is not in any way blamable, no matter what unwarranted insinuations have appeared to the contrary.

Mr. Ambrose did not spare McGlade. He told the jury that the former deputy's position in the office was not a political appointment, that he had always been one of his warmest friends and had always trusted him in the fullest and that the position had been given him on the basis of that friendship. He explained how it had been possible for McGlade to take blank warrants from the office, but he stated that he had never given him authority to use his name. Mr. Ambrose also exonerated any of the employes of his office from complicity in his deputy's crimes, and with that statement he was dismissed.

Auditor Broderick and Thomas B. McGinnis were also examined, as was Expert Kytka, who testified that all of the names save those of McGlade and the members of the Finance Committee of the Board of Supervisors had been forged. McGlade's signature was genuine, and the body of the bogus warrants was written in his handwriting. Kytka said he had discovered seventy five forgeries in all, and that he deemed McGlade guilty of them.

The investigation into School Board crookedness has been finally dropped. The jury decided to have nothing more to do with it, upon the advice of District Attorney Dunne, who reported that any indictment brought for an infringement against the one-twelfth act would be [illegible] through lack of both evidence and sufficient law. The jury will be probably finally adjourned on Friday afternoon.

HAVOC WROUGHT BY A DELUGE IN NEW YORK CITY

Collapse of a Giant Gasholder Releases the Water.

Huge Wave Drowns Several Persons and Wrecks Buildings.

DAMAGES ABOUT $500,000

The Flood Washes Women and Children Out of the Lower Floors of Tenements.

THE DEAD RECOVERED.
ANDREW WENDT, workman.
JOHN GRAY, seventy-five years old.
PIUS BAUM, engineer.

MISSING.
GEORGE BREWER, time-keeper.
(GUSTAVE) WINKLE, fifteen years old, son of Foreman Winkle.
JAMES O'CONNOR, foreman in Fuldner's factory.

INJURED.
CATHERINE O'CONNELL, four years old; seriously.
PETER WALKER, seriously.
FIFTEEN OTHERS more or less severely, or almost drowned.

(Special Dispatch to "The Examiner.")

NEW YORK, December 14.—Eight million gallons of water, rushing in a raging torrent through east-side streets last evening, caused death and destruction on every side. The largest gas-holder in the country collapsed under hydrostatic pressure. Several lives were lost. Men, women and children were swept from their feet and dashed bruised and bleeding against pavements and walls, many receiving fatal injuries. A furniture factory was wrecked, two tenement-houses demolished, trucks in the streets broken to pieces, gas-mains destroyed and the city below Grand street left in darkness, so far as the gas supply was concerned. The damage is estimated at half a million dollars.

The gas-holder which collapsed was located at Avenue A and Twentieth street and was the property of the Consolidated Gas Company. Many men were engaged in making a hydrostatic test of the huge tank when it burst, and of these the body of only one had been found up to an early hour this morning.

The collapse of the holder under pressure released an enormous volume of water, estimated at 8,000,000 gallons, which rushed in a huge wave through the adjacent streets, sweeping away in its headlong course scores of pedestrians. Almost all those injured were caught in this way in the flood.

So terrific was the force of the torrent that great iron gas main pipes, nearly four feet in diameter, were whirled along in the flood, in some instances for a distance of 200 yards, and were shivered against each other like so many vessels of clay. Heavy trucks standing along the curb were lifted bodily, turned over and over and dashed into fragments against the walls of houses.

A four-story furniture factory in Avenue A, immediately adjoining the site of the gas-holder, was completely wrecked, and two tenement houses next to it were so damaged by the fall of the debris and the rush of water that they will probably have to be demolished.

In its fall the giant gas-holder crushed many of the largest mains belonging to the company, with the result that all that part of the city below Grand street was last night deprived of gas. Twenty-first street, between Avenue A and First avenue, is now blockaded by a tangled mass of twisted iron

(Continued on Page Two.)

MRS. BOTKIN WEARIED BY THE LONG TALE OF DEATH.

MRS. BOTKIN'S ONE QUICK LOOK AT THE CROWD AS SHE SAT DOWN.

How Mrs. Dunning Suffered and Died, and How Arsenic Enough to Kill an Army Was Found in the Chocolates.

By Edward H. Hamilton.

Mrs. Botkin was wearied. She rested a tired head on her hand. Behind her black veil her eyes looked worn. The malodorous air; the strain of bearing up under a thousand eyes; the long recital of dreadful suffering ending in the tragic deaths—all this was beginning to tell.

It was in the afternoon of yesterday that she drooped. "Poison" had been written all over the day's trial like a label on a dangerous bottle. The skull-and-bones of death were there, with the convulsions and agonies and last gasps of victims.

The Delaware doctors told how Mrs. Dunning ... the idea that arsenic was the cause, and while rattling one doctor a good deal, had rather the worse of the contest with the other.

Then the State Chemist of Delaware told of finding the arsenic in the candy—lumps of arsenic as big as peas, and some powdered arsenic as well. Attorney Knight was very particular about this arsenic. His idea seems to be that the druggist who is to swear that he sold Mrs. Botkin arsenic will declare that it was powdered and not in lumps. There is also a rumor that Professor Price in this city did not find in the candy the same kind of arsenic as was found by Dr. Wolfe, Delaware's official chemist.

Such matters seem very small, but when a case depends entirely on circumstantial evidence the slightest flaw may offer the opportunity to break it all down. Consequently Attorney Knight is prying into every possible crevice, looking into all corners, eager to take advantage of every misstatement or misconception. So far it seems that Mrs. Botkin relies upon negativing the prosecution's case rather than offering positive testimony on her own behalf.

Just when Knight will spring his point as to the jurisdiction of the California courts over a murder in which the death occurred in Delaware, he will not say. It appears that he will let the prosecution go on to the end, for the death of Mrs. Dunning in Delaware has been amply proven, but he has made no sign. Still, he says he has absolute confidence in the point.

"It is certain that Mrs. Botkin cannot be tried here," he said yesterday.

Beyond this, Knight expects to rip to pieces the proof of arsenical poisoning. He expects to show that the only certain way of proving death from that cause is by an analysis of the stomach of the victim. No such analysis was made in this case, and the defense will contend that without it there is ... way of proving "beyond a reasonable Buildings.

DAMAGES ABOUT $500,000

The Flood Washes Women and Children Out of the Lower Floors of Tenements.

THE DEAD RECOVERED.
ANDREW WENDT, workman,
JOHN GRAY, seventy-five years old.
FILS BAUM, engineer.

MISSING.
GEORGE BREWER, timekeeper.
GEORGE WINKIE, fifteen years old, son of Foreman Winkle.
JAMES O'CONNOR, foreman in Fuldner's factory.

INJURED.
CATHERINE O'CONNELL, four years old, seriously.
PETER WALKER, seriously.
FIFTEEN OTHERS more or less severely, or almost drowned.

(Special Dispatch to "The Examiner.")

NEW YORK, December 14.—Eight million gallons of water, rushing in a raging torrent through east-side streets last evening, caused death and destruction on every side. The largest gas-holder in the country collapsed under hydrostatic pressure. Several lives were lost. Men, women and children were swept from their feet and dashed bruised and bleeding against pavements and walls, many receiving fatal injuries. A furniture factory was wrecked, two tenement houses demolished, trucks in the streets broken to pieces, gas-mains destroyed and the city below Grand street left in darkness, so far as the gas supply was concerned. The damage is estimated at half a million dollars.

The gas-holder which collapsed was located at Avenue A and Twentieth street and was the property of the Consolidated Gas Company. Many men were engaged in making a hydrostatic test of the huge tank when it burst, and of these the body of only one had been found up to an early hour this morning.

The collapse of the holder under pressure released an enormous volume of water, estimated at 8,000,000 gallons, which rushed in a huge wave through the adjacent streets, sweeping away in its headlong course scores of pedestrians. Almost all those injured were caught in this way in the flood.

So terrific was the force of the torrent that great iron gas main pipes, nearly four feet in diameter, were whirled along in the flood, in some instances for a distance of 200 yards, and were shivered against each other like so many vessels of clay. Heavy trucks standing along the curb were lifted bodily, turned over and over and dashed into fragments against the walls of houses.

A four-story furniture factory in Avenue A, immediately adjoining the site of the gas-holder, was completely wrecked, and two tenement houses next to it were so damaged by the fall of the debris and the rush of water that they will probably have to be demolished.

In its fall the giant gas-holder crushed many of the largest mains belonging to the company, with the result that all that part of the city below Grand street was last night deprived of gas. Twenty-first street, between Avenue A and First avenue, is now blockaded by a tangled mass of twisted iron

(Continued on Page Two.)

MRS. BOTKIN'S ONE QUICK LOOK AT THE CROWD AS SHE SAT DOWN.

How Mrs. Dunning Suffered and Died, and How Arsenic Enough to Kill an Army Was Found in the Chocolates.

By Edward H. Hamilton.

Mrs. Botkin was wearied. She rested a tired head on her hand. Behind her black veil her eyes looked worn. The malodorous air; the strain of bearing up under a thousand eyes; the long recital of dreadful suffering ending in the tragic deaths—all this was beginning to tell.

It was in the afternoon of yesterday that she drooped. "Poison" had been written all over the day's trial like a label on a dangerous bottle. The skull-and-bones of death were there, with the convulsions and agonies and last gasps of victims.

The Delaware doctors told how Mrs. Dunning and Mrs. Deane died. The prosecution's efforts were directed toward getting out in bold relief the fact that arsenical poisoning and nothing else caused the deaths. The defense vigorously attacked the idea that arsenic was the cause, and while rattling one doctor a good deal, had rather the worse of the contest with the other.

Then the State Chemist of Delaware told of finding the arsenic in the candy—lumps of arsenic as big as peas, and some powdered arsenic as well. Attorney Knight was very particular about this arsenic. His idea seems to be that the druggist who is to swear that he sold Mrs. Botkin arsenic will declare that it was powdered and not in lumps. There is also a rumor that Professor Price in this city did not find in the candy the same kind of arsenic as was found by Dr. Wolfe, Delaware's official chemist.

Such matters seem very small, but when a case depends entirely on circumstantial evidence the slightest flaw may offer the opportunity to break it all down. Consequently Attorney Knight is prying into every possible crevice, looking into all corners, eager to take advantage of every misstatement or misconception. So far it seems that Mrs. Botkin relies upon negativing the prosecution's case rather than offering positive testimony on her own behalf.

Just when Knight will spring his point as to the jurisdiction of the California courts over a murder in which the death occurred in Delaware, he will not say. It appears that he will let the prosecution go on to the end, for the death of Mrs. Dunning in Delaware has been amply proven, but he has made no sign. Still, he says he has absolute confidence in the point.

"It is certain that Mrs. Botkin cannot be tried here," he said yesterday.

Beyond this, Knight expects to rip to pieces the proof of arsenical poisoning. He expects to show that the only certain way of proving death from that cause is by an analysis of the stomach of the victim. No such analysis was made in this case, and the defense will contend that without it there is no way of proving "beyond a reasonable doubt" that arsenic caused Mrs. Dunning's death.

It was evident from the testimony of Dr. Lemuel H. Bishop, the family physician, that he did not get around to the arsenic theory till late in the case. He even had some notion that death resulted from ptomaines at the time the inquest was called. Ptomaines have been very fashionable in

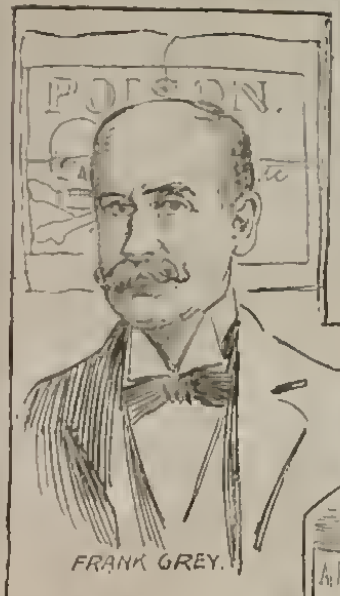
THE MAN OF ERUDITION AND OF DEADLY POISONS.

"THAT IS THE WOMAN," SAYS DRUG CLERK FRANK GREY.

MRS. BOTKIN RISES AND IS IDENTIFIED.

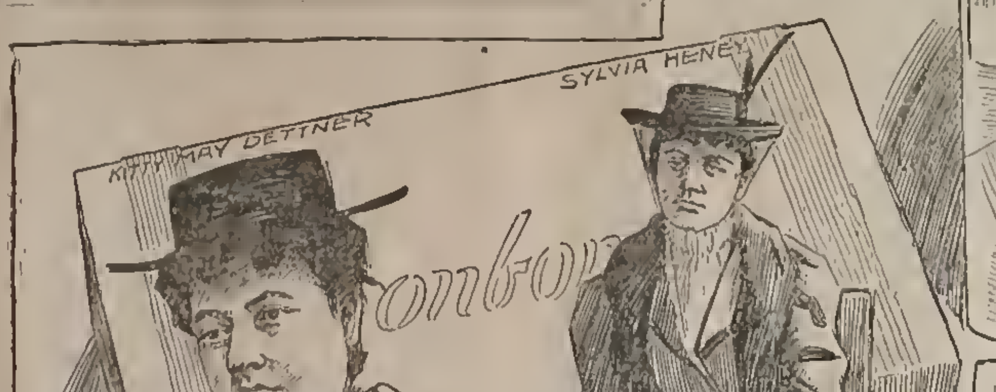
For the First Time Her Name Is Mentioned in the Poisoning Trial—Candy Girls on the Stand.

AT LAST the defendant has come into the Dover poisoning case. Mrs. Botkin's name was mentioned for the first time yesterday at 11 o'clock, and thereafter she was called upon four times to rise and subject herself to the scrutiny of witnesses, a series of ordeals that must have been far from pleasing. When ordered to do so by her attorney, Mrs.



FRANK GREY.

DAVID GREEN.



KITTY MAY DETTNER

SYLVIA HENEY

Botkin half rose, smiled a faint, forced smile and then sank again to the seat from which she never fully rose. Her teeth glittered as she mutely challenged the witnesses to identify her, and her lips drew aside painfully as if the smile hurt. As a matter of fact, only one out of four witnesses identified her positively. Another witness believed that Mrs. Botkin and her candy customer were the same, and the other witnesses could not even be as positive as to that. Yet, despite several small successes on the part of the defense, the prosecution began to connect Mrs. Botkin with the box of candy which has already cost two lives and may demand another before its vengeful purpose is satisfied.

By far the most important testimony was that of Frank Grey, a clerk from the Owl drug store. Grey testified crisply that he knew Mrs. Botkin by sight, and that on June 1st he sold her two ounces of arsenic, which she said she wanted for bleaching hats. Grey's story was up to specifications, and was exactly the same as has been foreshadowed so many times. It was a dramatic moment when Knight asked: "Do you identify the lady in court?"

Mrs. Botkin rose deprecatingly and smiled consciously, while the witness answered quite coolly, as though it were a matter of no moment: "Yes, that is the lady."

The packed courtroom heaved and sighed and palpitated as one man. The bailiff's sharp tap recalled it to itself, but the courtroom refused to suppress its satisfaction. It was athirst for excitement, and at every suggestion of humor of what passes for such an audible titter ran round the room. Three times the Judge threatened to clear the courtroom unless the disturbance ceased. In fact, the Judge was so angry that he delivered a little lecture on courtroom etiquette, and in his excitement his construction became slightly involved. "I will not permit this sort of thing to proceed to be carried on," he remarked sternly, frowning the frown that once made witnesses for the prosecution tremble. It is the same gloomy look, only now it blights the just and the unjust at the same time.

"This is a murder trial," his honor went on, "and I intend to have seemly conduct here," and the frown became even more fierce. "If this occurs again I will have the courtroom cleared." And that was all the reward the crowd received for its appreciation of a fine point. The titterers [illegible] again, and the [illegible] pass in ominous silence.

The drizzle kept no one away. W[illegible] came at [illegible] the [illegible] dense than ever. [illegible]

... and shows it on every possible occasion. Hosmer is an exceedingly touchy man, and he bristled with wrath when a covert attack was made upon the Stockton candy man and his testimony that "blew up." Several times Chief Lees attempted to compel Knight to accept photographic copies and certified copies instead of originals, at which the defense became angry and blustered like the north wind. In the matter of the poison book of the Owl Drug Store the original was forced into court by Knight, but as to the signed statements of the candy girls he was compelled to accept certified copies. "Copies certified by whom?" sniffed the attorney contemptuously.

When copies came at last Knight baited the candy girls with them. These girls prefer to be called "salesladies," but Knight dubbed them "pretzel peddlers." Just the same, they proved better witnesses than had been expected. Sylvia Heney, whose name begins with poetry and ends with prose, had a detailed story, to which she stuck in every particular. She was subjected to the most severe cross-examination of the trial, and was unshaken. Before Knight was through with her she was as red as a peony and was fanning herself with her purse, while a tender-hearted bailiff revived her with a glass of water. In the beginning Miss Heney took Mrs. Botkin's cue and swathed herself in a thick, black veil, but the jurors, who are taking an active interest in the trial, requested her to remove it so that they might watch the play of expression on her features. Knight's cross-examination did not shake the girl in any of the main features of her story. She was contradicted on several points by her friend, Kittie Dettner, who came immediately after, and who did not hear the testimony of Miss Heney.

The only rout suffered by the prosecution was when it sought to prove that Mrs. Botkin had purchased two kinds of arsenic—amorphous and crystallized. The amorphous purchase was readily proved by Grey, but when David Green of a rival drug store sought to prove that the witness had purchased crystallized arsenic of him about the last of May or the 1st of June, he failed utterly to identify the witness, and the forces of the prosecution were ingloriously routed. The defense hugged this solitary comfort to its breast, and the Chief of Police, who had kept this new witness a secret, did not seem altogether happy. It was also said, though not in court, that Chief Lees had become possessed of a letter written by Mrs. Botkin to Governor Budd, in which she asked to go to Manila as a Red Cross nurse. This is regarded as valuable as an exemplar of Mrs. Botkin's handwriting, but as there are several other acknowledged samples of her chirography, it is not vital.

The first witness of the day was Thomas Price, the analytical chemist. He is the antithesis of Wolf just as he is the opposite of that lean and hungry apothecary who figured in the tragic lines of "Romeo and Juliet." Price is a little roly-poly man familiar to San Francisco juries. He illustrated the difference between the commercial and the [illegible] chemist, most of what he [illegible] entirely clear to the layman [illegible]. When he [illegible] grains of arsenic [illegible] candies he wrote familiarly [illegible] the Judge's desk until he and [illegible] came near sitting together [illegible] such been put into the candy would it ever assume the lump form?"

"No, sir."

The witness said he saw no evidences of the candies having been opened for the purpose of inserting a foreign substance. On redirect testimony he said he had never heard of arsenic being used to bleach straw. When questioned as to the substances forming on copper bottles, he replied that such poison would not be found in candy in lumps.

"Crystalline arsenic is sometimes pulverized, is it not?" asked Hosmer.

"Yes, sir."

"If put into water or subjected to moisture, would it assume an amorphous condition?"

"It would."

Juror Daniels wanted to know if big lumps kept in a drug store might pulverize, and was informed that they might.

Dr. Wolf was recalled and testified that he had never heard of arsenic being used to bleach straw.

Frank Grey, clerk for the Owl Drug Company, was the next witness. He said he had known Mrs. Botkin by sight since August, 1897. On the 1st day of last June she came into the store where he was employed and asked for arsenic. She was alone at the time. The witness asked her what she wanted to do with the arsenic, and she replied that she intended to use it to bleach straw hats. When told that other chemicals were better adapted to bleaching she said she was accustomed to using arsenic in that way. The witness then gave her two ounces of pulverized arsenic and took her name and address, the entry in the poison register, written in his own hand on June 1st, being "Mrs. Botkin, Victoria Hotel, California and Hyde streets."

On cross-examination Knight wanted to know why the witness had quit the employment of Druggist Hoffman in Ukiah and why he had been dismissed from the pharmacy of the Ukiah Insane Asylum. Hosmer objected strenuously, and Knight said, "You mustn't get tender in these matters whenever the bird flutters. Suppose the witness had been let out of these places because he does not know the difference between arsenic and antimony?"

The objection was overruled and the witness said he had left the first place to go to the second and had been let out of the asylum pharmacy for some unknown reason. He thought politics was at the bottom of it.

Grey could not remember any other person purchasing arsenic on June 1st. Knight called for the record. He was offered a photographic copy.

"The book—I want the book," he shouted, and the witness was temporarily excused.

David Green, a drug clerk who was employed in the Star drug store last May and June, was called to the stand. He [illegible] that some time in the latter part of May or the early part of June he sold [illegible] of arsenic to a woman flashily dressed and of stout build. [illegible] all he said the examination. He wanted to know if a record of poison sales had been kept by Green, but as testimony regarding the sale had been ruled out an objection to the question was sustained.

The defense then lost its temper and blurted out: "This is a race for publicity between rival drug stores for advertising in the newspapers their sale of poisons. [illegible] the Owl and Star drug companies were the [illegible] had the [illegible] and arsenic [illegible] in the city. We haven't got through with your Owl drug store yet."

But Knight's bark was worse than his bite. When Grey came back the defense had changed its mind and let him off almost without question, to the great surprise of the witness, who was prepared for a siege.

At 2 o'clock Grey and the poison register of the place where he is employed were on hand. A package similar to the one sold to Mrs. Botkin was admitted in evidence for identification, the Court reserving its ruling on Knight's objection. The register, however, was not admitted, as Grey had testified as to all the facts from memory and had said that the entry in the register was in his own handwriting. On re-direct examination he said that his successor in the Ukiah Asylum pharmacy was a stepson of one of the directors of the institution.

Sylvia Heney, "saleslady" in the Market-street candy store of George Haas & Son, next gave testimony. Miss Heney has a thin sylvan pipe of a voice. She said that on the afternoon of Sunday, July 31st, she remembered making a sale of chocolate candy to a woman, whom she described as being not very tall and inclined to be stout.

"Is the defendant the party to whom you sold the candy?" asked Hosmer.

"I believe she is."

Miss Heney then told of the woman coming into the store and asking to see some fancy boxes, and after an inspection selecting a bonbon box. The witness said the box introduced in evidence looked like the one selected by her customer. Going back to the sale of the candy Miss Heney said she started to fill the box with mixed chocolates, but at the request of the customer, who said she wanted to put something else in the box, she did not quite fill it. Miss Kitty Dettner, also a "saleslady" in the store, was present at the time and brought the witness some tissue paper to put around the box. A brown paper was used for the outside wrapper. The witness thought she placed the seal of the firm on the box, but was not sure. As the box of candy was not a full pound the customer was charged 40 cents instead of 50 cents. The fancy box was 25 cents extra. The witness identified the candy sent to Mrs. Dunning as being from the Haas stock, and said the addressed wrapper around the package was the kind of paper used by her in wrapping up the box purchased by her customer. The ornamental seal of the Haas firm was introduced in evidence for the purpose of illustrating testimony.

Miss Heney said she noticed her customer particularly, as she walked around the store and seemed to be rather nervous. The latter part of the statement was stricken out.

Then the tiger had fun with the saleslady.

Knight cross-examined the witness at length minutely as to the statements she had made to the police and her numerous visits to the City Hall for the purpose of identifying Mrs. Botkin. She said she had thought of the transaction on July 31st without suggestion from any one, and then talked it over with her employer, but on this point she contradicted herself later. Knight tried over and over again to get the witness to declare positively whether or not her customer was Mrs. Botkin, but the invariable answer was, "I believe she is the woman." As to a time when she went to the City Prison, the witness said she did not know when she was sent for that it was with the object of having her identify Mrs. Botkin. Knight asked for the two statements made by Miss Heney to Chief of Police Lees. He disputed Hosmer's assertion that the originals were at present in the State of Delaware, but finally accepted certified copies and asked numerous questions, which failed to shake the testimony of the witness. Miss Heney was sure she could distinguish Haas' candy from any other made in the United States. The witness made the mistake of acknowledging [illegible] store [illegible] statements [illegible] corrected herself by saying that the signature looked like her handwriting. Miss Heney admitted many interviews with detectives.

Miss Kitty Dettner, also employed by Haas, followed Miss Heney on the stand. She remembered the sale on the afternoon of July 31st. Miss Heney's customer, said the witness, was rather short and active in her movements.

"How did the party you saw then compare in size, manner and action with Mrs. Botkin?"

"They are the same," answered the witness, meaning that they had similar peculiarities.

The witness told of the customer requesting that space be left in the box for another present. As to the box and the wrapper that had [illegible] the fatal package she said they were similar to others kept in stock at her place of employment.

The cross-examination of Miss Dettner was briefer but [illegible] that of Miss Heney. Knight asked questions referring to Mrs. Botkin as the customer of July 31st. The witness corrected him by saying sharply that she had not said positively that the customer was Mrs. Botkin.

"Have you any doubt about it?" asked Knight.

"Yes, sir," replied Miss Dettner. "I did not see enough of her to be sure."

The witness said that at the suggestion of Chief Lees she and Miss Heney went to the City Prison to catch sight of the defendant while she was on her way to the courtroom, and see if they could not identify her.

Just then Knight turned suddenly to Chief Lees and said: "Don't you hide your head, Chief Lees, the witness will do all of that that is necessary."

To Miss Dettner he said: "Don't look at him, he might lead it wrong."

In answer to further questions Miss Dettner said that Mrs. Botkin resembled the customer in general appearance, height and build, but as to features she could not say, as she did not see the customer's face. The witness remembered the day because it was the first Sunday after her summer vacation. She identified the box in evidence, as its color was faded, and it was the only faded box of its kind in stock.

The witness was excused and an adjournment taken until 10 o'clock this morning. Beginning to-day and continuing until the trial closes the sessions of court will be from 10 A. M. to 12:30 P. M. and from 2 P. M. to 4:30 P. M.

M'GLADE IS NOW INDICTED FOR FORGERY.

Two Charges Presented in the Court Against Him.

Bail Fixed at $20,000 and the Prisoner Stays in Jail.

STANTON TO BE HEARD.

Grand Jury Will Meet Monday to Hear Former Teacher's Story.

Peter W. McGlade, former bookkeeper in the office of the Superintendent of Streets was indicted yesterday on two charges of forgery, and his bail on each charge was set at $10,000, so that he cannot hope to leave prison unless some friend comes to his assistance with bail bonds of $20,000.

The indictments had the effect of taking McGlade's case out of the Police Courts into the Superior Courts, where political influences may not be used to secure his acquittal.

The Grand Jury met in the afternoon and presented two indictments in Department 7 of the Superior Court, accusing McGlade of forgery. One indictment was founded on the forgery of the name of T. B. McGinnis, a clerk in the Supervisors' office, September 1st, on a demand for $36 made out to T. Dwyer, one of the friends used by McGlade. The other alleged forgery was on a demand in favor of H. J. Swords for $36, September 1st, and purporting to be signed by Thomas J. Clark, gang foreman. Swords is McGlade's stepbrother, and his name was used to defraud the city. McGinnis, Dwyer and Swords were innocent parties, their signatures having been forged, it is alleged, by McGlade.

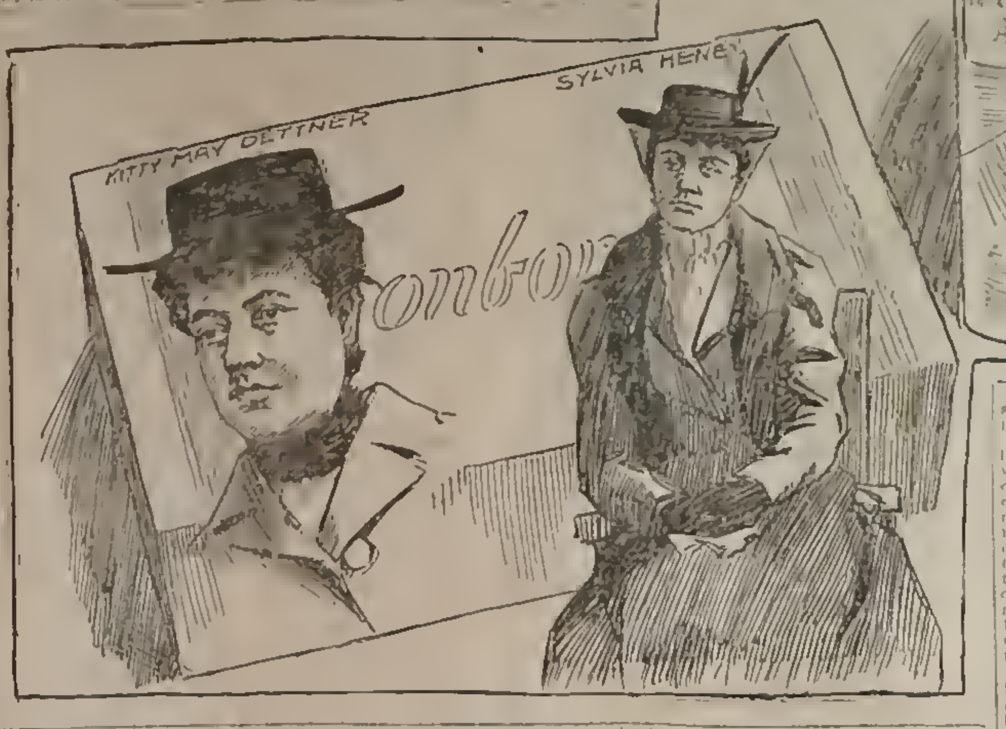
Warrants were issued and served on McGlade in the City Prison, who was then charged and returned to his cell.

Foreman McKee stated to Judge Belcher that the Grand Jury had discussed adjourning sine die yesterday, but as the indictment against D. E. Stanton was dismissed and he was on his way back to San Francisco, the Grand Jury decided to meet again Monday afternoon and hear Stanton's evidence against the School Board.

Expert Wright, who examined the ferry depot building, and Expert Kytka, who passed upon the forgeries in the McGlade case, caused the Grand Jury some trouble over payment of their demands. Wright's report has been used by the Senate Committee now investigating the [illegible] and an effort was made to have the [illegible] because the "sol d [illegible]" refused to appropriate [illegible] the Grand Jury [illegible] investigating frauds. Kytka [illegible] may not be paid [illegible] such serv[illegible]

Girls on the Stand.

AT LAST the defendant has come into the limelight [illegible] case. Mrs. Botkin's name was mentioned for the first time yesterday at [illegible], and [illegible] she was called upon four times to rise and submit herself to the scrutiny of witnesses—a series of ordeals that must have been far from pleasing. When ordered to do so by her attorney, Mrs. [illegible] and showed it on every possible occasion. If ever [illegible] is an exceedingly [illegible] man, and he bristled with wrath when a covert attack was made upon the [illegible] candy man and his testimony that [illegible] several times [illegible] Lees attempted to [illegible] Knight to accept photographic copies and certified copies [illegible] originals, at which the defense became angry and [illegible] like the north wind. In the matter of [illegible]



Botkin half rose, smiled a faint, forced smile and then sank again to the seat from which she never fully rose. Her teeth glittered as she mutely challenged the witnesses to identify her, and her lips drew aside painfully as if the smile hurt. As a matter of fact, only one out of four witnesses identified her positively. Another witness believed that Mrs. Botkin and her candy customer were the same, and the other witnesses could not even be as positive as to that. Yet, despite several small successes on the part of the defense, the prosecution began to connect Mrs. Botkin with the box of candy which has already cost two lives and may demand another before its vengeful purpose is satisfied.

By far the most important testimony was that of Frank Grey, a clerk from the Owl drug store. Grey testified crisply that he knew Mrs. Botkin by sight, and that on June 1st he sold her two ounces of arsenic, which she said she wanted for bleaching hats. Grey's story was up to specifications, and was exactly the same as has been foreshadowed so many times. It was a dramatic moment when Knight asked: "Do you identify the lady in court?"

Mrs. Botkin rose depressingly and smiled complacently, while the witness answered quite coolly, as though it were a matter of no moment: "Yes, that is the lady."

The packed courtroom heaved and sighed and palpitated as one man. The bailiff's sharp tap recalled it to itself, but the courtroom refused to suppress its satisfaction. It was a-tingle for excitement, and at every suggestion of humor or what passes for such an audible titter ran round the room. Three times the Judge threatened to clear the courtroom unless the disturbance ceased. In fact, the Judge was so angry that he delivered a little lecture on courtroom etiquette, and in his excitement his construction became slightly involved. "I will not permit this sort of thing to proceed to be carried on," he remarked sternly, frowning the frown that once made witnesses for the prosecution tremble. It is the same gloomy look, only now it blights the just and the unjust at the same time.

"This is a murder trial," his honor went on, "and I intend to have seemly conduct here," and the frown became even more fierce. "If this occurs again I will have the courtroom cleared." And that was all the [illegible] the crowd received for its appreciation of a fine point. The [illegible] did not occur again, and the throng let beautiful points pass in virtuous silence.

The drizzle kept no one away. Women came at the risk of ruining their furbelows, and the [illegible] of men was more dense than ever. The courtroom was full of the [illegible] which damp wool gives [illegible], and the windows clouded and ran drops of perspiration. There were many headaches from the close air and the [illegible] ordinance was violated every minute. Damp umbrellas [illegible] and steamed, mackintoshes gave off their [illegible] aroma and the whole place was [illegible] and uncomfortable. Even Mrs. Botkin felt the oppression of the air. She was more animated than usual, changing her position frequently, fanning herself vigorously, looking at the witnesses critically, consulting with her attorneys and altogether taking a more active interest in the proceedings than before she came audibly into the case. In the afternoon she removed her right glove and wrote a little note, which she coolly tucked away into the bosom of her gown. The hand that she uncovered was [illegible] and plump and white—a trifle too much like a pincushion for beauty, but full of coquettish suggestion. Behind the first lady in the case [illegible] women were taking off their hats as though at a play. The Botkin case is [illegible] becoming a spectacle.

Charles Wheeler, one of Mrs. Botkin's attorneys, has been [illegible] from her side, [illegible] was [illegible] he was away [illegible] the defense, [illegible] an air of expectation.

There were several passages at arms between Knight [illegible] Hosmer and [illegible] and [illegible] the defense had the [illegible] for the prosecution.

the poison book of the Owl Drug Store the original was forced into court by Knight, but as to the signed statements of the candy girls he was compelled to accept certified copies. "Copies certified by whom?" sniffed the attorney contemptuously.

When copies came at last Knight baited the candy girls with them. These girls prefer to be called "salesladies," but Knight dubbed them "pretzel polishers." Just the same, they proved better witnesses than had been expected. Sylvia Heney, whose name begins with poetry and ends with prose, had a detailed story, to which she stuck in every particular. She was subjected to the most severe cross-examination of the trial, and was unshaken. Before Knight was through with her she was as red as a peony and was fanning herself with her purse, while a tender-hearted bailiff revived her with a glass of water. In the beginning Miss Heney took Mrs. Botkin's cue and swathed herself in a thick, black veil, but the jurors, who are taking an active interest in the trial, requested her to remove it so that they might watch the play of expression on her features. Knight's cross-examination did not shake the girl on any of the main features of her story. She was contradicted on several points by her friend, Kittie Dettner, who came immediately after, and who did not hear the testimony of Miss Heney.

The only rout suffered by the prosecution was when it sought to prove that Mrs. Botkin had purchased two kinds of arsenic—amorphous and crystallized. The amorphous purchase was readily proved by Grey, but when David Green of a rival drug store sought to prove that the witness had purchased crystallized arsenic of him about the last of May or the 1st of June, he failed utterly to identify the witness, and the forces of the prosecution were ingloriously routed. The defense hugged this solitary comfort to its breast, and the Chief of Police, who had kept this new witness a secret, did not seem altogether happy. It was also said, though not in court, that Chief Lees had become possessed of a letter written by Mrs. Botkin to Governor Budd, in which she asked to go to Manila as a [illegible] nurse. This is regarded as valuable as an exemplar of Mrs. Botkin's handwriting, but as there are several other acknowledged samples of her chirography, it is not vital.

The first witness of the day was Thomas Price, the analytical chemist, who is the antithesis of Wolf, just as he is the opposite of that lean and hungry apothecary who figured in the tragic [illegible] of "Romeo and Juliet." Price is a little, roly-poly man familiar to San Francisco juries. He illustrated the difference between the commercial and the professional chemist, most of what he [illegible] being entirely clear to the layman [illegible] exceedingly business-like. When he [illegible] up the grains of arsenic found in several candies he wrote familiarly on the top of the Judge's desk until he and Judge Cook came near sitting together in bank. But no one could censure such a good-humored and clear-headed witness.

Chemist Price testified as to analyzing samples of the candy sent to Chief of Police Lees by the Delaware authorities. He had first made examination of five candies and some broken pieces, and had found a little over eighteen grains of arsenious acid which had come from arsenic in amorphous form, as distinguished from crystalline arsenic. The poison was in pulverized form, no lumps being found. Later the witness, while with Dr. Wolf, broke open several pieces of the candy from the box in possession of Chief Lees and found arsenic in lump form. Samples showing what the witness had found in the candy were admitted in evidence, and a sample of crystalline arsenic was admitted for purposes of identification.

On cross-examination the witness said arsenious acid was used in making pigments and also to convert nitro-benzine into aniline.

"You state that you found nothing but pulverized arsenic in your tests, while Dr. Wolf says he found lumps?" asked Knight.

"Yes."

"When you both went to Chief Lees' office you found lumps?"

"Yes; at that time I did not look for fine arsenic."

"If the powdered form of arsenic had been put into the candy would it ever assume the lump form?"

"No, sir."

The witness said he saw no evidences of the candies having been opened for the purpose of inserting a foreign substance. On redirect testimony he said he had never heard of arsenic being used to bleach straw. When questioned as to the substances forming on copper kettles, he replied that such poison would not be found in candy in lumps.

"Crystalline arsenic is sometimes pulverized, is it not?" asked Hosmer.

"Yes, sir."

"If put into water or subjected to moisture, would it assume an amorphous condition?"

"It would."

Juror Daniels wanted to know if big lumps kept in a drug store might pulverize, and was informed that they might.

Dr. Wolf was recalled and testified that he had never heard of arsenic being used to bleach straw.

Frank Grey, clerk for the Owl Drug Company, was the next witness. He said he had known Mrs. Botkin by sight since August, 1897. On the 1st day of last June she came into the store where he was employed and asked for arsenic. She was alone at the time. The witness asked her what she wanted to do with the arsenic, and she replied that she intended to use it to bleach straw hats. When told that other chemicals were better adapted to bleaching she said she was accustomed to using arsenic in that way. The witness then gave her two ounces of pulverized arsenic and took her name and address, the entry in the poison register, written in his own hand on June 1st, being "Mrs. Botkin, Victoria Hotel, California and Hyde streets."

On cross-examination Knight wanted to know why the witness had quit the employment of Druggist Hoffman in Ukiah and why he had been dismissed from the pharmacy of the Ukiah Insane Asylum. Hosmer objected strenuously, and Knight said, "You mustn't get tender in these matters whenever the bird flutters. Suppose the witness had been let out of these places because he does not know the difference between arsenic and antimony?"

The objection was overruled and the witness said he had left the first place to go to the second and had been let out of the asylum pharmacy for some unknown reason. He thought politics was at the bottom of it.

Grey could not remember any other person purchasing arsenic on June 1st. Knight called for the record. He was offered a photographic copy.

"The book—I want the book," he shouted, and the witness was temporarily excused.

David Green, a drug clerk who was employed in the Star drug store last May and June, was called to the stand. He testified that some time in the latter part of May or the early part of June he sold two ounces of arsenic to a woman flashily dressed and of stout build. Unkindest cut of all, he said the woman was "somewhat prepossessing."

"Did the woman resemble the defendant in this case?" asked Hosmer.

"Somewhat," was the answer.

Knight then broke in calling on Mrs. Botkin to stand up while the witness looked at her. The defendant stood up and Hosmer objected to Knight's methods. Hosmer did not want the witness to look and Knight did. Knight raised his strident voice and was rebuked by the Court. When quiet was restored the witness said Mrs. Botkin reminded him of his customer.

Judge Cook then asked a question. "Can you say that you feel that the defendant is the woman to whom you sold the arsenic?"

"No, sir," answered Green.

Hosmer then asked whether the witness had sold lump arsenic, and, when objection was made to the question, said that he expected to show that the woman who made the purchase had told Green she wanted the arsenic to bleach hats, and had spoken of having been at the Owl drug store. The objection was sustained because of the failure of the witness to identify the defendant. Green was allowed to testify, however, that the firm by which he was employed had lump arsenic on sale at the time in question.

Knight asked one question on cross-surprise of the witness, who was prepared for a siege.

At 2 o'clock Grey and the poison register of the place where he is employed were on hand. A package similar to the one sold to Mrs. Botkin was admitted in evidence for identification, the Court reserving its ruling on Knight's objection. The register, however, was not admitted, as Grey had testified as to all the facts from memory and had said that the entry in the register was in his own handwriting. On re-direct examination he said that his successor in the Ukiah Asylum pharmacy was a stepson of one of the directors of the institution.

Sylvia Heney, "saleslady" in the Market-street candy store of George Haas & Son, next gave testimony. Miss Heney has a thin sylvan pipe of a voice. She said that on the afternoon of Sunday, July 31st, she remembered making a sale of chocolate candy to a woman, whom she described as being not very tall and inclined to be stout.

"Is the defendant the party to whom you sold the candy?" asked Hosmer.

"I believe she is."

Miss Heney then told of the woman coming into the store and asking to see some fancy boxes, and after an inspection selecting a bonbon box. The witness said the box introduced in evidence looked like the one selected by her customer. Going back to the sale of the candy Miss Heney said she started to fill the box with mixed chocolates, but at the request of the customer, who said she wanted to put something else in the box, she did not quite fill it. Miss Kitty Dettner, also a "saleslady" in the store, was present at the time and brought the witness some tissue paper to put around the box. A brown paper was used for the outside wrapper. The witness thought she placed the seal of the firm on the box, but was not sure. As the box of candy was not a full pound the customer was charged 40 cents instead of 50 cents. The fancy box was 25 cents extra. The witness identified the candy sent to Mrs. Dunning as being from the Haas stock, and said the addressed wrapper around the package was the kind of paper used by her in wrapping up the box purchased by her customer. The ornamental seal of the Haas firm was introduced in evidence for the purpose of illustrating testimony.

Miss Heney said she noticed her customer particularly, as she walked around the store and seemed to be rather nervous. The latter part of the statement was stricken out.

Then the tiger had fun with the saleslady.

Knight cross-examined the witness at length minutely as to the statements she had made to the police and her numerous visits to the City Hall for the purpose of identifying Mrs. Botkin. She said she had thought of the transaction on July 31st without suggestion from any one, and then talked it over with her employer, but on this point she contradicted herself later. Knight tried over and over again to get the witness to declare positively whether or not her customer was Mrs. Botkin, but the invariable answer was, "I believe she is the woman." As to a time when she went to the City Prison, the witness said she did not know when she was sent for that it was with the object of having her identify Mrs. Botkin. Knight asked for the two statements made by Miss Heney to Chief of Police Lees. He disputed Hosmer's assertion that the originals were at present in the State of Delaware, but finally accepted certified copies, and asked numerous questions, which failed to shake the testimony of the witness. Miss Heney was sure she could distinguish Haas' candy from any other made in the United corrected [illegible] saying [illegible] she had not said positively that [illegible] customer was Mrs. Botkin.

"Have you any doubt about it?" asked Knight.

"Yes, sir," replied Miss Dettner. "I did not see enough of her to be sure."

The witness said that at the suggestion of Chief Lees she and Miss Heney went to the City Prison [illegible] sight of the defendant while she was on her way to the courtroom, and see if they could not identify her.

Just then Knight turned [illegible] to Chief Lees and said: "[illegible] your [illegible] deal of [illegible]"

To Miss Dettner he said: "Don't look at him. Mr. Knight [illegible] wrong."

In answer to further questions Miss Dettner said that Mrs. Botkin resembled the customer in general appearance, height and build, but as to features she could not say, as she did not see the customer's face. The witness remembered the day because it was the first Sunday after her [illegible]. She identified the box in evidence as it [illegible] was faded, and it was the only faded box of its kind in stock.

The witness was excused and an adjournment taken until 10 o'clock this morning. Beginning today and continuing until the trial closes the sessions of court will be from 10 A. M. to 12:30 P. M. and from 2 P. M. to 4 P. M.

M'GLADE IS NOW INDICTED FOR FORGERY.

Two Charges Presented in the Court Against Him.

Bail Fixed at $20,000 and the Prisoner Stays in Jail.

STANTON TO BE HEARD.

Grand Jury Will Meet Monday to Hear Former Teacher's Story.

Peter W. McGlade, former bookkeeper in the office of the Superintendent of Streets, was indicted yesterday on two charges of forgery, and his bail on each charge was set at $10,000, so that he cannot hope to leave prison unless some friend comes to his assistance with bail bonds of $20,000.

The indictments had the effect of taking McGlade's case out of the Police Courts into the Superior Courts, where political influences may not be used to secure his acquittal.

The Grand Jury met in the afternoon and presented two indictments in Department 7 of the Superior Court, accusing McGlade of forgery. One indictment was founded on the forgery of the name of T. H. McGinnis, a clerk in the Supervisors' office, September 1st, on a demand for $35 made out to T. Dwyer, one of the friends used by McGlade. The other alleged forgery was on a demand in favor of H. J. Swords for $96, September 1st, and purporting to be signed by Thomas J. Clark, gang foreman. Swords is McGlade's stepbrother, and his name was used to defraud the city. McGinnis, Dwyer and Swords were innocent parties, their signatures having been forged, it is alleged, by McGlade.

Warrants were issued and served on McGlade in the City Prison, who was then charged and returned to his cell.

Foreman McKee stated to Judge Belcher that the Grand Jury had discovered adjourning sine die yesterday, but as the indictment against D. E. Stanton was dismissed and he was on his way back to San Francisco, the Grand Jury decided to meet again Monday afternoon and hear Stanton's evidence against the School Board.

Expert Wright, who examined the ferry depot building, and Expert Kytka, who passed upon the forgeries in the McGlade case, caused the Grand Jury some trouble over payment of their demands. Wright's report has been used by the Senate Committee now investigating the structure, and an effort was made to have the [illegible] pay him, because the "solid nine" refused to appropriate money for the Grand Jury's use in investigating frauds. Kytka's claim may not be paid, as there is no fund for such services.

A SCORE OF WITNESSES AGAINST MRS. BOTKIN.

NEW LINKS ADDED TO THE CHAIN

Tracing the Parcel Through the Mail.

Inspector Erwin and the Package of Death.

Further Proof Touching the Purchase of the Candy.

Evidence as to the Finding of the Seal in the Prisoner's Room —Admissions Made by Defense.

TO THE case against Mrs. Cordelia Botkin the prosecution added yesterday a number of important bits of evidence, gleaned from the testimony of twenty-candy firm, followed Pape. He testified that the box in evidence was of the kind which he carried in stock. When shown samples of the candies sent to Mrs. Dunning he said, "They look very much like our manufacture." Haas was asked if prior to the present case any one had ever complained of candy from his place being poisoned. Knight objected, but was overruled and the witness answered, "No, sir."

The witness objected to telling how many employes he had during the months of July and August, saying it would give his competitors a basis on which to estimate the amount of his business. The question was not pressed. He identified the seal in evidence as the kind placed on packages purchased in his store.

On cross-examination Haas objected to telling where he purchased his seals. Knight insisted on an answer to the question. The witness then said the seals were manufactured in London, England, and purchased by him in 20,000 lots.

"Have you used that many seals?" asked Knight.

"Yes, since I have been in business," answered Haas.

"Then there are 20,000 of these seals out?"

"Yes," was the answer, and Knight, in a jubilant tone, said, "That is all."

Mrs. Loretta Simpson, formerly proprietress of the Hotel Victoria, the last home of Mrs. Botkin prior to her arrest, was the next witness. She testified that kin come into the hotel from the street with two packages, one oblong and the other small. The oblong package was of the shade of the wrapper in evidence. Mrs. Botkin left the hotel on the afternoon of August 4th, giving the witness written instructions to forward her mail to Healdsburg. The instructions and a letter from Mrs. Botkin to Mrs. Price were admitted in evidence, the defense acknowledging that the writing was genuine.

In response to a question the witness said that the seal was found by Mr. Rosello and given to the clerk. The witness said she had heard of Dr. Tyrell calling to attend Mrs. Botkin.

"Don't you know it was on Sunday, July 31st, that he called?" asked Knight.

"I know that it was not," answered the witness, decisively.

Another relay of Haas' employes had arrived by this time. Julia [illegible] Duane, Essie Fifvey, Laura Dwyer, Annie Jansen and Etta Bray all testified that they had not poisoned their employer's candy, and did not know any one else had ever poisoned it. Knight then obviated the necessity of further negative testimony by admitting that all of Haas' employes would testify to the same thing.

W. P. Rosello, finder of the seal, was the next witness. He testified that on September 7th, while with W. W. Barnes, he found a portion of a seal under the edge of a mat in room 26 of the Victoria Hotel. He gave it to Barnes, who put it in his pocket and said it was important. When shown a piece of a seal by Hosmer he said the piece he found was similar to that.

Knight attacked this witness savagely. He inquired into the affairs of the witness, who testified that he was an advertising man. When objection was made he suggested that Rosello might be a dummy put into the house by the police. Rosello said he was inspecting the room as he intended to and did move into it. The witness said he was circulating pamphlets for a local cafe. Knight looked over the pamphlet, said there was obscene matter on the last page, and had it admitted in evidence. Rosello said he had been circulating the pamphlets for only a few days, and had not read the article referred to by Knight —this in answer to a question by Juror Harrington.

W. W. Barnes, clerk of the Hotel Victoria, testified to being present when Rosello found the piece of a seal from the candy store of George W. Haas & Son. He identified the fragment and it was then admitted in evidence, despite the objections of Knight. The witness said Rosello had picked it up and handed it to him. He testified further that the room had not been thoroughly swept from the time Mrs. Botkin went away until the finding of the seal, as the room was closed up except on the one night when it was occupied by two transient guests whose names he did not know. On the day Rosello picked up the seal the witness found a small piece of paper on which the word "hospitality" and part of another word had been written. The defense admitted that the writing was that of Mrs. Botkin.

On cross-examination Barnes said that Police Captain Seymour and Detective Gibson had been admitted to room 26 three times before the finding of the seal. He was not always with them, and once they had remained alone in the room for half an hour. When Rosello found the seal he asked the witness to inform the police. Barnes denied that he at once took the seal from Rosello and put it into his pocket.

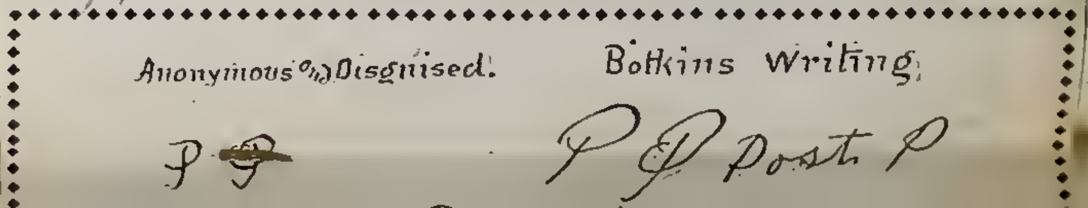
Barnes was the last witness of the day. At the close of his testimony an adjournment was taken until 10 o'clock this morning.

Daniel T. Ames, one of the handwriting experts who will be called upon to give his opinion as to the authorship of the handwriting that accompanied the poisoned candy, has caused the prosecution some annoyance and has weakened the effect of his testimony by rushing into the public prints before he was called on to give his evidence. Professor Ames' penchant for taking the public into his confidence nearly got him into trouble in the Fair will case, for while that was on trial and he was offering expert testimony, he gave a lecture on the handwriting in the case, and narrowly escaped punishment for contempt of court.

The defense will, undoubtedly, take every advantage of Ames' indiscretion. It is understood that the defense will attack the character of the testimony offered. It will attempt to throw discredit on the testimony of the physicians from the East and cast a doubt upon the cause of death. It will point out the weakness of all of the testimony that is not positive in character and assail all that is. The defense will attack expert testimony in general and the local experts in particular. It will attack the honesty and integrity of Dunning, the mental responsibility of Mrs. Rouff and Miss Livernash, and throw discredit on the testimony of the man who found the seal in Mrs. Botkin's room; the mail clerk who saw the package mailed, and the lady who sold Mrs. Botkin the handkerchief. Every possible doubt will be emphasized.

"THOU ART THE WOMAN," SAYS SCIENCE TO CORDELIA BOTKIN.

Ex.



SOME CANDY GIRLS.

four witnesses, the number of those testifying and the variety of the subjects covered making it one of the red-letter days of the cause celebre.

For to-day also there is an interesting programme. Everybody is waiting for Dunning to go on the stand. Though not the most important witness, he is the most sensational one. The prosecution has said that it intended to keep him for its valedictorian, but yesterday, when the bailiff called in stentorian tones "John D. Dunnigan," all hands mistook the name and thought that the man in the case was about to appear. Dunning evidently thought so himself, for he came in from the Judge's chambers and the whole courtroom shivered with excitement. The spectators had a delightful tingling of the spine, thinking that, at last, the sensation had arrived. But Dunning was sent back to his solitary confinement and in his place came an unimportant postal clerk, who became a witness solely because of a similarity of names. It is more than probable that Dunning will not come on until next week. There are a number of Stockton witnesses and people with whom Mrs. Botkin conversed after the tragedy and before the arrest. There are also the handwriting experts, who will probably take some time, judging by their previous performances. A handwriting expert is able to devote a week to a single curve and twirl as easily as not, and if the defense cross-examines them rigorously the testimony may prolong itself considerably.

With every day the case becomes more interesting and the crowd, swarming like bees in a honey pot, increases. Yesterday the Sheriff himself came to keep the peace and to plow a furrow through a field of solid humanity.

Mrs. Brown, the prisoner's sister, was absent during the afternoon, and it was said that she was spending her time urging a certain important witness to testify in her sister's behalf. Next to Mrs. Botkin sat the McClures of Healdsburg and a young man from the Seventh-Day Advent College of the McClures. This youth had a profile so similar to Mrs. Botkin's that many persons not familiar with the plump Beverley thought it must be the son.

The entire force of Haas' candy store was upon the stand yesterday. There were managers, candy-makers, "dippers," bonboniere and "saleesladies" without number. There were also postal inspectors, mail clerks and mail carriers, and lastly landladies and lodgers in the Hotel Victoria, where Mrs. Botkin formerly lived. The candy people were there to show that there were no poisons in Haas' establishment, that the cats caught the mice and rats in the basement and that there was never any poison about the place, that good materials were put into candy, and that the cooking utensils were kept clean. As Knight had persisted in looking for a reasonable doubt in the verdigris about the kettles, and in everything about the store, the prosecution, which is overlooking no point, big or little, called everybody in the store, from the prettiest "saleslady" to the humblest little chocolate dipper, which is not an astronomical constellation at all. Finally overwhelmed by the succession of witnesses, whom he refused to cross-examine, Knight admitted that all the other employes, if called, would testify on those bad days that they had put no arsenic in the candy which passed through their hands, and [illegible] returned to their chocolate creams.

Following the makers of sweet came the [illegible] people headed by Inspector Erwin. He swore as to the course of a letter going by the regular mail from here to Delaware. He testified that the mail leaving this city at 6 o'clock on the night of August 4th would have arrived at Dover on August 9th at 6:59 P. M., if all the trains were on time. He identified the dies used as postmarks at Station D, and they were introduced in evidence without opposition. Inspector Erwin said that he could not absolutely swear to the postmark, as it was not clear, but he believed it to be a San Francisco mark. He testified further that there was absolutely no way of determining where the package was mailed. It might have been mailed at the ferry or in South San Francisco. All the mail is stamped at Station D.

John D. Dunnigan was the mail clerk at Station D., who noticed the package because the name was so similar to his own. He remembered that the package was of the same shape as the one shown, though he would not say that it was of exactly the same size. He said at first that the paper was white, but afterward that it was light brown. He thought the address was "John P. Dunning, Dover, Delaware," and had no recollection of a prefix. He explained that he didn't want to get into the case, and so refrained from talking about it. He didn't want to go to Delaware, a plain California town being quite good enough for him.

Pressed by Knight as to why he tried to give the detectives a "steer," as he said, when a dummy box addressed like the original package was thrown about the station by the police, Dunnigan said: "It was because I didn't want to."

"Oh, that's a woman's reason," said Knight. "Give us a man's."

But Dunnigan is a determined young man, and his "dander" was up, and he declined to give a further reason.

Mrs. Loretta Simpson, landlady of the Victoria at the time Mrs. Botkin engaged a room there, was a lady with a jaunty purple hat tilted over her eyes and a four-in-hand tie of bright cerise. She was the first witness who had anything to say on the question of motive, though there will be plenty of testimony later on that point. Mrs. Simpson told how Mrs. Botkin and Dunning appeared at the Victoria to engage rooms, and how prostrated Mrs. Botkin was over Dunning's sudden departure, superinduced by a telegram from his employers. Mrs. Botkin was very much afraid Dunning would be killed.

Mrs. Simpson had an unpleasant cross-examination.

"Married or single?" inquired Knight, in irritating tones.

"Married," was the lady's equally brief reply.

"Where's your husband?" (spitefully).

"I don't know, sir" (crossly).

Then the attorney wished to know who had backed her in her lodging-house ventures, but was disappointed when he found that it was no person more romantic than a sister-in-law. Knight got from Mrs. Simpson the information that while the witness was landlady of the Victoria Mrs. Botkin conducted herself like a perfect lady, and the witness never saw anything improper between Mrs. Botkin and Dunning.

In the afternoon there were a number of shy witnesses who did not know that witness chairs were made to sit in. Some of them stood when asked to answer questions, remembering their school days, and many of them had never seen the inside of a court before. But the [illegible] crowd eyed them just the same, and their embarrassment was no reason why they should be let off from the [illegible].

The method of the defense demonstrated forcibly at yesterday's session, is to meet damaging testimony with sneers and reflections, express and implied, upon the private lives of witnesses. Knight's way is to bully and thunder when his subject is meek and nervous, to rasp and irritate when he encounters a temper on the stand, and, when he finds a witness who cannot be frightened or irritated, to try first ridicule and then the sneering aspersion of character, which the law permits upon cross-examination—these be the time-honored tactics of the attorney for the defense. The candy people passed yesterday without cross-examination, but those who told of the finding in Mrs. Botkin's room of the tell-tale seal were made to suffer all the ills that can befall a witness.

When it was all over those of the prosecution said they were well content, that their case was moving forward as they had planned it, and that when both sides were in there would not be the lingering shadow of a doubt as to who committed the atrocious Dover murders.

MORE LINKS IN THE CHAIN.

A Score of Witnesses Tell What They Know of the Murders.

When the morning session of the trial began Judge Cook announced that the package of arsenic put up by Frank Gray at the request of the police would be ruled out of evidence, as it had not been testified that the contents were from the same bulk as the purchase made by the defendant.

D. F. C. Droge, manager for George Haas & Son, was the first witness. He testified as to Miss Henry and Miss Dittner being at work on the afternoon of July 31st. He saw Miss Henry take an empty box from the window and go behind the counter to fill it. He did not see the customer. The witness testified that the box sent to Mrs. Dunning was of the same kind as those kept in stock at Haas' store. He identified the candy as having come from that store. He could not remember who worked on the other Sundays in July.

Henry Pape, foreman of the candy-making department of the Haas' firm, next took the stand. He explained the process of making chocolate creams and said there was no arsenic or anything else of a poisonous nature used in their manufacture. He identified the candy in evidence as having been made at the store of Haas & Son. The witness said the chocolates could easily be opened with a knife and the aperture closed up by heating the chocolate and redipping the candy.

The cross-examination was devoted mainly to minute inquiries as to the materials used by Pape in the manufacture of candies. Pape was also asked many questions as to the condition of appliances. He said the copper kettles and all other appliances were always kept clean. Some green coloring matter was used. He did not know what it was, but had tasted of it and had experienced no ill effects. The witness said that glucose manufactured in Chicago and bought by his firm by the barrel was sometimes used as a substitute for sugar. At times condensed milk was used instead of cream, but for chocolate creams, cream of tartar was used. In making chocolate creams the witness used sugar, water, cream of tartar and sweet chocolate. Pape said there had been no trouble with employes. A man named [illegible] had quit work in July on account of ill health.

George W. Haas, the a member of the [illegible] out?"

"Yes," was the answer, and Knight, in a jubilant tone, said, "That is all."

Mrs. Loretta Simpson, formerly proprietress of the Hotel Victoria, the last home of Mrs. Botkin prior to her arrest, was the next witness. She testified that she gave up her hotel on April 12th last, selling out to Mrs. Birdie Price. Mrs. Botkin was one of her lodgers, having come to the house last March in company with John P. Dunning. Dunning remained there five days and then went away in response to a telegram calling him to do newspaper duty at the scene of war. While Dunning was at the hotel Mrs. Botkin always breakfasted with him and the witness saw them going in and out together. When Dunning left Mrs. Botkin was almost distracted and told the witness of her sorrow, her loneliness and her fear that Dunning, of whom she was very fond, would be killed. Mrs. Botkin told the witness that she went over to Oakland with Dunning when he left the city and saw him start for the East.

Mrs. Simpson was asked to testify as to the Hyde-street cars, which pass the hotel. Knight observed the drift of the questions, and said: "Oh, yes, we admit that the Hyde-street cars run to Market street, that they run to Haas' store, that they run into the store."

On cross-examination the witness said Dunning and Mrs. Botkin occupied separate rooms at the Victoria and that the defendant had conducted herself properly.

James W. Erwin, United States postoffice inspector, was then called. When shown the wrapper of the package he testified that he believed the postmark thereon was that of the San Francisco postoffice. The mark was like that used at Station D, which is situated in the ferry building. The witness traced step by step the route of a package from San Francisco to Dover.

The witness identified dies used for stamping letters. There was 22 cents in postage on the package, and the witness testified that fourth-class mail matter was rated at 16 cents a pound.

Six money orders bearing the signature of Mrs. Botkin were admitted without objection. The defense further admitted that the boat connecting with the afternoon Healdsburg train during last August left the ferry at 4 P. M.

Erwin testified on cross-examination that he could not tell in what part of San Francisco the package was mailed, as fourth-class matter was not stamped until it reached the ferry.

John D. Dunnigan, mailing clerk at Station D, testified that early in August he saw an oblong package addressed to "John P. Dunning, Dover, Delaware," his attention being attracted by the similarity of the name to his own. He looked at the package for a minute or two. When shown the box of candy he said the package was the same shape as the one he had seen, but he could not say as to its size. The witness identified the postmark of Station D.

On cross-examination Dunnigan said he would have told what he knew before he did so but that he did not want to get into the case. The police officials visited Station D several times, and once passed around a package encased in a photographic copy of the original wrapper. The witness did not try to identify it then, but afterward told his story to Detective McVey.

Oscar A. Foster, letter carrier, was acquainted with Mrs. Botkin and had received written orders from her to have the address for delivering her mail changed. These orders, four in number, were put in evidence, the defense admitting them to be genuine.

Sylvia Henry, who testified on Wednesday that she sold a box of candy to a woman whom she believed to be Mrs. Botkin, was recalled and testified that her customer had a package when she came into the store. This package was small and square, and as it was laid down on the counter the witness had to push it out of the way when she began to wrap up the box of candy.

"Was it this package she had?" Knight asked, holding up the package of poison.

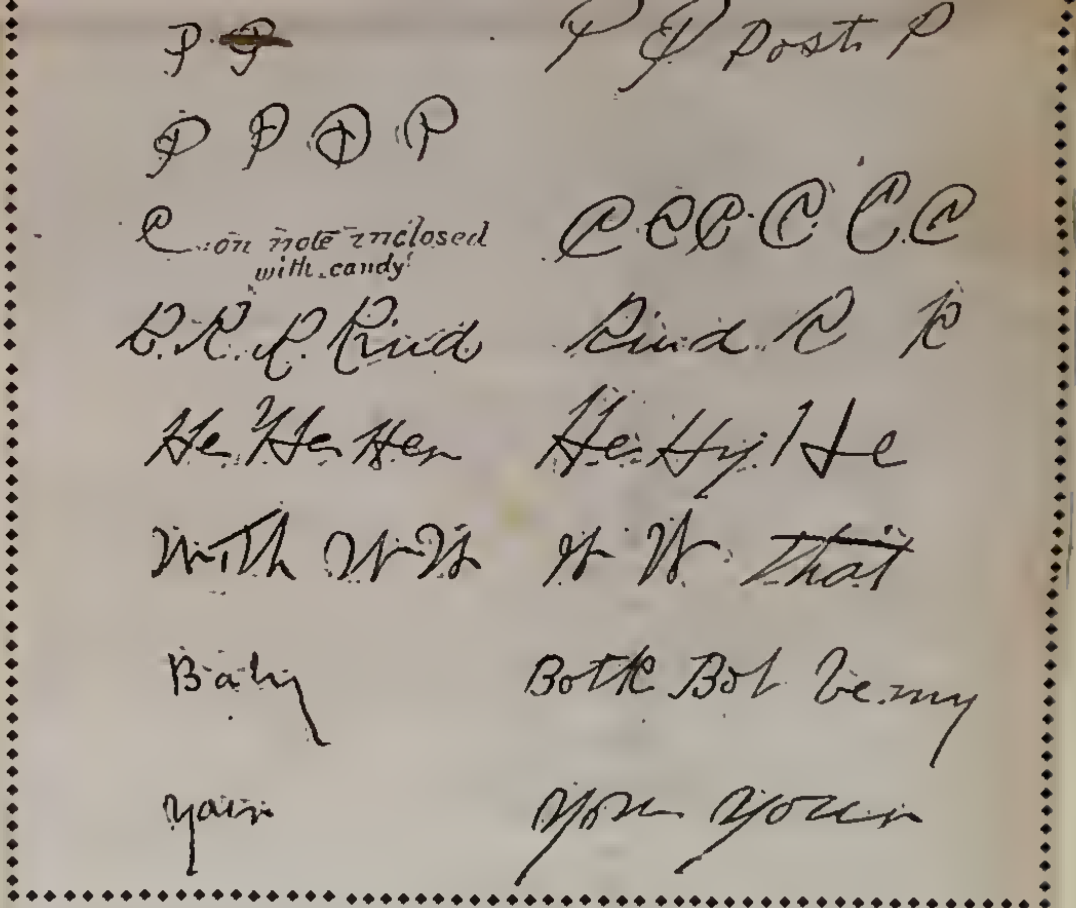
"No, sir."

"You don't know whether it was lump or powdered arsenic that the lady had, do you?"

"No, sir."

Then came a string of employes and former employes of Haas' candy store. Peter Hondy, Emma Herber, Annie Cramer, Edith Kelly, D. F. C. Droge, Annie Hoffman and Allen P. Lyon gave negative testimony to the effect that they had never placed any poison in candy, nor had any knowledge of such a thing having been done.

Mrs. Birdie Price, present proprietress of the Hotel Victoria, testified that Mrs. Botkin occupied room 28 on the top floor. The defendant went away on July 25th, returned on July 30th, and went away again on August 4th. The witness never knew of Mrs. Botkin bleaching straw. On July 31st Mrs. Botkin complained of being ill and had her meals served in her room. That afternoon the witness saw Mrs. Bot-



THE GENUINE AND THE DISGUISED BOTKIN WRITING.

Fac-simile made from photographs, showing the marked characteristics upon which the famous expert bases his positive declaration.

PROFESSOR DANIEL T. AMES, the handwriting expert who has been making a scientific analysis of Mrs. Botkin's penmanship for the past two weeks, will be called as a witness for the prosecution on Monday or Tuesday. He is convinced that the address on the candy box that carried death to Mrs. Dunning and her sister was written by the accused, and does not hesitate to say that he is in a position to prove beyond question that the anonymous letters sent to Mrs. Dunning before her murder were from the pen of Mrs. Botkin.

That Mrs. Botkin was the author of the note accompanying the poisoned candy, wishing love to Mrs. Dunning and her child and signed "Mrs. C.," Professor Ames believes there can be no question.

On Friday evening he held a conference with Chief Lees and Attorney Hosmer and explained to them comparative copies of letters and words taken from Mrs. Botkin's admitted handwriting and the letters alleged to have been written by her to the dead woman.

Chief Lees and the attorney were astonished at the startling similarity, and feel confident they are now in a position to establish the guilt of the accused through her failure to effectively disguise her penmanship.

Professor Ames is one of the most prominent handwriting experts in the United States. He has been identified with some of the most notorious criminal cases in the country, in which the lives of men depended on determining the authorship of writings.

"I do not see how there can be any question of Mrs. Botkin's authorship of the anonymous letters to Mrs. Dunning and the writing on the candy box," said Professor Ames yesterday. "If you compare the scheme of penmanship in these documents with the admitted handwriting of Mrs. Botkin from a scientific point of view you will readily see that they were written by the same person. The disguised penmanship in the anonymous epistles is palpably Mrs. Botkin's. In numerous cases she unconsciously permitted her individuality to crop out, and it is through these oversights on her part that we will be in a position to indisputably link her with the [illegible] of the writings involved in the case.

"Naturally Mrs. Botkin writes an English angular hand. This type is commonly taught in fashionable schools for women. Her individuality, however, is so marked that it had a perceptible effect on the general character of her handwriting. In many respects her penmanship is unique. She forms some of her letters in the oddest manner. I have never seen a duplication of many of them.

"Now, while the disguised handwriting in the exhibits is in a measure cleverly executed, she forgot herself at times and permitted her personality to break through the [illegible] mask. Mrs. Botkin forms the letter 'P' in a very characteristic manner, as you will see by the accurate copies I have made from her admitted handwriting. In several instances the letter 'P' in the anonymous epistles is formed along the same lines. The loop over the staff which forms the top of the letter is identical in both instances.

"She also made a peculiar 'C.' Now the C constituting the signature of the note inclosed in the box of poisoned candy is the work of Mrs. Botkin, beyond question. Her 'K's' are freakish. Not one person in ten thousand would form a letter in such a manner; yet they are duplicated in the anonymous letter received by Mrs. Dunning. You will notice that she has a tail at the top of the two staffs with which she makes her 'H's.' The same peculiarity is characteristic of the Dunning letters. Her 'W's,' 'Y's' and 'R's' are all oddly made and sufficiently individual in their general character to make their duplication without the aid of originals quite impossible.

"I will testify and to the best of my ability try to prove from a scientific standpoint that Mrs. Botkin wrote the letters. My analysis of her handwriting is now complete, and I will be in a position when I take the witness stand to illustrate my arguments with the aid of a blackboard."

The accompanying comparative specimens of Mrs. Botkin's admitted handwriting and the handwriting of the anonymous letters were prepared especially for "The Examiner" by Professor Ames.

PROSECUTION CLOSES IN ON MRS. BOTKIN.

Two Women Help Draw Tighter the Coil of Damaging Testimony.

Mrs. Ruoff Tells of Significant Words and Deeds—Handkerchief and Purchaser.

MRS. BOTKIN seemed more in jeopardy yesterday than ever before. Whether she realized it or not, nothing in her mask-like face showed. There was the same smiling insouciance, the same toothsome smile, and all the little courtroom graces and grimaces that have become familiar to the regular attendants at the trial. When the testimony of Mrs Almira Ruoff, once the prisoner's nurse and confidante, and now the strongest witness against her, was streaming volubly, Mrs. Botkin sat and studied intently a little fat book, which looked like a prayer-book, but was not. The tale of Mrs. Ruoff was spicy in parts and interesting as a whole. She had been Mrs. Botkin's nurse and sometimes her go-between, much as Juliet's nurse was her cicerone, except that the nurse of Genoa told no tales. When Mrs. Ruoff related how she went to Mrs. Botkin's room one evening, and found the door locked and herself refused admittance, the audience began to prick up its ears, for surely something sensational and salacious was about to be told. And it was. Mrs. Ruoff described, with some gusto, how Mrs. Botkin asked her to remain down stairs for a few minutes. The witness sat in the lower hall, more or less patiently, and after a half-hour or so Mrs. Botkin came and called softly over the stairs. The witness then went to the room and was admitted. Mrs. Botkin was attired in a pink silk robe de chambre, and there was a bottle of whisky on the table. Dunning was also there.

Mrs. Ruoff often accompanied Mrs. Botkin on shopping tours. On several of these occasions they met Dunning. Once he invited them both to the race track. Mrs. Botkin went, but Mrs. Ruoff declined. At another time Mrs. Botkin called the attention of the witness to some handkerchiefs in the City of Paris which seemed to Mrs. Botkin very cheap. Mrs Ruoff did not see Mrs. Botkin purchase any of the handkerchiefs.

But Mrs. Ruoff's most damaging testimony was not as to the times when [illegible] sister's house in Oakland.

The importance of her testimony lay in the recital of certain conversation [illegible] quaintance, whose name she could not remember, who lived at the Victoria. The sale impressed itself upon her mind because she served the customer out of her turn, thus breaking a rule of the house, and it was also made memorable by the fact that the customer looked much like the mother of the witness. This caused Mrs. Botkin to bite her lips in vexation. Mrs. Harris believed the defendant to be that customer and had no doubt of the fact. On cross-examination the witness developed some temper and a disinclination to reveal her senical poisoning. Several times he dropped the subject, and each time Mrs Botkin brought it up again. Before she left Stockton the defendant said to the witness: "Something tells me that the friendship between Jack Dunning and myself will be more strong in the future than it has been in the past."

The witness said that at this time Mrs. Botkin told her that Dunning would get a divorce if it were not for the child. Mrs. Ruoff was asked about Mrs. Botkin's visit to Stockton on August 15th, after her name had begun to figure in the Dover case. The defendant told the witness she had been sent to her by Mrs. McClure, sister of Mrs. Botkin. "For her sister's sake," said the witness, "I took her in." The defendant asked the witness if she believed the terrible story in the newspapers, and the answer was another question, "Why should I believe it?" When asked by the witness if she remembered the conversation with Dr. Stone, the defendant said, "You put that idea into my head. Send for that doctor right away." Then she became hysterical. The witness went out to send for the doctor, and when she returned Mrs. Botkin lay stretched out on the floor. When told to "get up and not act like a fool" she arose. Mrs. Botkin talked about the anonymous letters, and said she could not imagine who had written them unless it was "that old singed cat, Mrs. Fourcade, or her daughter." She said she made statements to Miss Livernash which she had afterward denied because they were not made for publication.

The witness said Mrs. Botkin at one time asked her about using arsenic for bleaching hats. Speaking as a former milliner Mrs. Ruoff had told her she had never heard of it being used.

Mrs. Ruoff seemed to have been in the habit of speaking somewhat plainly to Mrs. Botkin and of calling a spade a spade. When Mrs. Botkin talked of suicide Mrs. Ruoff pooh-poohed it saying, "You're too much of a coward." When Mrs Botkin stake. In concluding he instructed the Sheriff to bring the next offender before him.

The trial was resumed with all spectators devoutly silent. Hosmer withdrew his objection to the question as to how long Mrs. Ruoff had been in the Stockton Asylum, but Knight did not see fit to press the inquiry. He asked Mrs. Ruoff suggestive and irritating questions as to her occupation of nurse. The witness was answering questions in a mild tone, and Knight wanted to know if some one had not told her to alter her manner on the stand. She answered "Possibly they have." She objected to telling who it was that had spoken to her and when directed to do so by the Court she said Mr. Hosmer had told her it would be just as well not to show any ill-feeling. The witness denied having any ill-feeling toward the defendant. When asked if she was not a Seventh Day Adventist the witness answered that she was present to testify in the case and not to discuss theology. She answered, however, that she belonged to the sect named.

The witness, in response to a question, said she did not get drunk and have to be put to bed on the night when she saw Dunning in Mrs. Botkin's room at 927 Geary street. The witness said the locked door, the man in the room, the pink silk wrapper and the bottle of whiskey gave her an unfavorable impression of Mrs. Botkin, but she did not break with her as she felt a Christian sympathy for her. When questioned further the witness said that before the charge of poisoning she had often wished she had never seen Mrs. Botkin.

After drawing attention to Mrs. Ruoff's statement that she did not believe Mrs. Botkin's illness in Stockton, just prior to her arrest, was genuine Knight introduced in evidence a letter written August 19th by the witness to Mrs. McClure. In the letter the writer says of Mrs. Botkin: "She was very much broken and prostrated, but is feeling very much better today."

The witness said she had been told by Mrs. McClure that she did not send Mrs. Botkin to her. The anonymous letters were brought up again. The witness did not profess to be an expert, but said she could tell Mrs. Botkin's handwriting because of her long familiarity with it. She had seen one of the anonymous letters in the possession of Chief Lees and had spent an hour examining it. She saw attempts at disguise in the letters, but she believed the writing was that of Mrs. Botkin. She discussed the writing in the technical terms of the expert, talking of "muscular recoils" and "finger motions."

"No doubt in your mind she wrote them?" queried Knight.

"According to my best belief," answered the witness, "she wrote them."

On re-direct examination the witness testified that the money paid her by Chief Lees was to defray her expenses when called from Stockton to testify before the Grand Jury. Hosmer then asked the question as to the witness' experience at the Stockton Insane Asylum. Mrs. Ruoff answered that she was an attendant from July 12, 1866, to November, 1869. She was never a patient in the asylum.

In answer to questions by Knight the witness said she had not been discharged for cruelty to patients and had not told Mrs. Botkin so. Mrs. Ruoff said her fare was paid to Stockton when she went to look for letters written by Mrs. Botkin, but that the trip was as much for her own pleasure as to aid the police. The witness afterward explained that by pleasure she meant her own inclination and desire to find the letters.

Detective Ed L. Gibson testified as to visiting the Hotel Victoria to look over baggage left by Mrs. Botkin, also to inspect her room. He had not placed a piece of a seal there, nor did he know of any one else doing so. He had not seen the seal until it was shown to him on the stand.

Police Captain Seymour also testified as to visits to the Victoria Hotel. He had placed no seal in room 26 and did not know of it being done by any one. He had not seen the seal until Hosmer passed it to him on the witness stand.

An adjournment was then taken until Monday morning at 10 o'clock. Among the witnesses to come are the handwriting experts, Miss Livernash and John P. Dunning.

HE CALLS IT A VERY ODD TALE.

Lawyer Knight Scoffs at the Latest Botkin Case Story

The trial of Mrs. Botkin will be resumed at [illegible] before Judge Carroll Cook at [illegible] 10 o'clock as was announced at the adjournment of the court on Friday. The trial was put over out of respect to Juror Jacobs, whose sister died on Saturday.

Mrs. Botkin was feeling well mentally and physically yesterday. Notwithstanding the great strain on her nerves since the beginning of the trial she has borne up well, and it is apparent that she will be equal to any emergency that arises.

The legal defenders of Mrs. Cordelia Botkin are interested but not dismayed by the possibility that John P. Dunning will tell on the witness stand that the accused woman planned to kill him and would have accomplished her purpose had not her courage failed.

"This story about Dunning claiming that Mrs. Botkin at one time contemplated his death," said Attorney George A. Knight, "is intensely interesting and I shall be glad to hear more of the details connected with it. It is a very odd tale. Possibly when Mr. Dunning takes the stand for the recital of this thrilling incident he will be able to give us all the information we desire.

"The prosecution need have no hesitancy as far as the defense is concerned, in putting Mr. Dunning on the stand to relate this story. We shall raise no objection whatever to his testifying along that line. If Mr. Dunning has anything of this sort to say we will accord him as much freedom in telling it in court as he would have in telling it outside.

"I think the defense will not be averse to Mr. Dunning convincing the court and the jury, as well as the prosecution, that Mrs. Botkin really wanted to dispose of him. In so doing he will establish the fact that Mrs. Botkin actually wanted to get him out of the way, that she would rather have him in the next world than in this one. And if she really did have a strong desire to remove him from this earth, was satisfied to have him go out of her sight forever, where is the motive for the crime of which she is now charged?

"Possibly I do not thoroughly grasp the significance of the theory on which this story is based, but undoubtedly Mr. Dunning will make everything clear when he undertakes on the stand to give an account of this particular [illegible] episode."

Chief Lees and Assistant District Attorney Hosmer say that they know nothing about the alleged attempt of Mrs. Botkin to take Dunning's life.

Miss Livernash will be the first witness introduced this morning. She will be followed by writing experts [illegible] and Theodore Kytka, who will be asked whether in their opinion the address on the box of candy sent to Dover and the [illegible] inclosed in it were penned by Mrs. Botkin.

kin purchase any of the [illegible]

But Mrs. Ruoff's most damaging testimony was not as to the times when [illegible] opened the door for Dunning [illegible] upon Mrs. Botkin at her sister's house in Oakland.

The importance of her testimony lay in the recital of certain conversations had with Mrs. Botkin in Stockton about July 27th, when the witness, like another good Samaritan, had taken Mrs. Botkin in. At this time Mrs. Botkin said four extremely injudicious things, which can be accounted for only on the theory that Mrs. Botkin, if guilty of the murders, had not definitely decided that she would do them in the latter part of July. She had thought about it and was laying her plans—plans that must have been completed between July 31st and August 4th. Her inordinate vanity may possibly have led her to think that she could commit this long-range crime and never be suspected, but at any rate she said most injudicious things to Mrs. Ruoff, and that lady had no compunctions at all in telling the double row of sphinxes all about it. She was a most willing witness. During that memorable visit to Stockton Mrs. Botkin talked of poisons to Mrs. Ruoff, and inquired particularly as to their effects and the proper doses. Later she quizzed the physician who was attending her on the same matter, and the prosecution expects to corroborate this testimony by that of the doctor. From Mrs. Ruoff also Mrs. Botkin secured information as to the proper amount of postage for mailed packages, and exhibited a disinclination to register a package because she did not wish to sign her name. Mrs. Botkin also had a "hunch," which she unwisely confided to Mrs. Ruoff, that she and Dunning were soon to be closer together than they ever had been. To cap the climax, she intimated to Mrs. Ruoff that she might sometime be called as a witness in a case in which she (Mrs. Botkin) would be interested, and they even went so far as to discuss whether or not witnesses were paid in criminal cases.

All this testimony was necessarily damaging to Mrs. Botkin. The only thing the defense set up against it was that Mrs. Ruoff, in spite of her aggressive Christianity, appeared to have some animus against Mrs. Botkin. Cross-examination did not shake her testimony. Nothing was alleged against her character, and her memory seemed to be remarkable. She testified on cross-examination that she had received about $10 from the police for expenses, and related also that she had gone to Stockton to see if any of the numerous letters she had received from Mrs. Botkin were yet extant.

"Then you have been assisting the police to collect evidence in this case, have you?" queried Knight.

"I did it as much for my own pleasure as anything else," replied the witness with acerbity.

And then Mrs. Ruoff went her way to where lawyers cease from troubling and witnesses are at rest.

Before Mrs. Ruoff came on there was, as it seemed to many people, the most important testimony of the trial, save only the positive evidence of the drug clerk. This was given by Mrs. Grace Harris, who seems to be a person of sterling common sense, since she announced that she was a "saleswoman," the first one in the case. Mrs. Harris was a surprise. In the exceedingly close canvass of the prosecution's evidence made by the newspapers it has always been stated that there was no one at the City of Paris who could identify the defendant or who remembered selling the handkerchief in the candy box. The testimony of Mrs. Harris was a complete surprise to even the friends of the prosecution, and her almost positive identification was another surprise. It was stated that Mrs. Harris made an even better witness than the prosecution had expected. Mrs. Harris stated that she marked the handkerchief herself, and recollected selling the cheap cambric to a lady in the latter part of May or early in June. She was positive that it was the same handkerchief and recollected selling two of them. The customer [illegible] bought the handkerchiefs had purchased other goods and ordered them all sent to the corner of California and Hyde streets. Mrs. Harris had no recollection of the name of her customer, but recalled the [illegible] she had an ac-place of residence, but was compelled to answer. She wept copiously under the fire of Knight's sneering and suggestive interrogations. The worried look on the brow of the defense and the nervous way in which Mrs. Botkin buttoned and unbuttoned her glove showed that the importance of the testimony was fully appreciated. Nobody has yet explained the imbecility of the poisoner in leaving such a telltale thing as a price mark upon the handkerchief.

The rest of the testimony was not of great importance. There was a stifling and gaping courtroom into which a good many well-known people drifted, among them Mayor Phelan. All these curious people will have to go again, for Dunning will not take the stand until Monday, and possibly not then. The prosecution asked for an early adjournment yesterday because Miss Livernash was not on hand to testify, and it did not wish to depart from the settled order. The prosecution said it would be able to complete its case by Monday, and Knight remarked that the handwriting experts need not be detained long, implying that he did not intend to cross-examine.

The spectators were again in disgrace with Judge Cook. Near the close of the morning session Knight asked an unguarded question, and the witness, Mrs. Ruoff, gave him a wasp-like stab with her tongue.

"When you were in Stockton was it not your business to treat the hair?" he queried.

"It was not," was the reply.

"What did you do?"

"I treated bald heads," retorted the witness, looking straight at Knight's pate. The crowd raised a shout which lifted Judge Cook to his feet. He adjourned court, ordering the Sheriff to admit no one in the afternoon who could not find a seat. In the afternoon there was a cordon of police outside the door and inside it was comparatively comfortable. Judge Cook delivered a lecture on solemnity at a murder trial, and threatened to remove all gigglers. The decorum of the court was not broken during the afternoon.

THE TESTIMONY.

The testimony of R. Ecklund, a former employe of George Haas & Son, opened the day's proceedings. The witness testified that he left the candy store on account of ill health. He had had no trouble with either his employer or fellow employes. He had never put poison in the candy, nor did he know of any one else doing so.

Mrs. Grace Harris, who was employed in the City of Paris dry goods store up to the last week of August, was the next witness. She identified the handkerchief inclosed in the box of poisoned candy sent to Mrs. Dunning as having come from the City of Paris store. Her means of identification, she said, was the price mark made by herself with a rubber stamp. The witness remembered [illegible] two handkerchiefs in the latter part of May or early in June to a lady who gave her an address to which the handkerchiefs and other articles purchased in the store were to be sent.

"Where was that address?" asked Assistant District Attorney Hosmer.

"The Victoria Hotel," answered the witness.

"Do you recognize the defendant?"

"She resembles the lady to whom I sold the handkerchiefs."

Knight opened up the cross-fire by asking [illegible] Mrs. Harris [illegible] but was compelled [illegible] She [illegible] said [illegible] Market street. The witness said [illegible] to the City Hall. She remembered the sale particularly as on that occasion she had broken the rule under which saleswomen were to wait on customers in turn. The customer had come to her and the witness in that way received a commission on the sale which should have gone to another employe. Mrs. Harris said there was a record kept of deliveries of goods, but she did not know whether the Victoria Hotel entry had been found or not.

"What else besides breaking a rule attracted your attention to your customer?" asked Knight.

"She resembled my mother," answered the witness to the evident annoyance of Mrs. Botkin.

The witness could not remember how her customer was dressed. She remembered other sales to strangers at various times, and gave an instance. Inquiries as to the husband of the witness brought out the information that he died two years and a half ago. Knight also asked the witness to give her age. The witness answered promptly "Past 30."

"You are positive Mrs. Botkin bought those handkerchiefs?" queried Knight.

"I am liable to make mistakes sometimes, but I don't think I have this time," replied the witness.

Knight wanted to know if the address was not "Mrs. Bastian, Victoria Hotel." The witness said that she could not remember the name of the customer.

In response to a question by a juror the witness said a gentleman friend had told her shortly before the sale to which she had testified that he was working at a place under the Victoria Hotel. When the customer mentioned the name of the hotel she at once looked up and noticed the woman's features.

Knight asked about the identity of the gentleman friend, and the witness said he was an old schoolmate whose name she had forgotten.

John Nixon, formerly a special police officer, testified that he formerly made the grocery store under the Victoria Hotel his headquarters. He it was who sent two strangers to the hotel for lodgings for the night. The witness took the men upstairs, and Barnes, the clerk, took charge of them. He did not know their names and would not know them again if he saw them.

The testimony of Nixon had reference to the two transient guests who occupied Mrs. Botkin's former room for one night prior to the finding of the candy-store seal.

Mrs. Almira Ruoff, the nurse to whose house Mrs. Botkin went when her name was first mentioned in connection with the Dover murders, next took the stand and told her story. The witness said she had known Mrs. Botkin for two years and a half. She was also acquainted with John P. Dunning, and told of instances where she had seen him with Mrs. Botkin. While the defendant was living in Oakland the witness at Mrs. Botkin's request had twice let Dunning into the house without the formality of ringing the bell. Mrs. Botkin's reason for having this done was that she did not want people in the house to know of Dunning's visits. Mrs. Ruoff then related the locked-door incident. On being asked to do so she had taken a drink from the whisky on the table. The witness saw Dunning and the defendant together at other times. Once they asked her to accompany them to the races and she refused. That was the last time she saw Dunning.

The witness was shown the handkerchief from the box of poisoned candy and identified it as being of the kind shown her by Mrs. Botkin at the City of Paris a year and a half ago. She remembered the design, and also that the price was 25 cents.

Handwriting was the next subject on which the witness was interrogated. Mrs. Ruoff said she had been in correspondence with Mrs. Botkin for two years and was very familiar with her handwriting. A card on which Mrs. Botkin had written her name and a letter to Governor Budd in which the woman now accused of murder had requested that she be placed on the roll of Army nurses were identified by the witness. The defense acknowledged their genuineness and made no objection when they were offered in evidence.

The first anonymous letter sent to Mrs. Dunning was then shown to the witness. The missive, bearing date of June 11, 1898, tells [illegible] interesting and pretty [illegible] sharing with him the delights of a [illegible] and advises Mrs.

Dunning not to receive back her erring husband. The writer speaks of gay times at 927 Geary street, where Dunning and Mrs. Botkin sometimes occupied the same apartment. The missive is signed, "Your Friend."

"Whose writing would you say that was?" asked Hosmer.

"I believe it is Mrs. Botkin's," answered Mrs. Ruoff.

The witness pointed out peculiarities on which she based her belief. She referred to the crossing of the letter "t," the heavy underscoring, the oddly formed "y" and "s," and "e," all of which she said she had noticed in the letters written to herself by Mrs. Botkin.

The second anonymous letter, dated July 9th and addressed to Mrs. John Dunning, also impressed the witness as having been written by Mrs. Botkin. This letter speaks of Dunning's financial embarrassment being due partly to another woman and not wholly to racetrack speculation. The letter says that Dunning and the other woman occupied apartments together, and that the other woman was "quite clever and very good to him." The letter is signed, "One that you would know."

When shown the note which caused Mrs. Dunning to believe that the death-laden candy came from a friend the witness called attention to the signature, "Mrs. C.," saying that "C" in quotation marks was a peculiarity of Mrs. Botkin's writing. Wherever she made quotation marks she made them in just that way. The witness also said the "y" in "your" was similar to the same letter in Mrs. Botkin's writing. Mrs. Ruoff pointed out the dash, used instead of the common punctuation marks, this character being very freely used by Mrs. Botkin.

"With your knowledge whose writing would you say this is?" asked Hosmer.

"As far as I may judge," answered the witness, "I would say it was Mrs. Botkin's."

Hosmer started another line of inquiry, but the witness interrupted him with an objection to leaving what she called "the anonymous letter business" before she had her say. Mrs. Ruoff then spoke of the phrase "bohemian life," which she said was a favorite expression of Mrs. Botkin. The witness considered that expression a "dead give away."

Mrs. Ruoff was next questioned as to Mrs. Botkin's visits to Mrs. Ruoff's home in Stockton. The witness said Mrs. Botkin came to her house on July 27th or 28th of this year. At that time Mrs. Botkin made inquiries as to whether the witness had ever purchased arsenic. Mrs. Botkin brought up the subject by inquiries as to what the witness did to clear her place of mice. Mrs. Ruoff answered that she had used arsenic, but that the mice had grown fat on it. To another inquiry she replied that the arsenic she had used was in small crystals. Mrs. Botkin next inquired as to the rates for mailing packages, saying she intended to send a package up north. When advised to have the package registered she wanted to know if she would be obliged to sign her name when she sent a registered package. She received an affirmative answer. Mrs. Botkin also wanted to know if a person got into trouble and hired a lawyer if he or she would have to tell him everything. The witness advised her to follow the old saying which lays it down as best to tell the truth to doctors and lawyers. Mrs. Botkin's ostensible purpose in visiting Stockton at that time was to see about getting her diamonds out of pawn. The afternoon of the day she came she said she was very ill, but in fulfillment of a promise she went to dinner with her husband. When she came back she told the witness that she had dined with the "Governor," as it [illegible] was called, and had been to his room, which would prevent him from getting a divorce for a [illegible]. That [illegible] Mrs. Botkin complained of being ill. When questioned she said she had taken poison. The witness did not believe that, but called in Dr. Stone of Stockton. The physician said Mrs. Botkin had a high fever, and he gave her something to quiet her [illegible]. Afterward Mrs. Botkin [illegible] Dr. Stone with questions as to how different poisons acted on the human system. [illegible] first about [illegible] and then about arsenic. [illegible] Dr. St[illegible] told her strychnine [illegible] that the morphine route was the easiest [illegible] Dr. St[illegible] described the [illegible] of a case of [illegible] told the witness of the anonymous letters sent to her by Dunning. Mrs. Ruoff wanted to know what had become of them. Mrs. Botkin said that she had sent them back, whereupon Mrs. Ruoff informed her that she was a fool and that she should have destroyed them.

With his first question on cross-examination Knight roused the antagonism of the witness.

"How long were you in the Stockton Insane Asylum," he asked.

The prosecution objected and although Mrs. Ruoff said she was willing to answer, the objection was pressed and the question was ruled out. In response to a comprehensive question the witness said there was no doubt in her mind that Mrs. Botkin wrote the anonymous letter, addressed the wrapper around the fatal package and wrote the note inclosed in the box of candy. Asked as to how much money she had received, the witness said she had received altogether about $40 to pay her expenses. There was no understanding, either direct or indirect, that she was to receive pay for her testimony. Mrs. Ruoff flared up at some of Knight's questions and her curtness caused merriment among the spectators.

When the trial was resumed at 2 o'clock Judge Cook made some pointed remarks for the benefit of those who grew boisterously merry while a human life was at

FORGERS PLAY A BOLD GAME.

They Issue Bogus Checks Over a Tourist's Signature.

Chron — Dec 18

John Morris of York, England, and his niece, Miss Barnard of Surrey, England, who arrived here from Honolulu on the steamer Alameda several days ago, have called upon the police to assist in bringing to justice a gang of three accomplished crooks, who, according to Morris' story, are reaping a golden harvest at his expense by passing bogus checks on which his name has been forged.

Morris, who is a wealthy Englishman, is making a tour of the world with his niece. They recently spent several weeks in the Hawaiian Islands. While guests at the Hawaiian Hotel, in Honolulu, they participated one evening in a progressive euchre party with a number of other guests in the house, three of whom, it afterward turned out, were professional crooks and forgers. Scores were kept with pen and paper, and Morris, with his associate players, wrote his name across the top of one of the score cards. After the game had been finished, the card bearing Morris' signature was clandestinely pocketed by one of the three crooks, whose identity was not revealed until some days later. During the evening the gang also managed, in some way that is not explained, to secure possession of Morris' checkbook, and, with his genuine signature on the score card to work from, they forged a number of checks and passed them on unsuspecting shopkeepers in Honolulu. They then fled to San Francisco on the steamer City of Peking.

Fearing that the operators would forge more checks and deposit them with local banks for collection he hurried here, with his niece, on the next steamer, and they [illegible] are now looking for the trio of worthies.

BOTKIN JURY INVESTIGATED BY THE POLICE

Sensational Rumors Were Circulated and Created Consternation for the Prosecution.

Call — Dec 18-98

Defendant, Overcome by the Ordeal of the Trial, Is Attended by Physicians—Defense Ready With Its Witnesses.

For a few hours yesterday there was consternation in the camp of the prosecutors of Mrs. Cordelia Botkin.

The evidence that had been introduced on Friday created a profound impression, but it was widely rumored that certain members of the jury had already expressed opinions which could not and would not be changed by evidence. This startling rumor was at once called to the attention of the authorities, and an immediate investigation was made by the police and other officers of the prosecution.

The information that was taken to police headquarters was very definite and specific. It was claimed that at least two and perhaps three of the jurors who have been sworn to try Mrs. Botkin for murder had already expressed a judgment on the merits of the case to some of their friends. The information seemed to bear the stamp of accuracy, and the inquiry at once followed.

The information was sifted to the bottom. The laxity with which the jury was drawn seemed to give color to the report, but the closest and most thorough investigation failed to reveal any verification. No one who would say that a juror had spoken to him could be found. The members of the jury, as a matter of course, could not be questioned. The police pursued their investigations until they satisfied themselves that there was nothing of truth in the report. The affair for a time created some excitement. If the report had been substantiated there is little question that the matter would have been called to the attention of the court.

The authorities are convinced now, however, that the report, while warranting immediate attention, had no substantial foundation. When the case is resumed tomorrow morning the prosecution will present its remaining witnesses. The officers of the State expect to finish before the day is over. Whether this is done or not depends largely upon the defense and the extent of the cross-examination. Miss Livernash will be the first witness of the day, and if time remains during the session John P. Dunning will be the last.

It is anticipated that Miss Livernash will be sharply cross-examined. What shall be done with Dunning is a matter of conjecture. In reference to this witness the defense is in a very peculiar situation. A cross-examination of Dunning that would tend to expose thoroughly the character of his intimacy with Mrs. Botkin would be on the same lines as the testimony already introduced by the prosecution. Such evidence would be deemed, as the prosecution has planned it, to show the motive which it is alleged Mrs. Botkin had for the crime for which she is accused.

The prosecution will also [illegible] tomorrow the testimony of three [illegible] [illegible] candy [illegible] All of these [illegible] agree [illegible] woman [illegible] and the [illegible] The [illegible] assertions of Mrs. [illegible] John P. Dunning to the [illegible] are familiar [illegible] Mrs. [illegible] The defense does not [illegible] The legal [illegible] Mrs. [illegible] maintain that [illegible] Experts [illegible] is assumed [illegible] in a controversy that [illegible] Little effort will be made [illegible] that the testimony [illegible] experts [illegible] have devoted a great deal of time [illegible] this phase of the case [illegible] Mrs. [illegible] Friday [illegible] the long ordeal to which her [illegible] friend related the story that may have such serious consequences. When Mrs. Botkin returned to the Branch County Jail she almost collapsed. She rallied, however, and obtained rest during the night. Yesterday morning her condition was such that the services of a physician were demanded and received. Later in the day Mrs. Botkin recovered her customary spirits. Her sister and brother-in-law called and remained for some time with her.

Unusual efforts were made to conceal the fact of Mrs. Botkin's illness. It was denied that she had asked for a physician or had been ill. The fact remained, however, that she had seen a physician and was ill. Second to the general interest that exists in the prospective testimony of Dunning is the interest expressed in the announcement that Mrs. Botkin will take the stand. The accused woman intends to testify in her own behalf and to make a general denial of the charge against her. She will not attempt to deny her relations with Dunning, as she has already admitted them to a degree that requires no comment. She will not seek to establish an alibi, as the conditions of the case do not require such a defense, except in reference to the purchase of the candy and the handkerchief.

The testimony in reference to the purchase of the handkerchief at the City of Paris is perhaps the strongest single bit of evidence against her. This the accused woman will combat with every energy. In reference to her other movements in this city and in Stockton, Mrs. Botkin has admitted as much as the prosecution has proved. If Dunning declares that Mrs. Botkin attempted to kill him she will, of course, deny it. It will be her word against his, with the advantage on her part that Dunning continued his relations with her after the alleged attempt to kill him.

JOHN P. DUNNING STILL SILENT AND IN JAIL.

SAYS AGAIN HE WILL NOT GIVE NAMES

He May Be a Prisoner Till Trial Closes.

Mrs. Seeley Is the Star Witness of the Day.

Tells About the Doings of Mrs. Botkin and Son Beverly.

Two Experts in Handwriting Give Strong Testimony Against the Woman Accused of Murder.

MRS. LOUISE SEELEY.

YESTERDAY came the anti-climax in the Botkin case. After the stress and storm of Dunning's interrupted testimony and arrest the cool swearing of paid experts was a commonplace affair. It was a rueful matter for the jostling hundreds who braved the weather to hear Dunning only to have a handwriting expert palmed off in his stead. That furious imposition upon Labun paled beside it.

The result of the influx of "pot-hooks" and "curves," heavy "up-strokes" and light down ones, "muscle recoils" and "finger movements" was that the Judge caught up with a long-neglected correspondence; the lobby, which looked like a jail delivery, amused itself with coughing till it sounded like the Public Pound; reporters took cat-naps or left altogether, and the jurors took forty winks in relays and planned their Christmas gifts.

Meanwhile Dunning was haled into court, probed, found still recalcitrant, and remanded to custody. He told the majesty of the law that if he felt in his own mind that any of the women with whom he had associated had anything to do with the killing of his wife he would mention their names, but he was convinced that they had not, and so he must still decline to mention them. The Judge remarked that this was a conclusion which only the jury and the Judge could make. Dunning's own mind or his thoughts could not be taken as authority in the matter. There was a hot argument between Knight and Hosmer. Hosmer tried to suggest a way out of the dilemma for the witness. "Mr. Dunning," he said, "is the reason for your refusal to answer on the ground that your answer might possibly incriminate——"

"I object," shouted Knight. "That is a matter of personal privilege, and not one that an attorney has any right to suggest."

"That is so," assented the Court.

It was urged that the tendency of the question was to degrade the witness, but again Dunning did not take advantage of the loophole offered. As a last resort Hosmer argued against the propriety of the question, contending that it was improper; but Knight came back at him with the retort that the witness had been allowed to blacken the character of the defendant merely because the prosecution wanted a motive.

"The prosecution has made out a charge of felony," bellowed Knight. "They have induced the witness to testify to a life of open and notorious adultery with my client, and yet they expect to shield all other women with whom he had similar relations. We insist upon the question."

Again a deputy sheriff took Dunning's arm and again he was led from the courtroom under arrest, still smiling and apparently unmoved by the strange things that were happening to him.

Legal authorities say that Dunning cannot be kept in jail indefinitely for his obstinacy. It has been held recently by the Supreme Court that such contempt endures only until the end of the trial.

The defendant herself came yesterday prepared for battle. In anticipation that Dunning might be again upon the stand, and also, perhaps, because she showed the effects of a wakeful and tearful night, she had shrouded her face in her lace veil, the same face mask of black lace which on a former occasion blurred the outlines of her features and made it almost impossible to determine whether her eyes were red and swollen or her face less dainty than usual. If there was an emotion under them ...

that the man who brought up the unknown "transients" who slept in Mrs. Botkin's room between the time of her departure and the discovery of the candy seal, was Nixon. There were two witnesses from the City of Paris, the cashier and the treasurer. They testified that an order for Mrs. Botkin was cashed early in June of this year. In the cross-questions Knight outlined a part of his defense by hinting that Mrs. Botkin was a purchasing agent.

The most interesting witness of the day was Mrs. Louise Seeley, known in the case as the friend of Beverly Botkin, whom Knight mentioned as Mrs. Botkin's stepson. Mrs. Seeley is a rather pleasant-faced, soft-voiced little woman, quietly dressed and apparently unassuming. She gave no sign of bohemian tendencies. She testified that she knew Dunning and Mrs. Botkin, having met the former in Mrs. Botkin's apartment at 927 Geary street—that ill-odored house, which has since found it necessary to change its number. During Mrs. Seeley's testimony Mrs. Botkin read a paper assiduously. Mrs. Seeley said that she noticed that Mrs. Botkin and Dunning were very friendly, and, while she had been out several times with Dunning, she had never been alone with him. Mrs. Seeley could not remember at what cafes she had dined in his company. She denied emphatically that she wrote the anonymous letters or the address on the inclosure in the box of candy, and denied that she was a party to a conspiracy to write these things. Mrs. Seeley trembled visibly when she passed to Knight's gentle ministrations, but it did not suit his purpose to grill her. He is anxious to keep the doings in the Geary-street orgie-house out of the record as much as possible. To blacken Mrs. Seeley was to drag in Mrs. Botkin, so Mrs. Seeley escaped easily. She said that she was in the habit of addressing Dunning as "Mr. Dunning," as she does all gentlemen, but in the next breath she said that she calls young Mr. Botkin "Beverly," but that is because he is a boy of 24 or 25, not because he is not a gentleman. Mrs. Seeley testified that though she did not care for Mrs. Botkin there was no violent antipathy on her part. She denied with warmth that she had ever had matrimonial designs upon Beverly, and then she left the witness stand, obviously much relieved.

Detective E. L. Gibson testified that Mrs. Botkin told him she went to St. Helena on August 4th by the 4:30 o'clock ferry.

Then came the handwriting experts to make the courtroom go off into gentle slumbers like those of the household of the Sleeping Beauty. Daniel T. Ames, an expert, was the first of his kind. He testified against Knight's clients in the Davis will case and the attorney has no love for the old man. He bullied and badgered and harried him, but at no time did he succeed in shaking his testimony.

"I've been here before," said Knight contemptuously, "and I ask that the witness be asked to testify only to facts."

There was much of literal resemblances, but in all of Ames' peregrinations the jurors patiently followed him. Occasionally Knight and Hosmer engaged in spirited conflict. Once or twice Knight protested in thunder tones when swore that it was merely a change of slant. The case goes on at 10 o'clock this morning.

THE TESTIMONY.

With the calling of the case yesterday morning John P. Dunning was given another chance to regain his freedom by divulging the names of women other than Mrs. Botkin with whom he had been on terms of intimacy.

"Mr. Dunning," said Judge Cook, addressing the witness, "are you ready at this time to answer the question propounded to you?"

"I am not," answered Dunning, "and I would like to make a statement."

"Does the defense still insist on the question?" asked the Court.

"We do," replied Knight, "and we object to any statement."

The Court ruled that Dunning had a right to give his reasons for not answering the question.

Dunning said: "If I had any suspicion that any of these women are in any way responsible for the death of my wife I would give their names, but as I am satisfied in my own mind that they had nothing to do with the crime I must decline to answer."

Assistant District Attorney Hosmer strove to extricate Dunning from his dilemma. "These inquiries are going beyond cross-examination," he said, "and through them the opposing counsel is seeking to make a defense. The argument can be made just as well without these women's names as it can with them."

Hosmer pleaded that an answer would tend to further degrade the witness, and Knight essayed a bit of oratory in reply.

"We have the right to attack the character of the witness," he shouted. "The character of the defendant has been attacked. If, by showing intimacy with the witness, the prosecution can draw conclusions that she is guilty, why cannot the same conclusions be drawn in regard to the other women?"

Judge Cook decided that Dunning's reason for not answering was insufficient. Under ordinary circumstances, he said, the question would not have to be answered, but as the substance of the witness' testimony related to showing a motive for the crime it was proper to ascertain the names of the women demanded by the defense.

Hosmer asked the witness if his reason for not answering was that he would incriminate himself. Knight objected to Hosmer's inquiry, saying such an excuse was a matter of personal privilege and could not be brought out by counsel.

The Court upheld the contention of the defense. Dunning did not take advantage of the opportunity to dodge the troublesome question and was again remanded to the custody of the Sheriff, to be confined in the County Jail until he gives the information desired.

Julius Fay, treasurer of the City of Paris dry goods store, was the first witness. He identified a money order dated June 1, 1898, and signed over to the firm by Mrs. Botkin. The order was admitted in evidence without objection on the part of the defense. Fay's testimony was considered important by the prosecution, as the order was presented by Mrs. Botkin about the time the handkerchiefs similar to the ones sent to Mrs. Dunning were purchased. Mrs. Grace Harris has testified that the sale to Mrs. Botkin was made during the latter part of May or early in June.

Dr. Wolf, State Chemist of Delaware ...

self and the writer and those who may have been enlightened by the writer. The letter referred to was never shown to Mrs. Dunning. This testimony bears out the statements about the anonymous letters which Miss Livernash testified were made to her by Mrs. Botkin.

Detective Ed L. Gibson was recalled to testify that Mrs. Botkin had told him she left San Francisco on the afternoon of August 4th, going to the ferry, thence by boat and train to Healdsburg.

Daniel T. Ames, the first of the handwriting experts, then put in an appearance. This witness made minute comparisons of the admitted and disputed handwritings. The admitted handwritings are a letter from Mrs. Botkin to Governor Budd, a letter to Mrs. Emily Price, several orders for changes of Postoffice address and fragmentary writings, including several signatures of the defendant. The disputed writings are two addresses on the package sent to Mrs. Dunning, the note inclosed in the box of candy and the two anonymous letters. After the expert had inspected the writings he declared they were all written by the same person. He said the addresses on the wrapper were carefully disguised, but showed certain peculiarities conforming to those in the writings admitted to be genuine. The witness then called attention to the capital letter "P" on the wrapper, and with the aid of the blackboard showed the marked similarity between that "P" and the one in the Price letter. The similarity extended also to the anonymous letters and one of the orders for a change of address. Ames then took up the note inclosed in the candy box. The expert took the note letter by letter and showed the same formation of letters, the same connecting lines, and sometimes whole words almost exactly similar to the admitted writings. Particular attention was called to the peculiar loop of the small letter "l" and the arrangement of the letters following as shown in all of the writings, both admitted and disputed. Comparisons in each instance were made with the anonymous letters and the wrapper and note.

When the trial was resumed in the afternoon Felix Reynaud, cashier of the City of Paris, testified that he knew Mrs. Botkin as a customer of the store in which he is employed. He had frequently cashed money orders for her. The witness identified a money order shown him, and, on referring to his books, fixed the date of its presentation by Mrs. Botkin as June 4, 1898. When asked by Knight if he knew Mrs. Botkin as a purchasing agent he said he had not known her in that connection at the place of his employment.

W. W. Harms, clerk of the Hotel Victoria, was recalled and testified that the men who occupied room 76 for one night prior to the finding of the candy-box seal were brought to the hotel by Special Officer Nixon. The strangers had nothing in their possession to his knowledge.

Daniel T. Ames then resumed his testimony. The disputed writings, he said, were not in a natural hand, but there were innumerable characteristics which were also found in the admitted writings. Even when the letters were disguised they were joined in a natural manner. The witness said the note was very carefully disguised, the slope of the writing being changed, the letters drawn carefully and an attempt to distort them out of all semblance to the natural writing. At the conclusion of the comparisons Hosmer asked:

"What is your opinion as to the writings?"

"There is no doubt but that all were written by the same person," answered the witness.

On cross-examination Ames said he had possibly made mistakes in the past, but he was as certain that all of the writings submitted to him in the Botkin case were written by the same person as he could be of anything without seeing it done. Ames denied having mistaken the disguised writing of a lawyer in the Whitman case, which was tried in New York, and having sworn the writing was entitled ...

journed to 10 o'clock this morning. ... dore Kytka, another expert, will ... Kleinschmidt and this will practically close the people's case.

Mrs. Botkin and Son Beverly.

Two Experts in Handwriting Give Strong Testimony Against the Woman Accused of Murder.

YESTERDAY came the anti-climax in the Botkin case. After the stress and storm of Dunning's interrupted testimony and arrest the cool swearing of paid experts was a commonplace affair. It was a rueful matter for the jostling hundreds who braved the weather to hear Dunning only to have a handwriting expert palmed off in his stead. That famous imposition upon Laban paled beside it.

The result of the influx of "pot-hooks" and "curves," heavy "up-strokes" and light down ones, "muscle recoils" and "finger movements" was that the Judge caught up with a long-neglected correspondence; the lobby, which looked like a jail delivery, amused itself with coughing till it sounded like the Public Pound; reporters took cat-naps or left altogether, and the jurors took forty winks in relays and planned their Christmas gifts.

Meanwhile Dunning was haled into court, probed, found still recalcitrant, and remanded to custody. He told the majesty of the law that if he felt in his own mind that any of the women with whom he had associated had anything to do with the killing of his wife he would mention their names, but he was convinced that they had not, and so he must still decline to mention them. The Judge remarked that this was a conclusion which only the jury and the Judge could make. Dunning's own mind or his thoughts could not be taken as authority in the matter. There was a hot argument between Knight and Hosmer. Hosmer tried to suggest a way out of the dilemma for the witness. "Mr. Dunning," he said, "is the reason for your refusal to answer on the ground that your answer might possibly incriminate——"

"I object," shouted Knight. "That is a matter of personal privilege, and not one that an attorney has any right to suggest."

"That is so," assented the Court.

It was urged that the tendency of the question was to degrade the witness, but again Dunning did not take advantage of the loophole offered. As a last resort Hosmer argued against the propriety of the question, contending that it was improper; but Knight came back at him with the retort that the witness had been allowed to blacken the character of the defendant merely because the prosecution wanted a motive.

"The prosecution has made out a charge of felony," bellowed Knight. "They have induced the witness to testify to a life in open and notorious adultery with my client, and yet they expect to shield all other women with whom he had similar relations. We insist upon the question."

Again a deputy sheriff took Dunning's arm and again he was led from the courtroom under arrest, still smiling and apparently unmoved by the strange things that were happening to him.

Legal authorities say that Dunning cannot be kept in jail indefinitely for his obstinacy. It has been held recently by the Supreme Court that such contempt endures only until the end of the trial.

The defendant herself came yesterday prepared for battle. In anticipation that Dunning might be again upon the stand, and also, perhaps, because she showed the effects of a wakeful and tearful night, she had shrouded her face in her train veil, the same face mask of black barege which on a former occasion blurred the outlines of her features and made it almost impossible to determine whether her eyes were red and swollen and her nose less dainty than usual. If there was to be emotion under Dunning's revelations Mrs. Botkin did not intend that her agony should be witnessed and described. In the afternoon, when the defendant's face had recovered from the struggle, she changed this shrouding black for a thinner veil, which gave once more the outline of her not ill-looking profile. Small wonder Mrs. Botkin seeks to veil her face. Yesterday there was turned on her a pair of opera-glasses, through which the owner of the binoculars calmly proceeded to scrutinize her, and the little sprig of English holly which she wore as the only addition to her toilette.

The [illegible] testimony was not of great importance. A number of witnesses were recalled to pick up dropped stitches. John B. Pennington came to tell what had already been mentioned: that Mrs. Dunning never saw the third anonymous letter, and, therefore, Mr. Pennington and through him Mrs. Botkin could not have been informed of it, the idea being to show that Mrs. Botkin knew of three letters when she should have known of but two. Harry Pennington was recalled so that the prosecution might withdraw its objection to a question asked by the defense, but as the defense refused to put the question again it remains unanswered. The question was as to whether the Penningtons had ever had trouble with their colored servant.

Mrs. Price of the Victoria was put back to untangle the kinks in a juror's understanding. She added nothing to her original testimony. Clerk Barnes, also of the Victoria, was recalled to say that the man who brought up the unknown "transients" who slept in Mrs. Botkin's room between the time of her departure and the discovery of the candy seal, was Nixon. There were two witnesses from the City of Paris, the cashier and the treasurer. They testified that an order for Mrs. Botkin was cashed early in June of this year. In the cross-questions Knight outlined a part of his defense by hinting that Mrs. Botkin was a purchasing agent.

The most interesting witness of the day was Mrs. Louise Seeley, known in the case as the friend of Beverly Botkin, whom Knight mentioned as Mrs. Botkin's stepson. Mrs. Seeley is a rather pleasant-faced, soft-voiced little woman, quietly dressed and apparently unassuming. She gave no sign of bohemian tendencies. She testified that she knew Dunning and Mrs. Botkin, having met the former in Mrs. Botkin's apartment at 927 Geary street—that ill-odored house, which has since found it necessary to change its number. During Mrs. Seeley's testimony Mrs. Botkin read a paper assiduously. Mrs. Seeley said that she noticed that Mrs. Botkin and Dunning were very friendly, and, while she had been out several times with Dunning, she had never been alone with him. Mrs. Seeley could not remember at what cafes she had dined in his company. She denied emphatically that she wrote the anonymous letters or the address on the inclosure in the box of candy, and denied that she was a party to a conspiracy to write these things. Mrs. Seeley trembled visibly when she passed to Knight's gentle ministrations, but it did not suit his purpose to grill her. He is anxious to keep the doings in the Geary-street orgie-house out of the record as much as possible. To blacken Mrs. Seeley was to drag in Mrs. Botkin, so Mrs. Seeley escaped easily. She said that she was in the habit of addressing Dunning as "Mr. Dunning," as she does all gentlemen; but in the next breath she said that she calls young Mr. Botkin "Beverly," but that is because he is a boy of 24 or 26, not because he is not a gentleman. Mrs. Seeley testified that though she did not care for Mrs. Botkin there was no violent antipathy on her part. She denied with warmth that she had ever had matrimonial designs upon Beverly, and then she left the witness stand, obviously much relieved.

Detective E. L. Gibson testified that Mrs. Botkin told him she went to St. Helena on August 4th by the 4:30 o'clock ferry.

Then came the handwriting experts to make the courtroom go off into gentle slumbers like those of the household of the Sleeping Beauty. Daniel T. Ames, an expert, was the first of his kind. He testified against Knight's clients in the Davis will case and the attorney has no love for the old man. He bullied and badgered and harried him, but at no time did he succeed in shaking his testimony.

"I've been here before," said Knight contemptuously, "and I ask that the witness be asked to testify only to facts."

There was much of literal resemblances, but in all of Ames' peregrinations the jurors patiently followed him. Occasionally Knight and Hosmer engaged in spirited conflict. Once or twice Knight protested in thunder tones when the expert started to crease the wrapper which bound the candy. Once when he innocently began, "The note that was in the candy"—Knight broke in and demanded to know how the witness knew whether the note was in a candy box or a dry goods box. Ames swore positively that there was no doubt whatever, in his mind, that the admitted writings, the anonymous letters and the address and note of the package were penned by the same person. Knight did not get much from Ames about his mistakes in former cases and as to the matter of recompense it was proven that no specific sum had been mentioned, but that the usual price of the expert for testimony was $100 a day, and that the witness had been told by Hosmer that a reasonable bill would be audited.

One seemingly important question was put by Knight. It has been asserted all along that the prosecution intercepted a letter from Mrs. Botkin to Dunning at Porto Rico and that it had this genuine sample of her handwriting which it was afraid to include among the exemplars. Ames denied that he had been shown any such letter, and Hosmer became quite wrathy about it. At this Knight sneered and remarked aloud, "You're a good'un," which won him a reprimand from the Court. Carl Eisenschimmel, another expert, was on the stand at adjournment. He and Ames contradicted each other on one point as experts invariably do. Ames testified that the handwriting of the address and anonymous letters was elaborately disguised, while Eisenschimmel swore that it was merely a change of slant. The case goes on at 10 o'clock this morning.

THE TESTIMONY.

With the calling of the case yesterday morning John P. Dunning was given another chance to regain his freedom by divulging the names of women other than Mrs. Botkin with whom he had been on terms of intimacy.

"Mr. Dunning," said Judge Cook, addressing the witness, "are you ready at this time to answer the question propounded to you?"

"I am not," answered Dunning, "and I would like to make a statement."

"Does the defense still insist on the question?" asked the Court.

"We do," replied Knight, "and we object to any statement."

The Court ruled that Dunning had a right to give his reasons for not answering the question.

Dunning said: "If I had any suspicion that any of these women are in any way responsible for the death of my wife I would give their names; but as I am satisfied in my own mind that they had nothing to do with the crime I must decline to answer."

Assistant District Attorney Hosmer strove to extricate Dunning from his dilemma. "These inquiries are going beyond cross-examination," he said, "and through them the opposing counsel is seeking to make a defense. The argument can be made just as well without these women's names as it can with them."

Hosmer pleaded that an answer would tend to further degrade the witness, and Knight essayed a bit of oratory in reply.

"We have the right to attack the character of the witness," he shouted. "The character of the defendant has been attacked. If, by showing intimacy with the witness, the prosecution can draw conclusions that she is guilty, why cannot the same conclusions be drawn in regard to the other women?"

Judge Cook decided that Dunning's reason for not answering was insufficient. Under ordinary circumstances, he said, the question would not have to be answered, but as the substance of the witness' testimony related to showing a motive for the crime it was proper to ascertain the names of the women demanded by the defense.

Hosmer asked the witness if his reason for not answering was that he would incriminate himself. Knight objected to Hosmer's inquiry, saying such an excuse was a matter of personal privilege and could not be brought out by counsel.

The Court upheld the contention of the defense. Dunning did not take advantage of the opportunity to dodge the troublesome question and was again remanded to the custody of the Sheriff, to be confined in the County Jail until he gives the information desired.

Julius Fay, treasurer of the City of Paris dry goods store, was the first witness. He identified a money order dated June 1, 1898, and signed over to the firm by Mrs. Botkin. The order was admitted in evidence without objection on the part of the defense. Fay's testimony was considered important by the prosecution, as the order was presented by Mrs. Botkin about the time the handkerchiefs similar to the one sent to Mrs. Dunning were purchased. Mrs. Grace Harris has testified that the sale to Mrs. Botkin was made during the latter part of May or early in June.

Dr. Wolf, State Chemist of Delaware, was recalled to testify that there was no difference in the poisonous qualities of the different kinds of arsenic. In answer to a question he said amorphous arsenic was more soluble than crystalline arsenic.

Harry Pennington was recalled to give the prosecution an opportunity to withdraw its objection to a question as to whether there had ever been any trouble with the servants of the Pennington household. After the withdrawal Knight did not repeat the inquiry, saying he did not care to ask the witness any further questions.

Mrs. Louise L. Seeley, who once had Mrs. Botkin on her visiting list, next took the stand. She said she knew Dunning and Mrs. Botkin, and had met Dunning at the latter's rooms. When asked as to their intimacy she said they were very friendly. When asked if she had written the anonymous letters, the witness replied:

"No, sir; I flatly deny ever having written anything of the kind."

Mrs. Seeley further said she had not sent the fatal package and had no knowledge of any one else doing so.

On cross-examination the witness said she was a widow. The time she first met Mrs. Botkin she was one of a party of four, made up of Beverly Botkin, Dunning, Mrs. Botkin and herself. Their meeting place was Mrs. Botkin's room.

"Are you friendly to Mrs. Botkin?" asked Knight.

"I haven't such a terrible ill feeling toward her," answered the witness.

"Have you any ill feeling toward her?"

"I do not care for her."

The witness denied having quarreled with Mrs. Botkin over the defendant's son Beverly or that she had ever had any matrimonial designs on Beverly.

John B. Pennington was recalled and testified that he informed no one of the receipt of the pencil anonymous letter until after the death of Mrs. Dunning. Until then its contents were known only to himself and the writer and those who may have been enlightened by the writer. The letter referred to was never shown to Mrs. Dunning. This testimony bears on the statements about the anonymous letters which Miss Livernash testified were made to her by Mrs. Botkin.

Detective Ed L. Gibson was recalled to testify that Mrs. Botkin had told him she left San Francisco on the afternoon of August 4th, going to the ferry, thence by boat and train to Healdsburg.

Daniel T. Ames, the first of the handwriting experts, then put in an appearance. This witness made minute comparisons of the admitted and disputed handwritings. The admitted handwritings are a letter from Mrs. Botkin to Governor Budd, a letter to Mrs. Bird. Price, several orders for changes of Postoffice address and fragmentary writings, including several signatures of the defendant. The disputed writings are two addresses on the package sent to Mrs. Dunning, the note inclosed in the box of candy and the two anonymous letters. After the expert had inspected the writings he declared they were all written by the same person. He said the addresses on the wrapper were carefully disguised, but showed certain peculiarities conforming to those in the writings admitted to be genuine. The witness then called attention to the capital letter "P" on the wrapper, and with the aid of the blackboard showed the marked similarity between that "P" and the one in the Price letter. The similarity extended also to the anonymous letters and one of the orders for a change of address. Ames then took up the note inclosed in the candy box. The expert took the note letter by letter and showed the same formation of letters, the same connecting lines, and sometimes whole words almost exactly similar in the admitted writings. Particular attention was called to the peculiar loop of the small letter "f" and the arrangement of the letters following as shown in all of the writings both admitted and disputed. Comparisons in each instance were made with the anonymous letters and the wrapper and note.

When the trial was resumed in the afternoon Felix Reynaud, cashier of the City of Paris, testified that he knew Mrs. Botkin as a customer of the store in which he is employed. He had frequently cashed money orders for her. The witness identified a money order shown him, and, on referring to his books, fixed the date of its presentation by Mrs. Botkin as June 1, 1898. When asked by Knight if he knew Mrs. Botkin as a purchasing agent he said he had not known her in that connection at the place of his employment.

W. W. Barnes, clerk of the Hotel Victoria, was recalled and testified that the men who occupied room 26 for one night prior to the finding of the candy-box seal, were brought to the hotel by Special Officer Nixon. The strangers had nothing in their possession to his knowledge.

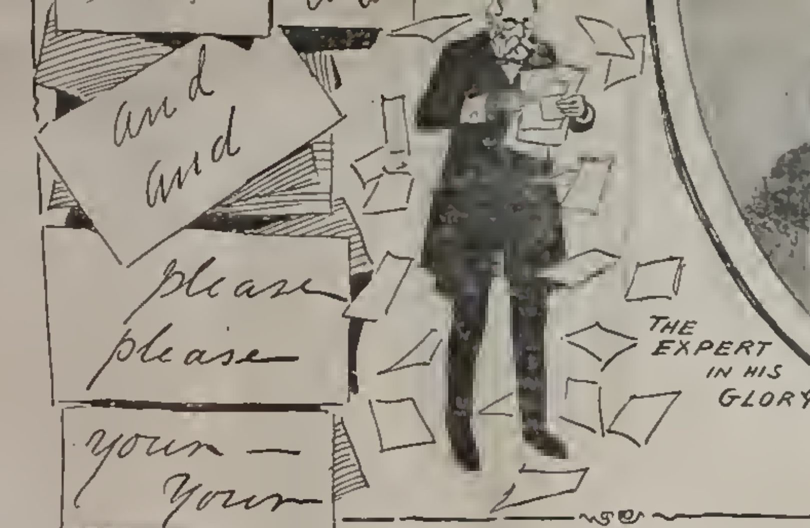
Daniel T. Ames then resumed his testimony. The disputed writings, he said, were not in a natural hand, but there were innumerable characteristics which were also found in the admitted writings. Even when the letters were disguised they were joined in a natural manner. The witness said the note was very carefully disguised, the slope of the writing being changed, the letters drawn carefully and an attempt to distort them out of all semblance to the natural writing. At the conclusion of the comparisons Hosmer asked:

"What is your opinion as to the writings?"

"There is no doubt but that all were written by the same person," answered the witness.

On cross-examination Ames said he had possibly made mistakes in the past, but he was as certain that all of the writings submitted to him in the Botkin case were written by the same person as he could be of anything without seeing it done. Ames denied having mistaken the disguised writing of a lawyer in the Whitman case, which was tried in New York, and having sworn the writing was entitled to a place among the genuine writings exhibited in the case. Knight was anxious to know how much Ames is to receive for his testimony, but had to be content with the information that the only agreement was a "reasonable fee." Ames said his usual fee was $100 a day. Knight desired to know if the witness had not been shown a letter written by Mrs. Botkin to John P. Dunning at Porto Rico and intercepted by the police. The witness answered that he had seen no such letter. Hosmer objected to that line of questioning, saying that Knight was seeking to get something in the case which did not belong to it. Knight switched to other questions. In one of his replies the expert said the address on the wrapper was written after it had been placed around the box and consequently the fingers could be cramped and the writing would not show a natural finger and forearm movement.

Carl Eisenschimmel, handwriting expert, was the last witness of the day. He began with a technical explanation of the terms used in studying handwriting. He believed all of the admitted and disputed handwritings were the work of the same person. He based this on the study of the muscular movement, which he said is never the same in two persons. He pointed out numerous peculiarities in the writings exhibited and said the writer had a remarkably developed thumb pressure and could not make a light up stroke. This showed, he said, in all of the writings. Numerous letters and words in the anonymous writings were dissected and similar formations shown in the admitted writings. The witness said that the pencil note inclosed in the box of candy was written in a natural hand without any disguise whatever, only the slant of the letters being changed. This directly contradicts Ames, who testified that the note was carefully disguised and the letters distorted. Eisenschimmel had not completed his testimony at 4:30, at which hour court adjourned to 10 o'clock this morning. Theodore Kytka, another expert, will follow Eisenschimmel and this will practically close the people's case.



MRS. LOUISE SEELEY.

WITNESS DUNNING IN JAIL FOR REFUSING TO ANSWER.

A SENSATION IN THE BOTKIN CASE.

Husband of One Murdered Woman Seeks to Shield a Companion of His Revels.

Mrs. Botkin was not the only person concerned in the Dover tragedy who spent last night in jail. John P. Dunning, once her lover, now her accuser, also lodged at the expense of the county, having been sent to jail by Judge Carroll Cook for refusing to answer a question. Mr. Dunning flouted the Court in its face and declined to answer a question put by Knight and allowed by the Court. It was not a pleasant question, but Dunning had little reason to expect that the defense would handle him with kid gloves. The witness was evidently thunderstruck when he heard the order commiting him to jail for contempt. He had sought to temporize with a query not to his liking, and when the Judge's order came there remained nothing but to take his medicine with as good a grace as possible. The last the crowded courtroom saw of Dunning was when he left the room in the convoy of a husky deputy Sheriff.

Ill luck seems to follow "Jack" Dunning. A stroke of blind fortune gave him a magnificent opportunity when he was a young man—an opportunity which he had wit and strength enough to grasp. It was fortune's tide in his affairs, and he took it at the turn. But he was not strong enough for good luck. Having won at a bound what better men give a lifetime to attain, he showed his incapacity by dissipating his powers and his money, until he finally traded on the confidence of his employers. He drove his wife from him, lived at a faster and faster pace and finally lost everything he had gained in his one lucky hour. Then, when fortune was at the very lowest ebb, when he was in rags, both physically and morally, came another lucky chance—an opportunity to retrieve himself. Again he took the tide at the turn. But this time he did not reap the rewards of his well doing. He was summoned home suddenly to find his wife murdered, his mistress accused of the crime and himself obliged to choose between duty to the state and fealty to the woman who had loved and defended him—a position few men would care to be in. Dunning chose the former and came to testify.

Yesterday he told, without apparent emotion, how he had deceived his wife, how he had lived with Mrs. Botkin, partaking of her bounty and at times sharing the money given her by her husband, told of her affection for him and her agony at the parting, then ... involved two states and has included jealousy and murder.

The question over which Dunning came to grief was one on which the defense lays particular stress. The prosecution said that as Dunning's refusal to answer was designed to protect the name of a particular woman, it was probable that the defense would not insist on the question, but the defense negatived this, and said it would push the question to the bitter end. Judge Cook was equally firm, and Dunning is obstinate. The question over which these wills clashed was as to the women with whom Dunning had been intimate in San Francisco. When first asked, Dunning said that there were perhaps half a dozen whose names he did not know. Asked, then, as to those whose names he did know, he hesitated, appealed to the Court, and, forced into a corner, refused to answer.

Through all Dunning's merciless expose his eyes constantly sought Mrs Botkin's, though hers fell before his. When he threw the searchlight most strongly upon their life in common, telling how their mode of life forced them from boarding-house to boarding-house, how they went like moral fugitives from pillar to post, she dropped her eyes, narrowed her lids and bit her lips. When he looked straight into her face and said that he believed the poisoned package was addressed by her and that the note within was written by her, she nodded her head affirmatively, as though life held nothing further in the way of disillusion, but when he told of his infidelities to her, woman like she shed tears for the first time during the trial.

The day was a hard one for other people besides Mrs. Botkin. There was no morning session on account of the death of the sister of Juror Jacobs, but the swift succession of sensations during the afternoon hours more than made up for the lack-luster morning. And when the star witness came it was a surprise, after all. The handwriting experts were held over for some reason and Dunning was called after Miss Livernash—called without warning, so that his coming sent a thrill through the packed courtroom, which was jammed in anticipation of some such sudden climax. The men and women who have been standing up for days and steaming in the judicial sweatbox lest they should miss a syllable of the expected nastiness had the reward for their long and patient waiting. When it came the testimony was not so bad to hear. It was told decently, though in English not too slavish to refined ears, and it was only when the listener stopped to think what it meant that it seemed as though the story was too bad to be true. To be sure, it was too bad ... life, but nevertheless ...

she first met the defendant in Healdsburg on August 15th at the residence of Mrs. McClure, sister of Mrs. Botkin. The defendant, in answer to inquiries, said she had no idea as to who had sent the poisoned candy. She said Mrs. Dunning had many friends and no enemies. Mrs. Botkin expressed a belief that the candy had been sent by a friend who did not know it contained poison. The next day Mrs. Botkin told the witness of her intimacy with Dunning at 927 Geary street. At first she did not want to talk, saying she wished to see a lawyer before making a statement. The witness told her that if she had anything to conceal she had better consult a lawyer, but such a course would be viewed in an unfavorable light by the public. Mrs. Botkin reconsidered and told how she formed an acquaintance with Dunning one summer day in Golden Gate Park, how she met him at the race track and how he became a visitor at 927 Geary street while that place was her home. Dunning was then living on Post street, but Mrs. Botkin persuaded him to take a room at 927 Geary street. Mrs. Botkin told the witness that she and Dunning spent nearly all their time together. They went to the race course. She lost little because she did not have much to squander, and he was extravagant in his speculations. Dunning was dissipating a great deal, Mrs. Botkin said. He became financially embarrassed, and Mrs. Botkin believed he would have committed suicide but for her. She prepared meals for him in her room. Mrs. Botkin also said that she tried to reform him, and was glad when he got the offer of a place as a war correspondent. She declared that his misfortunes had been a drain on her sympathies. He was in abject poverty, and when he left here he was in a pitiable condition. In another interview on the same day the witness told Mrs. Botkin that she was under strong suspicion of having sent the box of poisoned candy. Mrs. Botkin seemed greatly horrified and protested her innocence. ... she became hysterical and ...

In a room in the Imperial Hotel, after having left the witness in the hallway, the witness heard Mrs. Botkin pleading with her husband, telling him that he must save her. After the couple came out Mrs. Botkin framed the sentences of an interview in which the husband took all the responsibility and declared that his wife had been all that a wife should be. The husband nodded his assent to each sentence. Later Beverly Botkin came in and talked of "Jack" Dunning's love for his mother and his mother's love for "Jack" Dunning. Mrs. Botkin interrupted him telling him he would ruin her. At that time Mrs. Botkin told the witness that she was an English woman. Further questioning brought out testimony that Mrs. Botkin told the witness that when she was at her sister's house in Healdsburg she could not sleep as the walls seemed to be closing in on her. The walls in Stockton also had the same peculiarity, and it seemed as if something was trying to clutch her.

On cross-examination the witness said Mrs. Botkin had paid her railroad fare and Mr. Botkin had paid her hotel bill in Stockton. The witness had been told of the enmity of Mrs. Seeley and Mrs. Botkin. Mrs. Botkin had declared that Mrs. Arbogast was the mistress of her husband. She said Mrs. Arbogast had been trying to induce Botkin to get a divorce, but that Mrs. Botkin would not consent. The witness admitted that Mrs. Botkin was hysterical several times, but said the defendant's answers were responsive to her questions.

Knight let the witness go for a moment, then called her back, and brought out testimony that Mrs. Botkin had said that Dunning had embezzled money from his employers. When asked as to whether Mrs. Botkin had not said he was dismissed for embezzling $1000 she said she did not remember any such statement.

John P. Dunning began his testimony by telling of his marriage, of his wife's residence in this city, her frequent and lengthy visits to her Eastern home, and her departure for Delaware in August, 1896. He became acquainted with Mrs. Botkin in September, 1896, and met her frequently while his wife was still in the city, but avoided meeting her in public places. At first he did not know her by name, then she told him her name was Mrs. Curtis. At this Mrs. Botkin smiled. She said she was married, that her husband was in England, and that she was living in San Francisco to establish a residence and get a divorce. Dunning told her at their first meeting that he was a married man. A few weeks after they became acquainted the defendant gave her name to the witness as Mrs. Adelaide Botkin, and, telling her former story in a ... said she was living in San Francisco with her husband. She said she was born in Kent county, England, was put in a convent at a tender age on account of the death of her mother, remained there until she was 15, and then married Curtis, a man much older than herself. On his death she received some property, and, coming to the United States, met and married Botkin in Boston. Botkin had at that time, she said, a boy 15 years old, and this boy, Beverly Botkin, had been brought up by her.

After the witness' wife went away he was much with Mrs. Botkin. About the first week of 1897 he took a room at 927 Geary street, where she lived, making the change on account of his appreciation of her society. His room was on the same floor as that of the defendant. They went to the races and visited cafes, saloons and restaurants, with an occasional theater. Sometimes he dined in her rooms. They were on terms of close intimacy, and, according to the witness, she treated him with a marked degree of affection. After a few months of the gay life at 927 Geary street Dunning went to Salt Lake City. This was in May, 1897, and he remained there until the following August. While in Salt Lake he corresponded with Mrs. Botkin, but destroyed all her letters. He sent her a copy of one of the anonymous letters, which was forwarded to him by his wife. Dunning wrote to Mrs. Botkin that he suspected Mrs. Seeley of having written the letter, and the defendant seemed to be well satisfied with that suspicion.

The witness then told of his life in San Francisco after his return from Salt Lake City. Mrs. Botkin informed him that ... she had been divorced by ... county.

Hosmer showed the witness the wrapper of the fatal package sent to Mrs. Dunning, and asked.

"Can you state in whose handwriting these two addresses on this wrapper are written?"

"I believe it to be the handwriting of Mrs. Botkin," answered Dunning.

"You state that from your knowledge of her handwriting?"

"I do."

The witness was shown the note which was inclosed in the box of poisoned candy and after that the anonymous letters. He believed all the writings were the work of Mrs. Botkin.

Dunning was asked if there was any information in the anonymous letters that was known only to himself and Mrs. Botkin, and he answered, "Not exclusively so."

Knight began his cross-examination by questions as to incriminating handwriting, but Dunning repeated that he believed it was all the work of Mrs. Botkin. He admitted that in writing to his wife he had cast suspicion on a Miss Chamberlain as being the author of the anonymous letters, but said he had never believed that she had written them. He said that because she had made a remark to the effect that he was drinking himself to death. Dunning said he knew there was a feud between Mrs. Botkin and Mrs. Seeley. He had heard that Botkin was living with Mrs. Arbogast, and once at 927 Geary street Mrs. Botkin had told him she would not let her husband get a divorce, as she did not intend to be left without support. The witness did not encourage her to get a divorce nor seek to discourage any such action. The witness said he traveled around with Mrs. Botkin because he enjoyed her society more than any other woman in the city. He was asked if he had been intimate with other women, and replied in the affirmative. This led to more pointed inquiries. Dunning said he did not know the names of some of the women with whom he had been intimate.

"Give the names of those you do know," said Knight.

"I decline to answer," said Dunning, nervously.

Knight insisted on the question, and counsel for defense and prosecution briefly argued the point. The defense contended that the question had direct bearing on the possible motive of the crime. Judge Cook decided that the question demanded an answer. Dunning asked for time to think the matter over, and, looking appealingly at the clock, said, "It's almost 5 now."

The defense wanted an immediate answer, and the Court upheld its contention.

"Answer the question," said Judge Cook.

"I decline to answer," replied Dunning, doggedly.

Judge Cook then adjudged Dunning guilty of contempt of court and ordered that he be remanded to the County Jail until he was ready to answer the question.

Assistant District Attorney Hosmer tried to smooth Dunning's way to freedom by asking if he had forgotten the names he was asked to divulge.

"I remember the names," said Dunning. "I don't pretend that I don't remember, but I decline to answer."

The court then adjourned and Dunning was taken to his place of imprisonment by a deputy sheriff.

Attorney Knight will insist on the question being answered, even though that insistence may keep Dunning out of reach of further cross-examination. It has been suggested that Dunning may escape answering by saying that the answer would be an acknowledgment of criminal ...

With or without ... being the first ... on this morning at 10 o'clock.

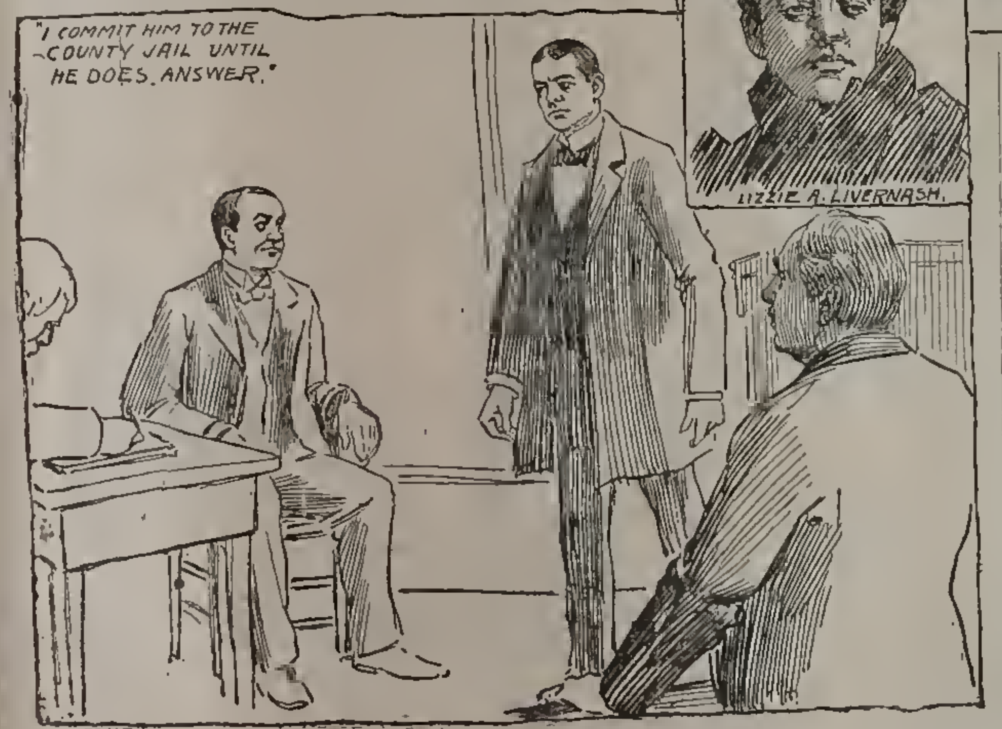
DUNNING IN JAIL.

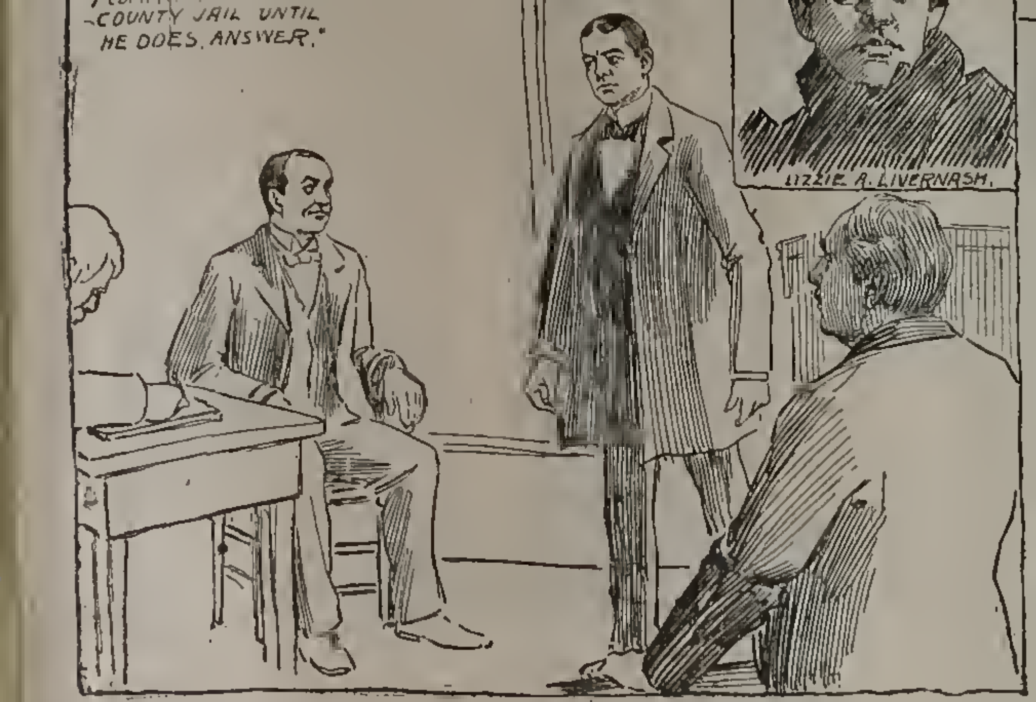
When seen at the County Jail last night Dunning was unwilling to say what determination he had come to, if any, in regard to telling in court the story of his gallantries. He was comfortably wrapped up in ... in the ... and blankets in a room on the second floor of the jail, which is set apart for prisoners above the level of the common herd of malefactors, and he appeared to be in a frame of mind that expressed little concern for the future intention of the Court.

"I am not worrying very much," he said as he carelessly rolled a cigarette, "and I'm pretty comfortably situated, although I can't say that I am very proud to be here. When I refused to answer that question in court to-day I did as my conscience dictated. What I will do in court to-morrow morning I am not prepared to say. I have consulted with no one and have told no one what my intentions are. Neither will I make known my intentions now.

"When I say I am not worrying over the situation I don't want to be considered as taking a flippant view of things. I realize the seriousness of the situation. I have nothing to say, however, about the probable outcome of what I may decide to do or say when I am taken into court to-morrow morning."

JOHN P. DUNNING.





JOHN P. DUNNING.

nothing but to take his medicine with as good a grace as possible. The last the crowded courtroom saw of Dunning was when he left the room in the convoy of a husky deputy Sheriff.

Ill luck seems to follow "Jack" Dunning. A stroke of blind fortune gave him a magnificent opportunity when he was a young man—an opportunity which he had will and strength enough to grasp. It was fortune's tide in his affairs, and he took it at the turn. But he was not strong enough for good luck. Having won at a bound what better men give a lifetime to attain, he showed his incapacity by dissipating his powers and his money, until he finally traded on the confidence of his employers. He drove his wife from him, lived at a faster and faster pace and finally lost everything he had gained in his one lucky hour. Then, when fortune was at the very lowest ebb, when he was in rags, both physically and mentally, came another lucky chance—an opportunity to retrieve himself. Again he took the tide at the turn. But this time he did not reap the rewards of his well doing. He was summoned home suddenly to find his wife murdered, his mistress accused of the crime and himself obliged to choose between duty to the state and fealty to the woman who had loved and defended him—a position few men would care to be in. Dunning chose the former and came to testify.

Yesterday he told, without apparent emotion, how he had deceived his wife, how he had lived with Mrs. Botkin, partaking of her bounty and at times sharing the money given her by her husband, told of her affection for him and her agony at the parting, then passed on to tell how from Mrs. Botkin's embraces he passed at once to those of his wife, lived with her a few days in the East and then departed for Cuba. He testified that he wrote Mrs. Botkin, both before he left and again after arrival at his destination, that he did not intend to return to San Francisco, but it soon came out that he kept up a diligent correspondence with her, writing to her and to his wife at the same time. Not once while Dunning testified was there the slightest flash of emotion, not once did the much-talked-of "horror" come to [illegible] his [illegible] gray eyes. Asked whether he thought the anonymous letters, the wrapper and the candy note were written by the same person he looked [illegible] at Mrs. Botkin and replied that he thought they were. Asked whose work he thought it was he looked with level gaze into her face and replied in a voice that might have been blown from an ice field, "I believe they are the work of Mrs. Botkin."

Dunning stood under the gas lamp during the anonymous letters with the light streaming down over his head [illegible] he looked a most insignificant [illegible]. He has a small head, set on narrow shoulders, and a small body not [illegible] carried. His shoulders stoop and his gait is slouching. His [illegible] covered with pale brown hair [illegible] thin and fine, the eyes are small [illegible], the lips thin and pressed to[illegible]. His habitual expression is a [illegible] smile, which deepens at times [illegible] quite fades away. His voice [illegible] and fulfills the promise of [illegible] mouth.

[illegible] Dunning stood there he was the [illegible] in the world who would have [illegible] as the hero of this tale [illegible] of the Tenderloin. The [illegible] the world to whom vacillating [illegible] would be expected to [illegible] [illegible] and honor. Any [illegible] the room looked more the [illegible] than this one, yet this was the [illegible] the story that has already cost [illegible] of two women and may cost the blood of another, that has in pose his eyes constantly sought Mrs. Botkin's, though hers fell before his. When he threw the searchlight most strongly upon their life in common, telling how their mode of life forced them from boarding-house to boarding-house, how they went like moral fugitives from pillar to post, she dropped her eyes, narrowed her lids and bit her lips. When he looked straight into her face and said that he believed the poisoned package was addressed by her and that the note within was written by her, she nodded her head affirmatively, as though life held nothing further in the way of disillusion, but when he told of his infidelities to her, woman like she shed tears for the first time during the trial.

The day was a hard one for other people besides Mrs. Botkin. There was no morning session on account of the death of the sister of Juror Jacobs, but the swift succession of sensations during the afternoon hours more than made up for the lack-luster morning. And when the star witness came it was a surprise, after all. The handwriting experts were held over for some reason and Dunning was called after Miss Livernash—called without warning, so that his coming sent a thrill through the packed courtroom, which was jammed in anticipation of some such sudden march. The men and women who have been standing up for days and steaming in the judicial sweatbox lest they should miss a syllable of the expected sensation had the reward for their long and patient waiting. When it came the testimony was not so bad to hear. It was told decently enough in English not too shocking to refined ears, and it was only when the listener stopped to think what it meant that it seemed as though the story was too bad to be true. To be sure, it was a tragedy in low life, but nevertheless it was not a pretty tale. Once Dunning said that his wife was a deeply religious woman, reared in an entirely different atmosphere from San Francisco, which she could never understand or appreciate, and at this remark the witnesses from Delaware exchanged sympathetic glances and approving nods.

The defense started out for a raking cross-examination, designed to show, primarily, that there were plenty of other women in San Francisco who held an undivided hundredth in Dunning's affections and that any of them had as much motive to commit the crime as Mrs. Botkin. On the first questions from the defense Dunning committed himself on the proposition that he believed the anonymous letters and the wrapper and note to have been written by the same person. He went on to give testimony showing that Mrs. Botkin was by no means a truthful woman, given to building castles in the air out of the materials of cheap English novels. Before Dunning came on the defense had proved by Miss Livernash that she had heard that Dunning was an embezzler and with the word ringing in the jury's ears Dunning appeared.

To-day will be the important day in the case. The defense relies much on the cross-examination of Dunning, though it is said that it expects to discredit him as a witness. As to his testimony, though it cost him so dear, it did not set forth any evidence that was new and the promised sensation that Dunning would testify that Mrs. Botkin once confessed to him that she had intended to kill him proved, as was expected, a fake.

THE TESTIMONY.

Miss Lizzie A. Livernash, who, as the representative of a San Francisco paper, had several interviews with Mrs. Botkin, was the first to testify. The witness said she first met the defendant in Healdsburg on August 14th at the residence of Mrs. McClure, sister of Mrs. Botkin. The defendant, in answer to inquiries, said she had no idea as to who had sent the poisoned candy. She said Mrs. Dunning had many friends and no enemies. Mrs. Botkin expressed a belief that the candy had been sent by a friend who did not know it contained poison. The next day Mrs. Botkin told the witness of her intimacy with Dunning at 927 Geary street. At first she did not want to talk, saying she wished to see a lawyer before making a statement. The witness told her that if she had anything to conceal she had better consult a lawyer, but such a course would be viewed in an unfavorable light by the public. Mrs. Botkin reconsidered and told how she formed an acquaintance with Dunning one summer day in Golden Gate Park, how she met him at the race track and how he became a visitor at 927 Geary street while that place was her home. Dunning was then living on Post street, but Mrs. Botkin persuaded him to take a room at 927 Geary street. Mrs. Botkin told the witness that she and Dunning spent nearly all their time together. They went to the race course. She bet little because she did not have much to squander, and he was extravagant in his speculations. Dunning was dissipating a great deal, Mrs. Botkin said. He became financially embarrassed, and Mrs. Botkin believed he would have committed suicide but for her. She prepared meals for him in her room. Mrs. Botkin also said that she tried to reclaim him, and was glad when he got the offer of a place as a war correspondent. She declared that his misfortunes had been a drain on her sympathies. He was in abject poverty, and when he left here he was in a pitiable condition. In another interview on the same day the witness told Mrs. Botkin that she was under strong suspicion of having sent the box of poisoned candy. Mrs. Botkin seemed greatly horrified and protested her innocence. Then she became hysterical and exclaimed, "Oh, why didn't I let the man die and spare the mother to her child!" She said she wouldn't harm Mrs. Dunning even by a thought. After she became calmer she decided to go to her husband in Stockton. Heavily veiled, she started from Healdsburg the next day and was accompanied by the witness. On the train Mrs. Botkin spoke of her fear that Dunning would suspect her, and then, in her horror, end his life. She wanted to know if the handwriting was disguised would the experts be able to detect it, and was told that they would. She spoke of the note signed "Mrs. C." and mentioned the name of Mrs. Corbaley, saying either Mrs. Corbaley or herself would be suspected, as one was a friend of the wife and the other a friend of the husband. When newspapers were brought aboard the train she inquired anxiously, "Is the child dead?" Then she asked if suspicion against her would not become stronger in case she and "Jack" Dunning should ever marry. The witness was requested by Mrs. Botkin to get an interview from Botkin, the husband, to the effect that he and his wife were not living together. When Mrs. Botkin and the witness reached San Francisco they went to the Russ House. The defendant did not register, saying she did not want to be apprehended until she was at her husband's side. On the journey Mrs. Botkin talked of the anonymous letters, giving a summary of their contents. She said the letters were three in number. Among other statements, which the witness testified were made to her by the defendant, was the following:

"I acknowledge that I have lived a gay life. I have lived for the pleasures of life alone, and not one has escaped me. I would not stop at anything to gain my desires, but even the divine court knows I would not stoop to murder."

The witness repeated stories of gay times at 927 Geary street as related to her by Mrs. Botkin. These times, Mrs. Botkin said, were participated in by her son, Beverly Botkin, Mrs. Louise Seeley, Dunning and herself. She admitted her intimacy with Dunning, saying, "He is my affinity, and to live with one's affinity is only to be compared with existence on another planet." Mrs. Botkin accused Mrs. Clara Arbogast, proprietress of the Hollister lodging-house, or Mrs. Seeley of having written the anonymous letters.

When the defendant reached Stockton, said the witness, she was met by her husband. While the husband and wife were in a room in the Imperial Hotel, after having left the witness in the hallway, the witness heard Mrs. Botkin pleading with her husband, telling him that he must save her. After the couple came out Mrs. Botkin framed the sentences of an interview in which the husband took all the responsibility and declared that his wife had been all that a wife should be. The husband nodded his assent to each sentence. Later Beverly Botkin came in and talked of "Jack" Dunning's love for his mother and his mother's love for "Jack" Dunning. Mrs. Botkin interrupted him telling him he would ruin her. At that time Mrs. Botkin told the witness that she was an English woman. Further questioning brought out testimony that Mrs. Botkin told the witness that when she was at her sister's house in Healdsburg she could not sleep as the walls seemed to be closing in on her. The walls in Stockton also had the same peculiarity, and it seemed as if something was trying to clutch her.

On cross-examination the witness said Mrs. Botkin had paid her railroad fare and Mr. Botkin had paid her hotel bill in Stockton. The witness had been told of the enmity of Mrs. Seeley and Mrs. Botkin. Mrs. Botkin had declared that Mrs. Arbogast was the mistress of her husband. She said Mrs. Arbogast had been trying to induce Botkin to get a divorce, but that Mrs. Botkin would not consent. The witness admitted that Mrs. Botkin was hysterical several times, but said the defendant's answers were responsive to her questions.

Knight let the witness go for a moment, then called her back, and brought out testimony that Mrs. Botkin had said that Dunning had embezzled money from his employers. When asked as to whether Mrs. Botkin had not said he was dismissed for embezzling $100 she said she did not remember any such statement.

John P. Dunning began his testimony by telling of his marriage, of his wife's residence in this city, her frequent and lengthy visits to her Eastern home, and her departure for Delaware in August, 1896. He became acquainted with Mrs. Botkin in September, 1896, and met her frequently while his wife was still in the city, but avoided meeting her in public places. At first he did not know her by name; then she told him her name was Mrs. Curtis. At this Mrs. Botkin smiled. She said she was married, that her husband was in England, and that she was living in San Francisco to establish a residence and get a divorce. Dunning told her at their first meeting that he was a married man. A few weeks after they became acquainted the defendant gave her name to the witness as Mrs. Adelaide Botkin, and, calling her former story a joke, said she was living in San Francisco with her husband. She said she was born in Kent county, England, was put in a convent at a tender age on account of the death of her mother, remained there until she was 15, and then married Curtis, a man much older than herself. On his death she received some property, and, coming to the United States, met and married Botkin in Boston. Botkin had at that time, she said, a boy 13 years old, and this boy, Beverly Botkin, had been brought up by her.

After the witness' wife went away he was much with Mrs. Botkin. About the first week of 1897 he took a room at 927 Geary street, where she lived, making the change on account of his appreciation of her society. His room was on the same floor as that of the defendant. They went to the races and visited cafes, saloons and restaurants, with an occasional theater. Sometimes he dined in her rooms. They were on terms of close intimacy, and, according to the witness, she treated him with a marked degree of affection. After a few months of the gay life at 927 Geary street Dunning went to Salt Lake City. This was in May, 1897, and he remained there until the following August. While in Salt Lake he corresponded with Mrs. Botkin, but destroyed all her letters. He sent her a copy of one of the anonymous letters, which was forwarded to him by his wife. Dunning wrote to Mrs. Botkin that he suspected Mrs. Seeley of having written the letter and the defendant seemed to be well satisfied with that suspicion.

The witness then told of his life in San Francisco after his return from Salt Lake City. Mrs. Botkin informed him that in his absence she had been divorced by the Superior Court of San Joaquin county, Botkin having instituted a suit in which John P. Dunning was the corespondent. The witness did not learn of the falsity of the story until last summer. He then [illegible] Dunning told of the many changes of abode made by Mrs. Botkin. They kept up their intimacy, Dunning spending a great deal of his time in her rooms, sometimes with them in [illegible] and sometimes with [illegible] at the Victoria Hotel and [illegible]. After being at the Victoria Hotel four or five days the witness received a telegram saying he could have a position to go to Havana as a war correspondent if he would start immediately for New York. Mrs. Botkin urged him not to go, saying it would be unkind and cruel to leave her after they had been so intimate. The witness was in more financial straits, and he told her that he must try to better his condition. She said poverty would be better than to break off such happy relations. The witness told her that he would never come back to San Francisco, as he would probably get a position in New York after he returned from Cuba. When the witness went away Mrs. Botkin accompanied him as far as the Sixteenth street railway station, Oakland.

"What was her manner at that time?" asked Hosmer.

"She was very much depressed," answered the witness. "She cried some on the train and when I bade her good-by the train and when I bade her good-by [illegible] manner was particularly affectionate."

Dunning then testified that he had talked with Mrs. Botkin about his wife several times. He told her of his wife's likes and dislikes, and remembered having mentioned to Mrs. Botkin that his wife was passionately fond of candy.

When asked about his determination not to return to San Francisco the witness said he had not only told Mrs. Botkin this, but had repeated it in one of his letters. The witness told of his journey East, of meeting his wife and daughter in Philadelphia and of their accompanying him to New York and remaining with him two days. He then recounted briefly his career in following the Army and [illegible] the front. [illegible] Porto Rico at the front. He learned of his wife's death, when he heard of his wife's death [illegible] and did not know that she had been poisoned until he reached New York city. When he reached there his attention was called to the anonymous letters, the originals of which he had never seen before.

Hosmer showed the witness the wrapper of the fatal package sent to Mrs. Dunning, and asked:

"Can you state in whose handwriting these two addresses on this wrapper are written?"

"I believe it to be the handwriting of Mrs. Botkin," answered Dunning.

"You state that from your knowledge of her handwriting?"

"I do."

The witness was shown the note which was inclosed in the box of poisoned candy and after that the anonymous letters. He believed all the writings were the work of Mrs. Botkin.

Dunning was asked if there was any information in the anonymous letters that was known only to himself and Mrs. Botkin, and he answered, "Not exclusively so."

Knight began his cross-examination by questions as to incriminating handwriting, but Dunning repeated that he believed it was all the work of Mrs. Botkin. He admitted that in writing to his wife he had cast suspicion on a Miss Calamberil as being the author of the anonymous letters, but said he had never believed that she had written them. He said that because she had made a remark to the effect that he was drinking himself to death. Dunning said he knew there was a feud between Mrs. Botkin and Mrs. Seeley. He had heard that Botkin was living with Mrs. Arbogast, and once at 927 Geary street Mrs. Botkin had told him she would not let her husband get a divorce, as she did not intend to be left without support. The witness did not encourage her to get a divorce nor seek to discourage any such action. The witness said he traveled around with Mrs. Botkin because he enjoyed her society more than any other woman in the city. He was asked if he had been intimate with other women, and replied in the affirmative. This led to more pointed inquiries. Dunning said he did not know the names of some of the women with whom he had been intimate.

"Give the names of those you do know," said Knight.

"I decline to answer," said Dunning, nervously.

Knight insisted on the question, and counsel for defense and prosecution briefly argued the point. The defense contended that the question had direct bearing on the possible motive of the crime. Judge Cook decided that the question demanded an answer. Dunning asked for time to think the matter over, and, looking appealingly at the clock, said, "It's almost 4:30 now."

The defense wanted an immediate answer, and the Court upheld its contention.

"Answer the question," said Judge Cook.

"I decline to answer," replied Dunning, doggedly.

Judge Cook then adjudged Dunning guilty of contempt of court and ordered that he be confined in the County Jail until he was ready to answer the question.

Assistant District Attorney Hosmer tried to smooth Dunning's way to freedom by asking if he had forgotten the names he was asked to divulge.

"I remember the names," said Dunning. "I don't pretend that I don't remember, but I decline to answer."

The court then adjourned and Dunning was taken to his place of imprisonment by a deputy sheriff.

Attorney Knight will insist on the question being answered, even though that insistence may keep Dunning out of reach of further cross-examination. It has been suggested that Dunning may escape answering by saying that the answer would

VOLUME LXXXV.—NO. 22. SAN FRANCISCO, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1898. PRICE FIVE CENTS.

DUNNING PLEADS THAT HE SEEKS JUSTICE, NOT REVENGE, UPON MRS. BOTKIN

Purged of Contempt by the Courtesy of the Defense.

Defenders of the Accused to Open Their Case This Morning.

Message of Death That Followed Close Upon a Missive of Love.

IT was a day of varied interest at the trial yesterday of Mrs. Cordelia Botkin. The prosecution closed its case and the defense announced that it will be ready to proceed this morning with the introduction of testimony, the right to make an opening argument to the jury being waived. John P. Dunning was again made yesterday the central figure of interest. He was brought into court in the custody of the Sheriff, after a night in the County Jail. He was placed on the witness stand, and George Knight, to the surprise of those interested in the trial of the case, withdrew his demand for the names of the women with whom Dunning claimed to have been intimate.

The cross-examination of Dunning then proceeded to the close, and something of Knight's purpose in releasing Dunning was seen in the result. It is seldom that a man is forced to make a public confession of personal dishonor and shame such as John P. Dunning made yesterday of himself in the presence of hundreds of listening men and women. He admitted that he had lived upon the bounty of his mistress, accepting her money, sharing her food and her home, existing upon her resources and thriving upon her means. He declared that she had shown him more than charity—that she had cared for him, counseled with him for reformation and divided with him the food that she needed for herself. When distress came to her she still clung to the man with whom she was fascinated and gave to him what she should have retained for herself.

More than this, the witness declared Mrs. Botkin had never, not even by insinuation, suggested to him to seek a divorce from his wife. This jealous, immoral mistress knew that her lover never intended to return to her, but as far as he knew she felt no resentment at the ties that kept him away from her and led him to other fields and another home. This testimony, under cross-examination, startled the courtroom. Dunning appeared more as a witness for the defense than for the prosecution. He presented an abject figure, but his humiliation seemed to be felt more keenly by his hearers than by himself.

There was an air of conscious boastfulness in his manner when he declared that he had been intimate with three women whose names he would not give. The defense has already shown that it means to make much of this secrecy and to insinuate that perhaps one of these women may have comm[illegible] the crime [illegible] which Mrs. Botkin [illegible]. The [illegible] clates Mr. Knight said: "May it please the court, I will withdraw the request for the names of the ladies."

The Court—Proceed with the cross-examination.

Knight—Mr. Dunning, you say there are six women with whom you were on intimate terms whose names you do not remember. How many are there whose names you remember, but do not wish to give? A.—Three.

Q.—Do you know Mrs. Corboley, and did you have any business relations with her? A.—She loaned money to myself and Mrs. Dunning. It was $800 in all.

The witness said he wrote to Mrs. Botkin while on the train between here and develop? A.—When I heard of an important happening several months ago. It came within one hour after I reached Dover and learned of the circumstances surrounding the death of my wife and my sister-in-law. Their death by poisoned candy directed my suspicions toward Mrs. Botkin. Up to that moment I had no suspicions against Mrs. Botkin. The first telegram only told me of her death by supposed confectionery poisoning. I had no suspicions against any one else, although I told the officers of the law that Mrs. Ruoff and the druggist who sold the arsenic might be useful witnesses. I referred to Mrs. Ruoff as a witness and not as a principal. I knew of her confidential relations with Mrs. Botkin.

[illegible] Before Dunning went on the stand [illegible] the[illegible] in that word to the one in [illegible]

Q.—Explain your hostility toward Mrs. Botkin. A.—It arises because of the death of my wife.

Q.—What was the first thing to cause you to think of Mrs. Botkin in connection with the poisoning of your wife? A.—Because of the relations that had existed previously between us and of the feeling she had for me, or that I thought she had for me. In my own heart I did not think any one else would do it.

The witness learned of his wife's death at 6 p. m. August 13. An hour before that time he drove to Ponce, Porto Rico, and mailed a letter to Mrs. Cordelia Botkin in this city. This was the last communication of any character Dunning has had since that moment with the woman now on trial for her life. The letter reads:

PONCE, Porto Rico, August 13, 1898.

Dear Ada: I have been here about dead to the world for two or three weeks, without any means of getting any mail and very little chance of getting any away. Just before I left Kingston I wrote you asking you to address me at St. Thomas, but have never been there yet, having come here direct, and I have received no mail. We got the news to-day that peace had been declared, and I suppose I will be going to New York soon, but I know nothing particular about it. I will have to send you an address when I get to New York, and you had better not send any more mail to St. Thomas as I will probably not get there now. This is the most beautiful island I have ever seen, and I have been [illegible] in the saddle since I have been here, wearing holes in my anatomy. I am really sorry the war is [illegible] for I have certainly enjoyed it and ...to insinuate that perhaps ... of these women may have committed the crime ... which Mrs. Botkin [illegible] ... The ... of Mrs [illegible] ...ing at ... and [illegible] ...en of ... their ... estab-lish...

During the afternoon Attorney McGowan made a spectacle of himself. Knight was ill, and McGowan undertook the task of cross-examination. He succeeded in disgusting the court and in elevating Dunning to a plane of comparative decency. McGowan carried his questions in relation to the intimacy between Mrs. Botkin and Dunning to the point of indecency, and Judge Cook angrily declared that he would sustain any objection made to that sort of an inquiry. Assistant District Attorney Hosmer shrugged his shoulders and replied that he had no wish to interrupt the plan of the defense as interpreted by Mr. McGowan.

It was then that Mrs Botkin's lawyer elicited from Dunning the most damaking testimony he had given against the accused woman. McGowan demanded to know and was informed why Dunning is hostile to Mrs. Botkin. Dunning replied that he came here with no thought of vengeance on the woman. He came with no hatred toward her, but with a sense of duty he owed to his dead and a purpose to compensate, as far as he may, for the offenses in the past. He was convinced that Mrs. Botkin was concerned in the death of his wife, and he begged McGowan to believe that it was duty, not pleasure, that impelled him to become the accuser of Mrs. Botkin. McGowan was not even satisfied with the effect of his boomerang. He asked to know the reason of Dunning's suspicion toward Mrs. Botkin, and received the reply that within one hour after the witness reached Dover he was convinced that Mrs. Botkin was guilty.

McGowan then drew from the witness the confession that he had been in collusion with his mistress to deceive his wife, and that while he was speeding on his journey to New York he sent letter after letter to Mrs Botkin. This phase of the examination developed a pathetically dramatic recital. Dunning's letters, written from Cuba and Porto Rico to Mrs Botkin, were read in court. The epistles were uninteresting except for their reference to great events of which Dunning as a newspaper correspondent had been an observer and sometimes a participant. Occasionally the writer would express some term of endearment, but not by any means an extravagant one. He wished his mistress well, and told her in passing what was happening at the seat of war.

On August 13 Dunning wrote his last letter to his paramour. He was at the city of Ponce, in Porto Rico, and drove three miles in a carriage to the seaside postoffice to mail his epistle of affection. Having mailed his letter he returned to Ponce and went without delay to the cable office. He there found waiting for him a cablegram telling him that his wife had been poisoned and was dead. His offense to his home and his family had borne its fruit.

Dunning was then released from the witness stand. Judge Cook then set aside his own order confining Dunning to the County Jail. In committing the witness to the custody of the Sheriff Judge Cook declared that he had simply done his duty. A question had been asked by the defense and the questioner was entitled under the law to an answer. With the withdrawal of the question there was no further reason for punishment. The question had been of such a character, the Judge continued, that he did not feel that he should inflict a fine as well as imprisonment. He therefore ordered Dunning released from custody.

The prosecution had very little more to offer. Before Dunning went on the stand Carl Eisenschimmel held the attention of the court and jury. As an expert on handwriting Eisenschimmel went over the old familiar ground of dots and dashes, hooks and curves and all the dreary technical detail of the critical analysis of handwriting. From every consideration Eisenschimmel declared his positive belief that Mrs. Botkin wrote the anonymous letters, the note in the box of candy and the address on the package of poisoned sweets.

Attorney Knight offered the expert a specimen of handwriting and asked if it were in the handwriting of Mrs. Dunning. Eisenschimmel was not to be trapped and demanded time out of court in which to make a thorough investigation. It is an old trick of the experts to deceive experts with clever forgeries, but Eisenschimmel is familiar with the game.

He had not been so careful, however, the day before, when he quietly slipped into the gallery of the courtroom and listened to the testimony of Expert Ames. Eisenschimmel vehemently protested that he had no ulterior purpose, but the fact remained that he had gone to the court room, and the defense was glad that the fact had been discovered. Theodore Kytka was the last handwriting expert placed on the witness stand by the prosecution.

Kytka had made a series of photographs of the exhibits in the case and had made the customary critical analysis. He also was positive that Mrs. Botkin wrote all the letters and the addresses. After a cross-examination that was of no consequence Kytka was relieved. The prosecution placed Chief Lees and Harry Pennington on the stand to close small gaps in the chain of evidence and then the Assistant District Attorney announced that the case for the people was closed. As Attorney Knight was not present the defense could not proceed. McGowan announced that the defense will be ready this morning and an adjournment was taken until then.

Upon the opening of court Mr. Hosmer, the prosecuting officer, asked for the dismissal of the case against J. G. Edwards, charged by Andrew J. Clunie with libel. Mr. Edwards printed the alleged libelous articles in his insurance paper. Judge Cook dismissed the charge at the request of Mr Clunie, the complainant.

John P. Dunning was in the courtroom, but not being called retired to the Judge's chambers. He remained within call.

Carl Eisenschimmel, the writing expert, resumed his exposition of the peculiarities of Mrs Botkin's handwriting. He first took up the quotation marks in the "baby" note and dissected them, finally reaching the conclusion that they bore all the characteristics of Mrs. Botkin's handwriting. In the letter "C" he found a certain angularity which is in all Mrs. Botkin's writing. In one specimen of Mrs Botkin's known handwriting, that of her Healdsburg address, given Mrs Price, there were four "cs" and all had this characteristic angularity. The anonymous letters, he said, were fairly bristling with evidences of Mrs. Botkin's handwriting with but feeble attempt at disguise.

The "se" in "please" was written by her, being identical with standards of her writing. These two letters were invariably written off the line and much higher than any others. This is apparent in her known writing, according to the expert. There is a decided difference of slant between the "p" and "l" that is noticeable throughout her writing, the "p" being almost vertical and the "l" slanting.

"I call your attention to the word 'Madam,'" said the expert. "Compare the 'd' in that word to the one in 'madam' in this other letter. Note the similarity of the 'd' in those cases. That 'd' is produced in a peculiar manner, such as I have never seen before."

To the jurors, producing a microscope: "I will give a brief description of this instrument."

Knight—You needn't; we don't want it.

The expert ran counter to Knight shortly after when he told the jurors it was not necessary to use the glass to note what he desired to show them.

Knight—Who do you mean does not find it necessary?

The expert—I do not.

Knight—You are not in this testimony.

The expert then drew attention to the letter "c" made by Mrs. Botkin. He spoke of its abnormal size, being double the height of any other space letter. To Juror J. F. Myers he said it was impossible to judge of handwriting by form alone, and that the peculiarities ran through both capitals and small letters.

In conclusion, the expert said he thought he had established to the jury his belief that all the handwriting in evidence had been written by the same person.

In the course of a harsh cross-examination Knight elicited the information that Eisenschimmel occupied a place in the gallery of the courtroom while his colleague, Expert Ames, was on the witness stand. The expert said that what he meant by the "pen habit" and "writing habit" was the habitual manner in which writing was produced. He explained that paying tellers of banks were experts in a certain way. They look at a check and get an impression by which they are able to judge as to genuineness, but cannot explain how they reach that conclusion.

"Mrs Botkin has positive peculiarities or characteristics," said the expert.

Q.—Well, what do you find? A.—She writes the angular or so-called English hand.

Q.—What kind of arm movement? A.—Partly finger, partly forearm—a combined movement.

Q.—Find any characteristics of Mrs. Botkin's handwriting? A.—Yes, many of them.

Q.—Give one. A.—In the word "place" the letter "p" has one slant and the "l" another.

Q.—That is a Botkin characteristic? A.—Not in every case. There is no rule.

Q.—Is this the first time in your life you ever saw a "p" and an "l" that looked anything like those? A.—Yes.

The witness said that the "baby" note was in Mrs Botkin's handwriting, the only attempt at disguise being in the slant of the letters. He was handed a piece of paper by Mr. Knight, but declined to touch it or pass upon it, saying it was not an exhibit in the case. Knight's efforts to force the witness to express an opinion offhand as to the writing brought Hosmer to the rescue and developed some more of the schoolgirl repartee which has enlivened the proceedings from time to time.

"Don't interrupt me when I am talking," said Hosmer. "Some one else has a right to be heard here besides you."

"Well, you've been talking for two days," was the rejoinder.

When the expert retired finally Judge Cook said: "Call John P. Dunning." To the latter he said: "Mr. Dunning, it is the desire of the court that you should have an opportunity, at least every twenty-four hours, of reconsidering your determination not to answer the question put to you by Mr Knight on Monday."

Turning to Mr Knight he said: "Mr. Knight, do you insist upon the question?"

After a short conference with his asso-...

DUNNING DECLARED THAT HE SOUGHT NOT VENGEANCE BUT JUSTICE.

John P. Dunning is again at liberty. The legal defenders of Mrs. Botkin withdrew their question in reference to the man's gay companions, and he was released from the County Jail. Under cross-examination yesterday he declared dramatically that he sought to satisfy no vengeance on Mrs. Botkin, but was a witness simply from a sense of duty and with a purpose to compensate as far as he may for his past life. He was convinced, he said, that Mrs. Botkin was concerned in the death of his wife, and inspired by that conviction became a witness.

New York. He wrote again between that point and Tampa, Fla. In answer to further questions he said he did not remember ever having suggested to Mrs. Botkin that she go to New York and live. He did not remember ever telling her that he would like to have her there.

He telegraphed his wife before he left here, and again had a friend apprise her of his coming when he reached Chicago.

Q.—Why did you write to Mrs. Botkin? A.—I told her I would, and knew she expected to hear from me.

Q.—When you left Mrs. Botkin at Oakland there was no rupture between you? There was no good-by forever, this is all off, or anything of that kind, was there? A.—No; there was no rupture. I understood in my own mind that I was not coming back to San Francisco, but I did not tell Mrs. Botkin so.

Dunning again told in outline of the contents of the anonymous letters; about him drinking himself to death; of the life he had led in this city, and of his financial difficulties not due solely to his losses upon the race track. His wife sent him a copy instead of the original, but why he did not know. He did not get the original and send it to Mrs. Botkin. He had never asked for the original, although he was interested in knowing who wrote it. He did not know why he had not asked for it.

Q.—Did Mrs. Botkin ever express a desire to injure your wife or suggest that you secure a divorce? A.—She never expressed such a desire nor made such a suggestion.

Q.—Did not she divide her last morsel of bread with you when you were at 927 Geary street? A.—She did.

Q.—Didn't she nearly starve with you when you had hardly a boiled rag between you? A.—Yes, sir.

Q.—She gave you money to assist you which she received from her husband? A.—She gave me money; I don't know where she got it.

Q.—She sent you money to Salt Lake to bring you home, where you could get another position? A.—She did.

Q.—When you left here you wrote three or four letters to her and sent one telegram to your wife? A.—Yes, sir.

On redirect examination Mr. Hosmer drew from him the information that he had spent considerable money on Mrs Botkin's pleasures. He also testified that he knew of only two anonymous letters until after his wife's death. Witness said he never told Mrs. Botkin to come to New York. Upon his return from the war he purposed having his family join him, and they were to make their home in New York. The witness said he had no letters written him by Mrs Botkin; he had destroyed them all. He had received no letter from her since the death of his wife. He had received answers to all his except the last one he sent.

The hour for adjournment having arrived Judge Cook addressed Dunning and said that although he had been guilty of contempt of court in refusing to answer a question when directed to do so by the court, yet his Honor did not think it was a case where further punishment should be inflicted, especially when Mr. Knight had voluntarily withdrawn his question. Dunning was therefore, purged of his contempt and set at liberty.

Dunning was the first witness of the afternoon. In answer to Mr Hosmer he said Mrs Corboley was an intimate friend of his family. They were born near one another in the South on the border line between Maryland and Delaware. Their families had known one another for years. She was much older than he and was an intimate friend of his wife. He said none of the exhibits of writing in evidence resembled hers.

In the absence of Attorney Knight Senator Frank McGowan took the witness through a severe cross-examination. Dunning said that Mrs. Botkin knew Mrs. Corboley as a friend of Mrs. Dunning. He had told her so when telling her of the financial transaction between them. He had never had any intimacy or relation whatever with Mrs. Corboley except this.

Regarding Mrs. Callmbertie he said he had but a slight acquaintance with her. The writing was not hers. Asked as to why he mentioned her name to his wife he said it was because he wanted to give a plausible excuse. He first thought of Mrs. Seeley, but to mention her name would be to entangle himself in a maze from which he might find it hard to extricate himself.

McGowan asked if he had sustained any intimacy with Mrs. Callmbertie and Dunning said he had not.

McGowan—If you had would you tell?

Witness—I would decline to answer.

He said he had deceived his wife and had written her falsehoods, as he had to get out of the trouble brought on by the anonymous letters. Asked as to why he had not told her some one else he replied he had thought of no one else at the time. He knew it was false and knew it was an injustice to this woman to point the finger of suspicion at her, but at the moment he thought it would never come out.

Q.—Did you suspect Mrs Seeley? A.—I thought she had ill feeling against me.

Q.—For what reason? A.—About four months before Mrs Botkin wrote to her an insulting letter. She knew of the intimate relations existing between Mrs Botkin and myself, and I thought she might have suspected me of instigating it.

Q.—Did you know Mrs Seeley was an enemy? A.—I had no other reason for thinking she was.

Q.—Why did you not mention Mrs. Seeley's name to your wife? A.—Because it would expose the relations existing between Mrs Botkin, Mrs. Seeley and myself.

Q.—You wanted to shield yourself? A.—I certainly did, that was the main reason I put the blame on Mrs. Callmbertie. I had to give some name that would appear plausible to my wife.

Q.—You knew of the trouble between Mrs. Botkin and Mrs. Seeley? A.—I did.

Q.—Was it directed against you? A.—No; it was on account of contemplated divorce proceedings between Mr. Botkin and wife.

Q.—You speak of close intimacy. What do you mean by that expression? A.—I told you at length of the life led by myself and Mrs Botkin. I tried to avoid speaking too plainly.

Q.—Well, what was its nature? A.—It was improper. Do you want further answer?

Q.—I want an answer. A.—My relations with Mrs Botkin were such as a married man has no right to have with a married woman or any other woman. (A long pause.) I have been with her and have remained over night in her apartments.

The court here interposed an objection in the name of decency and the questioning on that line ceased.

The witness was asked as to a feeling of hostility he bore toward Mrs Botkin. He said he had such a feeling, but it was not one looking toward vengeance. He came here as a witness to "condone" for the faults of his past life of excess.

Q.—When did this feeling of hostility

...and you had better not send any more mail to St. Thomas, as I will probably not go there now. This is the most beautiful island I have ever seen, and I have been almost ... in the ... since I have been here, wearing holes in my anatomy. I am really sorry the war is over, for I have certainly enjoyed it and I am in considerable uncertainty about the kind of work I will do when I get to New York. I am perfectly well, but it is better than blue blazes here. I hope everything has continued to be well with you. With my love,

J.

Theodore Kytka, pen artist and photographer, succeeded Dunning in the witness chair. He was shown the various examples of handwriting, and without going into the customary painful explanations, testified that they were in Mrs. Botkin's handwriting. He was taken through a profitless cross-examination by Attorney C. M. Wheeler of Humboldt, who gave a clever imitation of George Knight in one particular. He could lean as gracefully on the rail of the witness-stand as Mrs. Botkin's leading attorney. The resemblance ceased there. He drew from the witness the statement that the wrapper from the candy box had been ironed out. He had forgotten that Chief Lees had testified to this early in the trial. He then tried to prove by the witness that the passage of the iron over the paper had changed its appearance entirely. The most the witness would acknowledge was that the ironing had not removed the original creases but had merely leveled them.

Mr. Hosmer then placed Chief Lees on the stand to explain how he had done the terrible washing and ironing to which the bit of paper had been subjected. "Mr." Lees, as Senator McGowan persisted in calling him, told how he had handled the wrapper. The venerable Police Chief, who looks more and more like a real flesh and blood Santa Claus, was cross-examined to no purpose.

"If your Honor please," said Mr Hosmer, "the prosecution rests its case."

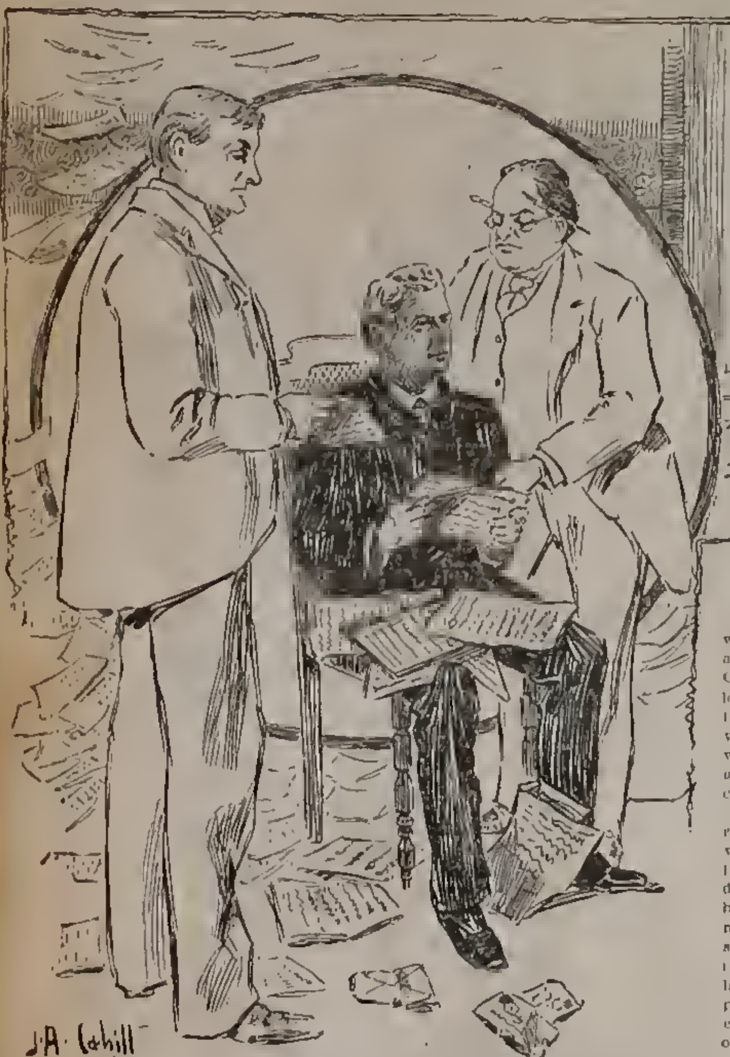
Judge Cook—Let the defense proceed.

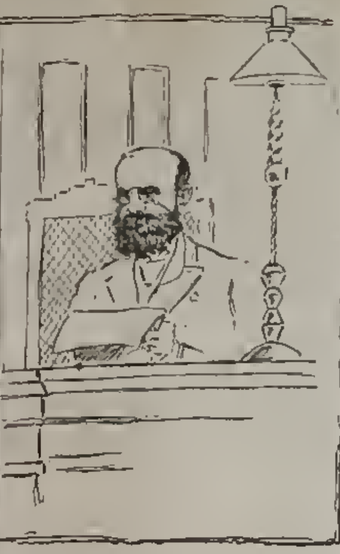
Mr McGowan then addressed the court, saying the defense did not expect the prosecution to conclude at so early an hour and was not prepared to place its witnesses on the stand at that time. He asked that the case go over until this morning. He said the defense would waive its right to an opening statement but reserved the right to call Mrs. Harris for further cross-examination.

Judge Cook agreed to the continuance, saying the trial was making most satisfactory progress that sixty-eight witnesses had been examined in seven days. The defense will commence its presentation of Mrs. Botkin's case at 10 o'clock.

An expert in handwriting is either very good or very bad. In one case he may be a scholarly gentleman of broad experience, undoubted ability and unquestionable integrity, and in the next but the paid hireling of the other side. It depends altogether upon whose expert he happens to be. In the Fair case, Mr Knight found Professors Ames and Professor Kytka men of probity and honesty. In the Davis will [illegible] his high opinion of them was confirmed, but in the Botkin case he will undoubtedly [illegible] that they are men who will [illegible] their opinions [illegible] highest bidder regardless of the fact that human life is at stake. The [illegible] [illegible] never make [illegible] [illegible] expense [illegible] two [illegible] handwriting.

JUDGE COFFEY AS A WITNESS IN JUDGE TROUTT'S COURT





Judge James M. Troutt.

JUDGE COFFEY had a novel experience yesterday in Judge Troutt's courtroom. Called by the complainant in the suit of Calvin F. Somers against the California Savings and Loan Society, Mrs. Maud Nolan and the executor of the Treadwell estate, the jurist was badgered and glared at by lawyers, told when to speak and when not to, and otherwise abused as witnesses are in cases where a large amount of money is the prize. Judge Coffey meekly bowed his head to the legal storm and humbly acknowledged that he was not an expert in handwriting but merely a Superior Judge, who in the course of his professional acts had gained a knowledge of the calligraphy of Mrs. Mabel Treadwell.

He laid no claim to fame as a decipherer of pothooks and hangers with which he had not a special acquaintance. The case on trial involves the disposition of $14,000 tied up in the hands of the savings and loan society made defendant, and title to which is sought by Summers, Mrs. Nolan and the Treadwell estate. The will of the late Millionaire Treadwell had been probated before Judge Coffey, and he certified to the widow's signature and other writing in various documents.

Judge Coffey was not quite sure about one paper, but he had an opinion, and this drew out the fact that he was not an expert but testifying only as regards writing with which he was familiar.

PETER McGLADE WILL PLEAD "NOT GUILTY"

DECEMBER 26, 1898.

Belief That Others Are Implicated.

MAY SHIELD A FRIEND

MORE SKELETONS IN THE WARRANT FORGERY CASES.

The Street Department Deputy's Attorney Says the Accused Will Soon Be Acquitted.

Is Peter W. McGlade, ex-Deputy Superintendent of Streets, and under indictment for forgery, trying to shield some one else equally or even more guilty?

This question has been asked frequently of late by many persons to whom the accused's affairs are well known. There is a growing inclination to the belief that there is more in the Street Department forgery cases than has made its appearance before the courts so far. There is no disposition to hold McGlade guiltless, the impression being that to say the least he is an accessory after the fact. Most of the surmises are based upon the actions of the accused and his attorneys, who are supposed to be in full possession of the inside facts and that the representatives of the law are not anxious to implicate any one else, if they can accomplish the acquittal of their client by other means. However one thing has been decided upon, and that is they will not have their client sacrificed to save any one, no matter what his social or political position may be.

As straws show which way the wind blows, so do the actions of McGlade and others indicate that there is more back of the forgery cases than has yet been made public; so argue the suspicious ones. In the first place they say Superintendent Ambrose's confidential deputy was well out of harm's way and might have eluded the officers of the law for an indefinite time, and may be forever, but he willingly came back to face the charges made against him. Was he promised protection? Some believe he was.

From the time of his return to the present he has maintained a strict silence, not even confiding to his most intimate friends a hint as to how he would meet the charges. McGlade's refusal to plead to the Grand Jury indictment before Superior Judge Cook last Saturday is looked upon as peculiar. His demand for time to plead, as allowed him by the law, is regarded as the first steps in a fight that may last indefinitely. Not a few believe that the ex-deputy will escape from very serious consequences, and their belief is to a great extent based upon something that happened after the court had adjourned.

McGlade's attorneys are the firm of Reddy, Campbell & Metson. Mr. Reddy asked the court for a continuance to give the defendant time to plead, and five days were allowed. The next was the announcement that at the proper time a motion would be made for a reduction of the bail from $10,000 on each of the two charges of forgery to $5000 on each. Good grounds for the request were promised, but what these good grounds are were not stated and so far they remain a secret. However, the attorneys lost no time in hunting for bondsmen, and they were successful, for a time. Mr. Metson, one of McGlade's attorneys, said he would go on one of the bonds, high as it was. When comment was made at the attorney taking such a risk he said: "I have no fear whatever. McGlade will be acquitted before his case goes to the jury. I know what I am doing."

This confident expression on the part of a careful lawyer lent additional weight to the belief already expressed. McGlade would have been out on Saturday evening on $20,000 bail but for the intervention of Superintendent of Streets Ambrose. Joseph Kelly, the capitalist and politician, was about to qualify on the bond with Mr. Metson, but Ambrose "pulled him down." It is said upon the argument that even if McGlade did get out he would be rearrested upon some other charges. Hence all further moves in the matter of getting bonds that night were called off until to-morrow, when a substitute for Kelly will be found. Somewhat to his annoyance McGlade spent his Christmas in the County Jail. He did not suffer for good things in the eating line, for when the meal time came his wife visited him and sent in as fine a dinner as one could wish to eat.

McGlade's confinement in the Broadway hotel does not seem to have had a very depressing effect upon him, for according to his own statements he is five pounds heavier than when he came back from his unannounced vacation in Deming, N. Mex. He declares that with the exception of a very little worry, that might be expected, he is in the best of health and spirits. Of the subject of his case McGlade has not a word to say, beyond that in keeping silent he is acting under the advice of his attorneys. One of the latter, Patrick Reddy, said yesterday that there was nothing out of the common practice in his asking for time for his client to plead.

"The law allows it and we should have a chance to learn the nature of the indictment," said he. "It is true we were told that the charge would be forgery, but we want time to look into the indictment before our client pleads. The indictment may be faulty and we may think it best to move to have it set aside upon statutory grounds, or we may put in a demurrer, which we certainly will do if there is the slightest grounds for such a course. When the time comes for McGlade to plead he will plead 'not guilty.' We are ready to go on with the trial at any time and meet the issue presented. I cannot say what our defense will be, for as I told you we have not had time to look into the indictment and we do not know what the exact charges are."

MRS. BOTKIN TALKING FOR HER LIFE.

PRISONER'S STORY MOSTLY DENIALS.

Sensation of the Defense Turns Out to Be an Alibi as to Those Unsigned Letters.

MRS. BOTKIN'S judges are having a chance to learn something of Mrs. Botkin's character from personal observation. Late yesterday afternoon the lady of the case shed her black veil so quietly that no one noticed she had discarded her weeds and the sleepy courtroom sat up with a start when Knight called in his superabundant voice "Mrs. Botkin."

She is small and plump, this leading woman of the case, and she tripped up to the witness chair, pausing midway to take the oath impressively and to give her name, which everybody knew—the name of the youngest and mildest of Lear's daughters.

But Mrs. Botkin is neither young nor mild and she might have been christened Regan or Goneril more appropriately. She shows temper in every turn of a hand, in every flashing glance, in every glittering tooth, when she raises her lip in a snarl that is not lovely, and even in the perky, bird-like motions of her head. No man can tell exactly what impression Mrs. Botkin made upon her judges. She was a woman talking for her life and telling a story that might save or damn her. Naturally, she was flustered and nervous. Mrs. Botkin is a bit of an actress, but it would take a greater mistress of stage craft than she to preserve entire calmness in such an ordeal. Her bosom heaved and now and then she caught her breath. She played nervously with her fingers and at times her voice was so monotonous and the downward droop of her eyes so persistent that she seemed to be reading. Whether the eyes were drooped in an assumption of coyness or modesty no one knows. At any rate, the ingenue role scarcely fits the experienced Mrs. Botkin.

The defendant sat with her back half turned on the teeming courtroom and her face turned full to the jury. Evidently it was to be allowed to watch the play of her countenance. Besides, Mrs. Botkin is accredited with powers of fascination. But Mrs. Botkin's countenance long since ceased to play. Only at times a genuine expression breaks through the habitual mask of reserve and illumines the face. Then it was that Mrs. Botkin flashed her eyes, which are handsome, into Lawyer Knight's face, or showed her teeth in a baleful way, like some animal brought to bay. But except for these transient gleams, Mrs. Botkin was an ordinary, everyday woman of the middle class, conceited, affected and desperately intent on putting the best foot forward.

The most striking thing about the prisoner is her affectation. It is probably a lifelong habit—so long worn that it has become second nature, and that she could not drop it if she would. The English accent is part of this, for Mrs. Botkin is an English woman from Missouri and her English is the English of the paper-covered novel. Mrs. Botkin makes a specialty of such words as "luggage," and calls her Tony Lumpkin of a son "the lad," though it is said that he is built like a barrel and weighs an incredible amount. Mrs. Botkin also says "me room" and "me apparel" and occasionally she drops the "h" from hotel without stopping to look for it. With her every room is an apartment and every buggy a carriage. She told how she drove from St. Helena to Healdsburg in "me sister's carriage," with suggestions of footmen and postilions and outriders. Mrs. Botkin's "a's" are broad enough for footbridges, but she shows a certain amount of superficial education in her correct pronunciation of French words, of which she is rather fond and which she does not English, for a wonder.

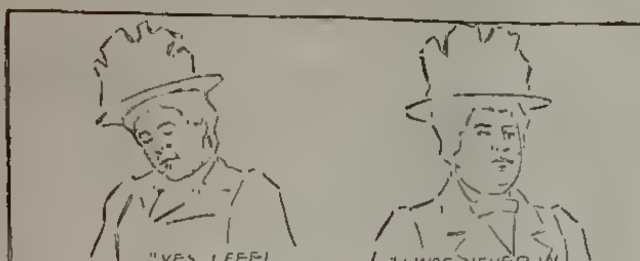
There was an utter lack of frankness about Mrs. Botkin's story and an apparent lack of ingenuousness. She recited so monotonously that many persons thought she was reading, and her performance bore all the earmarks of careful study. When she came to the place where she was obliged to speak of the time when she was first accused of the Delaware tragedy she made a full stop. After a melodramatic pause she caught her breath and went on.

"The next day," said Mrs. Botkin, with an indescribable drawl, "Miss Livernash came and told me that I was under strong suspicion" (full stop and a gulp) "of having caused the deaths of these unfortunate women. I was awfully shocked. I was insensible for several hours, and the shock was so great that Miss Livernash went away."

"How does it affect you now?" prompted Knight.

"I feel most sadly; yes," said the defendant.

history or antecedents, beginning the narration with her meeting with Dunning. Knight started the story with a few trivial questions, to which Mrs. Botkin replied with her name, with the statement that she had lived for ten or a dozen years in this city and was married, her husband residing in Stockton, Cal. She had known John P. Dunning, she said, since 1895. She was in Golden Gate Park with a woman friend when



"YES, I FEEL DEADLY."

"I WAS NEVER IN THE SHOP IN ME LIFE."

"HE 'AD A BIT OF SOCIAL LIFE AT 927 GEARY STREET."

"MY SISTER LEADS A QUIET, CHRISTIAN LIFE."

Dunning came along with a disabled bicycle. He made some remark about the wheel and followed it up with "making himself known to us," as Mrs. Botkin put it. From the dignity with which she made the statement, it might have been supposed that chance acquaintances were the most ordinary things in the world with respectable middle-aged married ladies, dwelling apart from their husbands. Mrs. Botkin next met her Nemesis on Grant avenue, on which occasion he raised his hat and walked a short distance with her.

"At this time," said Mrs. Botkin, "I was living at 2217 Bush street, where I stayed quite two years and where I was very, very ill. I was taken in a cab across the bay to my sister's house, where I was attended by Dr. Luke Robinson, now deceased. Mr. Dunning visited me twice at Mrs. McClure's, being admitted by my nurse, Mrs. Ruoff."

Mrs. Botkin told how she returned to San Francisco, taking up her residence at 1001 Bush street. Here she was joined by her son, and they moved to a small apartment at 717 Bush street, the mother desiring to make it more homelike for her boy and the income of the husband and father being somewhat diminished at that time. When the financial sky of the Botkins brightened mother and son removed to 927 Geary street.

"We remained there one year," said Mrs. Botkin. "Mr. Dunning visited us a great deal. He was at that time in sore financial straits and he asked financial assistance, which I was not then in a position to give him. He said he was in great fear of the strong hand of the law. He had a bit of social life with us there. My son was constantly with me, and I extended my hospitality willingly and kindly to Mr. Dunning. After leaving 927 Geary street I went to Humboldt county. I sailed on the Pomona on June 1st and returned to San Francisco on July 3d."

Mrs. Botkin described a few more of her wanderings from a boarding-house at 1222 Pine street to one at 1224, from which she went to the Victoria on the last of March.

"I lived there until Chief Lees arrested me," said Mrs. Botkin, with indescribable ardness. "On July 27th I left here to pay my periodical visit to my husband. On the Stockton boat I contracted a decided cold. As I had not been feeling very well before I left San Francisco I feared that I was threatened with pneumonia. I did not stop with my husband, but stayed at the hotel with Mrs. Ruoff. She was very unwilling that I should be ill there, and I, too, was very uncomfortable, as she had but ... having let all the which we had planned while I was in Europe, and she was then attending an Adventist camp meeting. I expected to be gone about two months. I hired a room and packed my things. I stayed at the sanitarium at St. Helena, where my sister was for a couple of days, and then drove to Healdsburg in my sister's carriage, arriving there on August 6th. It was there I read an account of the tragedy in Dover, Del., and I called my sister's attention to it. It was a great shock to me. I told my sister that I was well acquainted with the husband, and it would be a great shock to him, as he was far away at the war.

"On the following Monday morning Miss Livernash came to the house, saying that she had been detailed to see me. I was doing the upstairs work at the time, and my sister said that a woman wished to see me. I told her that I knew nothing of the tragedy, but that I knew the husband. She asked how well I knew the husband, and I told her of the friendship. I got the letters, withholding none of them, and gave them to her. I said that I wished to tell her all, and mentioned that Mr. Dunning had been under a cloud financially, having taken his employer's money, but that I believed his repentance was sincere. Miss Livernash represented that she wished to help another woman in trouble, and I told her I merely wanted to tell the truth. The next day she told me that I was under strong suspicion of having caused the deaths of those unfortunate women."

Here Mrs. Botkin backed and filled, and when she had recovered went on to say that when Miss Livernash returned the witness was in Mrs. McClure's bed, but she saw Miss Livernash and told her she felt that she must go to her husband in Stockton the next day. Miss Livernash wanted to know why Mrs. Botkin wished to go to her husband, and Mrs. Botkin told her that she felt that she needed a man's advice, as Mr. McClure was not at home and Mrs. McClure lived a religious, unworldly life and was even more inexperienced than Mrs. Botkin herself. Mrs. Botkin related that Miss Livernash made some confidences regarding her own life which Mrs. Botkin told her she did not care to hear. Mr. Botkin met the two at the train and was not pleasantly impressed with Miss Livernash. He declined to talk with his wife until Miss Livernash had gone, but Mrs. Botkin persuaded him that Miss Livernash was her friend. Mrs. Botkin said that she told her husband that he must say why it was that he lived in Stockton while she lived in San Francisco.

Then Knight began to put questions. Replying Mrs. Botkin said that the postal orders in evidence came to her ... she was a purchasing agent for to prove that the letter might have been mailed in an open bag, but Knight declares that he has testimony as to the arrival of mail steamers from Eureka which destroys that theory.

The defense began the presentation of its case with the testimony of Dr. George M. Terrill. This witness told of being telephoned for on July 31st by Mrs. Botkin. He went to her room in the Victoria Hotel, and treated her for headache and nervousness. He did not know the exact hour of his visit, but was sure that it was between the hours of 3 and 5 P. M. The witness said that Mrs. Botkin made no effort to arise and go down town while he was there, a period of a half or three-quarters of an hour. In response to a question the witness said that an autopsy was the only absolute test in cases of arsenical poisoning.

Terrill was given a rigid cross-examination, his testimony being considered important, for the reason that he fixed the date of his visit as being about the time, even to the hour, of the purchase of the candy at Haas' store. The witness said he was sure of the date, as he had an operation at a hospital on that day. He made no entry of his visit to Mrs. Botkin, and although he had intended to make a charge he had forgotten to make an entry. The witness was asked if he had not said in an interview in Seattle that he had attended Mrs. Botkin the day before she left San Francisco to visit her husband in Stockton. The witness answered that he had not. Nor had he told a reporter that Mrs. Botkin was well enough at that time to do anything that any other person could do. "What I did say," the witness stated, "was that I did not think Mrs. Botkin was too ill to go out."

Assistant District Attorney Hosmer then made inquiry as to the witness' knowledge of arsenical poisoning, and forced him to admit ignorance as far as practical knowledge was concerned. The witness had never had a case of that kind, and he was under the impression that amorphous and crystalline arsenic were the same.

Thomas J. Ford, superintendent of mails, was the next witness. While he was on the stand the jurors received an other course of instruction as to the workings of the Postoffice Department. The witness examined the postmark on the wrapper and said it looked like the San Francisco mark, though he would not swear positively and considered the postmark illegible. There was no way of telling the date and hour when the package was mailed. Knight then had the witness tell of the experiences of a package on a journey eastward. Ford went into details, telling how a package went from hand to hand and was thrown about in mail sacks ... sixty to seventy points.

pearance, remaining on the stand just long enough to testify that he had told Mrs. Botkin that his wife and child were living in Dover, Del.

Mrs. Grace Harris, who testified as to the purchase of the handkerchief by Mrs. Botkin, was then recalled for further cross-examination. Knight first asked the witness why she had left the employ of Will & Finck. Hosmer objected and the question was ruled out. Knight asked several questions reflecting on the character of the witness, and said he wanted to show that she was a frequenter of saloons. The Court blocked the inquiry, and Knight said he would call other witnesses later for purposes of identification.

William H. Roberts, brother-in-law of Mrs. Botkin, then sprang the promised sensation of the defense. He testified that during the month of June, 1897, Mrs. Botkin was visiting relatives in Humboldt county. As one of the anonymous letters was postmarked San Francisco, June 18, 1897, the defense expected by this to knock out the testimony of the handwriting experts, who were positive that Mrs. Botkin wrote both anonymous letters.

While the lawyers for the defense were still chuckling over Roberts' testimony Hosmer gave them a surprise by admitting that the defendant was in Humboldt county during the time mentioned, from June 1st to July 3d.

On cross-examination Hosmer asked as to the trips of steamers and as to their facilities for carrying mail. When an objection was made to a question he stated that he wanted to show that a letter could be put into a steamer mail bag and would be brought to San Francisco before it was mailed. The Court ruled that such testimony would have to be reserved for rebuttal.

Dr. W. F. McNutt was the next witness. In his opinion a post-mortem examination was the only conclusive test in cases of arsenical poisoning.

Mrs. Grace Harris was recalled, and Hosmer withdrew his objection to the question as to why she had left the employ of Will & Finck. The witness said there was a general investigation, accusations of theft having been made, and she and several others were let out. "There was nothing proven," added the witness. Mrs. Harris said her testimony before the Grand Jury was confined to the handkerchief, no questions being asked as to the identity of the customer.

John H. Watkington, floor manager in the City of Paris, then told of the system under which clerks work in the place where he is employed. When a person makes several purchases to be delivered, he said, they get transfers from one department to another, and the address is taken only by the clerk who last waits on the customer.

On cross-examination he said there was nothing to prevent the first or any of the clerks from taking the address, but in a case like that related by Mrs. Harris the saleswoman would have no occasion to take the address.

On redirect examination the witness said that if the Victoria Hotel had been given as an address there would be a duplicate of that address on record.

James W. Mullen, employed by Redington & Co., wholesale druggists, was put on the stand for the purpose of introducing samples of powdered and lump arsenic. They were not admitted, as Knight had previously objected to the presentation of samples by Hosmer.

State Chemist Wolf of Delaware refused to identify the arsenic produced by the defense until he had made an examination. He agreed to examine the samples offered.

William Lee, who supervises the delivery of packages for the City of Paris, testified that he kept a record of every package sent out. At the suggestion of Chief of Police Lees he had made a search for a record of a delivery to the Victoria Hotel, and had failed to find it.

On cross-examination he admitted the possibility of one of the delivery tags being lost, but did not think it likely.

Dr. Terrill, at the request of the prosecution, then brought in his book of professional visits. It contained no entry of a visit to Mrs. Botkin. The witness said that in his Seattle interview he had stated that he attended the patient the day after her return from Stockton, ...

M[illegible] having a chance to learn something of Mrs. Botkin's character from personal observation [illegible] yesterday afternoon. The lady of the [illegible] lifted her black veil [illegible] that [illegible] need she had [illegible] her words and the sleepy [illegible] with a start when [illegible] superintendent Knight [illegible] "Mrs. Botkin."

She [illegible] and plump, this leading woman of the case, and she tripped up to the witness chair, pausing midway to take the oath impassively and to give her name which everybody knew—the name of the youngest and mildest of Lear's daughters.

But Mrs. Botkin is neither young nor [illegible] and she might have been christened Regan or Goneril more appropriately. She shows temper in every [illegible] of a hand, in every flashing glance, in every glistening tooth, when she raises her lip in a snarl that is not [illegible] and even in the perky, bird-like [illegible] of her head. No man can tell exactly what impression Mrs. Botkin [illegible] upon her judges. She was a woman talking for her life and telling a story that might save or damn her. Naturally, she was flustered and nervous. Mrs. Botkin is a bit of an actress, but it would take a greater mistress of stage craft than she to preserve entire calmness in such an ordeal. Her bosom heaved and now and then she caught her breath. She played nervously with her fingers and at times her voice was monotonous and the downward droop of her eyes so persistent that she seemed to be reading. Whether the eyes were [illegible] in an assumption of coyness or modesty no one knows. At any rate, the [illegible] role scarcely fits the experienced Mrs. Botkin.

The defendant sat with her back half turned on the teeming courtroom and her face turned full to the jury. Evidently it was to be allowed to watch the play of her countenance. Besides, Mrs. Botkin is accredited with powers of [illegible]. But Mrs. Botkin's countenance long since ceased to play. Only [illegible] a genuine expression breaks through the habitual mask of reserve and illumines the face. Then it was that Mrs. Botkin flashed her eyes, which are handsome, into Lawyer Knight's face, or showed her teeth in a baleful way, like some animal brought to bay. But except for these transient gleams, Mrs. Botkin was an ordinary, everyday woman of the middle class, conceited, affected and desperately intent on putting the best foot forward.

The most striking thing about the prisoner is her affectation. It is probably a lifelong habit, so long worn that it has become second nature, and that she could not drop it if she would. The English accent is part of this, for Mrs. Botkin is an English woman from Missouri and her English is the English of the paper-covered novel. Mrs. Botkin makes a specialty of such words as "luggage," and calls her Tony Lumpkin of a son "the lad," though it is said that he is built like a barrel and weighs an incredible amount. Mrs. Botkin also says "me room" and "me apparel" and occasionally she drops the "h" from hotel without stopping to look for it. With her every room is an apartment and every buggy a carriage. She told how she drove from St. Helena to Healdsburg in "me sister's carriage," with suggestions of footmen and postilions and outriders. Mrs. Botkin's "a's" are broad enough for footbridges, but she shows a certain amount of superficial education in her correct pronunciation of French words, of which she is rather fond and which she does not English, for a wonder.

There was an utter lack of frankness about Mrs. Botkin's story and an apparent lack of ingenuousness. She recited so monotonously that many persons thought she was reading, and her performance bore all the earmarks of careful study. When she came to the place where she was obliged to speak of the time when she was first accused of the Delaware tragedy she made a full stop. After a melodramatic pause she caught her breath and went on.

"The next day," said Mrs. Botkin, with an indescribable drawl, "Miss Livernash came and told me that I was under strong suspicion" (full stop and gulp) "of having caused the deaths of these unfortunate women. I was awfully shocked. I was insensible for several hours, and the shock was so great that Miss Livernash went away."

"How does it affect you now?" [illegible] Knight.

"I feel most sadly; yes," said the defendant.

The story of Mrs. Botkin, carefully [illegible], flowed on almost without interruption, the words tumbling on each other's heels. There was little prompting from Knight. Once in a while Mrs. Botkin rounded herself up with a sharp turn and said to Knight, "Is this stupid? Shall I go on?"

The Judge threw down his pencil in [illegible] and the shorthand reporter put [illegible] steam.

According to the lady, she had always [illegible] with her son, and Dunning had [illegible] an incident—a penniless young man under a cloud of financial suspicion, who sought to borrow money from [illegible] and had been invited to partake of [illegible] hospitality. According to Mrs. Botkin's own story, Dunning was a [illegible] person whose chaperonage counted for much, and it was noticed that Dunning smiled broadly when Mrs. Botkin referred to Dunning as "entering into [illegible] of social pleasure" with them at [illegible] street. Throughout Mrs. Botkin's recital the Delaware witnesses sat with incredulous smiles upon their faces. They do not give Mrs. Botkin the benefit of the doubt.

The faces of the jurors were as impassive as those of sphinxes while Mrs. Botkin spun her web of denials. There [illegible] no [illegible] of enthusiasm on her [illegible]. Everything was carefully studied, [illegible] Mrs. Botkin's art is not that which [illegible] nature. She was most natural [illegible] she was most feminine. Once or [illegible] showed the claws in her velvet [illegible]. In speaking of Mrs. Seeley she [illegible] "I thought it was well to let the [illegible] her at home. It kept him from [illegible] dissipations and so for a time I [illegible] the intimacy between [illegible] and Mrs. Seeley, even if she [illegible] fourteen years [illegible] than he."

[illegible] that instant when the sly rapier [illegible] was put between the ribs, Mrs. [illegible] was the [illegible] natural. This [illegible] the real [illegible] understood [illegible] Botkin did not go into her family [illegible]

[illegible] with her meeting with Dunning. Knight started the story with a few trivial questions to which Mrs. Botkin replied with her name, with the statement that she had lived for ten or a dozen years in this city, and was married, her husband residing in Stockton, Cal. She had known John P. Dunning, she said, [illegible] Golden Gate Park with a woman friend when

"MY SISTER LEADS A QUIET, CHRISTIAN LIFE."

"HE HAD A BIT OF SOCIAL LIFE AT 927 GEARY STREET."

Dunning came along with a disabled bicycle. He made some remark about the wheel and followed it up with "making himself known to us," as Mrs. Botkin put it. From the dignity with which she made the statement, it might have been supposed that chance acquaintances were the most ordinary things in the world with respectable middle-aged married ladies, dwelling apart from their husbands. Mrs. Botkin next met her Nemesis on Grant avenue, on which occasion he raised his hat and walked a short distance with her.

"At this time," said Mrs. Botkin, "I was living at 2217 Bush street, where I stayed quite two years and where I was very, very ill. I was taken in a cab across the bay to my sister's house, where I was attended by Dr. Luke Robinson, now deceased. Mr. Dunning visited me twice at Mrs. McClure's, being admitted by my nurse, Mrs. Ruoff."

Mrs. Botkin told how she returned to San Francisco, taking up her residence at 1001 Bush street. Here she was joined by her son, and they moved to a small apartment at 717 Bush street, the mother desiring to make it more homelike for her boy and the income of the husband and father being somewhat diminished at that time. When the financial sky of the Botkins brightened mother and son removed to 927 Geary street.

"We remained there one year," said Mrs. Botkin. "Mr. Dunning visited us a great deal. He was at that time in sore financial straits and he asked financial assistance, which I was not then in a position to give him. He said he was in great fear of the strong hand of the law. He had a bit of social life with us there. My son was constantly with me, and I extended my hospitality willingly and kindly to Mr. Dunning. After leaving 927 Geary street I went to Humboldt county. I sailed on the Pomona on June 1st and returned to San Francisco on July 3d."

Mrs. Botkin described a few more of her wanderings from a boarding-house at 1222 Pine street to one at 1224, from which she went to the Victoria on the last of March.

"I lived there until Chief Lees arrested me," said Mrs. Botkin, with indescribable sadness. "On July 27th I left here to pay my periodical visit to my husband. On the Stockton boat I contracted a decided cold. As I had not been feeling very well before I left San Francisco I feared that I was threatened with pneumonia. I did not stop at the hotel with my husband, but stayed with Mrs. Ruoff. She was very unwilling that I should be ill there, and I, too, was very uncomfortable, as she had but small apartments, having let all the rest of her rooms. After dining with my husband I told him I must return to Mrs. Ruoff, as I feared I was going to be ill. I insisted upon a doctor being called, as I had severe pains. I told Dr. Stone that I was afraid of pneumonia, but he said there was no danger of that. He prescribed for me calomel and heavy doses of valerian and morphine—heavy medicines to which I was not accustomed."

Then came the most artfully constructed part of Mrs. Botkin's story. She told how the conversation with the doctor about poisons came to occur.

"Morphine was a poison," she said, "and I had never taken it before. I asked Dr. Stone what would happen if I took an overdose, and from talking of morphine poisoning we drifted to other things of that kind."

Mrs. Botkin related how, not liking to be ill away from home, she returned to San Francisco on July 30th. She was feeling a little better, and the next day had a light breakfast sent to her room. About 1:30 or 2 o'clock she thought she had better see a doctor, so she called up Dr. Terrill by telephone and asked him to visit her. He was the physician of a friend of hers, and she had never had a physician since the death of Dr. Robinson, and so she thought she would call him. He came between 3 and 4 o'clock.

"Were you out of your room besides going to the telephone on Sunday, July 31st?" asked Knight.

"I was not," replied Mrs. Botkin. "I was physically unfit."

"Did you go down to Haas' and purchase a box of chocolate creams?"

"I was never in the shop in my life," responded Mrs. Botkin, with dignity and an air of injured innocence.

"I gave up my apartment on August 6th," continued the prisoner, "and took the train for St. Helena. It was my regular midsummer visit to my sister, which we had planned while I was in Europe, and she was then attending an Adventist camp meeting. I expected to be gone about two months. I hired a room and packed my things. I stayed at the sanitarium at St. Helena, where my sister was for a couple of days, and then drove to Healdsburg in my sister's carriage, arriving there on August 6th. It was there I read an account of the tragedy in Dover, Del., and I called my sister's attention to it. It was a great shock to me. I told my sister that I was well acquainted with the husband, and it would be a great shock to him, as he was far away at the war.

"On the following Monday morning Miss Livernash came to the house, saying that she had been detailed to see me. I was doing the upstairs work at the time, and my sister said that a woman wished to see me. I told her that I knew nothing of the tragedy, but that I knew the husband. She asked how well I knew the husband, and I told her of the friendship. I got the letters, withholding none of them, and gave them to her. I said that I wished to tell her all, and mentioned that Mr. Dunning had been under a cloud financially, having taken his employer's money, but that I believed his repentance was sincere. Miss Livernash represented that she wished to help another woman in trouble, and I told her I merely wanted to tell the truth. The next day she told me that I was under strong suspicion of having caused the deaths of these unfortunate women."

Here Mrs. Botkin hacked and filled and when she had recovered went on to say that when Miss Livernash returned the witness was in Mrs. McClure's bed, but she saw Miss Livernash and told her she felt that she must go to her husband in Stockton the next day. Miss Livernash wanted to know why Mrs. Botkin wished to go to her husband, and Mrs. Botkin told her that she felt that she needed a man's advice, as Mr. McClure was not at home and Mrs. McClure lived a religious, unworldly life and was even more inexperienced than Mrs. Botkin herself. Mrs. Botkin related that Miss Livernash made some confidences regarding her own life which Mrs. Botkin told her she did not care to hear. Mr. Botkin met the two at the train and was not pleasantly impressed with Miss Livernash. He declined to talk with his wife until Miss Livernash had gone, but Mrs. Botkin persuaded him that Miss Livernash was her friend. Mrs. Botkin said that she told her husband that he must say why it was that he lived in Stockton while she lived in San Francisco.

Then Knight began to put questions. Replying Mrs. Botkin said that the postal orders in evidence came to her while she was a purchasing agent for people up north. She swore that she had never bought a handkerchief of [illegible] Mrs. Harris and that she had [illegible] her memory, but could not [illegible] age ever sent to her at the Victoria.

Mrs. Botkin then went into the Seeley affair, telling how the woman went to Stockton, sometimes ten along [illegible] weeks at a time with Beverly [illegible] the witness feared that Beverly would make a mistake and be entrapped into an early marriage. When Mrs. Seeley returned from one of these Stockton visits she took Dunning into her confidence and told him that Mrs. Botkin wished to get a divorce so that he could marry Mrs. Aftergast.

"Later Mr. Botkin asked me for a divorce," said Mrs. Botkin, "but I told him I had been a dutiful wife to him and that now, with my youth gone, I would not consent to a divorce. I said I would not interfere with his pleasures, but that he should never be legally divorced."

With this Mrs. Botkin assumed the expression of a martyr. She told she had trunks full of letters from Botkin beseeching her for a divorce, but that Chief Lees had confiscated them.

Other testimony, much more important for the defense than anything Mrs. Botkin could say, had been introduced before she was put on the stand. The "lead-pipe cinch" which Knight has been snuggling in his sleeve proves to be an alibi for Mrs. Botkin at the time of the mailing in San Francisco of the first anonymous letter in June. [illegible] Knight caused every witness for the prosecution to swear most positively that the same person wrote the anonymous letters and addressed the package and wrote the decoy [illegible]. Yesterday [illegible] proved—and the [illegible] admitted it—that Mrs. Botkin was in Humboldt county at the time when the letter was mailed. The prosecution hopes to prove that the letter might have been mailed in an open bag, but Knight declares that he has testimony as to the arrival of mail steamers from Eureka which destroys that theory.

The defense began the presentation of its case with the testimony of Dr. George M. Terrill. This witness testified to being telephoned for on July 31st by Mrs. Botkin. He went to her room at the Victoria Hotel, and treated her for headache and nervousness. He did not know the exact hour of his visit, but was sure that it was between the hours of 3 and 5 P. M. The witness told that Mrs. Botkin made no effort to raise and go down town while he was there, a period of a half or three-quarters of an hour. In response to a question the witness said that an autopsy was the only absolute test in cases of arsenical poisoning.

Terrill was given a rigid cross-examination, his testimony being considered important, for the reason that he fixed the date of his visit as being about the time, even to the hour, of the purchase of the candy at Haas' store. The witness said he was sure of the date, as he had an operation at a hospital on that day. He made no entry of his visit to Mrs. Botkin, and although he had intended to make a charge he had forgotten to make an entry. The witness was asked if he had not said in an interview in Seattle that he had attended Mrs. Botkin the day before she left San Francisco to visit her husband in Stockton. The witness answered that he had not. Nor had he told a reporter that Mrs. Botkin was well enough at that time to do anything that any other person could do. "What I did say," the witness stated, "was that I did not think Mrs. Botkin was too ill to go out."

Assistant District Attorney Hosmer then made inquiry as to the witness' knowledge of arsenical poisoning, and forced him to admit ignorance as far as practical knowledge was concerned. The witness had never had a case of that kind, and he was under the impression that amorphous and crystalline arsenic were the same.

Thomas J. Ford, superintendent of mails, was the next witness. While he was on the stand the jurors received another course of instruction as to the workings of the Postoffice Department. The witness examined the postmark on the wrapper and said it looked like the San Francisco mark, though he would not swear positively and considered the postmark illegible. There was no way of telling the date and hour when the package was mailed. Knight then had the witness tell of the experiences of a package on a journey east-ward. Ford went into details, telling how a package went from hand to hand and was thrown about in mail sacks weighing from sixty to seventy pounds. The sacks [illegible] the packages [illegible] be piled with other sacks [illegible] weighing [illegible] and [illegible] Knight wanted [illegible] make a [illegible] and still be [illegible] [illegible] Dunning [illegible] the jury [illegible] and made out the [illegible] San Francisco, June [illegible], 189[illegible] [illegible] Superintendent Ford was [illegible] letter [illegible] remain in a San Francisco [illegible] twenty-four or thirty [illegible] saying it would be taken up within a [illegible] after it was deposited.

On cross-examination the witness said that all packages [illegible] by rough [illegible]. He thought such a [illegible] show evidences of wear and tear. In speaking of the postmark he said he would not swear that it was San Francisco. He called attention [illegible] supposed to read "Cal." [illegible] that after the "C" a [illegible] missing and [illegible] [illegible] a mark [illegible] or something attached to the stamp [illegible] in making the [illegible]

Ford said a package like the one in evidence [illegible] chocolate creams [illegible] [illegible] that such a package [illegible] at the [illegible] the fact that a package [illegible] dynamite secretly passed through the mails. With that Ford was excused.

John P. Dunning made a [illegible]

[illegible] on the stand [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible]

Mrs. Grace Harris [illegible] [illegible] Knight asked several questions [illegible] said he wanted [illegible] that she [illegible] [illegible] and Knight said he would call other [illegible] purpose of identification.

William H. Rotaille [illegible] Mrs. Botkin [illegible] [illegible] that [illegible] Mrs. Botkin was [illegible] Humboldt county [illegible] San Francisco [illegible] [illegible] willing [illegible] that Mrs. Botkin [illegible]

While the [illegible] the defense [illegible] calling the [illegible] Humboldt county during the time [illegible] from June 1st to July 3d.

On cross-examination [illegible] asked as to the [illegible] of steamers [illegible] their facilities for carrying mail. When an objection was made to a question [illegible] stated that he wanted to show that a letter could be put into a steamer mail bag and would be brought to San Francisco before it was mailed. The court ruled that such testimony would have to be reserved for rebuttal.

Dr. W. P. McNutt was the next witness. In his opinion a post mortem examination was the only certain test in cases of arsenical poisoning.

Mrs. Grace Harris was recalled, and [illegible] withdrew his objection to the question as to why she had left the employ of Will & Finck. The witness said there was a general investigation [illegible] of theft having been made [illegible] she and several others were let out. "There was nothing proven," said the witness. Mrs. Harris said her testimony before the Grand Jury was confined to the handkerchief, no questions being asked as to the identity of the [illegible].

John H. Walkington, floor manager in the City of Paris, then told of the system under which clerks work in the place where he is employed. When a person makes several purchases to be delivered, he said, they get transfers from one department to another, and the address is taken only by the clerk who last waits on the customer.

On cross-examination he said there was nothing to prevent the first or any of the clerks from taking the address, but in a case like that related by Mrs. Harris the saleswoman would have to write on to take the address.

On redirect examination the witness said that if the Victoria Hotel had been given as an address there would be a duplicate of that address on record.

James W. Mullen, employed by Redington & Co., wholesale druggists, was put on the stand for the purpose of producing samples of powdered and lump arsenic. They were not admitted, as Knight had previously objected to the presentation of samples by Hosmer.

State Chemist Wolf of Delaware refused to identify the arsenic produced by the defense until he had made an examination. He again examined the samples offered.

William Lee, who supervises the delivery of packages for the City of Paris, testified that he kept a record of every package sent out. At the suggestion of Chief of Police Lees he had made a search for a record of a delivery to the Victoria Hotel, and had failed to find it.

On cross-examination he admitted the possibility of one of the delivery [illegible] being lost, but did not think it likely.

Dr. Terrill at the request of the prosecution then brought in his book of [illegible] and visits. It contained [illegible] of a visit to Mrs. Botkin. The witness said that in his Seattle interview he had stated that he attended the patient the day after her return from Stockton [illegible] instead of the day before [illegible]

Dr. William [illegible] [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] death from arsenical poisoning [illegible]

[illegible] of Mrs. Botkin [illegible]

[illegible]

All [illegible] will be [illegible] [illegible] examination which will [illegible]

MRS. BOTKIN'S DEFENSE IS FINISHED.

PRISONER ENDS HER NARRATIVE.

MERCY OF THE PROSECUTOR.

The Cross-Examination Is Not Long Nor Severe.

WITNESS MAKES A CHANGE OF TACTICS.

HER ATTORNEYS BANKING ON THE ALIBI AS TO UNSIGNED LETTERS.

A Queer Story About the Life of Dunning and the Women—Husband Approved of the Acquaintance.

IN SPITE of all the predictions, Mrs. Cordelia Botkin fared well on cross-examination. Like Mrs. Knoff, she had been warned to change her manner and she was much less affected, much less grotesque, much more womanly. She seemed to have read the newspaper criticisms of her manner and digested them, heartily as she must have disapproved of them. She made a much better impression on her second appearance than upon her debut, being gentler, more unassuming and not so positive. It was a noticeable fact that Knight did not hand any of the tangible evidence of the case to Mrs. Botkin. She was not required to handle the candy box, which she has never touched during the trial, nor the handkerchief nor the confections. Once or twice Mrs. Botkin wept a little, at which the jury seemed relieved, tears being the proper thing for a woman under these conditions. She wiped her eyes and her voice broke a little when she spoke of Dunning's ingratitude, and once she smiled glitteringly upon Hosmer.

"Really, I can't tell," she said, with a bashful smile, when pressed for a date upon cross-examination.

At another time she said she could not be sure about dates, as she was really incapable of giving them. Except for these frailties of memory, Mrs. Botkin's story went smoothly enough. Hosmer, who is a gentle-hearted man, did not try her with any of the exhibits of the case; nor did he try to see if her nerves would snap under the tension of angry questioning. He was even merciful in his inquiries about the relations of the prisoner and Dunning.

It was noticeable in the testimony that the place which belonged to Dunning was always his "room," while the prisoner's abode, whether one room or two, was always an "apartment." That is Mrs. Botkin's way of keeping up appearances. It reminded her hearers powerfully of the sentence passed upon her by the chambermaid of the Stockton hotel where she was arrested. The girl, a reader of "Lady Letitia's Love Letters" and literature of like class, remarked with round mouth and wide eyes: "Oh, she couldn't be guilty. Why, she is just like one of the fine ladies you read about in the story books."

And she is. In jail or anywhere else Mrs. Botkin will always have the airs of the fine lady. To her all pumpkins are coaches.

When Hosmer asked embarrassing questions Mrs. Botkin turned her round, full face away from the courtroom and squeezed a tear into her kerchief, which is always new and stiff. Her stout, black back was all that remained visible. Perhaps the fact that her profile is prettier than her full face had something to do with it.

The witness tried to explain her relations with Dunning, in whom her interest was purely motherly. According to her story, there was no impropriety, yet she admitted that she, a married woman living apart from her husband, and therefore doubly open to suspicion, allowed this unknown to scrape an acquaintance with her in the Park, to walk with her on the [illegible] afterward, and to talk to her at the [illegible]. Dunning asked permission to call, after these insufficient preliminaries, and came to see her in the afternoon. Almost immediately there was an invitation to dine, and [illegible] to a private room in a French restaurant. All this while Mrs. Dunning was still in the city. In extenuation Mrs. Botkin said that she went out with Dunning with her husband's [illegible] paid Mrs. Price 25 cents, it being the only dinner she ever ate in her house. Mrs. Botkin stated that it was her custom to get her own breakfast on a gas contrivance that she had and to dine wherever she happened to be down town. That Sunday dinner, she stated, was served early, before the regular dinner for the house was prepared. On Monday Mrs. Botkin still felt far from well. About 4 o'clock she made herself partially presentable, to use her own words, and went down stairs to "a shop under the Victoria" in order to purchase some buns and some fruit. The grocer had no "buns," so Mrs. Botkin was obliged to put up with plain American bread. She crossed the street to get some fruit, bought a few toilet articles from the "chemist's shop" and returned to the Victoria. She almost fainted getting up the stairs, and Mrs. Price, who was in the hall, called to her reproachfully, and asked her why she had not sent the Japanese or Mrs. Price's little boy.

The prisoner told of Dunning's pitiable condition, of how he wrote her that he had drunk up all his salary in Salt Lake and should never be able to do anything there, and of how he asked her for funds so that he might return. These funds she sent, not desiring especially to have him here, but wishing to make it so that he could obtain employment.

One important statement made by Mrs. Botkin was that the anonymous letter sent to her by Dunning from Salt Lake was written in ink, was not in Mrs. Dunning's writing, with which she was familiar, and was the same as those admitted in evidence. This will probably be used in argument by the defense to account for the missing anonymous letter, to prove that Mrs. Dunning did not copy the letter before sending it to her husband, so that he might be able to detect the sender through the handwriting, and also to show that Dunning did not think the handwriting was Mrs. Botkin's at that time, though he now swears that he thinks it is.

Mrs. Botkin swore that she never addressed Mr. Dunning as "John P. Dunning," but always as "J. P. Dunning, Esq." She denied flatly that she ever sent Mrs. Dunning a box of candy, and denied that she had ever purchased arsenic in her life or that she knew Druggist Grey. She testified also that she consulted W. H. L. Barnes with the view of getting a divorce and that she never thought of marrying Dunning.

On cross-examination Mrs. Botkin told of a number of French restaurants where she and Dunning had dined, but she said that she more frequently paid for the meals than he did. She told how she would serve refreshments in her room after they had a game of whist or euchre. Asked of what these refreshments would consist, she said that she would "brew a pot of tea" or make a salad, that sometimes Mr. Dunning and Beverly would have beer together or an occasional "toaster" of whisky. In time Mrs. Botkin herself came to like the [illegible] arrived from Eureka on the 17th or 18th was the Farallon, which does not carry mail and which left Eureka at 2:30 in the morning of June 11th and arrived here at 4 on the morning of the 18th.

Before Mrs. Botkin there were a couple of witnesses for the defense. One of them was Captain Callundan, called to tell that he knew Mrs. Grace Harris under another name at the time Will & Finck had trouble with thieving employes. The other witness was J. W. Bird, a brother-in-law of Kitty Deitner, who was called to testify as to her general reputation for honesty and veracity in the neighborhood in which she lives. Bird testified that the girl's reputation was exceedingly bad. He said that after her statement came out in the papers people around that neighborhood said: "How can you believe anything such a liar as Kitty Deitner says?" On cross-examination Hosmer asked Bird if it was true that he had made advances to Kitty which she rejected. Bird said that it was not he who made the advances, but Kitty. Bird became much excited and incoherent. He related how he went to Chief Lees and told him that Kitty Deitner would ruin his case, but the Chief said that she would make a good appearance before the jury. Bird said that all Kitty wanted was a trip East. Asked if he had said uncomplimentary things to Chief Lees about Kitty Deitner's mother and grandmother, he said that he did not recollect, but thought he might have said something about her mother, as she was his mother-in-law.

Bird testified that he was happily married—the first happily married person who has been on the stand in all this long and dreary case of jealousies, heart-burnings, infidelities and domestic infelicities.

THE TESTIMONY.

The taking of testimony in behalf of Mrs. Botkin was resumed yesterday morning with a slight variation from the expected programme. While the crowd impatiently waited for the defendant to take the stand and complete her story three minor witnesses were put on in an attempt to discredit important witnesses for the prosecution.

Captain J. J. Callundan, superintendent of Morse's patrol system, was called first. When asked if he was acquainted with Mrs. Grace Harris he replied, "I knew her under another name." He got no further, as the prosecution entered a vigorous and successful objection. Knight explained that his purpose was to impeach the testimony of Mrs. Harris by proving that she had confessed to theft committed while in the employ of Will & Finck. The explanation was of no avail, the Court ruling that the attempt to impeach testimony was not being made in the proper manner.

J. W. Bird then came on and testified as to the reputation of his sister-in-law, Kittie Deitner, for truth, honesty and integrity. He deemed it bad [illegible] severed. If there was any understanding it was that they were always to be friends. Neither was there any understanding that they were ever to marry. The witness said she was bound by marriage ties of many years' standing, and so was he. She thought it better that such ties should not be broken. They had never discussed the matter and had not talked of Dunning abandoning his wife.

"I went out repeatedly with Mr. Dunning," said the witness. "My husband knew about it and permitted it. There was no secrecy in deceiving him, and our friendship was open."

Soon Mrs. Botkin drifted back in her story and told of Dunning's days of poverty. Before he left here to become a war correspondent, she said, his condition was pitiable and would have aroused the sympathy of any woman. He was in want and she did what she could for him. At this point the witness stopped and said she did not care to talk further of what she had done out of a feeling of sympathy.

Resuming her story, the witness said that Dunning was in Salt Lake five months. There his salary went for drink. He wrote to her telling her he thought that he could get a position in San Francisco. He wanted to reform and live down the past. She sent him funds to return. When he went to Salt Lake both thought they were parting for good.

Knight then made inquiries about the anonymous letter which Dunning had testified was copied and the copy sent to him by his wife. Mrs. Botkin said she had not kept Dunning's letter to her at the time he sent her what he called a copy of the anonymous letter. In her answer she had said that she also suspected Mrs. Seeley.

"Have you ever seen Mrs. Dunning's handwriting?" asked Knight.

"I have," answered the witness. "Mr. Dunning used to read portions of his wife's letters to the gatherings at 927 Geary street."

"Does her handwriting resemble that of the letter sent to you?"

"It does not; that letter was a perfect counterpart of these." As she replied Mrs. Botkin indicated the box containing the anonymous letters introduced in evidence.

Next came a series of direct questions bearing on vital points of the prosecution's case.

"Did you ever send a box of candy to Mrs. John P. Dunning?"

"I never did in my life," answered the witness without a change of tone or manner.

The witness then denied having asked Mrs. Knoff about mailing a package. She said she was familiar with the postal regulations and did not have to seek information. She said that Mrs. Knoff had talked to her about having packages sent from Stockton to San Francisco by boat so that they would be postmarked San Francisco.

"Have you ever written any kind of a letter to Mrs. John P. Dunning?" was Knight's next question.

"I never have," answered Mrs. Botkin decisively. Then she explained that when she wrote to Dunning she addressed the envelope, "J. P. Dunning, Esq." That was her custom, she said, and for further emphasis she remarked, "I never wrote the word John in my life."

"Did you ever see the box of candy introduced here before it was brought into court?"

"I did not."

"Did you on the 1st of June go into the [illegible] drug store and purchase arsenic?"

"I did not."

"Do you know Frank Grey?"

"I do not."

"Did you ever have any conversation with him?"

"I never have."

"Did you ever purchase arsenic and place it in chocolate candy?"

"I never did. I have never purchased arsenic in San Francisco or any other place."

The witness finished up her long list of denials by denying the purchase of the handkerchief, also the story of [illegible]

[illegible] of visiting a cafe "where they [illegible] the little drinking places." She [illegible] ning made a confidant of her and told [illegible] all about his family. She declared [illegible] spent very little money on her, and [illegible] "I more frequently paid for the [illegible] than he." She admitted that he had [illegible] her to theaters, saying "he had the [illegible] free." Dunning's change of residence [illegible] 927 Geary street, she said, was due [illegible] desire to obtain better conveniences [illegible] less expense. The witness said that [illegible] at 927 Geary street Dunning was with [illegible] a great deal in the house and at the [illegible]

"Did you take meals with him?" [illegible] Hosmer.

"He took his meals with me," [illegible] Mrs. Botkin.

The witness told of Dunning after [illegible] ing back from the races "without [illegible] penny." The social life at 927 Geary [illegible] was defined as consisting of dinners, [illegible] and refreshments, the latter largely [illegible] up of "bracers" mixed from whisky.

A flash of spirit followed Hosmer's [illegible] inquiry. He wanted to know whether [illegible] occupied the same apartment with Dunning. "He occupied his own room [illegible] occupied mine," she said, haughtily. [illegible] her excitement she forgot to say [illegible] ment. Further inquiries in this line [illegible] ruled out.

The witness said she had introduced Dunning to her husband at her [illegible] Both Botkin and herself referred to [illegible] ning as "Jack." She said she corresponded with Dunning while he was in Salt Lake City, writing once or twice a month [illegible] sometimes her letters were quite long. She was rather glad when he returned to San Francisco because he felt that he [illegible] an opportunity to improve his condition. When he returned she was living at [illegible] California street, at which place she [illegible] son to furnish him food when he had [illegible]. The witness said that before he [illegible] the Victoria Hotel Dunning [illegible] on a sofa at the Press Club. She [illegible] that she paid his rent at the hotel for [illegible] four days he remained there before [illegible] ing for the East.

Mrs. Botkin then told of her departure from this city on August 4th, the day [illegible] which the box of candy is supposed [illegible] have been mailed. She took the [illegible] mento-street cars, she said and got [illegible] the turntable at the ferry. She did [illegible] make any stops on the way. After [illegible] reached the ferry she checked her [illegible]. Then she took the boat which [illegible] left at 7:30 P. M., but said it might [illegible] been 4:30. She went to St. Helena by [illegible] of Vallejo Junction, and three days [illegible] went to Healdsburg. The witness [illegible] her month's visit to Humboldt [illegible] without adding anything to her direct [illegible] timony. In answer to a question [illegible] that she visited Mrs. [illegible] before [illegible] left San Francisco for St. Helena [illegible] [illegible] She wrote Mrs. [illegible] letter from Healdsburg. A question [illegible] the contents of the letter was ruled [illegible] Mrs. Botkin was then asked about [illegible] shopping trips to the City of Paris [illegible] goods store. She said she had been at [illegible] more frequently but had made [illegible] visits there during the last year.

The representatives of the prosecution [illegible] held a whispered consultation and [illegible] slow Hosmer said: "That is all."

Mrs. Botkin stepped lightly down [illegible] the stand and her chief counsel said [illegible] pleasantly: "That is our case."

"Any rebuttal?" was the [illegible] ance of Judge Cook, and Hosmer [illegible] explain why the prosecution would [illegible] an adjournment to Tuesday at [illegible]. As there were a few minutes [illegible] ness available, he called W. H. [illegible]. This witness was asked about whether steamer Humboldt carried mail. [illegible] objection was made to the [illegible] was explained that he [illegible] steamers plying between Eureka and San Francisco brought mail from the [illegible] put in sacks and that the mail [illegible] stamped until it reached San Fran[illegible]

"The mere fact that Mrs. Botkin [illegible] Eureka," said Hosmer, "would [illegible] prevented her from sending the [illegible] [illegible] dated June [illegible]

[illegible] to the City Hall. He is expected [illegible] state that on each of his trips from Humboldt county the mail pouch at the wharf contained from fifty to 600 letters. He will tell how he takes charge of the letters and posts them at the Ferry Postoffice on his arrival in this city.

All letters that are dropped in the open mail pouch on the Eureka wharf are supposed to be stamped by the purser with a postmark bearing the mark "Way." The anonymous letter of June 18th, which was sent to Mrs. Dunning, has no mark of this kind, but this fact does not phase the prosecution. They say that the purser is supposed to so stamp such letters, but that he seldom does.

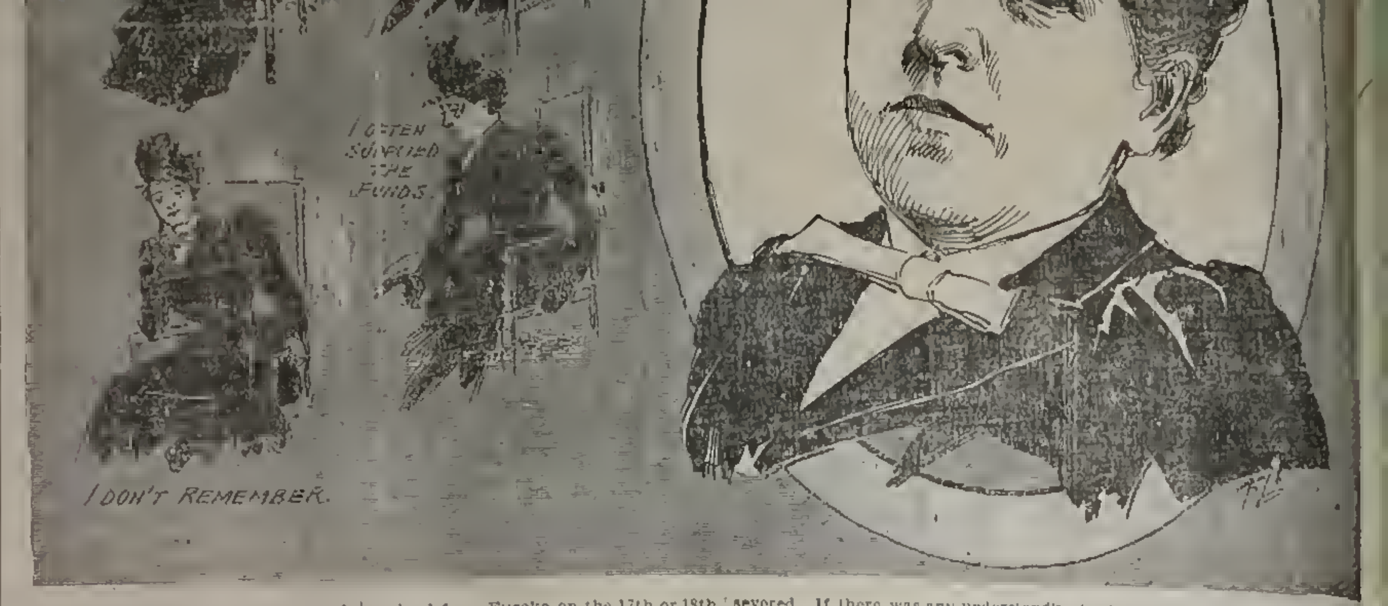
The defense is not troubled over this last move of the prosecution. They say the steamers Humboldt and Pomona are the only ones that carry the United States mail. They further claim that the prosecution has no facts on which to base its theory, and that the evidence will not be legitimate, because on the line of conjecture.

Mrs. Botkin expects to pass a rather pleasant Christmas. She is hopeful of a favorable termination of the case, and her sisters, Mrs. Roberts and Mrs. McClure, will do what they can to make the day cheerful.

CHANGE OF TACTICS.

HER ATTORNEYS BANKING ON THE ALIBI AS TO UNSIGNED LETTERS.

A Queer Story About the Life of Dunning and the Woman—Husband Approved of the Acquaintance.



IN SPITE of all the predictions, Mrs. Cordelia Botkin fared well on cross-examination. Like Mrs. Ruoff, she had been warned to change her manner and she was much less affected, much less grotesque, much more womanly. She seemed to have read the newspaper criticisms of her manner and digested them, heartily as she must have disapproved of them. She made a much better impression on her second appearance than upon her debut, being gentler, more unassuming and not so positive. It was a noticeable fact that Knight did not hand any of the tangible evidence of the case to Mrs. Botkin. She was not required to handle the candy box, which she has never touched during the trial, nor the handkerchief nor the confections. Once or twice Mrs. Botkin wept a little, at which the jury seemed relieved, tears being the proper thing for a woman under these conditions. She wiped her eyes and her voice broke a little when she spoke of Dunning's ingratitude, and once she smiled glitteringly upon Hosmer.

"Really, I can't tell," she said, with a bashful smile, when pressed for a date upon cross-examination.

At another time she said she could not be sure about dates, as she was really incapable of giving them. Except for these frailties of memory, Mrs. Botkin's story went smoothly enough. Hosmer, who is a gentle-hearted man, did not try her with any of the exhibits of the case, nor did he try to see if her nerves would snap under the tension of angry questioning. He was even merciful in his inquiries about the relations of the prisoner and Dunning.

It was noticeable in the testimony that the place which belonged to Dunning was always his "room," while the prisoner's abode, whether one room or two, was always an "apartment." That is Mrs. Botkin's way of keeping up appearances. It reminded her hearers powerfully of the sentence passed upon her by the chambermaid at the Stockton hotel where she was arrested. The girl, a reader of "Lady Letitia's Love Letters" and literature of like class, remarked with round mouth and wide eyes: "Oh, she couldn't be guilty. Why, she is just like one of the fine ladies you read about in the story books."

And she is. In jail or anywhere else Mrs. Botkin will always have the airs of the fine lady. To her all pumpkins are coaches.

When Hosmer asked embarrassing questions Mrs. Botkin turned her round, full face away from the courtroom and squeezed a tear into her kerchief, which is always new and stiff. Her stout, black back was all that remained visible. Perhaps the fact that her profile is prettier than her full face had something to do with it.

The witness tried to explain her relations with Dunning, in whom her interest was purely motherly. According to her story, there was no impropriety, yet she admitted that she, a married woman living apart from her husband, and therefore doubly open to suspicion, allowed this unknown to scrape an acquaintance with her in the Park, to walk with her on the street afterward, and to talk to her at the races. Dunning asked permission to call, after these insufficient preliminaries, and came to see her in the afternoon. Almost immediately there was an invitation to dine, and they went to a private room in a French restaurant. All this while Mrs. Dunning was still in the city. In extenuation Mrs. Botkin said that she went out with Dunning with her husband's express permission that he wished her to have proper escorts and some pleasure—provided always that her companions were gentlemen. Botkin was introduced to Dunning at Mrs. Botkin's "apartment" and pronounced himself satisfied with the young man. There were some careful questions by the prosecution as to the name Dunning went by in the bosom of the Botkin family. Mrs. Botkin said that she always called him Mr. Dunning, but that her son Beverly constantly spoke of him as "Jack" Dunning, and so in time he came to be spoken of as "Jack." Asked if, when her husband spoke of "Jack" in his letters, it was Mr. Dunning to whom he referred, Mrs. Botkin said that it was. These are the letters which the police are said to have in which Botkin alternately begged and demanded a divorce. Knight rose and fiercely demanded the letters, but did not get them.

Mrs. Botkin had a plausible explanation of how Mrs. Price happened to see her in the hall of the Victoria with packages. The defendant had already said that she was not out of her room on Sunday, July 31, except to telephone to the doctor. She said yesterday that she did not board at the Victoria, because she did not like the food, but on Sunday, the 31st, her dinner was served at her bedside by the Japanese servant. For that Sunday dinner Mrs. Botkin town. That Sunday dinner, she stated, was served early, before the regular dinner for the house was prepared. On Monday Mrs. Botkin still felt far from well. About 4 o'clock she made herself partially presentable, to use her own words, and went down stairs to "a shop under the Victoria" in order to purchase some buns and some fruit. The grocer had no "buns," so Mrs. Botkin was obliged to put up with plain American bread. She crossed the street to get some fruit, bought a few toilet articles from the "chemist's shop" and returned to the Victoria. She almost fainted getting up the stairs, and Mrs. Price, who was in the hall, called to her reproachfully, and asked her why she had not sent the Japanese or Mrs. Price's little boy.

The prisoner told of Dunning's pitiable condition, of how he wrote her that he had drunk up all his salary in Salt Lake and should never be able to do anything there, and of how he asked her for funds so that he might return. These funds she sent, not desiring especially to have him here, but wishing to make it so that he could obtain employment.

One important statement made by Mrs. Botkin was that the anonymous letter sent to her by Dunning from Salt Lake was written in ink, was not in Mrs. Dunning's writing, with which she was familiar, and was the same as those admitted in evidence. This will probably be used in argument by the defense to account for the missing anonymous letter, to prove that Mrs. Dunning did not copy the letter before sending it to her husband, so that he might be able to detect the sender through the handwriting, and also to show that Dunning did not think the handwriting was Mrs. Botkin's at that time, though he now swears that he thinks it is.

Mrs. Botkin swore that she never addressed Mr. Dunning as "John P. Dunning," but always as "J. P. Dunning, Esq." She denied flatly that she ever sent Mrs. Dunning a box of candy, and denied that she had ever purchased arsenic in her life or that she knew Druggist Grey. She testified also that she consulted W. H. L. Barnes with the view of resisting a divorce and that she never thought of marrying Dunning.

On cross-examination Mrs. Botkin told of a number of French restaurants where she and Dunning had dined, but she said that she more frequently paid for the meals than he did. She told how she would serve refreshments in her room after they had a game of whist or euchre. Asked of what these refreshments would consist, she said that she would "brew a pot of tea" or make a salad, that sometimes Mr. Dunning and Beverly would have beer together or an occasional "bracer" of whisky. In time Mrs. Botkin herself came to like the fancy drinks that the men mixed, but more frequently she confined herself to tea. At 1256 California street Mrs. Botkin kept a free food bureau for Dunning. At that time he was without the wherewithal to pay room rent and was sleeping on a sofa at the Press Club.

Mrs. Botkin was then hurried forward in her story to August 4th, when she went to St. Helena. She said that she came down in the Sacramento-street cars, checked her luggage to Healdsburg on Mr. McClure's ticket, bought a ticket for St. Helena and took the boat. She denied that she mailed anything at the Postoffice. Mrs. Botkin said she had visited a Mrs. Carter on the morning of August 3d.

To the surprise of the courtroom this ended the cross-examination. Knight made a grand-stand play, inviting the jury to step up and question Mrs. Botkin, but no one had any questions to ask and the prisoner stepped down. Her sisters, who had listened to her recital, were crying softly. Miss Brown is away, but Mrs. Roberts of Eureka, who strongly resembles her, sat in her place.

"That's our case," said Knight simply.

Hosmer at once called W. H. Roberts in rebuttal, seeking to prove that a letter could have been mailed in Eureka and come here without postmark in time to be stamped June 18th. The defense meets this proof with records showing that the only steamer which arrived from Eureka on the 17th or 18th was the Farallon, which does not carry mail and which left Eureka at 2:30 in the morning of June 17th and arrived here at 4 on the morning of the 18th.

Before Mrs. Botkin there were a couple of witnesses for the defense. One of them was Captain Callundan, called to tell that he knew Mrs. Grace Harris under another name at the time Will & Finck had trouble with thieving employes. The other witness was J. W. Bird, a brother-in-law of Kitty Dettner, who was called to testify as to her general reputation for honesty and veracity in the neighborhood in which she lives. Bird testified that the girl's reputation was exceedingly bad. He said that after her statement came out in the papers people around that neighborhood said: "How can you believe anything such a liar as Kitty Dettner says?" On cross-examination Hosmer asked Bird if it was true that he had made advances to Kitty which she rejected. Bird said that it was not he who made the advances, but Kitty. Bird became much excited and incoherent. He related how he went to Chief Lees and told him that Kitty Dettner would ruin his case, but the Chief said that she would make a good appearance before the jury. Bird said that all Kitty wanted was a trip East. Asked if he had said uncomplimentary things to Chief Lees about Kitty Dettner's mother and grandmother, he said that he did not recollect, but thought he might have said something about her mother, as she was his mother-in-law.

Bird testified that he was happily married—the first happily married person who has been on the stand in all this long and dreary case of jealousies, heart-burnings, infidelities and domestic infelicities.

THE TESTIMONY.

The taking of testimony in behalf of Mrs. Botkin was resumed yesterday morning with a slight variation from the expected programme. While the crowd impatiently waited for the defendant to take the stand and complete her story three minor witnesses were put on in an attempt to discredit important witnesses for the prosecution.

Captain J. J. Callundan, superintendent of Morse's patrol system, was called first. When asked if he was acquainted with Mrs. Grace Harris he replied, "I knew her under another name." He got no further, as the prosecution entered a vigorous and successful objection. Knight explained that his purpose was to impeach the testimony of Mrs. Harris by proving that she had confessed to theft committed while in the employ of Will & Finck. The explanation was of no avail, the Court ruling that the attempt to impeach testimony was not being made in the proper manner.

J. W. Bird then came on and testified as to the reputation of his sister-in-law, Kittie Dettner, for truth, honesty and integrity. He deemed it bad, and Knight asked him no further questions. Assistant District Attorney Hosmer was not so kind. He asked numerous questions and dragged out skeletons which the witness would fain have concealed. Bird admitted having been to Chief Lees with stories of family troubles. The witness said there had been a clash between Miss Dettner and himself, but he denied having any prejudice against her. He spurned the idea of being in love with his wife's sister, and when asked if he had not sought to charm her while she was cashier in his store he grew excited and almost shouted, "If there were any approaches made they came from the other side." Bird said his opinion that Miss Dettner was untruthful had been expressed by the young lady's brother and by several neighbors. He quoted one of the neighbors as commenting on her statement to the police, "What can you do with a liar like Kittie Dettner?" Bird wanted to argue almost every question asked on cross-examination and was rebuked several times by the Court.

Mrs. A. F. Grant of Healdsburg went on the stand and testified as to meeting Miss Lizzie Livernash on a train. The witness, in response to a question by Knight, said that Miss Livernash had told her that she gained the confidence of Mrs. Botkin by representing herself to be a woman of the world. The cross-examination of Mrs. Grant was brief and without interest. At its close a new Mrs. Botkin, far different from the harsh and glib-tongued woman of the day before, went quietly to the witness' chair and meekly faced the jury.

Mrs. Botkin resumed her fateful story by telling briefly of her correspondence with Dunning. After he went away he wrote the first letter, she said, and he constantly kept her informed as to his changes of address. The witness was then asked as to Dunning's departure last April. She said she accompanied him to the Sixteenth-street station, Oakland. When they parted there was no understanding that their friendship was to be severed. If there was any understanding it was that they were always to be friends. Neither was there any understanding that they were ever to marry. The witness said she was bound by marriage ties of many years' standing, and so was he. She thought it better that such ties should not be broken. They had never discussed the matter and had not talked of Dunning abandoning his wife.

"I went out repeatedly with Mr. Dunning," said the witness. "My husband knew about it and permitted it. There was no secrecy in receiving him, and our friendship was open."

Soon Mrs. Botkin drifted back in her story and told of Dunning's days of poverty. Before he left here to become a war correspondent, she said, his condition was pitiable and would have aroused the sympathy of any woman. He was in want and she did what she could for him. At this point the witness stopped and said she did not care to talk further of what she had done out of a feeling of sympathy.

Resuming her story, the witness said that Dunning was in Salt Lake five months. There his salary went for drink. He wrote to her telling her he thought that he could get a position in San Francisco. He wanted to reform and live down the past. She send him funds to return. When he went to Salt Lake both thought they were parting for good.

Knight then made inquiries about the anonymous letter which Dunning had testified was copied and the copy sent to him by his wife. Mrs. Botkin said she had not kept Dunning's letter to her at the time he sent her what he called a copy of the anonymous letter. In her answer she had said that she also suspected Mrs. Seeley.

"Have you ever seen Mrs. Dunning's handwriting?" asked Knight.

"I have," answered the witness. "Mr. Dunning used to read portions of his wife's letters to the gatherings at 927 Geary street."

"Does her handwriting resemble that of the letter sent to you?"

"It does not; that letter was a perfect counterpart of these." As she replied Mrs. Botkin indicated the box containing the anonymous letters introduced in evidence.

Next came a series of direct questions bearing on vital points of the prosecution's case.

"Did you ever send a box of candy to Mrs. John P. Dunning?"

"I never did in my life," answered the witness without a change of tone or manner.

The witness then denied having asked Mrs. Ruoff about mailing a package. She said she was familiar with the postal regulations and did not have to seek information. She said that Mrs. Ruoff had talked to her about having packages sent from Stockton to San Francisco by boat so that they would be postmarked San Francisco.

"Have you ever written any kind of a letter to Mrs. John P. Dunning?" was Knight's next question.

"I never have," answered Mrs. Botkin decisively. Then she explained that when she wrote to Dunning she addressed the envelope, "J. P. Dunning, Esq." That was her custom, she said, and for further emphasis she remarked: "I never wrote the word John in my life."

"Did you ever see the box of candy introduced here before it was brought into court?"

"I did not."

"Did you on the 1st of June go into the Owl drug store and purchase arsenic?"

"I did not."

"Do you know Frank Grey?"

"I do not."

"Did you ever have any conversation with him?"

"I never have."

"Did you ever purchase arsenic and place it in chocolate candy?"

"I never did. I have never purchased arsenic in San Francisco or any other place."

The witness finished up her long list of denials by denying the purchase of the handkerchief, also the story of Mrs. Grace Harris that she purchased two handkerchiefs and had them sent to the Victoria Hotel.

Mrs. Botkin then testified that she had consulted W. H. L. Barnes in regard to resisting a divorce suit in case one was brought by her husband. She said there was no understanding that she was to go to New York and join Dunning. For his own sake she was glad when he went away and she had hoped that he would prosper.

The witness then took a shy at the testimony of Mrs. Birdie Price, who is positive that she saw her enter the hotel with two small bundles on Sunday, July 31, the day when the candy was purchased. Mrs. Botkin's attack was in the way of an explanation.

"I never go out of my apartments on Sundays," she said. "I was not out on July 31st. The next day, between 3 and 4 o'clock, I made myself presentable and went to the shop under the Victoria Hotel to get some buns and some fruit. I did not care for the food of the hotel. I was not able to get the buns, and got a loaf of bread instead. I got the fruit and then went to the chemist's shop near by and purchased a few articles of toilet. On my way up stairs, as I was returning to my apartments, I met Mrs. Price."

Mrs. Botkin then spoke in praise of Mrs. Dunning, saying she thought her too good for her husband and rather narrow in her ideas. She denied again that she had ever discussed marriage with Dunning, and with that her direct examination closed.

Then came the cross-examination, and with it a disappointment for the expectant crowd. Hosmer was a kindly inquisitor, and only once did his inquiries arouse a spirit of antagonism in the witness.

In response to questions Mrs. Botkin in brief answers retold her story of meeting Dunning, how he requested to call and how he became a constant visitor at her rooms. While his family was here she did not go out with him. She gave the names of several restaurants where she had dined with Dunning, and also spoke naively of visiting a cafe "where it ... the little drinking places." She said Dunning made a confidant of her and told all about his family. She declared ... spent very little money on her and ... "I more frequently paid for the ... than he." She admitted that he had taken her to theaters, saying "he had the ... free." Dunning's change of residence ... 927 Geary street, she said, was due ... desire to obtain better conveniences ... less expense. The witness said that ... at 927 Geary street Dunning was with ... a great deal in the house and ... the ...

"Did you take meals with him?" ... Hosmer.

"He took his meals with me," ... Mrs. Botkin.

The witness told of Dunning after ... ing back from the ... "without ... penny." The social life at 927 Geary ... was defined as consisting of dinners, ... and refreshments, the latter largely ... up of "bracers" mixed from whisky.

A flash of spirit followed Hosmer's ... inquiry. He wanted to know whether ... occupied the same apartment with ... ning. "He occupied his own room ... occupied mine," she said, haughtily ... her excitement she forgot to say ... ment. Further inquiries in this line ... ruled out.

The witness said she had introduced Dunning to her husband at her ... Both Botkin and herself referred to ... ning as "Jack." She said she corresponded with Dunning while he was in Salt Lake City, writing once or twice a month ... sometimes her letters were quite long. She was rather glad when he returned to San Francisco because he felt that he ... an opportunity to improve his condition. When he returned she was living at ... California street, at which place she ... gan to furnish him food when he had ... The witness said that before he went to the Victoria Hotel Dunning was sleeping on a sofa at the Press Club. She ... that she paid his rent at the hotel ... four days he remained there before ... ing for the East.

Mrs. Botkin then told of her departure from this city on August 4th, the day on which the box of candy is supposed to have been mailed. She took the Sacramento-street cars, she said, and got ... the turntable at the ferry. She did not make any stops on the way. After ... reached the ferry she checked her trunk. Then she took the boat, which she thinks left at 3:30 P. M., but said it might have been 4:30. She went to St. Helena by way of Vallejo Junction, and three days ... went to Healdsburg. The witness told of her month's visit to Humboldt ... without adding anything to her direct testimony. In answer to a question she ... that she visited Mrs. Carter before ... left San Francisco for St. Helena on August 4th last. She wrote Mrs. Carter a letter from Healdsburg. A question as to the contents of the letter was ruled out. Mrs. Botkin was then asked about ... shopping trips to the City of Paris dry goods store. She said she had been to the place frequently, but had made very ... visits there during the last year.

The representatives of the prosecution held a whispered consultation and at its close Hosmer said: "That is all."

Mrs. Botkin tripped lightly down from the stand and her chief counsel said impressively: "That is our case."

"Any rebuttal?" was the laconic ... ance of Judge Cook, and Hosmer ... explain why the prosecution would ... an adjournment to Tuesday at that ... As there were a few minutes and one ... ness available, he called W. H. Roberts. This witness was asked about whether the steamer Humboldt carried mail. When ... objection was made to the question ... mer explained that he wished to show ... steamers plying between Eureka and San Francisco brought mail from the ... port in sacks and that the mail was ... stamped until it reached San Francisco.

"The mere fact that Mrs. Botkin was ... Eureka," said Hosmer, "would not ... prevented her from sending the anonymous letter which is dated June 11th and postmarked June 18th."

The witness was allowed to answer and said that he had heard of letters being ... tied that way. As the prosecution did not ... claim that the letter came down on the Humboldt further questions were ruled out.

Knight grew jovial and Hosmer said: "We shall show on what steamer the letter did come."

"That is another matter," remarked Judge Cook. He then ordered an adjournment until 10 o'clock Tuesday morning.

DECEMBER 25, 1898.

WILL ATTEMPT TO TRACE THE LETTER TO HER.

Prosecution Claims It Can Prove Mrs. Botkin Mailed It.

Asserts That Anonymous Communication Was Sent From Eureka.

When Mrs. Botkin's trial is resumed Tuesday morning the prosecution will present evidence to try and establish the fact that Mrs. Botkin mailed the anonymous letter sent to Mrs. Dunning and postmarked in San Francisco June 17th last. The contention of the prosecution is that Mrs. Botkin mailed the letter at Eureka, but through the laxity of the purser of the steamer Farallone it was not postmarked until after deposited in the Postoffice here. Mrs. Botkin expects to spend a pleasant Christmas, and her sisters, Mrs. Roberts and Mrs. McClure, will do what they can to make the day cheerful.

The trial of Mrs. Cordelia Botkin will be resumed on Tuesday morning at 10 o'clock. The prosecution is prepared to put in its rebuttal testimony as soon as the jury roll is disposed of. The attorneys for the defense will be largely guided in the presentation of rebuttal testimony by the evidence submitted by the prosecution. Both the prosecution and the defense feel confident that the case will be submitted to the jury Thursday.

The prosecution still holds to the belief that Mrs. Botkin wrote the anonymous letter postmarked San Francisco, June 18th, and an effort will be made to claim her as the author.

Before the defense submitted its testimony it was the theory of the prosecution that Mrs. Botkin was in this city on June 18th, and that she attended personally to mailing the anonymous letter directed to Mrs. Dunning. But since it has been shown, beyond question, that Mrs. Botkin was not in this city and could not have posted the letter here, the prosecution has been figuring on a possibility and looking around for another theory.

At last they have found it. They are now willing to admit that Mrs. Botkin was in Humboldt county on the day the letter was postmarked in this city. But they say that there is every reason to believe that she dropped the letter into the open mail pouch at the steamer just before the vessel cleared the wharf.

The prosecution has been making careful inquiry during the past three days about the occurrences at the wharf in Eureka on the 11th of last June. They have also been investigating the postal customs of the place.

Their inquiry produced the information that the steamer Farallone left that day for San Francisco, and that it is the custom to leave the mail pouch, which is stationed near the gangway, open until a few minutes before the steamer starts, in order to give people who were too late to get their letters into the mail through the postoffice an opportunity of posting them.

The prosecution will claim that all of the steamers that ply between this port and Eureka carry the United States mail. The purser of the Farallone will be subpoenaed as soon as he reaches port on Tuesday and taken to the City Hall. He is expected to state that on each of his trips from Humboldt county the mail pouch at the wharf contained from fifty to 500 letters. He will tell how he takes charge of the letters and posts them at the Ferry Postoffice on his arrival in this city.

All letters that are dropped in the open mail pouch on the Eureka wharf are supposed to be stamped by the purser with a postmark bearing the mark "Way." The anonymous letter of June 18th, which was sent to Mrs. Dunning, has no mark of this kind, but this fact does not phaze the prosecution. They say that the purser is supposed to so stamp such letters, but that he seldom does.

The defense is not troubled over this last move of the prosecution. They say the steamers Humboldt and Pomona are the only ones that carry the United States mail. They further claim that the prosecution has no facts on which to base its theory, and that the evidence will not be legitimate, because on the line of conjecture.

Mrs. Botkin expects to pass a rather pleasant Christmas. She is hopeful of a favorable termination of the case, and her sisters, Mrs. Roberts and Mrs. McClure, will do what they can to make the day cheerful.

FRIENDS OF M'GLADE CALL AT THE JAIL.

Of course the circumstances in which I happen to be placed interfered with the enjoyment of the Christmas dinner, but it served quite well even in the jail. My folks sent me the dinner and a number of friends visited me during the day. I enjoyed the meal and the conversation with my friends and was gratified to hear from them that I can leave here to-night or to-morrow. PETER M'GLADE.

MRS. ANNA BECKER, WHOSE DEVOTION CONTROLS HER DESTINY.

TRUE wifely devotion animated Mrs. Anna Becker's journey to San Francisco, for she has just arrived from New York to offer what comfort she may to her husband, Charles Becker, known on two continents as the "Prince of Forgers," before he goes to San Quentin to serve a term of seven years for forging a $22,000 check on the Crocker-Woolworth Bank. During Becker's first trial his wife sat beside him every day, and when the Supreme Court granted a new trial she was assured that there was no danger of his conviction because of the lack of legal evidence, so she returned to her business interests in the East in order to earn more money to pay the lawyers who were defending him. A second trial was had and the jury disagreed, but all at once the entire phase of the case was altered by all of Becker's accomplices turning State's evidence against him. There was nothing left for him to do but to plead guilty and throw himself on the mercy of the court. This change came so suddenly that Becker had to act quickly, and his wife was not able to sit beside him at the supreme hour of his misfortune. But she telegraphed that she would come across the continent to be near him, as soon as steam could fetch her, and the only favor he asked from the court was that he might remain in the County Jail long enough to eat his Christmas dinner with his wife. This concession was granted, so Mr. and Mrs. Becker will dine together to-day, and then Becker will take his departure for the State Prison. Mrs. Becker does not consider that she is doing more than any wife should. She says she married her husband for better or worse, that nothing but death can separate them, and that so long as she lives she will devote her most earnest efforts to ameliorate his lot and to secure the amnesty to which she feels that he is entitled, as all of his accomplices seem in a fair way to go free.

CHRISTMAS OF MRS. BOTKIN.

CHRISTMAS Day this year was unlike that of all previous years for Mrs. Cordelia Botkin. In the events of the past few weeks there has been nothing to indicate to her the approach of the glad holiday season. With the evidence for and against her now all in, and her fate hanging in the balance, there was neither mirth nor joy for her on the coming of the festal day. She has to look forward to another week before her judges and the decision of the issue on which her life depends.

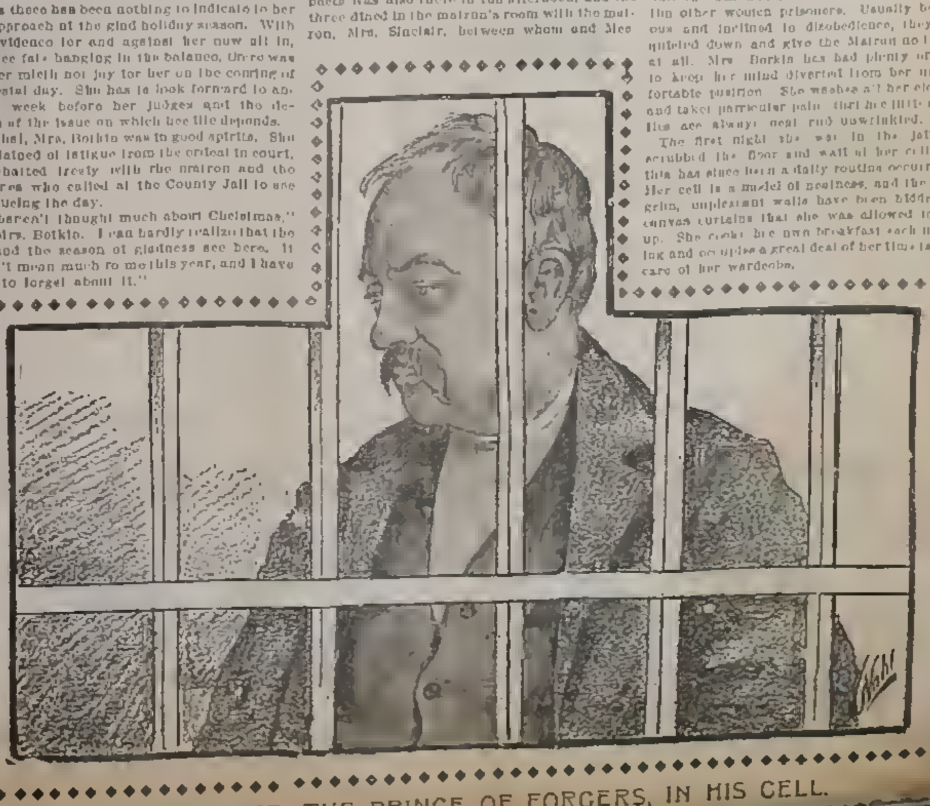
Withal, Mrs. Botkin was in good spirits. She complained of fatigue from the ordeal in court, but chatted freely with the matron and the relatives who called at the County Jail to see her during the day.

"I haven't thought much about Christmas," said Mrs. Botkin. "I can hardly realize that the day and the season of gladness are here. It doesn't mean much to me this year, and I have tried to forget about it."

Mrs. Botkin was visited by her sister, Mrs. W. H. Roberts, who brought a well-filled hamper containing Christmas dinner. Mr. Roberts was also there in the afternoon, and the three dined in the matron's room with the matron, Mrs. Sinclair, between whom and Mrs. Botkin there has developed a very warm friendship.

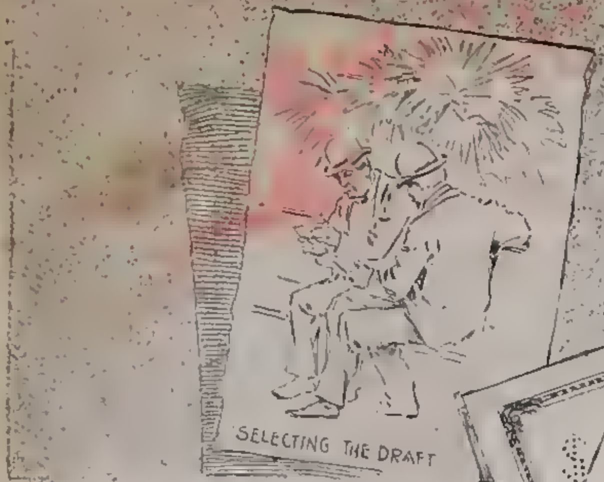
Since Mrs. Botkin has been in the County Jail she has had a marvelous influence over the other women prisoners. Usually boisterous and inclined to disobedience, they have quieted down and give the Matron no trouble at all. Mrs. Botkin has had plenty of work to keep her mind diverted from her uncomfortable position. She washes all her clothing and takes particular pains that her little string ties are always neat and unwrinkled.

The first night she was in the jail she scrubbed the floor and walls of her cell, and this has since been a daily routine occurrence. Her cell is a model of neatness, and the bare, grim, unpleasant walls have been hidden by canvas curtains that she was allowed to put up. She cooks her own breakfast each morning and occupies a great deal of her time taking care of her wardrobe.

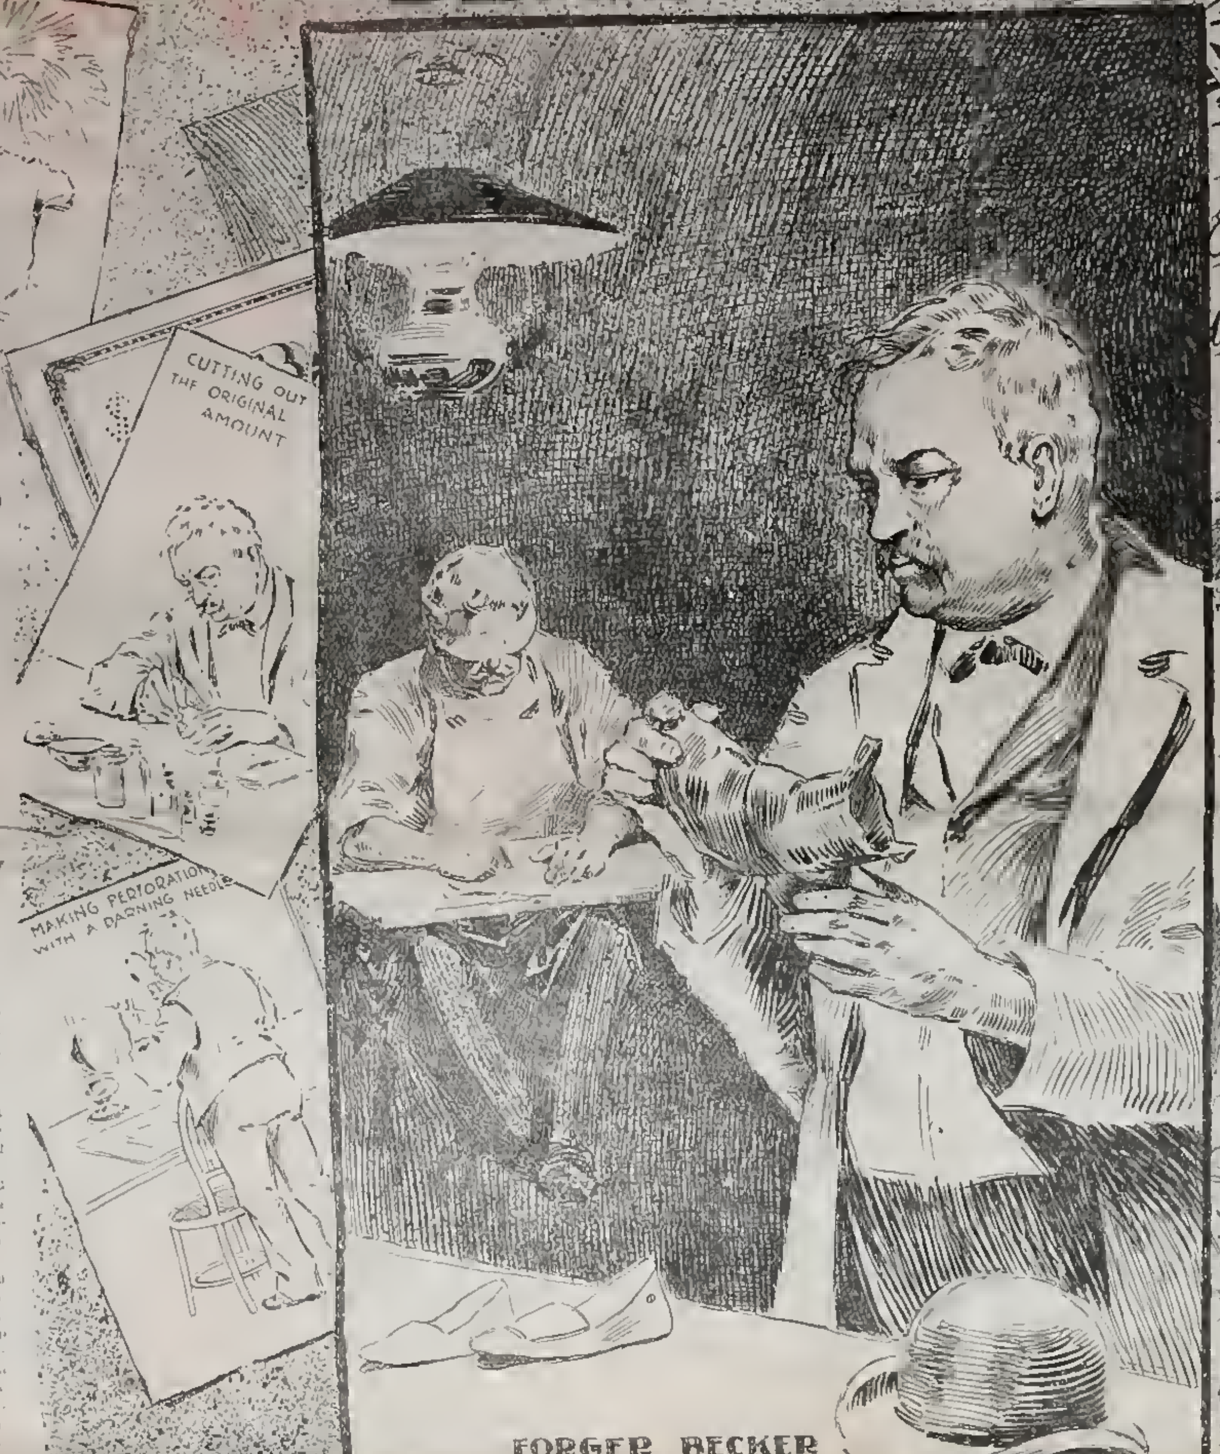


CARL BECKER, THE PRINCE OF FORGERS, IN HIS CELL.

HOW I FORGED THE $22000 DRAFT



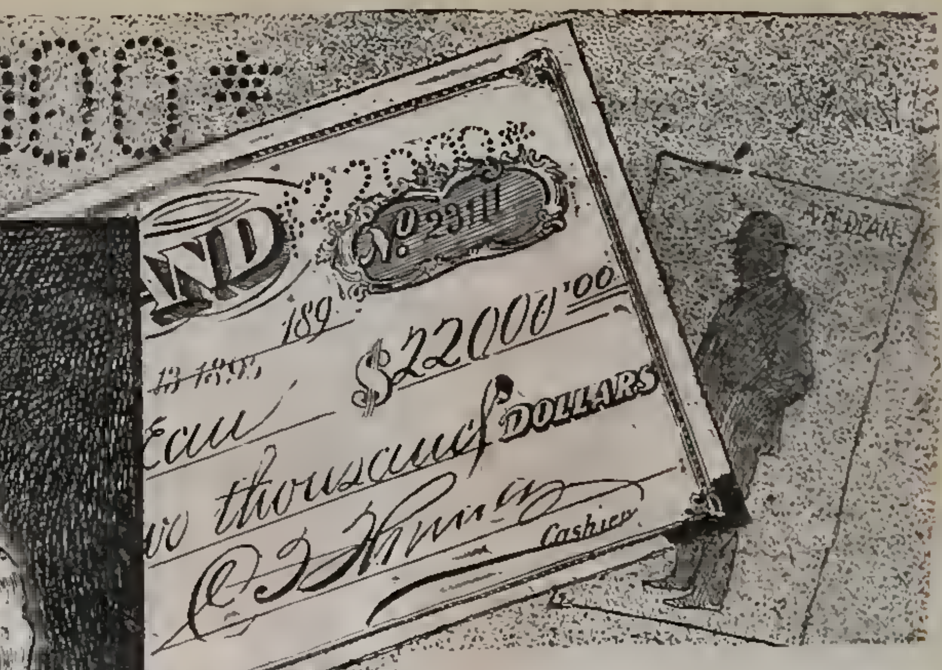
SELECTING THE DRAFT

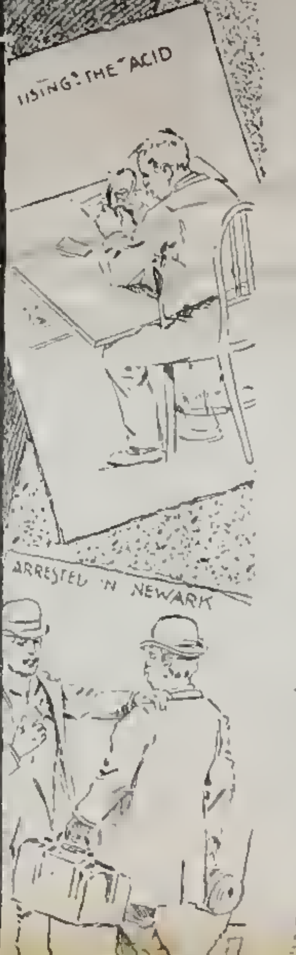


CUTTING OUT THE ORIGINAL AMOUNT

MAKING PERFORATIONS WITH A DARNING NEEDLE

FORGER BECKER LEARNING HIS LESSON





USING THE ACID

ARRESTED IN NEWARK

Warning to Bankers From the Greatest of Forgers, Who Tells How He Made the Big Forged Draft.

BY CHARLES BECKER.

This Is My Only Full Confession.

THE time has come when I feel willing to tell just how I raised that book of Woodland draft from $12 to $22,000. Whatever [illegible] motive [illegible] it will be clear that this statement will prove the sincerity of my resolution never to engage in the manipulation of banking paper again.

Banking officials and others who have to guard against deception in matters of this kind will confirm my statement that the [illegible] out of my manner of raising this check will greatly aid them in preventing a recurrence of the same trick. At any rate, the effect will be to put them on their guard and to make the skill of the forger less effective. If I had any idea of resuming this kind of a life after serving my sentence nobody could induce me to give this thing away, but I have made up my mind that it doesn't pay, and so it is my intention to go into some small business by which I can make an honest living, for my habits are simple and it will not take much to keep me and my wife for the remainder of our lives.

Two methods of manipulation were necessary in fixing up the Woodland draft. In the first place there were the perforated [illegible] in the paper that had to be disposed of in a [illegible] way. [illegible] is a photographic copy of the draft [illegible] in making my explanations. Several [illegible] have been made that I filled up those perforations [illegible] pulp, but that must have come from the [illegible] I never heard anything of the kind. My [illegible] [illegible] reading the cents and put in three more ciphers, letting them slope down, as I assumed a man writing hastily might do, closing the figures as the drawer of the draft showed his custom to be, by writing two small ciphers like these, "00," over two short lines. These might be considered unimportant details, but they all count in a work of this importance. The writing of the word "twelve" was very prominent and considerable ink was used, which caused some work in taking out the stain, but it finally yielded, and my task was finished, all but painting the letters necessary to complete the words "twenty-two thousand." It would have been impossible to have written those letters with the finest pen that I ever saw, so I used a camel's-hair brush.

The date shows very faint in the photograph, because it was stamped in colored ink that was not acceptable to the camera. I made no change in that, of course.

The work of altering this draft from $12 to $22,000 took me about three hours and a half, taking the time for drying the patches. I made no record of it, but in thinking over the matter I place that as about the time occupied. My work was done at the Galindo Hotel, in Oakland, where I stopped all the time I was in this part of California, for, you see, I never was in San Francisco until I was brought back under arrest.

My connection with this operation came about in a very natural way. Creegan knew what I could do and one day I received a letter asking me to join him in Chicago. When we met he said he had a man in San Francisco getting ready to plant some paper, so we started for the Coast. As I was not feeling well I stopped at Sacramento, but afterward came on to Oakland. Creegan met me across the bay and said that things were progressing well, and a few days later he handed me the draft. We were sitting on a bench in the Oakland City Hall park about noon one day, when he opened a book and showed me the draft. The book was not the "Bankers' Magazine," as some of the witnesses said, but was a novel. The detectives put in that story about the "Bankers' Magazine" for spectacular purposes. This draft was with a lot of others, and it was not my first choice, because there was another which bore in fine lines the legend "Under $1,000." When Creegan found out that this would take more time in order to change the legend, he overruled my preference and we took the Woodland paper. You see, the other seemed to be better safeguarded and therefore I considered it easier to pass by changing it to "Under $30,000," or any other appropriate figure. Anybody could have seen us handling the paper in the Oakland park, but nobody took an interest in our movements, so I went to my room and did the work. I never saw Dean or McClusky, and Creegan was the only person I knew in the deal. After getting the money he met me in Oakland and gave me $2,500. That was all I ever got out of the $20,000 which was drawn on my work. They said they gave $5,000 to Dean, $5,000 to Creegan, $2,000 to McClusky and $5,000 to some shadowy person called Eddy, who they said lived at the Palace Hotel and put up $1,000 to help along the game. That is one point I never could understand [illegible]

JURORS MAY ASK FOR ALL THE EXHIBITS.

DECEMBER 27, 1898.

An Unusual Proceeding Expected in the Botkin Case.

Believed the Jury Will Examine the Specimens of Handwriting.

CASE RESUMED TO-DAY

The Prosecution Will Make an Attempt to Impeach the Testimony of Dr. Terrill.

A very unusual thing is likely to happen when the Botkin case is submitted to the jury. The twelve men who are to decide the fate of the accused woman may, and in all probability will, ask to have all the exhibits used during the trial placed at their disposal.

The defense is not calculating on the jurors asking for the exhibits, but the prosecution is disposed to think they will do so. The prosecution bases its belief on the fact that in several closely contested cases of the magnitude of the Botkin case, the jurors have demanded the privilege of going over and making personal and careful inspection of the articles used as evidence; they say this has been the case particularly where the question of handwriting was one of the issues involved.

The Botkin case will this morning be resumed in Judge Cook's courtroom. The prosecution has its rebuttal testimony arranged and the witnesses will be put on the stand as soon as court opens. There will be some half a dozen witnesses. It is the expectation of the prosecution to consume but an hour's time with this testimony.

The prosecution will raise three points in its rebuttal testimony. It will endeavor to show that Dr. Terrill is mistaken in believing that he attended Mrs. Botkin on the afternoon of July 31st. They will claim that he made a professional call on her the following day, Monday, August 1st. A witness will be produced to point out to the physician his error.

The second issue raised will be in regard to the anonymous letter of June 18th. The prosecution regards it of the utmost importance to establish the fact that Mrs. Botkin is the author of the epistle that was sent to Mrs. Dunning in Dover. The handwriting experts they put on the stand testified that the writer of the anonymous letter surely wrote the address on the box of chocolates, and it would never do to let the jury believe that Mrs. Botkin's presence in Humboldt county on that date would make it impossible for her to have sent the letter. So the purser of the steamer Farallone will be put on the stand to tell how letters in Eureka are dropped in an open mail pouch until within a few minutes of the departure of the vessel.

The prosecution has no witnesses who will claim that Mrs. Botkin was at the steamer on June 17th, just before the vessel sailed, and there will be no one to swear that she was seen to drop a letter in the pouch. But this does not phase the prosecution. They consider their theory a good one, and they propose to abide by it. There is a possibility that she was there, they argue, and a probability, almost amounting to a certainty, that she slipped into the open mail sack a letter addressed to Mrs. Dunning. The purser will tell how the letters mailed in the pouch are postmarked in San Francisco at the Ferry postoffice.

The last effort of the prosecution in the rebuttal line will be to prove that Mrs. Botkin admitted buying powdered arsenic. Chief Lees may be put on the stand to testify that when he questioned Mrs. Botkin about buying arsenic after her admission of the purchase was made, she would neither affirm or deny the purchase, but referred him to her attorneys.

The defense is not worrying over any testimony the prosecution may offer in rebuttal. Dr. Terrill, they say, is sure of his date, because he dined with H. S. Foote on the 31st of July and went directly to the attorney's house after calling on Mrs. Botkin.

Charles Wheeler, the Humboldt attorney, who came down to assist in making Mrs. Botkin's defense, has returned to his home in the North. He has not formally withdrawn from the case, but he will take no further part in it. George A. Knight and Frank McGowan will finish the case. Mr. McGowan was all of yesterday and last evening deep in law books. It is not yet decided whether he or Mr. Knight will make the opening statement.

Attorney-General White of Delaware will open the argument of the prosecution; Assistant District Attorney Hosmer will make the closing speech.

Nothing of unusual interest happened yesterday to break the tedium of Mrs. Botkin's monotonous life at the County Jail. The Rev. Dr. McClure and his wife made her a visit and took with them a small hamper of delicacies sent from Humboldt by Miss Dora Brown.

There was a rumor last night to the effect that Mrs. Botkin had received a number of Christmas gifts, among them a box of Haas' candy from a friend in Sacramento. The rumor was unfounded.

FRIDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 30, 1898.

Miss Virginia Fair.

From her latest photograph by Aimau, N. Y.

MARIE HOWE,

The Popular Young Character Actress of the Alcazar Co

... sign reading

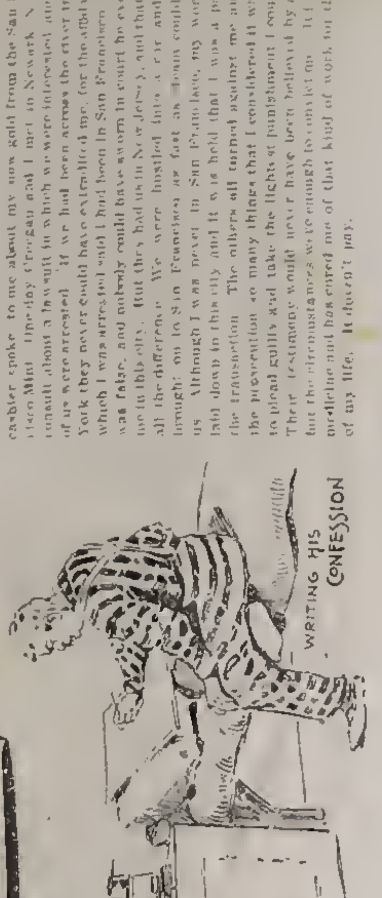
SHOES MENDED WHILE YOU WAIT

And I admired the skill of the workman as he proceeded to repair the break in the leather. He took a sharp knife and cut the hole right out, making, of course, a larger hole, which was cut on the bias, or bevel. Then he took another piece of leather as much like the leather in the upper of my shoe as he could find, and with his knife cut it out to fit the hole, making the bevel on the patch just the same as the bevel in the leather of the shoe. With a little waterproof cement he joined the patch to the shoe, gave it a minute to dry, and there was not one man in a dozen who could have seen the place where the shoe had been mended. So I said to myself that this was the right way to get rid of those perforations in a check, and used this method in my next job. In this Woodland draft [illegible] remembered that the original amount was put in with a dollar mark on one side, with a star on the other, and that two pieces or naughts were perforated. My idea was to leave as much of the paper in its original state as possible, so as not to disturb the natural "feel" and flexibility. The first thing that I did was to cut out the figure "1" and the "$," leaving the original figure "2." In making the incision with a sharp knife I was careful to cut on the bevel like the [illegible] did in patching my shoe. Then I prepared a patch to fit the hole by using some of the small checks which Creegan had furnished me. You see, it was necessary to have paper just like that used in the original draft, for it is of a delicate purple pink tint, and any other substance would be quickly detected. It would be useless to try to substitute the original paper from the same company, even if I could get it, for in the printing of the blank form there is a slight moistening of the paper that changes its color, and that must be taken into consideration.

The paper, as I have said before in speaking of this case, is what is known as the "Safety Banknote Paper," because it has been said that no draft made out on it could be tampered with, but that, of course, is a mistake, as we see here, for this was raised from $12 to $22,000, and passed the inspection of the officers of two banks and the clearing house. After I got the first part of the figures changed I had to take on the big, queer-looking star and make another patch. Here the dark shading of the letters in the name of the bank helped me, for it would be difficult to notice where the pieces of paper were joined after the letters were restored by the use of a brush and the proper ink to correspond with the rest of the printing. Some of the experts gave it as their opinion that water colors were used on this draft, but they only disclosed their ignorance, for the use of water colors would be fatal if the bankers took the trouble to hold the paper up to the light, but I must say that Expert Gumpel seemed to be fair. Water colors would show dark, would not be translucent, and this would arouse suspicion, and even a slight suspicion is all that is necessary to make the best forgery in the world a failure. In whatever lettering I did on this draft I used aniline colors. The next step was to make perforations that would pass muster at the bank. It would be out of the question for a man to travel around the country with a stamping or perforating machine, for if arrested on any kind of a charge having such a machine in his room or trunk would be almost enough to convict him of having a counterfeiter's tools in his possession. In this case I had the original figures for a pattern, and with them as a guide I made a model for my other characters. Taking a darning-needle, I broke it off so as to give it a square surface. Taking a piece of stiff, tough paper, I placed it on a block of boxwood, such as is used for wood engraving, cut across the grain. The slightest tap with a small hammer sent this improvised punch through the paper, making a perforation as clear-cut as if made by a regular perforating machine. That peculiar star I reproduced exactly as it appeared on the original draft, and that was one of the safeguards on which a person who was familiar with the paper of the Woodland Bank would rely, so it made the payment of the draft all the safer. The more safeguards that a draft contains the easier is its negotiation.

When it came to putting the figures into the other corner of the check by means of perforations, the job of patching was somewhat more extensive, because I had to set the dollar mark back in order to keep it from overrunning the paper. Here again the heavy shading of the paper helped me at the beginning of the patch, but so far as that was concerned I didn't particularly care for such accidental assistance. But again that peculiar star of the Woodland bank's perforating machine came into play and made the paper look all right without putting me to any great amount of trouble.

Changing the body of the draft, that is, the writing of it, was entirely a different operation, of course, and required a different kind of skill, but as I have tried to master the art of the papermakers, as well as being an engraver and designer, the process was not tiresome. Having plenty of specimens of the so-called "safety paper," and it [illegible] excellent so far as it goes, the effect of acids on this particular make of paper was easily ascertained. I first attacked the figure "1" and changed it into a "2" by the simple addition of the necessary lines. If you will inspect the draft after your attention is called to the first figure "2" you will detect the straight line of the original figure "1" and will see that it is not exactly like the banker's own figure "2" that follows. Using the acid that my experiments told me would not discolor the paper, I took out the small "no" that stood for ...



... I left on the night train for New York. Creegan and I met several times in Philadelphia and New York. Once in Philadelphia he got me to change $2,000 for him at the sub-treasury. I was required to tell who I was, and gave my real name and signature, just as I have signed it here. Creegan told Chief Lees of that, and if I had been tried again all that would have been proved, together with the fact that the cashier spoke to me about my new gold from the San Francisco Mint. One day Creegan and I met in Newark, N. J., to consult about a lawsuit in which we were interested, and both of us were arrested. If we had been across the river in New York they never could have extradited me, for the affidavit on which I was arrested said I had been in San Francisco, which was false, and nobody could have sworn in court he ever saw me in this city. But they had us in New Jersey, and that made all the difference. We were hustled into a car and were brought on to San Francisco as fast as steam could fetch us. Although I was never in San Francisco, my work was laid down in this city and it was held that I was a party to the transaction. The others all turned against me and told the prosecution so many things that I considered it was best to plead guilty and take the lightest punishment I could get. Their testimony would never have been believed by a jury, but the circumstances were enough to convict me. It's bitter medicine and has cured me of that kind of work for the rest of my life. It doesn't pay.

Charles Becker

TO ARGUMENT NOW, THEN TO THE JURY.

Mrs. Botkin Soon To Know Her Fate.

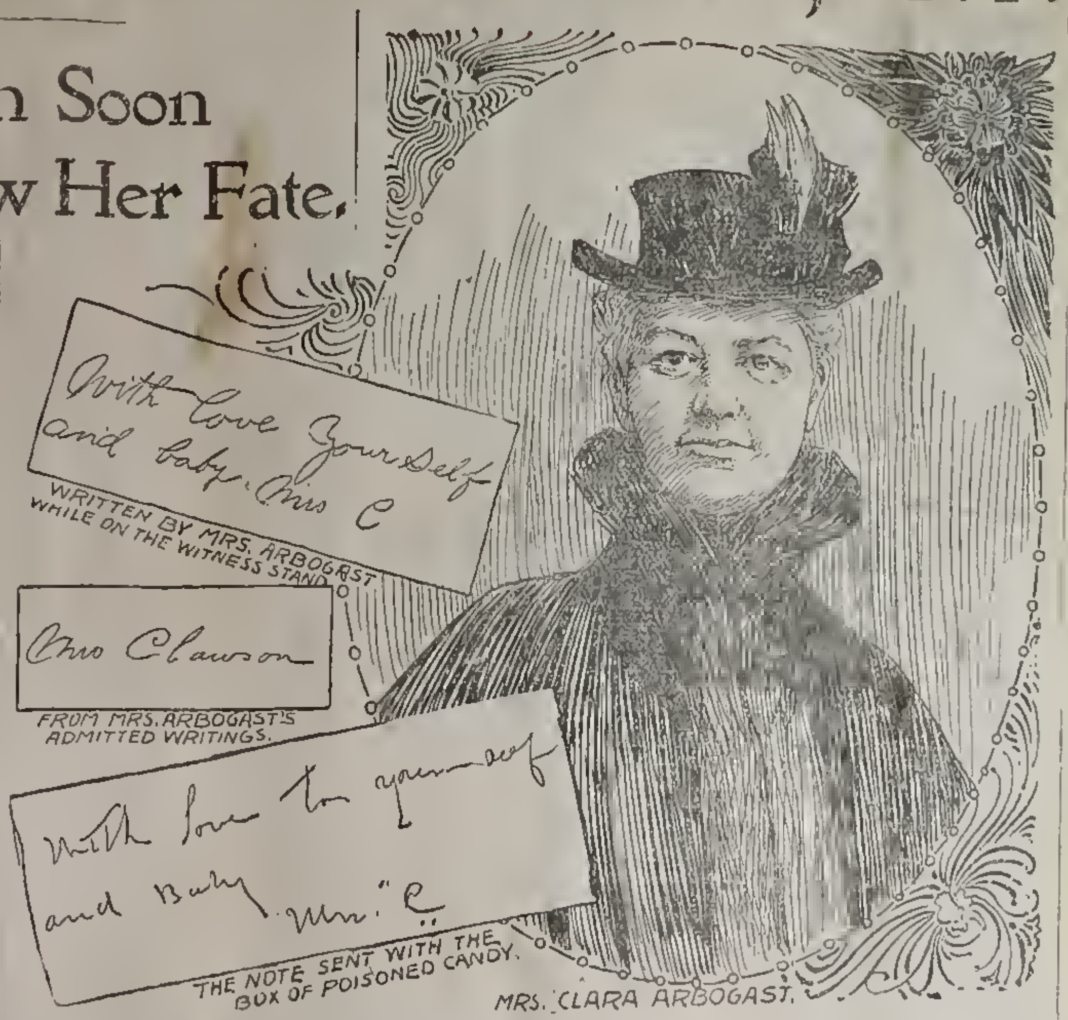
TESTIMONY SUBMITTED.

Mrs. Arbogast Appears as a Witness for the People.

TESTIMONY TO PROVE DR. TERRILL WRONG.

A TWO-DAYS' LIMIT TO TALK IS AGREED UPON BY ATTORNEYS.

Next Friday or Saturday May See a Verdict Returned in This Celebrated Poisoning Case.



All the evidence for and against Mrs. Botkin is in. Whether the spider threads the prosecution has woven about her be strong or weak the web can never be added to now. The case is closed, and though some of the advertised attractions did not appear, there have been sensations enough for the ordinary mortal. Two days will be allowed for the knitting into argument. Then the patient and long suffering jury will do its turn.

The woman for whom the defense has been arduously searching came calmly on the stand yesterday at the beck of the prosecution, and Mrs. Botkin and Mrs. Arbogast were, for the first time, face to face. The rivals glared at each other, Mrs. Arbogast calm and triumphant, Mrs. Botkin baffled and handicapped. As might be expected, Botkin, in his last choice, is diametrically opposed to his first. The wife of his youth is short and plump and dark; the love of his age is tall and thin and a blonde. Mrs. Arbogast is not only old enough to be a grandmother, but is a grandmother, and she does not look her age any more than Mrs. Botkin does. Whatever the Botkin case may have been as a moral advertisement of San Francisco, the women of the case certainly do not look their age by twenty years.

When the Junoesque Mrs. Arbogast, who has been used by the defense as the missing witness and made to figure as a sort of scapegoat on which to cast the sins of everybody, came gliding toward the stand there was a decided stir and bustle in the court. The wily Hosmer did not call her name in clarion tones. On the contrary, he whispered it mildly to a bailiff, and the tall woman in brown, with the very flaxen hair, was well on in her path before it was even suspected who she was.

It has been a clever coup of the prosecution—the idea of calling to the stand all the women even remotely suggested by the defense as the possible guilty persons—and submitting to them the disputed writings in the case. Mrs. Arbogast's coming was even more important than Mrs. Seeley's, for Mrs. Arbogast is the woman upon whom the defense has all along caused to rest the penumbra of remote suspicion—the woman with a motive for getting Mrs. Botkin into trouble. For Mrs. Arbogast Welcome Botkin withdrew his financial and moral support from the case. But Mrs. Arbogast, calmly smiling and not at all perturbed, with all the resources and experience of the woman who keeps a lodging-house in San Francisco, absolutely denied the motive. She wouldn't admit that Botkin ever came to see her, though she was willing to say that he sometimes stayed at her house, the Balboa, when he came to town on business. Sometimes, she said, he stayed at the Grand, on which occasions she never visited him. She denied ever having discussed his domestic relations with him, though she had heard that he was married. They occasionally wrote to each other, but their letters were merely those of friends and passed at long intervals.

"Was your friendship platonic or plutonic?" asked Knight, and the bewildered witness, upon whom the joke was entirely lost, answered, in a fog, "They were not love letters."

Like all the other women in the case, Mrs. Arbogast has had a somewhat turbulent matrimonial experience and Mr. Knight did not ask her to define love letters. The knowledge was presumed. And so the sixth wheel in this triangular case of infidelity labored through her testimony and made rather a good witness. She did not break on cross-examination, not even when Knight pounced upon her, asked her to [illegible]

the case. Though the prosecution did not, as had been promised, bring forward the man who is said to have introduced Mrs. Botkin and Frank Grey, or the woman who saw Mrs. Botkin in the car, there was a good deal in the case about arsenic. Professor Wolf was called to the stand at the suggestion of Judge Cook, who reminded the defense that it had given the professor something to analyze and had never called him back to obtain his results. The defense would gladly have got out of it, but it did not like to show the white feather, and so welcomed Wolf with a great display of cordiality. Wolf gave his testimony somewhat grudgingly. The jury took another university extension lecture on arsenic, and at the end probably knew less about it than in the beginning. Wolf explained for the one hundred and fifteenth time the difference between lump and powdered arsenic, and at the end of his testimony showed that while two kinds of arsenic were found in the candy, it had been proved that Mrs. Botkin bought but one and that the sort of which the candy shows least.

Hosmer declaimed hotly to the effect that the lump arsenic from the Star drug store was in evidence, but the Judge looked the matter up and held against him. The arsenic bought at the Owl drug store was powdered.

And through it all—even the sudden appearance of her successful rival—Mrs. Botkin sat affecting interest in other things, a little white rose on her breast and a new lace handkerchief, for which she has a fad and without which she has never appeared, held stiffly in her hand. The courtroom was stampeded. There was a line without the door that serpentined away through the halls, and would have been two blocks long had it ever straightened itself out.

The main effort of the prosecution in rebuttal was toward breaking down the Humboldt alibi for the first anonymous letter, this testimony having caused the prosecution as many sleepless nights as the Grace Harris testimony has the defense. The efforts to show that the letter might have come down on the Farallon were not brilliantly successful, as the testimony of the purser leaves eight hours unaccounted for, between the time when a letter on the Farallon would have been deposited and the time when the letter is postmarked. The effort to break down Dr. Tyrrell was more successful, he being contradicted in part by a servant girl at the Victoria, though the doctor remained positive to the end.

Mrs. Grace Harris, the saleswoman who claims to have sold the handkerchief, made one of her periodical reappearances on the stand. This time she was recalled at the instance of Juror Buckingham, who wished to know something about the interminable address and transfer tags. Mrs. Harris explained for the hundredth time, and, for a wonder, got away from the stand without any stabs at her morals. She reiterated her testimony to the effect that there should be a record at the City of Paris, both as to the cash sale of handkerchiefs and the address tag.

As the customer had already made purchases in another department, the second delivery tag may have been destroyed. The customer had given her address as the corner of Hyde and California streets, and the witness, knowing the place to which the customer referred, wrote "Victoria Hotel" on the delivery tag.

Mrs. Clara Arbogast, the woman whose name has figured in the case in connection with that of Welcome A. Botkin, husband of the defendant, was called to the stand as a witness in rewriting was then introduced in evidence without objection from the prosecution.

On further cross-examination the witness said she had known Botkin for two years. She was aware of the fact that he was married. The witness was landlady of the Balboa lodging-house for a year and a half, and when Botkin came down from Stockton he occasionally roomed at her place. She denied that Botkin was in the habit of coming down from Stockton every week and remaining at her place from Friday to Monday. She said she first met Botkin in Stockton, where she went "for her health."

"Ah, went to Stockton for your health, did you?" queried Knight, sarcastically.

In speaking of the "friendly" letters received from Botkin the witness said that the letters were of such a nature that she had not hesitated to read them to her family. She had never received presents from Botkin and had never given him any.

When asked as to where she had been residing lately the witness said she had not been out of the State. She had sold the Balboa and had taken a vacation at Mount Diablo. She had not been in concealment, but had made trips to San Francisco every week. The witness said that her husband was in Oregon. She stated that she had seen Botkin since his wife's arrest, but not since the opening of the trial. The witness said she knew Mrs. Seeley quite well, having been acquainted with her about a year and a half.

Knight hurriedly went to his office for several samples of Mrs. Arbogast's handwriting, which he has been carrying about him for weeks, on one of which he endeavored to get Expert Ehenschimmel to pass. Mrs. Arbogast identified these as in her handwriting. They were admitted in evidence as exhibits for the defense. The prosecution also introduced a sample of the witness' handwriting and she was then excused from the stand.

Dr. George M. Terrill followed. He was asked if he had not had difficulty in locating Mrs. Botkin's room on the day he was called to attend her. He replied that there was no response when he rang the bell. He met a lady on the stairs who told him to make inquiries in the dining-room. He asked as to the location of the room in which he had been summoned by telephone message. The witness admitted having told the girl he did not know the name of the person who sent for him, and that he asked if there was a sick woman in the hotel. He did not remember having told the police officer who subpenaed him as a witness for the defense that he could not recall the date of his visit to Mrs. Botkin. On cross-examination he said he had no doubt as to the date being July 31st.

Miss Maggie Smith, servant girl at the Victoria Hotel, was the next witness. She identified Dr. Terrill, saying he had asked her if there was a lady sick in the hotel. She replied, "Yes, Mrs. Botkin," and at his request she directed him to Mrs. Botkin's room. The witness did not remember the date, but was sure that the call was not made on Sunday, as she was in charge of the house at the time of his call, and she was never given that responsibility on Sunday. Another circumstance made her doubly sure. She was preparing vegetables for soup when Dr. Terrill called and that was not a part of her Sunday work.

On cross-examination the witness said she knew Mrs. Botkin was sick, as she had prepared food which was sent to her room. On Sunday she had sent food at 5 o'clock to Mrs. Botkin's room by the Japanese servant. When asked if question, but said he did not remember such a troupe by name, as the vessel often carried theatrical troupes. The witness stated that a letter to be carried by the Farallon from Eureka would have to be left at the office of the agent of the company on the wharf at that place.

Abe Marx, clerk of the Merchants' Exchange, identified the record of the Exchange, which showed that the Farallon arrived at 4:10 A. M. on June 18, 1897. He said the vessel, when reported, was off Meiggs' wharf, and that she probably reached her dock half an hour to forty minutes later.

Peter Gorlingle, postal clerk and night foreman of city distribution of mail, was called to testify as to the condition of packages after traveling across the continent, but such testimony was declared inadmissible.

S. A. Smith, purser of the Pomona during 1897, testified that the Pomona carried mail and that no letters were marked on the way down from Eureka.

Policeman John Reinstoury testified as to the location of Station D, where the package to Mrs. Dunning is supposed to have been mailed, and also to that of the baggage-room of the San Francisco and Northern Pacific Railroad, where Mrs. Botkin checked her trunk on August 4th.

Dr. T. R. Wolf testified briefly as to various kinds of arsenic shown him.

Policeman Peter A. Gillen, who served the subpoena on Dr. Terrill, testified as to a conversation with that witness. He said Dr. Terrill remarked that he could not call to mind the time he visited Mrs. Botkin. As there did not seem to be anything the matter with her, and as he did not expect a fee, he had made no record of the visit.

"We rest," said Hosmer, as Gillen stepped down from the stand.

William J. Corcoran was then called by the defense. He brought with him the passenger list of the Farallon for the down trip ending June 18, 1897, and with it refreshed his memory. He remembered the Columbia Opera Company, and said its members came aboard at Eureka at 11 o'clock on the night of June 16th. The vessel left Eureka about 2 o'clock on the morning of the 17th. He did not know whether the Farallon got into Eureka from Yaquina bay on the afternoon or night of the 16th.

Mrs. W. H. Roberts, sister of Mrs. Botkin, was the last witness. She said that she resided at Eleventh and M streets in Eureka during June, 1897. The office of the agent of the Farallon was at First and E streets. She remembered the Columbia Opera Company as she talked with her sister, Mrs. Botkin, about attending its last performance in Eureka, but did not go as her husband left the house before they thought of securing seats. The witness said that on that date, the 16th of June, her sister was not out of the house.

Mrs. Roberts was not cross-examined. At the conclusion of her testimony Knight said "That is our case."

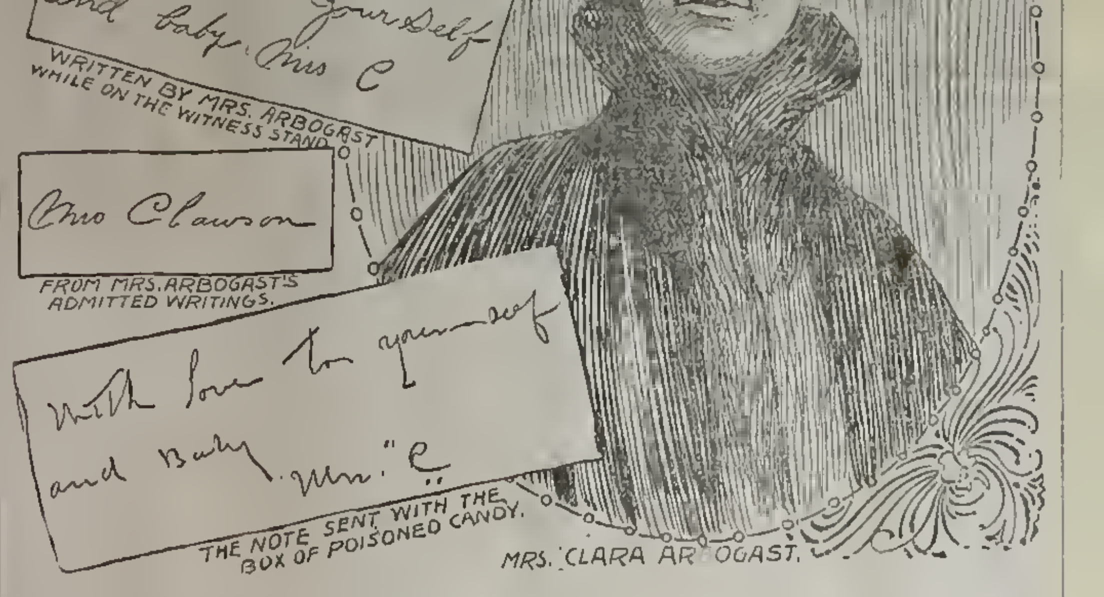
This morning Attorney-General White of Delaware will open the argument for the people, it being the understanding that his statement of the case shall be fair and full, so as to give the defense a chance to argue the case freely. He will be followed by Knight in the afternoon for the defense. Mr. McGowan will go on with the argument for the defense on Thursday morning, and Hosmer will close. The case should go to the jury by Friday morning, and wise ones think that Mrs. Botkin's fate will be decided before Saturday night. Though there is no hard and fast rule, it is understood that the attorneys will endeavor to limit themselves to a half day and so

Mrs. Arbogast Appears as a Witness for the People.

TESTIMONY TO PROVE DR. TERRILL WRONG.

A TWO-DAYS' LIMIT TO TALK IS AGREED UPON BY ATTORNEYS.

Next Friday or Saturday May See a Verdict Returned in This Celebrated Poisoning Case.



All the evidence for and against Mrs. Botkin is in. Whether the spider threads the prosecution has woven about her be strong or weak the web can never be added to now. The case is closed, and though some of the advertised attractions did not appear, there have been sensations enough for the ordinary mortal. Two days will be allowed for the knitting into argument. Then the patient and long suffering jury will do its turn.

The woman for whom the defense has been arduously searching came calmly on the stand yesterday at the beck of the prosecution, and Mrs. Botkin and Mrs. Arbogast were, for the first time, face to face. The rivals glared at each other, Mrs. Arbogast calm and triumphant, Mrs. Botkin baffled and handicapped. As might be expected, Botkin, in his last choice, is diametrically opposed to his first. The wife of his youth is short and plump and dark; the love of his age is tall and thin and a blonde. Mrs. Arbogast is not only old enough to be a grandmother, but is a grandmother, and she does not look her age any more than Mrs. Botkin does. Whatever the Botkin case may have been as a moral advertisement of San Francisco, the women of the case certainly do not look their age by twenty years.

When the Junoesque Mrs. Arbogast, who has been used by the defense as the missing witness and made to figure as a sort of scapegoat on which to cast the sins of everybody, came gliding toward the stand there was a decided stir and bustle in the court. The wily Hosmer did not call her name in clarion tones. On the contrary, he whispered it mildly to a bailiff, and the tall woman in brown, with the very flaxen hair, was well on in her oath before it was even suspected who she was.

It has been a clever coup of the prosecution—the idea of calling to the stand all the women even remotely suggested by the defense as the possible guilty persons—and submitting to them the disputed writings in the case. Mrs. Arbogast's coming was even more important than Mrs. Seeley's, for Mrs. Arbogast is the woman upon whom the defense has all along caused to rest the penumbra of remote suspicion—the woman with a motive for getting Mrs. Botkin into trouble. For Mrs. Arbogast Welcome Botkin withdrew his financial and moral support from the case. But Mrs. Arbogast, calmly smiling and not at all perturbed, with all the resources and experience of the woman who keeps a lodging-house in San Francisco, absolutely denied the motive. She wouldn't admit that Botkin ever came to see her, though she was willing to say that he sometimes stayed at her house, the Balboa, when he came to town on business. Sometimes, she said, he stayed at the Grand, on which occasions she never visited him. She denied ever having discussed his domestic relations with him, though she had heard that he was married. They occasionally wrote to each other, but their letters were merely those of friends and passed at long intervals.

"Was your friendship platonic or platonic?" asked Knight, and the bewildered witness, upon whom the joke was entirely lost, answered, in a fog, "They were not love letters."

Like all the other women in the case, Mrs. Arbogast has had a somewhat turbulent matrimonial experience and Mr. Knight did not ask her to define love letters. The knowledge was presumed. And so the sixth wheel in this triangular case of infidelity labored through her testimony and made rather a good witness. She did not break on cross-examination, not even when Knight pounced upon her, asked her to identify some of her own writing and to write at his dictation.

Besides the meteoric transit of Mrs. Arbogast, the day was enlivened with several passages at tongues between George Knight and District Attorney Hosmer. The long days of the trial, possibly the Christmas cheer, have frayed these gentlemen's tempers. Yesterday they growled a good deal. Knight had made some grand-stand play which particularly exasperated Hosmer, and that gentleman remarked, "Oh, you play to the gallery," to which Knight replied contemptuously, "Well, you couldn't play to anything."

It was amusing when Knight had a witness from Humboldt county to hear the Toms and Bills and Bobs ripple out. This was not the prosperous city attorney, but the country lawyer recalling the scenes of his earlier and humbler years. This was the favorite son who wouldn't mind being named for Senator and if some of the familiar names were misplaced nobody in the courtroom knew the difference, and the geniality warmed the witnesses through and through.

All the loose ends of the case were gathered up and the dropped stitches were sought to be woven into an orderly chain by both sides. Whether the fabric will ravel or not can only be told after the jury has been alone with it for a while. The poison bobbed up again in the case. Though the prosecution did not, as had been promised, bring forward the man who is said to have introduced Mrs. Botkin and Frank Grey, or the woman who saw Mrs. Botkin in the car, there was a good deal in the case about arsenic. Professor Wolf was called to the stand at the suggestion of Judge Cook, who reminded the defense that it had given the professor something to analyze and had never called him back to obtain his results. The defense would gladly have got out of it, but it did not like to show the white feather, and so welcomed Wolf with a great display of cordiality. Wolf gave his testimony somewhat grudgingly. The jury took another university extension lecture on arsenic, and at the end probably knew less about it than in the beginning. Wolf explained for the one hundred and fifteenth time the difference between lump and powdered arsenic, and at the end of his testimony showed that while two kinds of arsenic were found in the candy, it had been proved that Mrs. Botkin bought but one and that the sort of which the candy shows least.

Hosmer declaimed hotly to the effect that the lump arsenic from the Star drug store was in evidence, but the Judge looked the matter up and held against him. The arsenic bought at the Owl drug store was powdered.

And through it all—even the sudden appearance of her successful rival—Mrs. Botkin sat affecting interest in other things, a little white rose on her breast and a new lace handkerchief, for which she has a fad and without which she has never appeared, held stiffly in her hand. The courtroom was stampeded. There was a line without the door that serpentined away through the halls, and would have been two blocks long had it ever straightened itself out.

The main effort of the prosecution in rebuttal was toward breaking down the Humboldt alibi for the first anonymous letter, this testimony having caused the prosecution as many sleepless nights as the Grace Harris testimony has the defense. The efforts to show that the letter might have come down on the Farallon were not brilliantly successful, as the testimony of the purser leaves eight hours unaccounted for, between the time when a letter on the Farallon would have been deposited and the time when the letter is postmarked. The effort to break down Dr. Tyrrell was more successful, he being contradicted in part by a servant girl at the Victoria, though the doctor remained positive to the end.

Mrs. Grace Harris, the saleswoman who claims to have sold the handkerchief, made one of her periodical reappearances on the stand. This time she was recalled at the instance of Juror Buckingham, who wished to know something about the interminable address and transfer tags. Mrs. Harris explained for the hundredth time, and, for a wonder, got away from the stand without any stabs at her morals. She reiterated her testimony to the effect that there should be a record at the City of Paris, both as to the cash sale of handkerchiefs and the address tag.

As the customer had already made purchases in another department, the second delivery tag may have been destroyed. The customer had given her address as the corner of Hyde and California streets, and the witness, knowing the place to which the customer referred, wrote "Victoria Hotel" on the delivery tag.

Mrs. Clara Arbogast, the woman whose name has figured in the case in connection with that of Welcome A. Botkin, husband of the defendant, was called to the stand as a witness in rebuttal for the prosecution. She began her testimony by saying that she did not know Mr. Botkin. As to Mrs. John P. Dunning, she was not aware of her existence until the newspapers brought the attention of the public to the Dover poisoning case. After the witness had said she was acquainted with W. A. Botkin she was asked.

"Did you ever urge Mr. Botkin to get a divorce from his wife?"

"I never did," answered the witness.

The anonymous letters, the note inclosed in the candy box and the wrapper which inclosed the package sent to Mrs. Dunning were shown to Mrs. Arbogast, and as each was passed to her she denied all knowledge of the handwriting, saying none of it had been penned by her.

Knight began his cross-examination in a dramatic way. Taking a pencil and a piece of paper to the witness, he asked her to write at his dictation. The witness took up the pencil and Knight said:

"Now write 'With love to yourself and baby, Mrs. C.'" As these were the words of the greeting sent to Mrs. Dunning with the death-laden package, the crowd grew intensely interested.

Mrs. Arbogast wrote as requested, showing no apparent excitement. When she had concluded, Knight asked:

"Is this your natural handwriting?"

"Yes, but a little nervous," was the reply.

The sample of Mrs. Arbogast's handwriting was then introduced in evidence without objection from the prosecution.

On further cross-examination the witness said she had known Botkin for two years. She was aware of the fact that he was married. The witness was landlady of the Balboa lodging-house for a year and a half, and when Botkin came down from Stockton he occasionally roomed at her place. She denied that Botkin was in the habit of coming down from Stockton every week and remaining at her place from Friday to Monday. She said she first met Botkin in Stockton, where she went "for her health."

"Ah, went to Stockton for your health, did you?" queried Knight, sarcastically.

In speaking of the "friendly" letters received from Botkin the witness said that the letters were of such a nature that she had not hesitated to read them to her family. She had never received presents from Botkin and had never given him any.

When asked as to where she had been residing lately the witness said she had not been out of the State. She had sold the Balboa and had taken a vacation at Mount Diablo. She had not been in concealment, but had made trips to San Francisco every week. The witness said that her husband was in Oregon. She stated that she had seen Botkin since his wife's arrest, but not since the opening of the trial. The witness said she knew Mrs. Seeley quite well, having been acquainted with her about a year and a half.

Knight hurriedly went to his office for several samples of Mrs. Arbogast's handwriting, which he has been carrying about him for weeks, one of which he endeavored to get Expert Eisenschimmel to pass. Mrs. Arbogast identified these as in her handwriting. They were admitted in evidence as exhibits for the defense. The prosecution also introduced a sample of the witness' handwriting and she was then excused from the stand.

Dr. George M. Terrill followed. He was asked if he had not had difficulty in locating Mrs. Botkin's room on the day he was called to attend her. He replied that there was no response when he rang the bell. He met a lady on the stairs who told him to make inquiries in the dining-room. He asked as to the location of the room to which he had been summoned by telephone message. The witness admitted having told the girl he did not know the name of the person who sent for him, and that he asked if there was a sick woman in the hotel. He did not remember having told the police officer who subpenaed him as a witness for the defense that he could not recall the date of his visit to Mrs. Botkin. On cross-examination he said he had no doubt as to the date being July 31st.

Miss Maggie Smith, servant girl at the Victoria Hotel, was the next witness. She identified Dr. Terrill, saying he had asked her if there was a lady sick in the hotel. She replied, "Yes, Mrs. Botkin," and at his request she directed him to Mrs. Botkin's room. The witness did not remember the date, but was sure that the call was not made on Sunday, as she was in charge of the house at the time of his call, and she was never given that responsibility on Sunday. Another circumstance made her doubly sure. She was preparing vegetables for soup when Dr. Terrill called and that was not a part of her Sunday work.

On cross-examination the witness said she knew Mrs. Botkin was sick, as she had prepared food which was sent to her room. On Sunday she had sent food at 6 o'clock to Mrs. Botkin's room by the Japanese servant. When asked if Mrs. Botkin was sick in bed on that Sunday, the witness replied that she knew Mrs. Botkin went out on that day.

"How do you know she went out?" asked Knight.

"Because I saw her come in," was the unexpected answer. The witness said she had seen Mrs. Botkin at the time she met Mrs. Price, the landlady, on the stairway. At this Knight, apparently satisfied that he was on dangerous ground, suddenly changed the line of inquiry.

The servant girl again declared that she was positive Dr. Terrill did not call on Sunday. She said he came soon after the Sunday to which she had referred. According to her recollection, his visit was made either on Monday or Tuesday. The witness said that the police had made no inquiries of her until after Dr. Terrill had given his testimony in behalf of the defense.

William J. Corcoran, purser of the steamer Farallon during the months of June and July, 1897, testified as to the Farallon plying between Yaquina bay and San Francisco, touching at Eureka on all trips. Agents would take mail at the different ports. It was placed in charge of the purser. All mail received on the return trip was taken to Station D, in this city, where it was postmarked for the first time.

The witness was asked if the Columbia Opera Company was not brought down by the Farallon on the trip in question, but said he did not remember such a troupe by name, as the vessel often carried theatrical troupes. The witness stated that a letter to be carried by the Farallon from Eureka would have to be left at the office of the agent of the company on the wharf at that place.

Abe Marx, clerk at the Merchants' Exchange, identified the record of the Exchange, which showed that the Farallon arrived at 4:10 A. M. on June 18, 1897. He said the vessel, when reported, was off Meiggs' wharf, and that she probably reached her dock half an hour to forty minutes later.

Peter Gorlingle, postal clerk and night foreman of city distribution of mail, was called to testify as to the condition of packages after traveling across the continent, but such testimony was declared inadmissible.

S. A. Smith, purser of the Pomona during 1897, testified that the Pomona carried mail and that no letters were marked on the way down from Eureka.

Policeman John Reinsbury testified as to the location of Station D, where the package to Mrs. Dunning is supposed to have been mailed, and also to that of the baggage-room of the San Francisco and Northern Pacific Railroad, where Mrs. Botkin checked her trunk on August 4th.

Dr. T. K. Wolf testified briefly as to various kinds of arsenic shown him.

Policeman Peter A. Gillen, who served the subpoena on Dr. Terrill, testified as to a conversation with that witness. He said Dr. Terrill remarked that he could not call to mind the time he visited Mrs. Botkin. As there did not seem to be anything the matter with her, and as he did not expect a fee, he had made no record of the visit.

"We rest," said Hosmer, as Gillen stepped down from the stand.

William J. Corcoran was then called by the defense. He brought with him the passenger list of the Farallon for the down trip ending June 18, 1897, and with it refreshed his memory. He remembered the Columbia Opera Company, and said its members came aboard at Eureka at 11 o'clock on the night of June 16th. The vessel left Eureka about 2 o'clock on the morning of the 17th. He did not know whether the Farallon got into Eureka from Yaquina bay on the afternoon or night of the 16th.

Mrs. W. H. Roberts, sister of Mrs. Botkin, was the last witness. She said that she resided at Eleventh and M streets in Eureka during June, 1897. The office of the agent of the Farallon was at First and E streets. She remembered the Columbia Opera Company as she talked with her sister, Mrs. Botkin, about attending its last performance in Eureka, but did not go as her husband left the house before they thought of securing seats. The witness said that on that date, the 16th of June, her sister was not out of the house.

Mrs. Roberts was not cross-examined. At the conclusion of her testimony Knight said "That is our case."

This morning Attorney-General White of Delaware will open the argument for the people, it being the understanding that his statement of the case shall be fair and full, so as to give the defense a chance to argue the case freely. He will be followed by Knight in the afternoon for the defense. Mr. McGowan will go on with the argument for the defense on Thursday morning, and Hosmer will close. The case should go to the jury by Friday morning, and wise ones think that Mrs. Botkin's fate will be decided before Saturday night. Though there is no hard and fast rule, it is understood that the attorneys will endeavor to limit themselves to a half day apiece.

THE BOTKIN CASE GOES TO THE JURY TO-DAY.

ARGUMENTS NEAR AN END.

Impassioned Pleas for and Against the Accused.

THE DELAWARE LAWYER ASKS FOR A CONVICTION.

KNIGHT TAKES HIS FLING AT WITNESSES FOR THE PROSECUTION.

Assistant District Attorney Hosmer Will Conclude the Closing Speech This Morning.

One more day and the Botkin case will be matter of history. It reached the valedictory stage yesterday. The lawyers wore their best clothes; their relatives and friends, with bright, expectant faces, sat in the front seats to hear them orate; the courtroom was filled with a buzzing, holiday crowd. It reminded one, for all the world, of closing day at a school, two boys on a side and the burden of proof on the affirmative, with a judicial school-teacher behind the desk to keep the peace and to see that no one stepped over the line.

To Mrs. Botkin, however, it was no playday affair. The lawyers might be enjoying the chance of a lifetime, but Mrs. Botkin was the prize for which they fought—her life the thing they snatched at. Every metaphor against her, however mixed, stabbed her. Every summary of testimony, however lame, went through her armor; and when she fell into the hands of her friends she was scarcely better off.

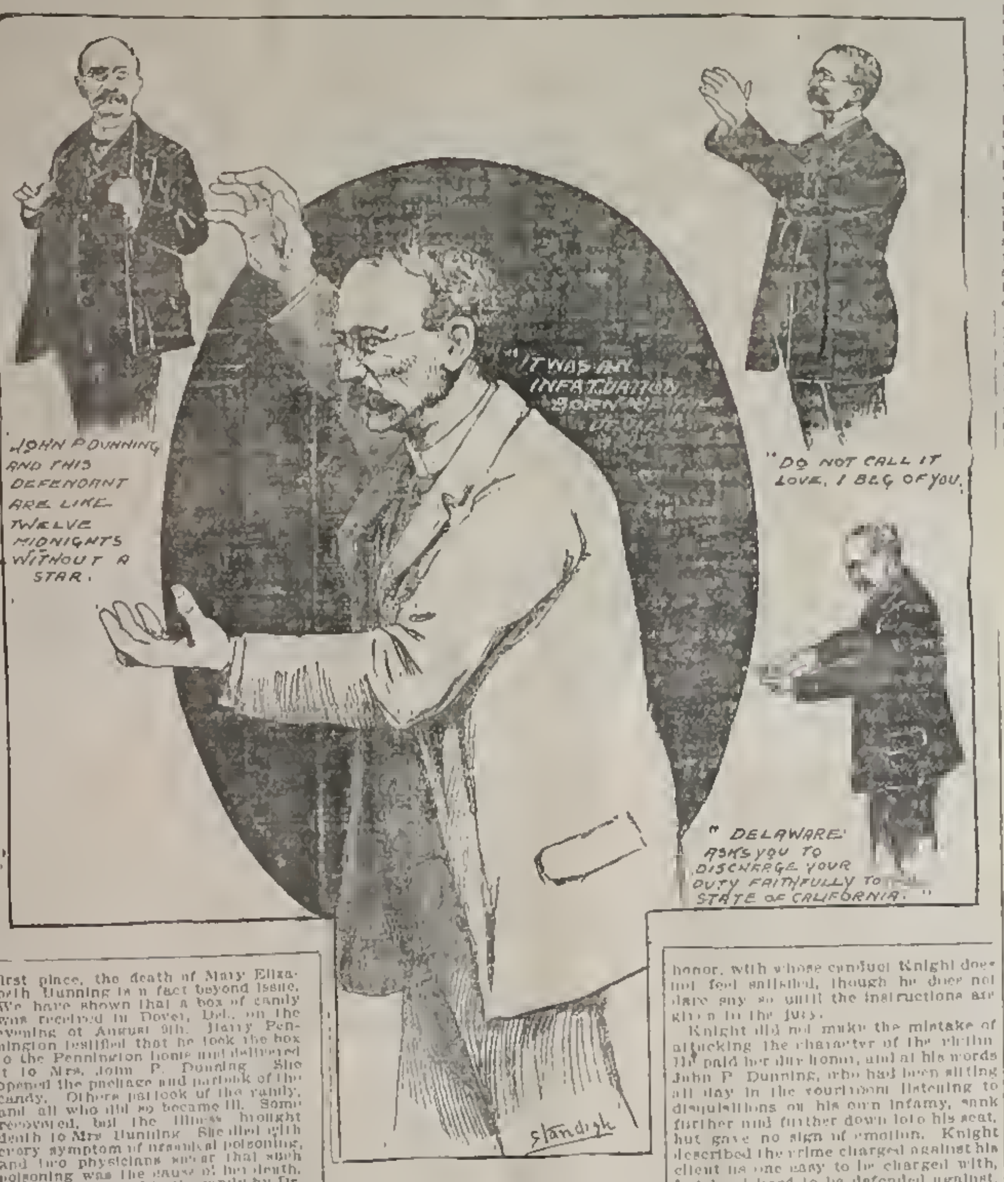
Where Attorney-General White of Delaware called her a "poor, degraded woman" and asked for an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth, and the life of a California woman to wipe away the death of a woman in Delaware, Mr. Knight compared his client to women of Biblical history, who were not so good as they might have been; besought the jury to forget her sins and not to adjudge her a murderess because she had been untrue to her marriage vows. This, too, caused Mrs. Botkin to shrink and shudder. When White had finished with her she burst into convulsive weeping, and it was some time before her sisters could comfort her or bind a thicker veil over her red and swollen face. When the deputy sheriff, who is her constant escort, came to take her away at the noon recess he had all he could do to get her down the stairs, so weak and fainting was her condition. The staff of her pride had failed her and Mrs. Botkin had "broken down" at last.

By the time the jury brings in its verdict, it is the general opinion, she will be on the verge of collapse. Her nerves are gone.

The crowd yesterday afternoon was the greatest in the history of the case. Fully 500 people, standing in line for two blocks, failed to obtain entrance. The courtroom was jammed and through the swinging doors came fragments of hoarse cries that sounded like the Roman populace in "Julius Caesar." Through the din, Knight talked uninterruptedly for three hours. His speech was interesting, calm, forceful, eloquent, temperate, kept carefully within bounds and only straying once or twice into dangerous paths. Sometimes the attorney for the defense was genuinely pathetic, always he was sincere. If he passed one or two climaxes that might have been genuinely dramatic, only to end with an anti-climax at the last, he but did what many a greater orator has done before him.

On all sides it was conceded that Knight had done very well and the crowd was repaid for coming. Prominent attorneys did the orator the compliment of sitting in the stifling courtroom all the afternoon to hear him. D. M. Delmas was there, as was Garret McEnerney and W. H. Alford. Judge Lawlor dropped in to sit in back with Cook. All the Knight family had come to hear the head of the house talk. At the close there was a little buzz of congratulation and Mrs. Botkin tearfully thanked her attorney.

In the morning it was Attorney-General White of Delaware who held the boards. The gentleman is thin and tall and spare, his memory for names is not good, and he was very nervous. A greater antithesis to Knight could not be imagined. One was easy, self-confident, a swashbuckler—the other timid, embarrassed, doubtful. It is not a pleasant task to have the opening statement of the prosecution's case, and White was acutely conscious that he was not at home, but before a strange jury in a strange place. Dover seemed very far from San Francisco at that moment. White looked as though he had been burning the midnight oil. He is a type where Knight is ... gale. The Delaware style of oratory is the pulpit variety, and the Attorney-General talked as though he had matriculated in theology at some period of his career.



ATTORNEY-GENERAL WHITE IN ACTION.

first place, the death of Mary Elizabeth Dunning is a fact beyond issue. We have shown that a box of candy was received in Dover, Del., on the evening of August 9th. Harry Pennington testified that he took the box to the Pennington home and delivered it to Mrs. John P. Dunning. She opened the package and partook of the candy. Others partook of the candy, and all who did so became ill. Some recovered, but the illness brought death to Mrs. Dunning. She died with every symptom of arsenical poisoning, and two physicians swear that such poisoning was the cause of her death. Arsenic was found in the candy by Dr. Wolf and by Thomas Price.

We have shown from the wrapper that the box came from San Francisco. You can make nothing else out of the postmark. We have sought by two chains to prove the identity of the sender of the candy, the first a chain of handwriting and the second a chain of actions.

White then talked of the anonymous letters, the wrapper of the package and the note to Mrs. Dunning. He drew comparisons between the note of the poisoner and a postscript admitted to be the writing of Mrs. Botkin, and said the peculiarities in the writing of the word "love" were alone sufficient to prove that Mrs. Botkin wrote the note. It was argued that the purpose of the anonymous letters was to induce Mrs. Dunning to get a divorce. They breathed a tone of friendship, and, as they might figure in court, they were disguised. The wrapper was also addressed in a disguised hand, but the writer, thinking that the note would never become an accuser, had written it in a more natural hand. Therefore, if Mrs. Dunning recognized the writing of the anonymous letters in the note she would think of the friendly tone of those letters and fear no evil. Attorney-General White then went on to say:

> Three expert witnesses swear that all the writings are the work of the same person. In addition we have similar testimony from Mrs. Ruoff and John P. Dunning. If any one should be familiar with the handwriting of the defendant it is John P. Dunning, and he is positive that she wrote the anonymous letters and the note and addressed the wrapper. With this testimony there can be no doubt that the defendant sent the box of candy. Then there is a lateral chain to corroborate what is already proven. Miss Henderson of Haas' candy store swears that on July 31st she sold a box of chocolate candy to a woman whom she believes was the defendant. She explains why she remembers the date and the transaction. Miss Dittmer corroborates her testimony and is only less strong in that she does not distinctly remember the customer.

The handkerchief was declared to be another link from the fatal package. Strong emphasis was laid on Mrs. Harris' testimony that she had sold the handkerchief to a woman whom she identified as Mrs. Botkin. Reference was next made to the portion of one of Haas' candy-box seals found in the room occupied by Mrs. Botkin. The anxious inquiries of the defendant to Mrs. Ruoff and Miss Liversach were deemed evidences of guilt. The speaker then dwelt on the anonymous letters, saying the evidence showed that Mrs. Botkin had told Mrs. Ruoff that there were three anonymous letters. John B. Pennington had testified that only himself and the writer had known of the third anonymous letter, and it was held that Mrs. Botkin, in her conversation with Mrs. Ruoff, had shown guilty knowledge of the contents of that letter.

Arsenic was the next subject discussed. The speaker reviewed the testimony of Frank Gray of the Owl Drug Store, who testified as to a sale of powdered arsenic to Mrs. Botkin on June ... He then referred to Dan ... of the Star Drug Store, who had made a sale of lump arsenic to a woman resembling Mrs. Botkin. As Green could not identify the defendant nearly all his testimony ... When White bond between Dunning and his wife must be broken.

The speaker implored the jury not to call this infatuation love, and then delivered a little lecture upon the tenderest and gentlest of passions. He told how Mrs. Botkin had gently tapped at the tie between Dunning and his wife, and had endeavored to influence Mrs. Dunning to a divorce. Having failed, she was obliged to resort to what White called "heroic" measures. Some people would have called them desperate measures, but White said heroic. He went on to relate how Mrs. Botkin's affinity had gone to the wars. She wrote a letter to Governor Budd, hoping to be sent to Cuba as a Red Cross nurse, to join him even at the cannon's mouth. At this time the devil spoke to Mrs. Botkin, the Attorney-General declared, whispering to her to buy poison, to put it in a box of candy with a loving note and send it to Mrs. Dunning. White said that Mrs. Botkin lacked sympathy for Mrs. Dunning; that when "she was flaunting in San Francisco haunts of sin with her dear husband (Mrs. Dunning's husband)" she never thought of the wife in Delaware. In closing the speaker said:

> Your sympathies have doubtless been excited in this case. Won't you share them with the woman who died and the little girl whose mother was taken from her? Delaware has asked vengeance for the life so ruthlessly taken, and California could not have done more if the person slain was of her own people. We have had the aid of a police force the work of which must challenge the admiration of the world. We have had all assistance possible, and, whatever your verdict, when I tell the people of Delaware what California has done for them they will be satisfied. All we ask now is that you discharge your duty faithfully to the State of California; faithfully to that poor departed woman and faithfully to yourselves.

Knight departed from the time-honored custom of sugaring the jurymen. He peppered them. He told them that he was aware they were all prejudiced against Mrs. Botkin—that they would not be human if they were not—that he was aware that their wives were all against Mrs. Botkin, it being the nature of women to attack one of their own kind when in trouble. In fact, he assured them that they were—most of them—bad men, but he would forgive them if they did the fair thing. He recalled the fact that he had only used ten of his twenty peremptory challenges, to show that he was convinced of the justice of his cause and that he had nothing to fear from any man. He bullied them and flattered them indirectly and adroitly, and the jury shifted its legs like that self-complacent one in "Pudd'nhead Wilson," and smiled inwardly to think how popular it was with both sides of the case. And, having toasted one side of the jury and frozen the other, Knight went on to make the worse appear the better reason.

There is something grotesque in this ... Where White had seen ... before a jury ... "the chain of circumstantial evidence," "the chain dovetailing," as he said, and ... Knight could see but shallow ... connection be-honor, with whose conduct Knight does not feel satisfied, though he does not dare say so until the instructions are given to the jury.

Knight did not make the mistake of attacking the character of the victim. He paid her due honor, and at his words John P. Dunning, who had been sitting all day in the courtroom listening to disquisitions on his own infamy, sank further and further down into his seat, but gave no sign of emotion. Knight described the crime charged against his client as one easy to be charged with, but hard hard to be defended against. He referred to the Maybrick case as a parallel, and adroitly played on the race feeling of some of his hearers by referring to the Dreyfus case as another in point.

Then Knight made a strong play. He became furiously excited, and said:

> The fumes of a Russell trial may stink through this door, the infamy of the acquittal of Figel may be fresh in the public mind, but Mrs. Botkin shall never be a vicarious atonement for the infamy of a police department. She is here asking equal rights of the State of California—a defenseless woman, without a dollar in the world—ready to bow her head to the guillotine of fate if proven guilty.

Then followed the analysis of motive:

> Did Mrs. Botkin want Mrs. Dunning's husband?
>
> From his own testimony she had him.
>
> Was it love for him that prompted this crime?
>
> She had the dissolute brute. He was an incumbrance upon her. She fed and nourished him, and put shoes upon his feet—and he swore to it himself. Did she want him?
>
> She had him.

Knight demanded to be shown any place in the record where a breach between Mrs. Botkin and Dunning was shown. He said that even the sniffi... witness, Mrs. Ruoff, had testified that Mrs. Botkin said in their last interview that she made it impossible for Botkin to secure a divorce for another year, and that she would never divorce him. According to Dunning himself marriage had never been mentioned between them.

The speaker wished to know if the jury thought Mrs. Botkin made up her mind to murder in June, when she bought the poison, and then carried the arsenic around two months before she used it.

"My God, gentlemen," he inquired, with the force of a volcanic explosion, "are you going to conjecture like that?"

Knight then devoted himself to the extradition of Mrs. Botkin, and wanted to know if the Police Department would have sent to Delaware, along with Grace Harris, Mr. Walkington and the wrapping clerk from the City of Paris store. He spoke of Mrs. Harris as a woman of the town and a convicted thief. Then followed a fiery attack on the Police Department. Knight alluded to the suppression of the Farallon ... as one of the most infamous things ever perpetrated in a court of justice.

Then Knight did a clever thing. He called the jury up like so many schoolboys, and the jurors named blushed like youngsters caught eating apples in the schoolroom. On Knight's roll of honor were the men whom he suspects of being prejudiced against Mrs. Botkin and he paid particular attention to Mr. Daniels, the friend of Chief Lees and said to be something of a handwriting expert himself.

From this phase Knight passed to the difficulties of identification and the ... of the candy girls, with their subsequent shadowing of Mrs. Botkin. The girls he said were but the plastic material upon which the Police Department worked, the girls being anxious to write a book entitled "The Poisoner's Conundrum, or, The Candy Girl's Revenge."

For all handwriting experts, and especially for Daniel Ames, between whom and Knight there is a grudge ... as that between

... deemed unfavorable to the prosecution. Knight thought that if John P. Pennington was much of a man he must have made some political enemies and he did not think it impossible that some enemy had done this. Particular stress was laid on the fact that Mrs. Dunning would not have neglected an anonymous letter that stung her as this one did.

That brought Knight back to Dunning again. He sneered at him as a hero who professed that he would rather go to jail than betray a woman who had loved him. "That is," shouted Knight, "talking of gentlemanly conduct and breeding! If he could he dare the woman who put bread in his mouth why not the other nine who also stand unprotected?"

The peroration was eloquent. Knight pointed out that his client was a woman who would have to suffer whether she were convicted or not. He referred to the words of Christ, "Let him who is without sin cast the first stone." No woman, he said, was ever wholly bad. She always looked back and longed for her former estate. Mrs. Botkin's morals should be left out of the question. He referred to the placing of the candy seal in the room as a trick so gross that it would excite ridicule anywhere outside of San Francisco.

"I do not appeal for mercy," said Knight, in closing. "I demand justice. I am defending this woman without a dollar of compensation or any expectation of any. I am doing it because I know my cause is just and I feel it is right. I ask you to render a verdict of not guilty because the case is not proven and we are innocent."

KNIGHT TAKES HIS FLING AT WITNESSES FOR THE PROSECUTION.

Assistant District Attorney Hosmer Will Conclude the Closing Speech This Morning.

One more day and the Botkin case will be matter of history. It reached the valedictory stage yesterday. The lawyers wore their best clothes; their relatives and friends, with bright, expectant faces, sat in the front seats to hear them orate, the courtroom was filled with a buzzing, holiday crowd. It reminded one, for all the world, of closing day at a school, two boys on a side and the burden of proof on the alternative, with a judicial school-teacher behind the desk to keep the peace and to see that no one stepped over the line.

To Mrs. Botkin, however, it was no playday affair. The lawyers might be enjoying the chance of a lifetime, but Mrs. Botkin was the prize for which they fought—her life the thing they snatched at. Every metaphor against her, however mixed, stabbed her. Every summary of testimony, however tame, went through her armor; and when she fell into the hands of her friends she was scarcely better off.

Where Attorney-General White of Delaware called her a "poor, degraded woman" and asked for an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth, and the life of a California woman to wipe away the death of a woman in Delaware, Mr. Knight compared his client to women of Biblical history, who were not as good as they might have been; besought the jury to forget her sins and not to adjudge her a murderess because she had been untrue to her marriage vows. This, too, caused Mrs. Botkin to shrink and shudder. When White had finished with her she burst into convulsive weeping, and it was some time before her sisters could comfort her or bind a thicker veil over her red and swollen face. When the deputy sheriff, who is her constant escort, came to take her away at the noon recess he had all he could do to get her down the stairs, so weak and fainting was her condition. The staff of her pride had failed her and Mrs. Botkin had "broken down" at last.

By the time the jury brings in its verdict, it is the general opinion, she will be on the verge of collapse. Her nerves are gone.

The crowd yesterday afternoon was the greatest in the history of the case. Fully 500 people, standing in line for two blocks, failed to obtain entrance. The courtroom was jammed and through the swinging doors came fragments of hoarse cries that sounded like the Roman populace in "Julius Caesar." Through the din, Knight talked uninterruptedly for three hours. His speech was interesting, calm, forceful, eloquent, temperate, kept carefully within bounds and only straying once or twice into dangerous paths. Sometimes the attorney for the defense was genuinely pathetic, always he was sincere. If he passed one or two climaxes that would have been genuinely dramatic, only to end with an anti-climax at the last, he but did what many a greater orator has done before him.

On all sides it was conceded that Knight had done very well and the crowd was repaid for coming. Prominent attorneys did the orator the compliment of sitting in the stifling courtroom all the afternoon to hear him. D. M. Delmas was there, as was Garret McEnerney and W. H. Alford. Judge Lawlor dropped in to sit in bank with Cook. All the Knight family had come to hear the head of the house talk. At the close there was a little buzz of congratulation and Mrs. Botkin tearfully thanked her attorney.

In the morning it was Attorney-General White of Delaware who held the boards. The gentleman is thin and tall and spare, his memory for names is not good, and he was very nervous. A greater antithesis to Knight could not be imagined. One was easy, self-confident, a swashbuckler—the other timid, embarrassed, doubtful. It is not a pleasant task to have the opening statement of the prosecution's case, and White was acutely conscious that he was not at home, but before a strange jury in a strange place. Dover seemed very far from San Francisco at that moment. White looked as though he had been burning the midnight oil. He is a ... place where Knight is a gale. The ... nature style of oratory is the pulpit variety, and the Attorney-General talked as though he had matriculated in theology at some period of his career. He has a regard for the proprieties, was very gentle in all that he said, careful of his words, and, above all, refined. His talk was expurgated for well-bred ears—not so Knight's.

Knight is fond of vigorous Anglo-Saxon. He likes to call things by their true names, but when he alluded to Maggie Smith, the domestic at the Victoria, as "that fried piece of bacon," there were those that said there was a coarse streak in Knight's nature that would out.

White began his speech with the conventional tribute to the jury. He remarked frequently that he had never seen "such a mass of intelligence in a jury box" not even in Delaware. He has several characteristic gestures which he used with full effect as soon as he had swung into the full current of his speech. Sometimes he thrust his thumbs inside the armholes of his vest and felt for his suspenders. Finding them safely in position, he seemed relieved, and withdrew his hands, only to thrust them deep into his trousers' pockets. Later he folded his hands in the attitude of prayer, which went well with his voice, which alternately swelled and fell in pulpit cadence. He said, in part:

The chain of circumstantial evidence in this case is a long one, reaching from the Golden Gate to the Diamond State. It is not ... to state the circumstances ... conviction of the defendant. In the first place, the death of Mary Elizabeth Dunning is a fact beyond issue. We have shown that a box of candy was received in Dover, Del., on the evening of August 9th. Harry Pennington testified that he took the box to the Pennington home and delivered it to Mrs. John P. Dunning. She opened the package and partook of the candy. Others partook of the candy, and all who did so became ill. Some recovered, but the illness brought death to Mrs. Dunning. She died with every symptom of arsenical poisoning, and two physicians swear that such poisoning was the cause of her death. Arsenic was found in the candy by Dr. Wolf and by Thomas Price.

We have shown from the wrapper that the box came from San Francisco. You can make nothing else out of the postmark. We have sought by two chains to prove the identity of the sender of the candy, the first a chain of handwriting and the second a chain of actions.

White then talked of the anonymous letters, the wrapper of the package and the note to Mrs. Dunning. He drew comparisons between the note of the poisoner and a postscript admitted to be the writing of Mrs. Botkin, and said the peculiarities in the writing of the word "love" were alone sufficient to prove that Mrs. Botkin wrote the note. It was argued that the purpose of the anonymous letters was to induce Mrs. Dunning to get a divorce. They breathed a tone of friendship, and, as they might figure in court, they were disguised. The wrapper was also addressed in a disguised hand, but the writer, thinking that the note would never become an accuser, had written it in a more natural hand. Therefore, if Mrs. Dunning recognized the writing of the anonymous letters in the note she would think of the friendly tone of those letters and fear no evil. Attorney-General White then went on to say:

Three expert witnesses swear that all the writings are the work of the same person. In addition we have similar testimony from Mrs. Rueff and John P. Dunning. If any one should be familiar with the handwriting of the defendant it is John P. Dunning, and he is positive that she wrote the anonymous letters and the note and addressed the wrapper. With this testimony there can be no doubt that the defendant sent this box of candy. Then there is a literal chain to re-enforce what is already proven. Miss Heney of Haas' candy store swears that on July 31st she sold a box of chocolate candy to a woman whom she believes was the defendant. She explains why she remembers the date and the transaction. Miss Dittmer corroborates her testimony and is only less strong in that she does not distinctly remember the customer.

The handkerchief was declared to be another telltale from the fatal package. Strong emphasis was laid on Mrs. Harris' testimony that she had sold the handkerchief to a woman whom she identified as Mrs. Botkin. Reference was next made to the portion of one of Haas' candy-box seals found in the room occupied by Mrs. Botkin. The anxious inquiries of the defendant to Mrs. Rueff and Miss Livernash were deemed evidences of guilt. The speaker then dwelt on the anonymous letters, saying the evidence showed that Mrs. Botkin had told Mrs. Rueff that there were three anonymous letters. John B. Pennington had testified that only himself and the writer had known of the third anonymous letter, and it was held that Mrs. Botkin, in her conversation with Mrs. Rueff, had shown guilty knowledge of the contents of that letter.

Arsenic was the next subject discussed. The speaker reviewed the testimony of Frank Grey of the Owl Drug Store, who testified as to a sale of powdered arsenic to Mrs. Botkin on June 21. He then referred to David Green of the Star Drug Store, who had made a sale of lump arsenic to a woman resembling Mrs. Botkin. As Green could not identify the defendant nearly all his testimony was ruled out. When White mentioned Green's name Knight made vigorous objection, saying there was nothing in the record to show that the defendant had ever purchased lump arsenic.

A wrangle ensued and Knight asked that all of Green's testimony be stricken out. He was told that he was too late with his motion and that counsel could read such portions of the testimony as were not stricken out. The Court ruled that Green's testimony could only be referred to as showing that lump arsenic was on sale in San Francisco.

White went into the details of the case, showing how link by link the chain had been completed. He placed little weight on Dr. Terrill's testimony that he attended Mrs. Botkin on July 31st, the day on which the candy was purchased. He believed the witness to be mistaken as to the date and called attention to the testimony of the servant girl of the Victoria Hotel who was positive that Dr. Terrill's visit was not made on Sunday.

The question of motive was then gone into. White said:

I will show you the motive. I place John P. Dunning and this defendant together. There they are, twelve midnights without a star. How this alliance was formed I do not know. The defendant was bound by legal ties to her husband. John P. Dunning was bound by legal ties, and I hope by ties of affection, to his wife. This legal bond between Dunning and his wife must be broken.

The speaker implored the jury not to call this infatuation love, and then delivered a little lecture upon the fiercest and gentlest of passions. He told how Mrs. Botkin had gently tapped at the tie between Dunning and his wife, and had endeavored to influence Mrs. Dunning to a divorce. Having failed, she was obliged to resort to what White called "heroic" measures. Some people would have called them desperate measures, but White said heroic. He went on to relate how Mrs. Botkin's affinity had gone to the wars. She wrote a letter to Governor Budd, hoping to be sent to Cuba as a Red Cross nurse, to join him even at the cannon's mouth. At this time the devil spoke to Mrs. Botkin, the Attorney-General declared, whispering to her to buy poison, to put it in a box of candy with a loving note and send it to Mrs. Dunning. White said that Mrs. Botkin lacked sympathy for Mrs. Dunning; that when "she was flaunting in San Francisco haunts of sin with her dear husband (Mrs. Dunning's husband)" she never thought of the wife in Delaware. In closing the speaker said:

Your sympathies have doubtless been enlisted in this case. Won't you share them with the woman who died and the little girl whose mother was taken from her? Delaware has asked vengeance for the life so ruthlessly taken, and California could not have done more if the person slain was of her own people. We have had the aid of a police force the work of which must challenge the admiration of the world. We have had all assistance possible, and, whatever your verdict, when I tell the people of Delaware what California has done for them they will be satisfied. All we ask now is that you discharge your duty faithfully to the State of California; faithfully to that poor depraved woman and faithfully to yourselves.

Knight departed from the time-honored custom of sugaring the jurymen. He peppered them. He told them that he was aware they were all prejudiced against Mrs. Botkin—that they would not be human if they were not—that he was aware that their wives were all against Mrs. Botkin, it being the nature of women to attack one of their own kind when in trouble. In fact, he assured them that they were—most of them—bad men; but he would forgive them if they did the fair thing. He recalled the fact that he had only used ten of his twenty peremptory challenges, to show that he was convinced of the justice of his cause and that he had nothing to fear from any man. He bullied them and flattered them indirectly and adroitly, and the jury shifted its legs like that self-complacent one in "Pudd'nhead Wilson," and smiled inwardly to think how popular it was with both sides of the case. And, having toasted one side of the jury and frozen the other, Knight went on to make the worse appear the better reason.

There is something grotesque in this Tweedledee and Tweedledum business before a jury. Where White had seen a chain of circumstantial evidence, "the chain dore-chilling," as he said, and stretching its grim length across a continent, Knight could see but shattered links, with no earthly connection between them. The words of the speakers were as diametrically opposed as the speakers and their manners. Knight did not mar the lines of his pretty Prince Albert—his talking clothes—by seeking his vest arm holes—not he. Instead, he played the bass drum on a lot of law books piled up before him and beat the air into froth with his eloquent arms. He had some effective stage business with a sealed box of chocolates for properties. These he opened with melodramatic fervor, breaking some of them open to show that a fissure would be apparent. He also showed, what has never been brought out before, that Mrs. Botkin could easily have laid a folded handkerchief and a slip of a note on top of a full box of candies had she desired, and that, having mentioned that she intended to add something to the box, it was absurd to think that the candy girl had sealed it.

Shortly after Knight commenced Mrs. Botkin dropped into his chair, and he, standing by her side, made a strong play of looking down upon her and pointing at her.

One of Knight's impressive points was that he had chosen these jurors by their faces knowing that they could not be influenced by a "District Attorney or the shrug of the shoulder of a Judge." This was a direct slap at his honor, with whose conduct Knight does not feel satisfied, though he does not dare say so until the instructions are given to the jury.

Knight did not make the mistake of attacking the character of the victim. He paid her due honor, and at his words John P. Dunning, who had been sitting all day in the courtroom listening to disquisitions on his own infamy, sank further and further down into his seat, but gave no sign of emotion. Knight described the crime charged against his client as one easy to be charged with, but hard hard to be defended against. He referred to the Maybrick case as a parallel, and adroitly played on the race feeling of some of his hearers by referring to the Dreyfus case as another in point.

Then Knight made a strong play. He became furiously excited, and said:

The fumes of a Rosser trial may stink through this door, the infamy of the acquittal of Figel may be fresh in the public mind, but Mrs. Botkin shall never be a vicarious atonement for the infamy of a police department. She is here asking equal rights of the State of California—a defenseless woman, without a dollar in the world, ready to bow her head to the guillotine of fate if proven guilty.

Then followed the analysis of motive:

Did Mrs. Botkin want Mrs. Dunning's husband?

From his own testimony she had him.

Was it love for him that prompted this crime?

She had the dissolute brute. He was an incumbrance upon her. She fed and nourished him, and put shoes upon his feet—and he swore to it himself. Did she want him?

She had him.

Knight demanded to be shown any place in the record where a breach between Mrs. Botkin and Dunning was shown. He said that even the swift witness, Mrs. Rueff, had testified that Mrs. Botkin said in their last interview that she made it impossible for Botkin to secure a divorce for another year, and that she would never divorce him. According to Dunning himself marriage had never been mentioned between them.

The speaker wished to know if the jury thought Mrs. Botkin made up her mind to murder in June, when she bought the poison, and then carried the arsenic around two months before she used it.

"My God, gentlemen," he inquired, with the force of a volcanic explosion, "are you going to conjecture like that?"

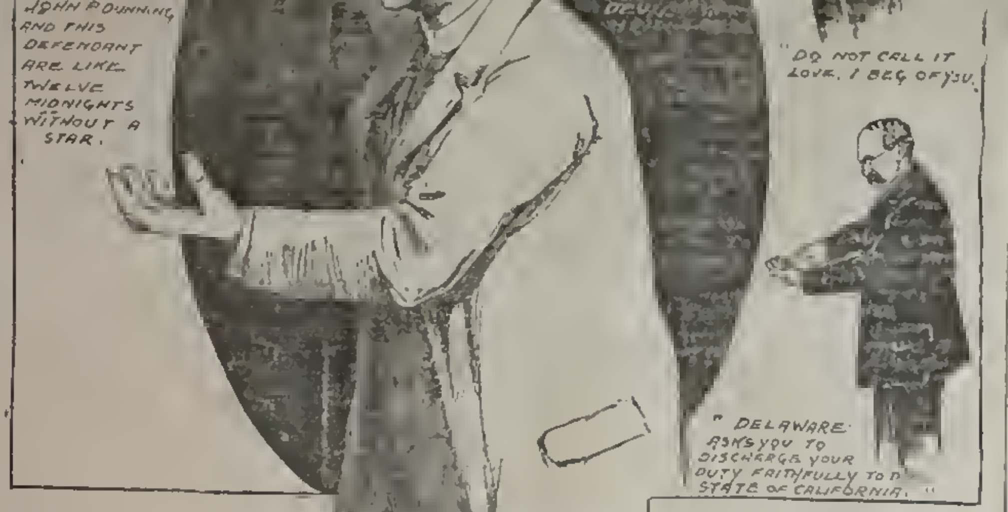
Knight then devoted himself to the extradition of Mrs. Botkin, and wanted to know if the Police Department would have sent to Delaware, along with Grace Harris, Mr. Watkinson and the wrapping clerk from the City of Paris store. He spoke of Mrs. Harris as a woman of the town and a convicted thief. There followed a fiery attack on the Police Department. Knight alluded to the suppression of the Farallon passenger list as one of the most infamous things ever perpetrated in a court of justice.

Then Knight did a clever thing. He called the jury up like so many schoolboys, and the jurors named blushed like youngsters caught eating apples in the schoolroom. On Knight's roll of honor were the men whom he suspects of being prejudiced against Mrs. Botkin, and he paid particular attention to Mr. Daniels, the friend of Chief Lees, and said to be something of a handwriting expert himself.

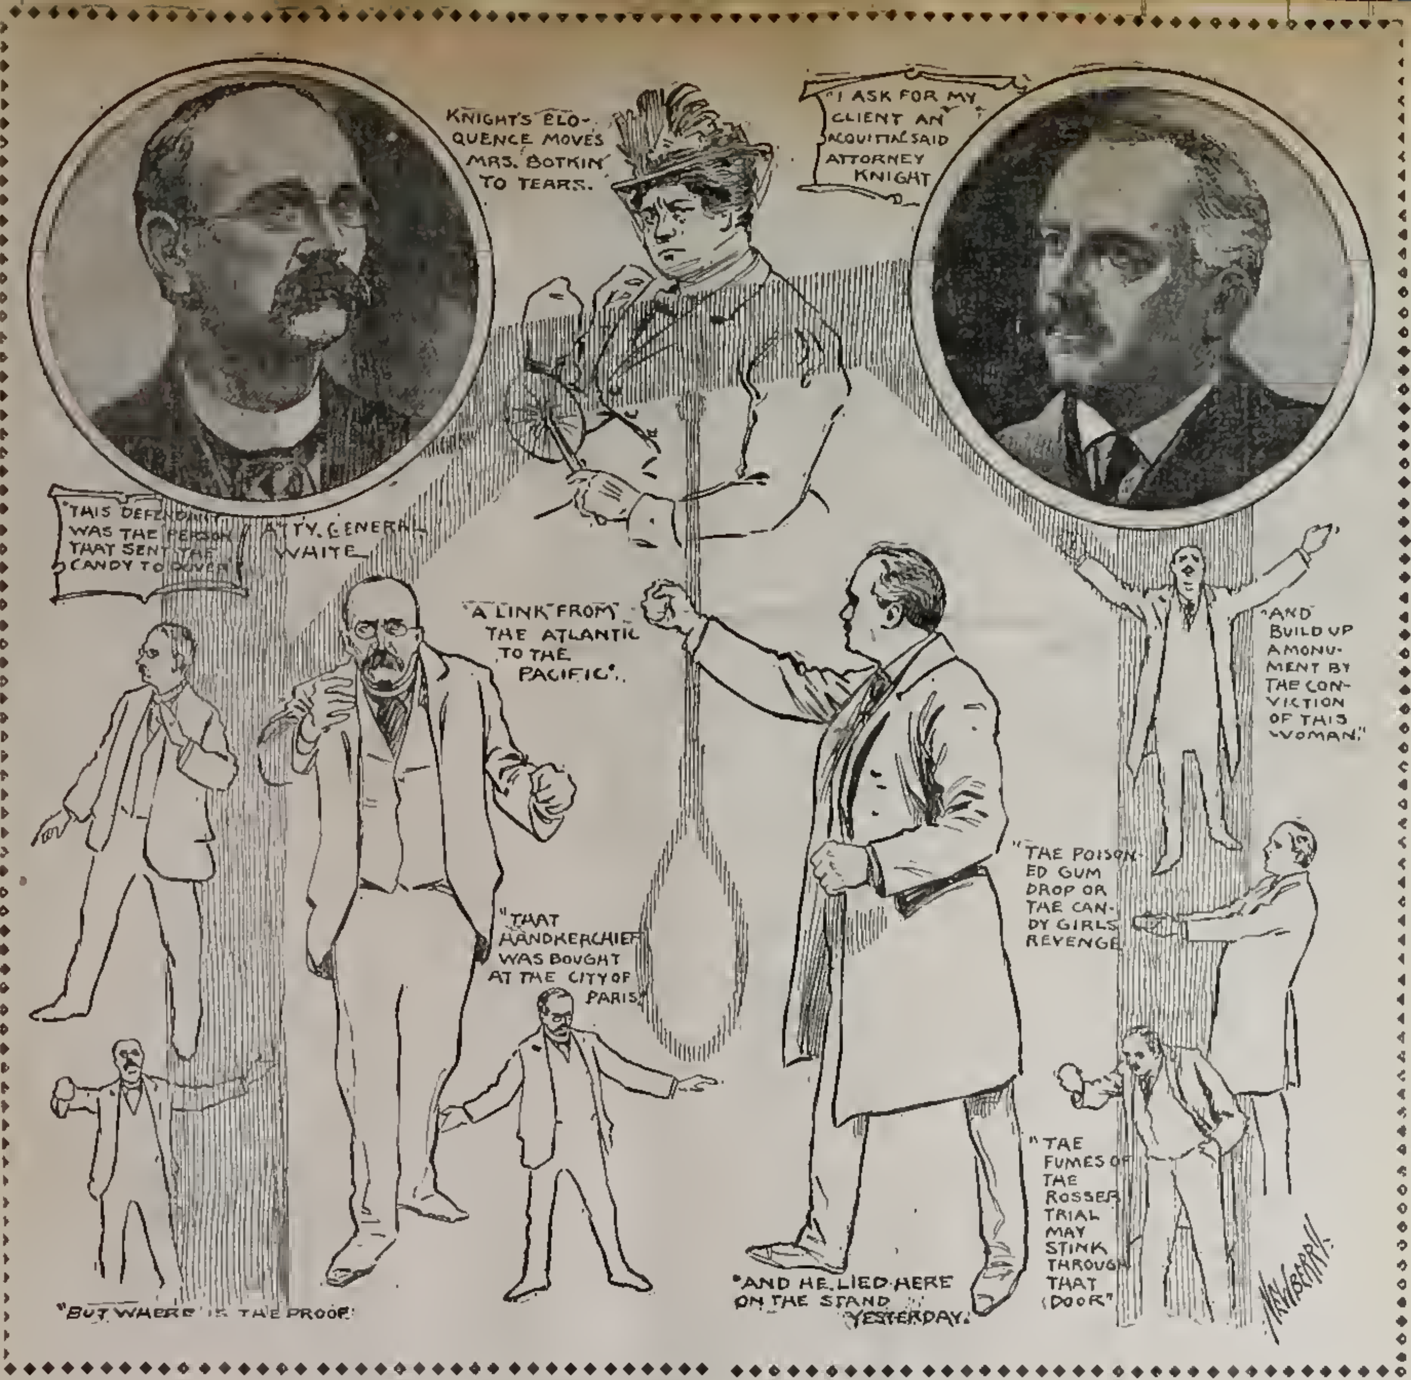
From this phase Knight passed to the difficulties of identification and the silliness of the candy girls, with their subsequent shadowing of Mrs. Botkin. The girls, he said, were but the plastic material upon which the Police Department worked, the girls being anxious to write a book entitled "The Poison Gumdrop; or, The Candy Girl's Revenge."

For all handwriting experts, and especially for Daniel Ames, between whom and Knight there is a grudge ancient and honorable as that between the Montagues and Capulets, the attorney had a string of epithets as long as the circumstantial chain across the continent. Knight said that the Bar Association of New York was taking measures to protect itself against these "hired liars."

After the Eureka alibi had been given its full force, Knight dwelt upon the lump arsenic in the case and the fact that the record did not show that Mrs. Botkin ever purchased lump arsenic. Knight snarled at Witness Wolf from Delaware and accused him of trying to muddle the jury. The next thing was the assertion that there was no proof of the corpus delicti, with some legal citations for the Judge—a citation that came all the way from Florida. Knight pooh-poohed the idea that there Delaware doctors were sufficiently skilled to show of what a person died. He thought perhaps Dr. Bishop might have concealed the arsenic in the candy, after losing his patient, in order to conceal his own ignorance. He questioned the proof of whether or not the candy-box was ever mailed. Certainly, he said there was no proof that Mrs. Botkin mailed it. The ironing of the wrapper of the candy-box came in for special condemnation. The charge was made that the purpose of the ironing was to obliterate



ATTORNEY-GENERAL WHITE IN ACTION.



ATTORNEYS WHITE AND KNIGHT DURING THEIR ARGUMENTS IN COURT.

GUILTY AS CHARGED.

A JURY made up of representative men has declared Cordelia Botkin guilty of murder. The verdict will receive approval. Justice will be satisfied with the fixing of the penalty at imprisonment for life. While morally on the plane with one of the other sex, and as a defendant, equal before the law, there is an irrepressible tendency to show deference to a woman even though the blood of innocence be on her head. This is in token of a sentimentality inborn, and the advocate of capital punishment would pause before consenting to its violation. Therefore the community, weary of travesty, impatient of the immunity of the transgressor, will say to the jury that it has done well.

After the preliminaries relative to possible extradition, the trial from the first moved with remarkable celerity. There was little wasted time save that devoted to abusing witnesses for the State. The attorneys for the prisoner must have felt that they had a hopeless fight, or different tactics would have been adopted. They would not have devoted hours to points which could avail them nothing unless by confusing the twelve in the box, and the twelve were not of the material to be confused.

Among assassins the Botkin woman is almost unique. Apparently shallow, there was shown to be in her composition a depth of guile hard to comprehend. With the gallows looming up before her, she seemed to be frivolous, unconcerned, at times forgiving. She lied with a nonchalance meant to be winning. She posed as everything she was not; she was innocence, virtue, kindness. No evil thought had entered her mind. Yet all the time she knew the unblemished victims of her plot, a plot as diabolical as ever directed by the fury of thwarted lust, lay dead in a distant State. She is a monster, devoid of conscience, of sympathy, of the nobler impulses. Her egotism has crowded out the good there may have been in her. To others it worked death, to her it worked a ruin far worse than death.

To have permitted this social viper to escape would have been a new shame upon the fair fame of the State in which justice has received many a blow in the house of its friends. There will be in the end of this evil doer a salutary lesson. No crime can be so cunningly devised that the criminal may not be hunted down. An idle word may lead to exposure, a guilty conscience betray. The most despicable, deliberate and cowardly murder possible is that in which poison is the chosen instrument. There will be no sane pity lavished on Mrs. Botkin. She challenged fate and it has overtaken and overcome her.

TEN YEARS OLD AND A FORGER.

Tacoma Produces a Remarkable Case of Criminal Precocity.

[Special Dispatch to "The Examiner."]

TACOMA, December 30.—George Henry Gilman Johnson, aged ten years, stood on the raised platform fronting Justice Mattison's desk in the police court to-day, unconcernedly listening while four business men of Tacoma made formal complaint charging him with being a forger and a constant menace to the safety and morality of the other boys of the town.

Johnson is very small for his age and he had to be placed on the raised platform so Justice Mattison could see him.

Johnson is charged with forging George Shaw's name to several orders on which he received various small sums of money. When taken to the city jail the boy showed no signs of emotion, preserving a stoical demeanor the whole time. He calmly told the officers he had spent the money for a revolver and cartridges with which to shoot at a mark. He stated that a schoolboy companion showed him how to write the orders while they were in school. He thought, to use his own language, "it would be a slick way to make lots of money easy," and proceeded to put the plan into execution.

The boy's father was not willing that a charge of incorrigibility be entered against his child and Justice Mattison committed him to the Superior Court.

LAST WORD FOR THE DEFENDANT.

DECEMBER 30, 1898.

McGowan Talks the Whole Day.

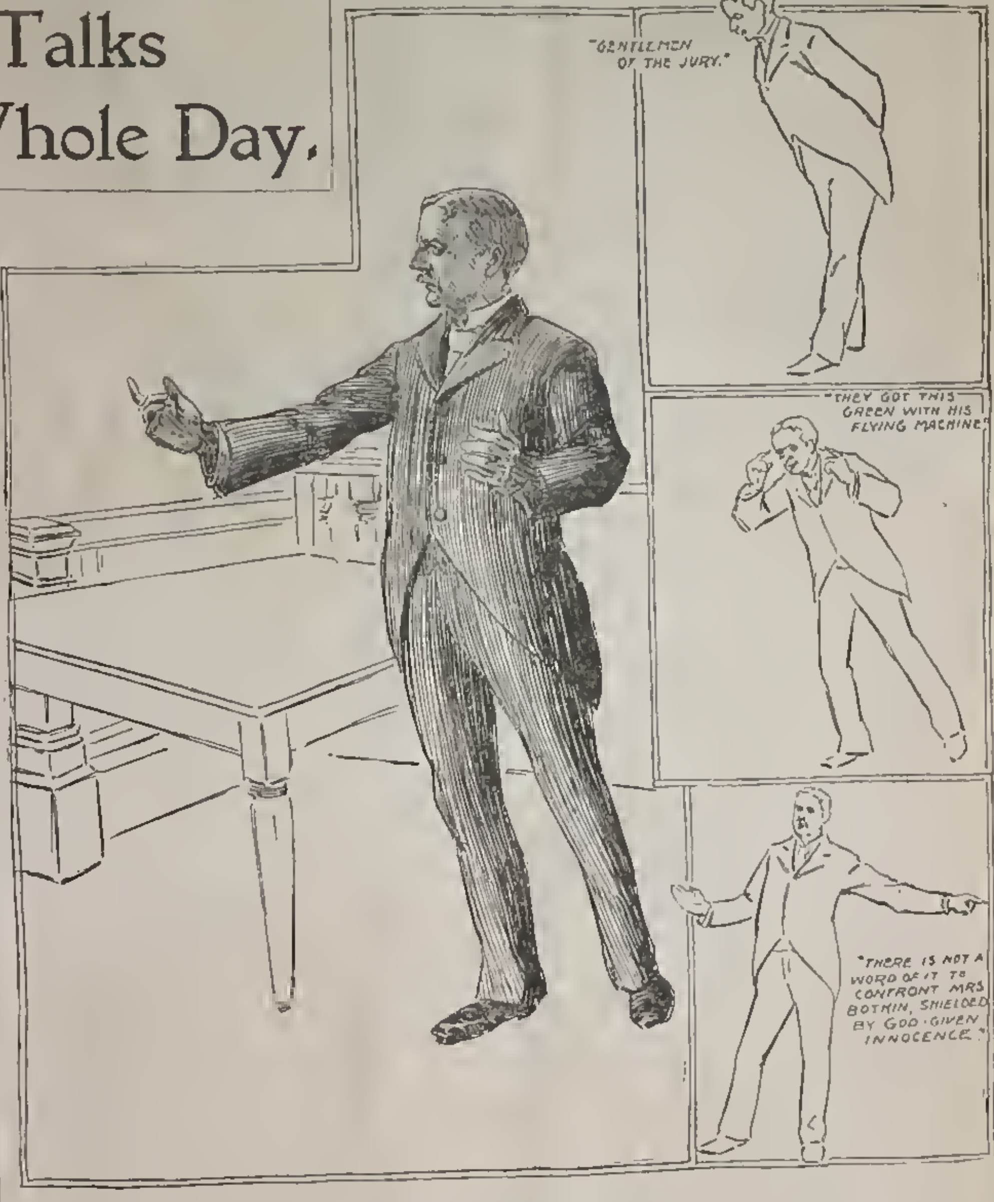
JEERS SOME, PRAISES ONE.

Pictures Mrs. Botkin as an Exemplar of Goodness.

DUNNING IS PAINTED AS ALL THAT IS VILE.

RIDICULE OR COARSE EPITHET FOR THE PROSECUTION'S WITNESSES.

Hosmer Will Begin the Closing Argument in Behalf of the People This Morning.



Frank McGowan Addresses the Jury.

The last word has been said for Mrs. Botkin. There remains only the searing denunciation of the prosecution, and no one who watched Hosmer yesterday, cynical, saturnine, sarcastic, doubts but that his excoriation will be to the point. Many unpleasant things may be said about Mrs. Botkin, and after the wholesale roasting McGowan gave to almost every witness of the prosecution, there is no reason why Hosmer should stay his hand. His retainers were not spared, why should he give quarter? The jury may be charged to-night, or the judicial words that lay down the law, outside whose narrow bounds no juror is allowed to tread, may not be said until to-morrow, but, whenever it is, the jurors will go to their room with the prosecution's last words ringing in their ears. With men the last word is not supposed to count, but with the most of humanity the last man is the best fellow.

A settled sadness has fallen upon Mrs. Botkin. She is like one in a nightmare. She shakes her head as one in a dream and the tears stream from her eyes. Yesterday her tears dropped silently all day. She has been transformed from a brisk little Xantippe into a melting Niobe. She has been accused of being stony-hearted, but the flintiness has gone. These tears are not simulated. There are bags beneath her eyes and her whole features have set in a despairing mold. She and her two sisters, all three shrouded in heavy nun-like veils, sit in a drooping row and weep silently through the days. It is like a funeral.

A good-sized crowd came in the morning and a much larger crowd in the afternoon, for which Hosmer had been billed, in anticipation of which he, too, had changed his raiment and appeared in whatever glory may attach to a long coat and silk hat. McGowan absorbed the entire day in his argument, and Hosmer, being a man who likes to give tit for tat, says that he does not think he can finish in a half-day, and so it is quite possible that there will be another whole day of talk.

McGowan has been in Legislatures and has stumped the State in political campaigns. He talks very well in private life, with a pretty humor and a lambent flame of sarcasm, and is very effective. But yesterday he discarded the easy repartee of every-day life. He stood in front of the jury-box like a baseball pitcher, and, with all the gyrations of a "phenom," curved rhetorical nosegays into the jury-box. His speech showed evidence of careful preparation. There were none of the haphazard sentences of Attorney-General White, breaking down simultaneously at every point like the "one-hoss shay." Nor was it the earnest talk of Knight, who rears the careful scaffolding of a speech only to throw it all away when he stands face to face with the jury and catches the inspiring lilt of the occasion. About McGowan there was little that was off-hand. When he was spontaneous he was not at his best. Some people thought the four hours of speaking pyrotechnic and sophomoric—too much like a graduating oration, with sonorous periods and careful interlarding of quotations. But then Marc Antony's speech would be laughed at nowadays. When McGowan finished there was a burst of applause from the lobby on all matters of policy. McGowan made points that Knight would have glossed over, and the senior attorney looked a trifle worried at times.

As for the prosecution it was not present, except as embodied by the watchful Hosmer, who sat with open ears and narrowed eyes. Delaware was conspicuously absent. The truth to tell, Delaware was a bit huffy. It had seen its favorite son assailed in the public prints and it felt aggrieved. It considered that it had not been treated with interstate comity.

And so Delaware waited until afternoon, when it expected to hear Hosmer and was forced to listen to McGowan's stinging denunciations instead. White showed his diminished head. He merely put in a formal appearance to show that he was still alive after the caustic criticisms that had been passed upon him, and, after a few moments, quietly left the courtroom. White thinks that some prophets are more honored in their own country than away from it. "Californy" is too keenly critical for him.

McGowan has a singularly clear and distinct enunciation, and not one word he said was lost—not even when his voice sank to the solemn tones of a funeral oration or soared in the melodramatic flights of the campaign orator. There was none of Knight's man-handling, straight-from-the-shoulder talk, but a more studied, politer speech. If some of the metaphors had seen long and honorable service and were worn smooth as pebbles in a brook, at least the figures were not mixed and tangled like the Attorney-General's frightened attempts to embroider his discourse.

It took McGowan some time to get into action. For an hour or so he trained his guns in target practice and then bore down upon the enemy and said:

> Every technicality known to an astute attorney has been employed by the prosecution to thwart the defense in the presentation of evidence in behalf of Mrs. Botkin, but on our side there has been no effort at delusion, no attempt at concealment. If the woman were guilty there would have been a vicious technical fight, in which no quarter would have been given and none expected. She need not have offered you a scintilla of evidence. She could have stood on her legal rights and defied the prosecution to prove her guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. Instead of that she, confident in her own innocence, has met the prosecution on every issue. Only an innocent defendant meets accusation in that way.

Mr. McGowan went on to say that there never was a case in which there ... reasonable doubts. He of intelligence, which he slobbers over with praise?" Referring to motive he said:

> You may search the case from its inception and you can find no motive for crime, no motive to induce a woman to take life for the first time, no motive for committing a deed which has horrified the world. Dunning is not physically, mentally or morally a man for whom a woman would commit murder. This defendant fed him, clothed him, but even he will not say that she ever proposed that he leave his wife. No reasoning, however strained, can gather from the evidence that Mrs. Botkin sought to get this valuable man as a husband. There is nothing to show that she ever wanted him to come back after he left her to go to Cuba. Instead, according to testimony, she told Miss Livernash that she felt relieved when he went away.

McGowan thought it extremely unlikely that any one with the mental and moral advantages of California would be likely to commit a murder unless he had murdered before in some less favored clime. He actually said that in California all the men were intelligent and all the women noble and kind. He took issue with Knight in saying that Mrs. Botkin had no blot on her 'scutcheon. Where the senior counsel had painted Mrs. Botkin's morals in tones of gray and lavender, McGowan would consent to nothing but gleaming white.

McGowan referred to Dunning's "sin-polluted lips," spoke of him as a "craven-hearted cur" and as the only man brazen-faced enough to raise his hand to a heaven he believed to be empty and say, "Thou art the woman." Dunning was the man of "adamantine cheek, with a foul heart and a rotten mind," a "man beyond reproach," a "mass of putrid matter."

Referring to the nine muses of Dunning's affection, McGowan said: "In that number there is one whose heart rose in vindictiveness against the debauchery of John P. Dunning. Here is the dreadful secret—locked behind Dunning's lips."

McGowan thought it absurd that if Mrs. Botkin intended to commit a crime she should not give an assumed name in buying arsenic and should attract attention to herself in the candy store by doing unusual things and selecting an unusual box. He referred to the doubtfulness of the candy girls' identification, to the contradictions in time between them and Mrs. Price and Maggie Smith. McGowan referred to the latter as a "goggle-eyed [illegible] wolloper," and, later, as "the vegetable-soup witness." He contrasted the little servant of the Vic... ...rda with the honorable Southern fam... ... Dr. Terrill on his way

Miss Livernash was referred to as a "journalistic buccaneer," who admitted that Mrs. Botkin was hysterical during part of the interviews, and then came into court to swear her life away. He represented the reporter as crawling on her stomach like a serpent and trying to worm herself into Mrs. Botkin's confidence.

McGowan theorized on Mrs. Arbogast's strong motive for committing such a crime and throwing suspicion on Mrs. Botkin. He closed by references to Mrs. Botkin's good family, an old and honorable one in the northern forests, and said:

> I once saw a human being drop through a gallows trap to the darkness of eternity. I thought then, "Oh, if there has been a mistake. How it will torture those who have passed judgment on the unfortunate one." There is uncertainty in all things human. We ask only that you do your duty. We want you to render a verdict founded on justice and sanctioned by law; such a verdict that in the future will enable you to look your fellow men in the face and say, "I did my duty as God gave me light to see it." We ask you to write a verdict that will bring joy to the aged mother, who with uplifted hands is praying that an American jury will restore to liberty her innocent daughter.

And all the while Hosmer, with a sardonic smile, was taking notes in a little red book. There'll be blood-letting to-day.

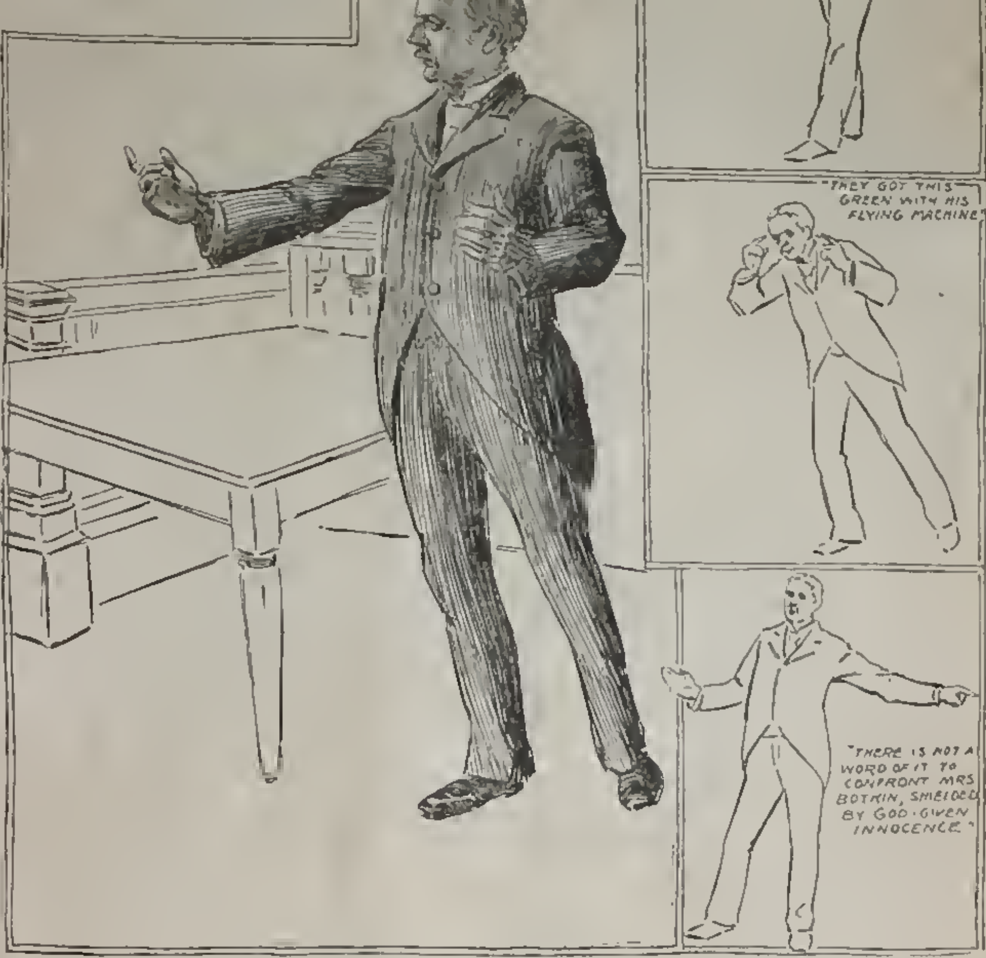
JEERS SOME, PRAISES ONE.

Pictures Mrs. Botkin as an Exemplar of Goodness.

DUNNING IS PAINTED AS ALL THAT IS VILE.

RIDICULE ON COARSE EPITHET FOR THE PROSECUTION'S WITNESSES.

Hosmer Will Begin the Closing Argument in Behalf of the People This Morning.



Frank McGowan Addresses the Jury.

The last word has been said for Mrs. Botkin. There remains only the searing denunciation of the prosecution, and no one who watched Hosmer yesterday, cynical, saturnine, sarcastic, doubts but that his excoriation will be to the point. Many unpleasant things may be said about Mrs. Botkin, and after the wholesale roasting McGowan gave to almost every witness of the prosecution, there is no reason why Hosmer should stay his hand. His retainers were not spared, why should he give quarter? The jury may be charged to-night, or the judicial words that lay down the law, outside whose narrow bounds no juror is allowed to tread, may not be said until to-morrow, but, whenever it is, the jurors will go to their room with the prosecution's last words ringing in their ears. With men the last word is not supposed to count, but with the most of humanity the last man is the best fellow.

A settled sadness has fallen upon Mrs. Botkin. She is like one in a nightmare. She shakes her head as one in a dream and the tears stream from her eyes. Yesterday her tears dropped silently all day. She has been transformed from a brisk little Xantippe into a melting Niobe. She has been accused of being stony-hearted, but the flintiness has gone. These tears are not simulated. There are bags beneath her eyes and her whole features have set in a despairing mold. She and her two sisters, all three shrouded in heavy nun-like veils, sit in a drooping row and weep silently through the days. It is like a funeral.

A good-sized crowd came in the morning and a much larger crowd in the afternoon, for which Hosmer had been billed, in anticipation of which he, too, had changed his raiment and appeared in whatever glory may attach to a long coat and silk hat. McGowan absorbed the entire day in his argument, and Hosmer, being a man who likes to give tit for tat, says that he does not think he can finish in a half-day, and so it is quite possible that there will be another whole day of talk.

McGowan has been in Legislatures and has stumped the State in political campaigns. He talks very well in private life, with a pretty humor and a luminent flame of sarcasm, and is very effective. But yesterday he discarded the easy repartee of every-day life. He stood in front of the jury-box like a baseball pitcher, and, with all the gyrations of a "phenom," curved rhetorical nosegays into the jury-box. His speech showed evidence of careful preparation. There were none of the haphazard sentences of Attorney-General White, breaking down simultaneously at every point like the "one-hoss shay." Nor was it the earnest talk of Knight, who rears the careful scaffolding of a speech only to throw it all away when he stands face to face with the jury and catches the inspiring fill of the occasion. About McGowan there was little that was off-hand. When he was spontaneous he was not at his best. Some people thought the four hours of speaking pyrotechnic and sophomoric—too much like a graduating oration, with sonorous periods and careful interlarding of quotations. But then Marc Antony's speech would be laughed at nowadays. When McGowan finished there was a burst of applause from the lobby—a tribute Knight did not receive—and almost all women and some men were sad eyed, for McGowan played on the strings of sympathy. Several times he wept at his own pathos and the tears splashed on his coat, while his voice quivered in tremolo passages.

The speech was too long and it was verbose. The jury fretted under it. Points that were good could have been put more concisely, and valuable deductions were smothered in verbiage.

There were some faults of phraseology in McGowan's speech, just as there had been in those of the men who preceded him. His predicates and subjects were not always running mates, one frequently paced to the other's gallop and there were some startling disparities of number and tense. The unbridled past participle sometimes gave McGowan a merry chase, and reminded the hearers of the eccentric grammar of Delaware. There were also some oddities of pronunciation. He says "stomick" and "irreliability."

At apt characterization of the prosecution's witnesses McGowan was at his best. Dunning was fried, grilled, broiled, stewed, baked, parboiled, fricasseed, roasted and steamed. When it became so hot that Dunning could not stand it, he left the room and showed a timorous head again just in time to hear himself called a "lecherous mass of putrid flesh." McGowan could not let Dunning slink away out of the case. He returned again and again to take another fall out of him. It was like kicking a corpse. There are limits beyond which denunciation may not go and be effective. The fickle crowd, once it has its fill, begins to veer like a weather cock and say, "The man's persecuted."

Some thought this was what made Knight fidget in his chair and glower, for Knight and McGowan do not agree on all matters of policy. McGowan made points that Knight would have glossed over, and the senior attorney looked a trifle worried at times.

As for the prosecution it was not present, except as embodied by the watchful Hosmer, who sat with open ears and narrowed eyes. Delaware was conspicuously absent. The truth to tell, Delaware was a bit huffy. It had seen its favorite son assailed in the public prints and it felt aggrieved. It considered that it had not been treated with interstate comity.

And so Delaware waited until afternoon, when it expected to hear Hosmer and was forced to listen to McGowan's stinging denunciations instead. White showed his diminished head. He merely put in a formal appearance to show that he was still alive after the caustic criticisms that had been passed upon him, and, after a few moments, quietly left the courtroom. White thinks that some prophets are more honored in their own country than away from it. "Californy" is too keenly critical for him.

McGowan has a singularly clear and distinct enunciation, and not one word he said was lost—not even when his voice sank to the solemn tones of a funeral oration or soared in the melodramatic flights of the campaign orator. There was none of Knight's man-handling, straight-from-the-shoulder talk, but a more studied, politer speech. If some of the metaphors had seen long and honorable service and were worn smooth as pebbles in a brook, at least the figures were not mixed and tangled like the Attorney-General's frightened attempts to embroider his discourse.

It took McGowan some time to get into action. For an hour or so he trained his guns in target practice and then bore down upon the enemy and said:

> Every technicality known to an astute attorney has been employed by the prosecution to thwart the defense in the presentation of evidence in behalf of Mrs. Botkin, but on our side there has been no effort at delusion, no attempt at concealment. If the woman were guilty there would have been a vicious technical fight, in which no quarter would have been given and none expected. She need not have offered you a scintilla of evidence. She could have stood on her legal rights and defied the prosecution to prove her guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. Instead of that she, confident in her own innocence, has met the prosecution on every issue. Only an innocent defendant meets accusation in that way.

Mr. McGowan went on to say that there never was a case in which there were so many reasonable doubts. He accused the police of tampering with the evidence and changing circumstances to fit their theory. He argued that it had never been proved that Mrs. Dunning died of arsenical poisoning, and pointed out the fact that Dr. Bishop's two patients died, their cases aggravated by his medicines, while those who avoided his prescriptions recovered, and yet in the testimony of these "know-nothing doctors" rested all the evidence of arsenical poisoning. He called attention to Dr. Wolf, who, while in Delaware, found lump arsenic in the candy. He said that the police, in order to make out a case that would fit with a purchase of powdered arsenic, had to find powdered arsenic in the candy. Therefore, the nearer the candy approached the Golden Gate the nearer it came to powdered arsenic, and when it at last reached here, Professor Price found powdered arsenic after the candy had been for some time in the custody of the police. He said there was not a scintilla of evidence to connect the defendant with lump arsenic—the sort that Miss Bateman picked from her teeth.

McGowan did not believe that the candy box ever crossed the continent until it crossed in a Pullman car with Detective McVey. He thought that the wrapper was ironed out to conceal the fact that it had been folded too many times to fit the police theory. He trod on pretty hot embers when he said that Mrs. Botkin had probably read in the papers that there were three anonymous letters, which accounted for her statement to Miss Livernash. Then McGowan took a gentle fall out of the Attorney-General of Delaware. Referring to his speech he remarked. "Why present this flimsy argument to this mass of intelligence, which he slobbers over with praise?" Referring to motive he said:

> You may search the case from its inception and you can find no motive for crime, no motive to induce a woman to take life for the first time, no motive for committing a deed which has horrified the world. Dunning is not physically, mentally or morally a man for whom a woman would commit murder. This defendant fed him, clothed him, but even he will not say that she ever proposed that he leave his wife. No reasoning, however strained, can gather from the evidence that Mrs. Botkin sought to get this valuable man as a husband. There is nothing to show that she ever wanted him to come back after he left her to go to Cuba. Instead, according to testimony, she told Miss Livernash that she felt relieved when he went away.

McGowan thought it extremely unlikely that any one with the mental and moral advantages of California would be likely to commit a murder unless he had murdered before in some less favored clime. He actually said that in California all the men were intelligent and all the women noble and kind. He took issue with Knight in saying that Mrs. Botkin had no blot on her 'scutcheon. Where the senior counsel had painted Mrs. Botkin's morals in tones of gray and lavender, McGowan would consent to nothing but gleaming white.

McGowan referred to Dunning's "sin-polluted lips," spoke of him as a "craven-hearted cur" and as the only man brazen-faced enough to raise his hand to a heaven he believed to be empty and say, "Thou art the woman." Dunning was the man of "adamantine cheek, with a foul heart and a rotten mind," a "man beyond reproach," a "mass of putrid matter."

Referring to the nine muses of Dunning's affection, McGowan said: "In that number there is one whose heart rose in vindictiveness against the debauchery of John P. Dunning. Here is the dreadful secret—locked behind Dunning's lips."

McGowan thought it absurd that if Mrs. Botkin intended to commit a crime she should not give an assumed name in buying arsenic and should attract attention to herself in the candy store by doing unusual things and selecting an unusual box. He referred to the doubtfulness of the candy girls' identification, to the contradictions in time between them and Mrs. Price and Maggie Smith. McGowan referred to the latter as a "goggle-eyed gut walloper," and, later, as "the vegetable-soup witness." He contrasted the little servant of the Victoria with the honorable Southern family of Dr. Terrill—Dr. Terrill on his way to dine with Judge Foote, who later became "General" Foote. At this time, he said, "Mrs. Botkin was lying on her divan engaged in being sick." Suddenly McGowan asked the jurymen what day it was, two months ago, when they saw their best friend coming to their house. Each man's face was a blank. McGowan seemingly forgot that this parallel would apply as well to Dr. Terrill, who had made no record in his visit book as to the indefinite candy girls and boarding-house folk.

McGowan referred bitterly to the "salting" of Mrs. Botkin's room and disposed of Rosello as "the little jumping-jack of a witness who peddles obscene literature." He said sarcastically that it was not fair to allow Rosello to find the candy seal when the honor fairly belonged to the detectives. In analyzing Mrs. Harris' testimony he pointed out that it was strange, since there was such a resemblance between Mrs. Botkin and the witness' mother, that Mrs. Harris should not recollect the name. He commented on the significant omission to present any photograph of Mrs. Harris' maternal ancestor. He remarked the significant absence of records in the City of Paris and ended by calling Mrs. Harris "one of the boys, who tips the festive glass."

Mrs. Ruoff was the "flippant witness, who evidently belongs to the church militant, and from her conduct with the whisky-bottle to the church alcoholic." He called her "that $40 witness, burning with malice and hatred, like Judas Iscariot of old, wishing to earn her forty pieces of silver." It was of her that he said. "Oh, father Abraham, how these Christians love one another!"

Miss Livernash was referred to as a "journalistic buccaneer," who admitted that Mrs. Botkin was hysterical during part of the interviews, and then came into court to swear her life away. He represented the reporter as crawling on her stomach like a serpent and trying to worm herself into Mrs. Botkin's confidence.

McGowan theorized on Mrs. Arbogast's strong motive for committing such a crime and throwing suspicion on Mrs. Botkin. He closed by references to Mrs. Botkin's good family, an old and honorable one in the northern forests, and said:

> I once saw a human being drop through a gallows trap to the darkness of eternity. I thought then, "Oh, if there has been a mistake. How it will torture those who have passed judgment on the unfortunate one." There is uncertainty in all things human. We ask only that you do your duty. We want you to render a verdict founded on justice and sanctioned by law; such a verdict that in the future will enable you to look your fellow men in the face and say, "I did my duty as God gave me light to see it." We ask you to write a verdict that will bring joy to the aged mother, who with uplifted hands is praying that an American jury will restore to liberty her innocent daughter.

And all the while Hosmer, with a sardonic smile, was taking notes in a little red book. There'll be blood-letting to-day.

5,389 Want Ads were published by the Sunday Examiner during the Month of December.

In the other papers........2,746 and 2,370 respectively
Total in other two papers 5,116

The Examiner.

VOL. LXVII. SAN FRANCISCO: SATURDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 31, 1898. NO. 184.

THE WEATHER.

FORECAST MADE AT SAN FRANCISCO FOR THIRTY HOURS ENDING MIDNIGHT, DECEMBER 31, 1898:

FOR SAN FRANCISCO AND VICINITY—Fair Saturday; brisk northwest wind.

W. H. HAMMON,
Forecast Official.

MRS. BOTKIN, THE POISONER, FOUND GUILTY OF MURDER.

CONDEMNED TO A LIFE IN STATE PRISON.

Came Within One Vote of a Verdict of Hanging by the Neck.

ALL FOR HOSMER

The Deputy District Attorney Makes a Masterful Analysis of the Testimony.

Last night the jury that tried Cordelia A. Botkin for the murder of Mary Elizabeth Dunning brought in a verdict of murder in the first degree. They fixed the penalty at imprisonment for life. Had it been a man, the decision would have been for hanging. Men do not hang women in California. As it was, she was once within one vote of the gallows. The jury was out just four hours and fourteen minutes.

Some time after receiving the verdict of the jury Mrs. Botkin fainted, but soon was revived, and was escorted to a cell in the branch County Jail.

Now another legal battle will be on. The question of jurisdiction will be raised—the question whether a California court can condemn for a mur-

MRS. BOTKIN HAD THE UTMOST CONFIDENCE THAT THE JURY WOULD RETURN A VERDICT CLEARING HER OF ALL COMPLICITY IN THE TRAGEDY.

The verdict was a greater surprise to me than I can make any one understand. I was confident that the jury would restore to me my freedom. My reason for this confidence was based on the testimony introduced during the trial.

I have often thought, as I looked into the faces of the jurors, that my fate was in the hands of twelve honest, fearless men, and I had no feeling of apprehension, even when the prosecution was using its utmost skill to prejudice the minds of those men against me. But it seems that the twelve men I thought capable of discerning between the false and the true, the right and the wrong, were not as fearless as I credited them with being.

I cannot but feel, and I think all thinking and intelligent people will agree with me, that in the verdict there is an entire absence of justice. Can it be that the failure of justice in the Rosser case and in the Figel case influenced this jury and brought forth the cruel verdict rendered to-night? Can it be that these men felt that it was time for some one charged with crime to be convicted, and so made me an example and a victim?

Is this our American justice to make me—a woman—a scapegoat? But, however shocked and disappointed I may be to-night, I am not discouraged. I yet feel that I shall be vindicated. The verdict does not terminate the matter.

The public will one day know that I am not the sort of woman the verdict of this jury would lead the people to believe. I can now do nothing but wait my time, trusting in a higher justice than was understood by the twelve men who were intrusted with the high duty of passing on a human life.—Statement by Mrs. Botkin.

FAINTS AFTER HEARING THE VERDICT,

Soon Revives and Is Led Away to Her Cell in the Jail.

SHE WILL APPEAL

The Crowd About the Bulletin Board Cheered the Announcement of the Verdict.

prisonment or the death penalty was still a problem.

"What is your verdict?" again the voice of the Judge was heard in measured tones.

Foreman Kennedy arose and proferred a slip of paper, which was taken by Stenographer Drew, who handed it to Clerk Tolle. Without reading it Mr. Tolle delivered the fateful screed to Judge Cook, who scrutinized it carefully, and passed it back to the clerk, with instructions to record it. When this brief clerical duty was finished Clerk Tolle said:

"Gentlemen of the Jury, listen to your verdict as it stands recorded: 'We, the jury, find Cordelia Botkin guilty of murder of the first degree and fix the penalty at imprisonment in the State Prison for the remainder of her life.'"

There was an audible "Ah!" in the crowd, notwithstanding the warnings of the Court and bailiff that no demonstration would be permitted, no matter which way the verdict was rendered.

The feeling in the audience appeared to be

Now another legal battle will be on. The question of jurisdiction will be raised—the question whether a California court can condemn for a murder consummated in Delaware.

Aside from the verdict, the event of the day was the masterful presentation of the case of the prosecution by Deputy District Attorney John A. Hosmer.

After an impartial charge from Judge Cook, the reading of which consumed an hour and twelve minutes, the case was given to the jurors at 5:06 p. m. Almost immediately after they reached their room and had elected Juror Kennedy foreman, they sent word back that they would go to dinner before considering the case at length, and the crowd dispersed. Mrs. Botkin was taken to the Sheriff's office.

The jurors returned at 7 o'clock and soon proceeded to ballot on a verdict.

The first ballot stood ten for hanging and two for life imprisonment. The second ballot was eleven for hanging and only one for life imprisonment. Mrs. Botkin was within one vote of the gallows.

But the one stood firm, and after much discussion the other eleven went over to him. So, though the verdict was "murder in the first degree," the punishment was fixed at imprisonment for life. The verdict was handed in at 9:20 p. m.

At first Mrs. Botkin seemed to receive the verdict with as much stolidity and unconcern as did Durrant. But after a few minutes she swooned and fell over into the arms of her sister, Mrs. McClure. As she revived she said:

"Why didn't you give me an American jury? I told you to give me an American jury."

Attorney Knight says that on Saturday next he will move for a new trial, and then take an appeal. He places great reliance on the point that a California court has no jurisdiction to try a case of murder where the death occurred in another State.

When the announcement of the verdict was flashed on "The Examiner" bulletin board last night the crowd [illegible].

After her arrival at the branch County Jail Mrs. Botkin broke down completely and for some time gave vent to her anguish in sobbing and occasional shrieking.

THE FAINTING OF MRS. BOTKIN AFTER HEARING THE VERDICT OF GUILTY.

J. D. DEANE IS SATISFIED.

The verdict was a surprise to me, but it was an agreeable surprise, for I had been led to believe from common report that it was impossible to convict a guilty person in San Francisco. This impression has been corrected by the verdict that has been rendered. I am not vindictive, for the punishment of this woman could not bring back to me my dead wife; but I believe the verdict is in accordance with the testimony and evidence in the case, and am therefore satisfied.—J. D. Deane, in an interview.

AWAITING THE VERDICT.

Curious Throngs at Night in the Courtroom and Corridors.

After the jury, at 5.06 o'clock, retired for deliberation so many people crowded the corridor in the neighborhood of the jury room that several policemen were detailed to keep them back. Almost at once the jurors were allowed to go to dinner, and it was nearly 7 o'clock before they returned to the City Hall, when they repaired to their chamber.

No hint of the way in which the vote stood was given by the jurors at this time, though there was evidence that they had not been able to agree at the outset of their balloting, for at 8 o'clock a messenger arrived with Juror Buckingham's valise, containing his night shirt and toilet articles. Five minutes later two more gripsacks were delivered to Bailiff Whelan, and he conveyed them to the jury room.

At 7 o'clock the court room doors were opened, and the throng pressed in, filling every available seat in the gallery and in the main auditorium. Then began a time of waiting. There was at first a little nervousness, but presently the people settled down to quiet conversation, and some of the men sought solace in smoking, but this was quickly suppressed by the bailiff.

One woman who has attended every session of the trial from the beginning of the impanelment of the jury, and who gave her name as Mrs. Schwartz, was asked what she thought the verdict would be and what she thought it ought to be. To both questions she replied that she could not make up her mind, saying that she had not been able to fathom the feelings of the jurors by studying their faces and that in her own soul she was not able to say whether Mrs. Botkin ought to be convicted or acquitted.

It was 7.10 o'clock when Mrs. Botkin arrived, accompanied by the officers, her lawyers and her sisters.

At 7.30, the time when the jury was expected to report or ask for further instructions, a hush fell upon the crowd, but this was momentary, for Clerk Tolle informed those in the vicinity of his desk that Judge Cook had resolved not to send for the jury until they manifested a desire to communicate with him, and that if they did not agree by 10 o'clock they would be locked up for the night.

Not the slightest intimation was given of what was going on in the jury room, and the time dragged heavily. Mrs. Botkin sat in her accustomed place, talking to George Knight, her attorney, once in a while turning to her sister and passing some remark on the apparent delay of the jury in making up their minds; but generally her conversation was of other matters.

Naturally Mrs. Botkin was nervous, for the strain was very great, and she showed it in her face. Most of the time she held her sister's hand, and gently plied her fan, for the atmosphere was close.

A feeling became prevalent that the jury would fail to agree, and half of the people in the gallery left, but only men took their departure. Not a woman stirred, but on the contrary they forced themselves forward to take the places vacated by the men.

There was beginning to develop a feeling of impatience, when suddenly at 9.15 the electric bell connecting with the jury room gave two sharp, quick rings, and instantly expectancy was on tiptoe.

Judge Cook, who was in his chambers, was informed that the jury had given a signal of desiring to be heard, and he dispatched the bailiff to ask if an agreement had been reached. An affirmative answer was returned, and the excitement in the crowd became more intense. The Judge ascended the bench and the attorneys took their places, all of them being present. Assistant District Attorney J. A. Hosmer and Attorney-General White of Delaware representing the prosecution, while George A. Knight and Frank McGowan sat by Mrs. Botkin.

The jurors filed in and took their places in the box.

"Gentlemen, have you agreed on a verdict?" asked Judge Cook.

Men and women were standing up, jostling and pressing to get nearer the center of interest, but there was not a sound. In the hush that fell on the throng it seemed almost that the deep breathing of the prisoner could be heard. There seemed to be something in the air that foretold of conviction, but whether it would be life im-[illegible] was rendered.

The feeling in the audience appeared to be more sympathetic than otherwise. If there was any savage exultation over the conviction of this fellow mortal it was not shown by word or deed. The feeling was that of deep sadness, so far as it could be observed, though at the first utterances permitted after adjournment of court there were quiet expressions to the effect that justice had been meted out. After the verdict was made known there was a general acquiescence, where before no definite opinion seemed to prevail.

Mrs. Botkin sat with her hand upon her left side, as if in pain, as the jurors entered the box, but after they had taken their seats she resumed an easy position, and when the word "guilty" was uttered by the clerk she made no sign beyond a slight twitching of the eyes and a short gasp, as if her heart had for the instant failed and her breath was gone. Then she rallied, and cast a defiant glance toward the jurors, but at once turned to her sister, Mrs. McClure.

Attorney Knight filed his formal objection to the verdict on all the legal grounds and Judge Cook set a week from to-day as the time for passing sentence, at which time Mr. Knight gave notice that he would move for a new trial.

Fifteen minutes after the jury had left the room, and while waiting for the wagon which was to convey her to the Branch County Jail, Mrs. Botkin fainted. Sheriff Whelan quickly handed a glass of water to Mrs. McClure, in whose arms she was resting. Mr. Knight fanned the unconscious woman, and the Rev. Mr. McClure and Mrs. Roberts also offered assistance. When Mrs. Botkin recovered consciousness five minutes later she blurted out:

"Why didn't you give me an American jury? I told you I wanted an American jury."

FATHER OF THE DEAD WOMEN SPEAKS.

It would hardly be becoming in me to make any statement or voice any opinion in regard to the result of the trial, but I can say that I believe the jury has done its duty fairly and conscientiously. That is all I can say.—J. B. Pennington, father of Mrs. Dunning and Mrs. Deane, in an interview.

ATTORNEY WHITE COMMENDS JURY.

Having a high opinion of the men sworn to try the case, I could not see how they would fail to convict her. I apprehended, however, that the punishment would be fixed at life imprisonment.

Perhaps the revelations as to Dunning's character and the impression this made upon the jury was what led them to decide upon the lesser punishment.

But I am satisfied with the verdict, and commend the jurors for having done their duty.—Attorney-General R. C. White of Delaware in an interview.

DUNNING NEVER DOUBTED THAT MRS. BOTKIN WAS THE WOMAN WHO CRUELLY MURDERED HIS WIFE.

The only comment I care to make upon the verdict of guilty against Mrs. Botkin, is that it is certainly in accord with the testimony which I gave in the case myself. I have no feeling of exultation in the matter. I did not take this long journey to San Francisco to testify in the case in any spirit of vengeance, for the punishment of a hundred women will not give me back my wife or restore the mother to the child.

I knew before I came here the miserable, degrading story that I would have to tell, and I could have escaped it all by refusing to come. But I had no wish to shield the murderer of my wife, and I felt it my duty to come here and tell the unhappy story which has brought so much shame and disgrace upon me and to atone in some measure for my faults and follies of the past.

From the first moment that I learned the circumstances attending the death of my wife and sister-in-law, I never had the shadow of a doubt as to who it was that caused their cruel murder.

From the first I have given the authorities, both in Delaware and California, all the assistance in my power. I have been subjected to criticism of the most virulent kind, particularly during the last few days, when Mrs. Botkin's attorneys were making their arguments. There was not one word of truth in many of the things they said about me, but I will reply to none of them and will make no effort to defend myself against their unjust attacks.

I will leave here as soon as possible, return to my old home, where this whole horrible story is told by two graves in the little country church-yard, along the banks of the Delaware river. Then I will devote the remainder of my life to the happiness of all I have left, the little girl who bears on her face the imprint of her angel mother and who climbs upon my knee and asks me if her mamma has gone to heaven.

JOHN P. DUNNING.

ARGUMENT OF HOSMER.

Brilliant Presentation of the Great Case by the Prosecutor.

John Allen Hosmer, slicked and brushed and clean, prosecutor in the case where Mrs. Cordelia Botkin was charged with murder, made a name for himself yesterday. It was this dark man's first chance at a cause which filled all the public eye. Hitherto his superiors in office have stepped in to take the honors of the cases which meant advertisement and position. Specially engaged attorneys often have clouded his dreams of filling the general view. He has frittered away the years in an effort to drive common scoundrels into a common jail.

But yesterday there was nothing to hinder. The Attorney-General of Delaware, who had opened the case for the prosecution was a something to be brushed away. The shouters for the defense had mouthed their best abstractions, had called the demons from the nether deeps and the angels from the farther blue, had summoned all the gusty metaphors and clangorous hyperboles—and then had left the case to him.

And John Allen Hosmer, prosecutor in the case of the people against Cordelia Botkin, charged with murder, without one thrill of voice, with no engaging gesture, in cold

Call

O, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1898. PRICE FIVE CENTS.

MRS. CORDELIA BOTKIN IS GUILTY OF THE CRUEL DELAWARE MURDERS

Jury Fixes Penalty for the Heinous Crime at Imprisonment for the Term of the Inhuman Perpetrator's Natural Life----The Condemned Woman Receives the Verdict With Tearless Eyes and Unnatural Composure.

Her Attorneys Affirm That the Verdict Is Not in Keeping With either the Law or the Evidence Submitted by the Prosecution in This Case, Which Has Attracted the Attention of the Whole World Owing to the Viciousness of the Methods Employed by This Modern Borgia—Sentence Will Be Pronounced on the Seventh Day of January.

We find the defendant, Cordelia Botkin, guilty of murder in the first degree, and fix her punishment at imprisonment for the term of her natural life.

WITH these words a jury fastened upon Mrs. Cordelia Botkin yesterday one of the most cruel crimes of the century—the murder of Mrs. John P. Dunning and Mrs. Joshua Deane at Dover, Del., on the night of August 9. This modern Borgia sent through the mails a box of chocolate bonbons, the contents of which were

There was a peremptory tone to its ring and those experienced in the ways of juries at once said it meant a verdict had been decided upon and that it was not likely to be favorable to Mrs. Botkin. A moment before those in the courtroom stood about in little groups discussing the possibility of the jury being out all night. This seemed likely as valises full of clothes were being brought in from time to time.

At the premonitory signal from the bell a hush fell upon those in the room. Mrs. Botkin fidgeted about in her chair and apparently could find no comfortable attitude. Her hand went to her head and she fingered nervously at her mouth. Attorneys Knight and McGowan were in their accustomed places, as were her sisters, Mrs. McClure and Mrs. Robarts, and their husbands.

The silence was oppressive. It was could utter no words of sympathy or cheer to the condemned woman. The prisoner's face was sphinx-like and betrayed no motion, no feeling. The room was cleared. No one seemed brave enough to break in upon Mrs. Botkin and disturb her thoughts, whatever they may have been. She sat perfectly upright with her hands on the table opening and shutting as though clutching at something unseen by human eyes. She fanned herself automatically and suddenly went off into a faint. But this was but momentarily, and she was soon herself again.

Her attorneys consoled her with the statement that the verdict was not in keeping with the law or the evidence, and they hinted at great pressure having been brought to bear on the jury through the public sentiment that had been aroused by the miscarriage of justice in the Rosser and other cases lately.

George H. Knight was the most disappointed person in the courtroom (not even excepting the prisoner herself) when the decision was handed in. Immediately after the verdict he was asked to express his opinion about it, and said:

"Well, all I have to say is that it is against the law and against the evidence."

When asked if he expected it he replied emphatically that he did not, although later on he was heard to say, with an assurance that was no doubt assumed, that he rather looked for it; but he would not give the reason for his nesses with impunity when trying a case before a jury of business men. If it teaches him and men of his kind that those tactics are not the proper ones to employ, the lesson will not have been wasted."

When Mrs. Botkin was ready for the road her sisters asked as a favor that they be allowed to accompany her on the journey to the Branch Jail at Ingleside. This boon was readily granted by Sheriff Whelan. When the time came to move Mrs. Botkin had recovered her wonted composure and gave no outward sign of the emotions within her. She gathered her skirts about her and with the grand air which had become a habit with her she said, "I'm ready." With her little escort she left the room and made her way out of the building by the exit near the Hall of Records. From here they went to Market street and thence down Seventh to the Mission-street cars. She walked between a Deputy Sheriff, who has been her custodian from the first, and Brother-in-law Robarts. Some of the loungers on the street corners recognized her as she passed, but to the majority she was but an ordinary personage.

The greater portion of the day was given over to the closing argument of Mr Hosmer. At its conclusion a recess of ten minutes was taken before Judge Cook commenced to deliver his charge to the jury. The hum of conversation commenced immediately and was not hushed until the jurymen commenced to file back to their seats. For the second time during the trial Mrs. Botkin removed her veil.

The great strain to which her overstrung nerves had been subjected during the long day showed in her face, and she looked her two-score years. The charge, which Judge Cook read from manuscript, required an hour in its presentation. The woman's attorneys knew that portions of it decided certain disputed points in the testimony favorable to her and they were confident, or affected an air of confidence, in the outcome of the jury's deliberations.

Not so Mrs. Botkin. Her face assumed an ashen pallor and her lips twitched almost continuously.

There Was an Impressive Silence in the Courtroom as the Clerk Read the Words Condemning Mrs. Botkin.

Perpetrator's Nat... Witarless Eyes and Unnaural Composure.

Her Attorneys Affirm That the VeIs Not in Keeping With ither the Law or the Evidence Sbmitted by the Prosecution in This Case, WHas Attracted the Attention (the Whole World Owing to the Viciousness of the Methods Eed by This Modern Borgi—Sentence Will Be Pronounced on the Seventh Day of anuary.

We find the defendant, Cordelia Botkin, guilty of murder in the first degree, and fix her punishment at imprisonment for the term of her natural life.

WITH these words a jury fastened upon Mrs. Cordelia Botkin yesterday one of the most cruel crimes of the century—the murder of Mrs. John P. Dunning and Mrs. Joshua Deane at Dover, Del., on the night of August 9. This modern Borgia sent through the mails a box of chocolate bonbons, the contents of which were

There ring an of juries had bee not like kin. A courtro discussi being o as valid brought

At th hell a h Mrs. Bo and app able att head un mouth. Gowan w as were Mrs. Ro peremptory tone to its experienced in the ways e said it meant a verdict ed upon and that it was e favorable to Mrs. Botnt before those in the d about in little groups possibility of the jury ght. This seemed likely of clothes were being m time to time.

The sil

onitory signal from the upon those in the room. geted about in her chair could tind no comfort- Her hand went to her ngered nervously at her eys Knight and Mc- their accustomed places, ters, Mrs. McClure and nd their husbands.

vas oppressive. It was could uttemo words of sympathy or cheer to th condemned woman. The prisoner's fe was sphinx-like and betrayed no motion, no feeling. The room was clenred. No one seemed brave enou to break in upon Mrs. Botkin and sturb her thoughts, whatever they my have been. She sat perfectly uprigt with her hands on the table openir and shutting as though clutching atosmething unseen by human eyes. Se fnuned herself automatically and sddenly went off into a faint. But tis was but momentarily, and she was oon herself again.

Her attorys consoled her with the statement tht the verdict was not in keeping withthe law or the evidence, and they hinted at great pressure having been hrght to hear on the jury through the ublic sentiment that had been aroused by the miscarriage of nesses with impunity when trying a case before a jury of business men. If it teaches him and men of his kind that those tactics are not the proper ones to employ, the lesson will not have been wasted."

When Mrs. Botkin was ready for the road her sisters asked as a favor that they be allowed to accompany her on the journey to the Branch Jail at Ingleside. This boon was readily granted by Sheriff Whelan. When the time came to move Mrs. Botkin had recovered her wonted composure unit gave no outward sign of the emotions within her. She gathered her skirts about her and with the grand air which had become a habit with her she said, "I'm ready." With her little escort she left the room and made her way out of the building by the exit near the Hall of Records. From here they went to Market street and thence down Seventh to the Mission-street cars. She walked between a Deputy Sheriff, who has been her custodian from the first, and Brother-in-law Roburts. Some of the loungers on the street corners recognized her as she passed, but to the majority she was but an ordinary personage.

The greater portion of the day was given over to the closing argument of Mr. Hosmer. At its conclusion a recess of ten minutes was taken before Judge Cook commenced to deliver his charge to the jury. The hum of conversation commenced immediately and was not hushed until the jurymen commenced to file back to their seats. For the second time during the trial Mrs. Botkin removed her veil.

There Was an Impressive Silence in the Courtroom as the Clerk Read the Words Condemning Mrs. Botkin.

justice in the Rosser and other cases lately.

George H. Knight was the most disappointed person in the courtroom (not even excepting the prisoner herself) when the decision was handed in. Immediately after the verdict he was asked to express his opinion about it, and said:

"Well, all I have to say is that it is against the law and against the evidence."

When asked if he expected it he replied emphatically that he did not, although later on he was heard to say, with an assurance that was no doubt assumed, that he rather looked for it; but he would not give the reason for his change of sentiment.

"There have been errors of law made in this case," he continued, "and on that we will base our appeal for a new trial."

When asked for a particular instance of those errors he said: "The Judge erred when he did not state in his charge, as I requested him to do, that there was absolutely and positively no evidence that Mrs. Botkin had purchased any lump arsenic in the Owl drug store."

The attorney then abused one of the jurors. "Why, this juryman," he said, "owes a large amount of money to members of the police force, but I will not say any more, and I have advised my client to keep a discreet silence."

Knight assumed a general air of indifferent terity throughout his conversation on the subject, but it was apparent he did not express his real feelings at the verdict.

If the jury came in for criticism from Mr. Knight he in turn was criticized by them. As they were leaving the room after being dismissed one of them remarked, "This will teach George Knight that he cannot bulldoze wit-

The great strain to which her overstrung nerves had been subjected during the long day showed in her face, and she looked her two-score years. The charge, which Judge Cook read from manuscript, required an hour in its presentation. The woman's attorneys knew that portions of it decided certain disputed points in the testimony favorable to her and they were confident, or affected an air of confidence, in the outcome of the jury's deliberations.

Not so Mrs. Botkin. Her face assumed an ashen pallor and her lips twitched almost continuously.

She could not cry, although there was at all times a suspicion of moisture in her eyes. For a time she watched the Judge and then bent a steady gaze on the jurymen, as though to learn from their faces what the fates had in store for her. The solemnity of the closing words of the charge did not seem to strike home to her heart. As the jurymen left the courtroom to commence their deliberations Mrs. Botkin leaned her head on the back of her chair and her lips moved as if in prayer. The pallor on her features, which seemed swollen, increased and for a time it seemed as if she would faint.

Her faithful sister came to her relief and in a moment she stood up and moved about in a sprightly manner. At the suggestion of the Sheriff she was taken to his office, where she and her relatives could commune in privacy.

The charge of Judge Carroll Cook was an important one. If there was any leaning, the tendency was toward the woman on trial for her life. In opening the Judge congratulated the jurymen that their duties would soon end and thanked them for their atten-heavily charged with arsenic. The prosecution weaved a remarkable web of circumstantial evidence about the woman upon whom suspicion was first directed and she was convicted last night. As a motive for the crime they showed her infatuation for John P. Dunning, the husband of one of the unfortunate victims.

Her manner when the verdict was announced was in keeping with her actions from the start. There was no sob—no piteous moan as of a heart and spirit crushed by the enormity of the crime thus brought home to her. The leaning which she has toward the melodramatic was with her to the end. As Oscar Tolle read the verdict of the jury with all its dreadful import she watched him as though transfixed and as immovable as stone. When the jury was being polled she bent a look of supreme disdain upon the men who had weighed the evidence against her and had said "thou art the woman."

At fourteen minutes past nine the courtroom bell which is connected with the jury-room rang out sharp and clear. Some minutes before the door opened and the jury filed in. The relatives and supporters of the woman accused sat with their backs toward the door and gave no token of their knowledge that the men were coming in. Those who could see the faces of the jurymen knew at once what the verdict was at which they had arrived. There was a set expression which told of an unpleasant duty performed in keeping with the trust and responsibility reposed in them. They were asked if they had arrived at a verdict and Foreman Kennedy arose and said they had. He handed a slip of paper to Clerk Tolle, who in turn passed it to Judge Cook. He read it to himself and then ordered it read aloud.

The words of such terrible import were spoken and nothing broke the stillness save the order of the Judge that it be recorded. This required some moments and no one in the court room stirred. Attorney Knight looked neither to the right nor the left. Mrs. Botkin cast one long look at the jury and then gazed at the desk before her. Her sisters were struck dumb and Francisco Chronicle.

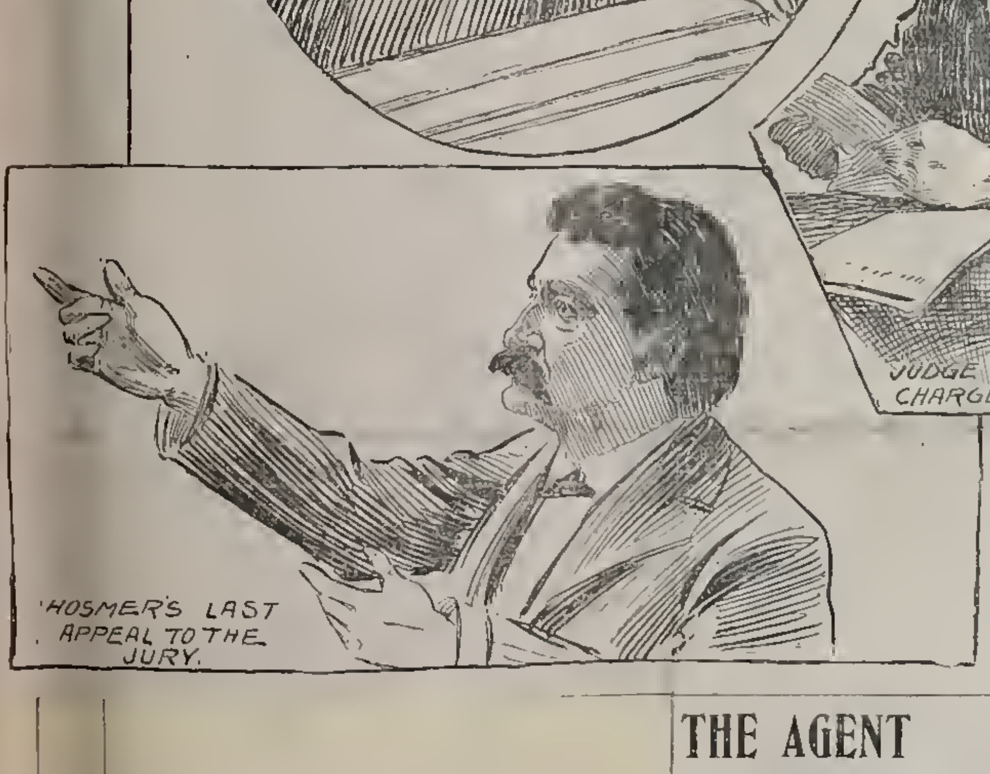
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SATURDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1898. NO. 169.

MRS. BOTKIN SENT TO PRISON FOR LIFE.



VERDICT OF THE JURORS.

Convicted of Murder, but Saved From the Gallows.

SWIFT JUSTICE FOR THE WOMAN POISONER.

SHE MEETS HER FATE WITH A DISPLAY OF MUCH STOICISM.

It Took Twelve Men Four Hours to Agree as to the Author of the Dover Tragedies.

Cordelia Botkin bears the mark of Cain, but she is not to die on the gallows. Instead, she is doomed to pass her days in the women's quarter in San Quentin, between the dark yard and the sunny cells. She is spared an ignominious death on the scaffold, but to Cordelia Botkin the terrible seclusion, away from the teeming world she loves, deprived of the society of men, condemned to association with the most repulsive of women, is more than death.

It is said to be a compromise verdict, given because at the last moment men who had declared on oath that they would hang a woman as quickly as they would shoot a cat, shrunk from the ultimate test.

After but four hours of deliberation, half of which was spent in comforting the inner man, the jurors returned to the crowded court with downcast faces, and it did not take an expert in character to read the verdict in their hanging heads and sorrowful eyes. As the twelve filed into the room each one glanced at the defendant out of the corner of his eye.

The Verdict a Great Surprise.

The verdict was a tremendous surprise. The wiseacres had predicted a delay of at least a day, and then a hung jury, to be followed by a hurried second trial, in which no one would take any interest and from which the defendant would go scathless. The wiseacres were all wrong. It simply shows that no one can tell what twelve men are going to do. It is probable that the speedy conclusion surprised the jurors themselves. They had been sending home for packed grips and boxes of cigars, and everybody supposed they were settling themselves for an all-night siege, when suddenly the bell in the courtroom rang two distinct peals and everybody sat up as though they were shot, for a verdict at this time could mean nothing but conviction. Acquittals are either on the spur of the moment or not at all—it is hard to argue a set man into a conviction of innocence.

It was at precisely 5:05 o'clock when the Judge's hour-long charge came to an end and the jurymen filed out in a solemn row—not through the familiar back door through which they have been going these many days, but out through the ceremonious entrance, through the swinging baize doors into the stone corridor. People settled themselves for a wait, for that memorable Durrant jury, which came trooping back in exactly fifteen minutes, has never been quite forgotten. And when every nerve was a-quiver and every neck a-crane, it was announced that the jury—had gone to dinner. From that the defense took hope, for men are supposed to view all things kindly after dinner.

At 7:30 o'clock the court began to sit again—to sit in that half-hearted way peculiar to waiting on the jury. Judge Cook was in his chambers. There was smoking within the sacred precincts of the court, and the light gleamed yellow through grimy globes but seldom used. Some of the "steadies" of the trial were so sure that there would be nothing until Saturday that they had gone home to superintend their dinners, and failed to come back.

Met the Verdict With Stoicism.

They cleared the courtroom, of course, but those who looked down on the convicted one will never forget the sight. Some say that innocence behaves that way in horrible desperation, others that it was the steely nerves of guilt springing back from the terrible tension, but it did not matter particularly which it was—it was a human being wounded to the quick—a soul in mortal agony.

She took it like a stoic. Through the evening hours, as she waited, none was as blithe as she. Either she was ...

---

liament closed to-day. The Budget expenses are 325,000 contos. The receipts are estimated at 351,000 contos. Extradition with the United States and other republics was approved.

If you want to post your friends about the resources of California send them a copy of the New Year's "Chronicle."

DUAL MONARCHY TO STILL SHARE EXPENSES.

Imperial Decree Maintaining the Present Proportion Between Austria and Hungary.

BUDAPEST, December 30.—The Official Gazette will publish to-morrow, the day when the provisional Ausgleich between Austria and Hungary expires, an imperial decree maintaining the present proportion between the respective shares of expenditures devolving upon the two members of the dual monarchy.

Indescribable confusion marked the closing scenes in the Lower Chamber of the Hungarian diet to-day. The National, People's and Independent parties protested against the unconstitutional conditions which they alleged would prevail by reason of the fact that the provisional Ausgleich will lapse to-morrow. Baron Banffy, the Premier, attempted to speak, but the tumult was so deafening that he could not be heard and it was necessary to suspend the sitting.

When business was resumed the members of the opposition gathered in the center of the floor and kept up an incessant uproar. After repeated violent efforts the Premier finally succeeded in speaking, and he concluded his statement by declaring that all responsibility for the situation rested upon those who had persistently obstructed public business.

The resources of California will be described in the New Year's edition of the "Chronicle."

KRUEGER URGED TO REFRAIN.

Boers Will Not Burn Jameson in Effigy.

PRETORIA, December 30.—Strong representations have been made to ...

THE AGENT GOT THE COIN

Developments in the Big Robbery at San Antonio.

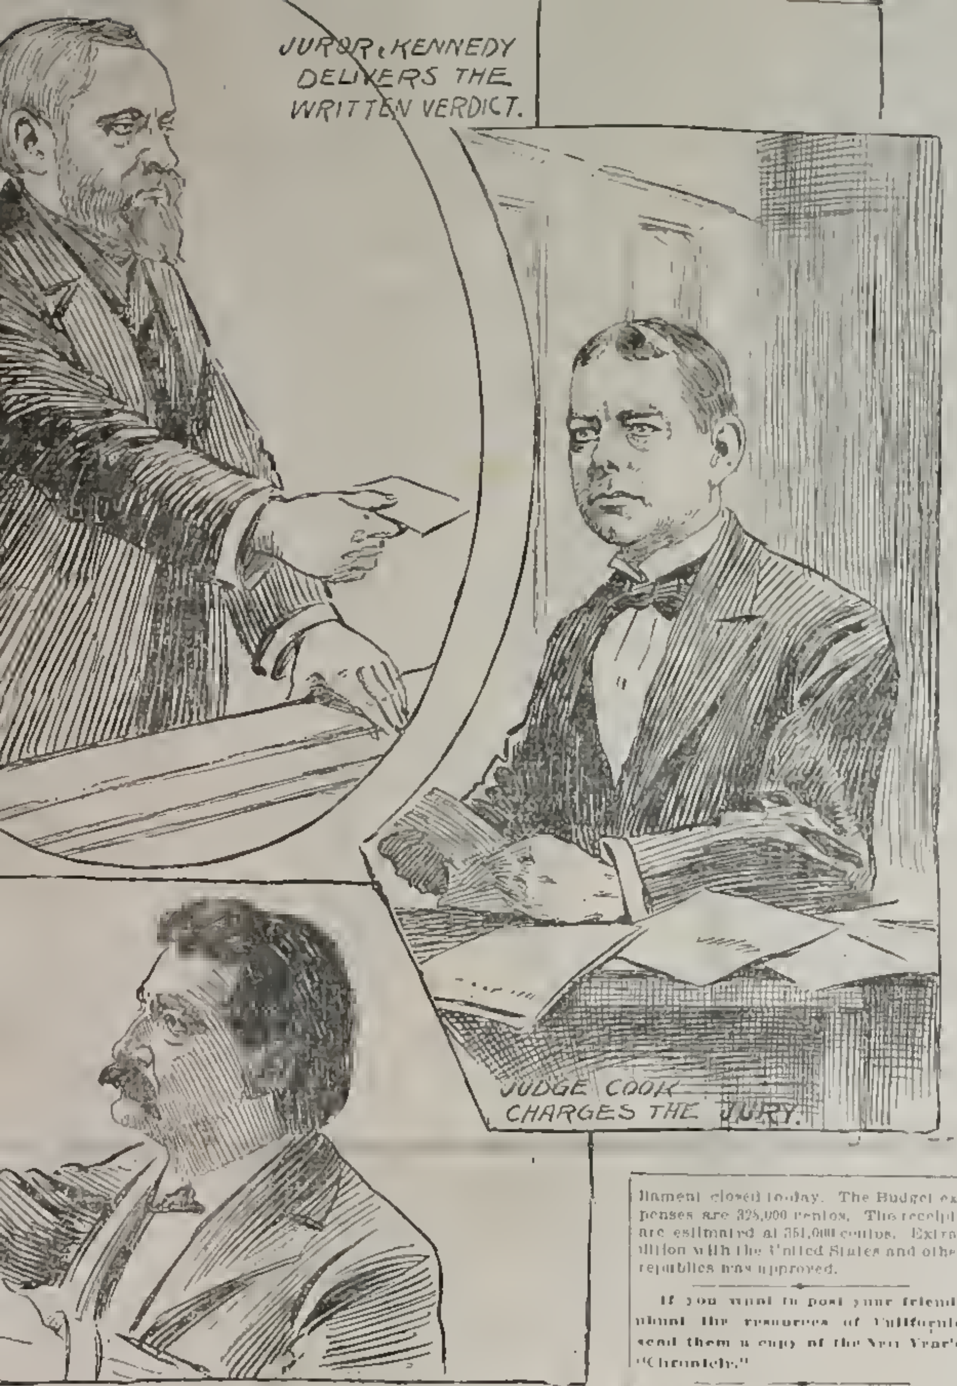
PACKED THE MONEY OFF ON A HORSE.

BEELER SEEN DRIVING NEAR THE SPOT WHERE HIS RIG WAS FOUND.

The Culprit Thoroughly Acquainted With the Border Country and His Capture Believed to Be Difficult.

Special Dispatch to the "Chronicle."

SAN ANTONIO (Tex.), December 30.—It transpired to-day that Charles A. Beeler, the missing Wells-Fargo money delivery clerk, was seen driving his wagon at a point in close proximity to the place where the wagon was discovered by the old negro. This discovery removes all suspicion of foul play and proves conclusively that Beeler left the city with the money. Developments to-day also show that while the Southern Pacific package secured contained $50,000, Beeler had other packages containing minor sums none of which ...



VERDICT OF THE JURORS.

Convicted of Murder, but Saved From the Gallows.

SWIFT JUSTICE FOR THE WOMAN POISONER.

SHE MEETS HER FATE WITH A DISPLAY OF MUCH STOICISM.

It Took Twelve Men Four Hours to Agree as to the Author of the Dover Tragedies.

Cordelia Botkin bears the mark of Cain, but she is not to die on the gallows. Instead, she is doomed to pass her days in the women's quarter in San Quentin, between the dark yard and the sunny cells. She is spared an ignominious death on the scaffold, but to Cordelia Botkin the terrible seclusion, away from the teeming world she loves, deprived of the society of men, condemned to association with the most repulsive of women, is more than death.

It is said to be a compromise verdict, given because at the last moment men who had declared on oath that they would hang a woman as quickly as they would shoot a cat, shrank from the ultimate test.

After but four hours of deliberation, half of which was spent in comforting the inner man, the jurors returned to the crowded court with downcast faces, and it did not take an expert in character to read the verdict in their hanging heads and sorrowful eyes. As the twelve filed into the room each one glanced at the defendant out of the corner of his eye.

The Verdict a Great Surprise.

The verdict was a tremendous surprise. The wiseacres had predicted a delay of at least a day, and then a hung jury, to be followed by a hurried second trial, in which no one would take any interest and from which the defendant would go scathless. The wiseacres were all wrong. It simply shows that no one can tell what twelve men are going to do. It is probable that the speedy conclusion surprised the jurors themselves. They had been sending home for packed grips and boxes of cigars, and everybody supposed they were settling themselves for an all-night siege, when suddenly the bell in the courtroom rang in distinct peals and everybody sat up as though they were shot, for a verdict at this time could mean nothing but conviction. Acquittals are either on the spur of the moment or not at all—it is hard to argue a set man into a conviction of innocence.

It was at precisely 5:05 o'clock when the Judge's hour-long charge came to an end and the jurymen filed out in a solemn row—not through the familiar back door through which they have been going these many days, but out through the ceremonious entrance, through the swinging baize doors into the stone corridor. People settled themselves for a wait, for that memorable Durrant jury, which came trooping back in exactly fifteen minutes, has never been quite forgotten. And when every nerve was a-quiver and every neck a-crane, it was announced that the jury had gone to dinner. From that the defense took hope, for men are supposed to view all things kindly after dinner.

At 7:30 o'clock the court began to sit again—to sit in that half-hearted way peculiar to waiting on the jury. Judge Cook was in his chambers. There was smoking within the sacred precincts of the court, and the light gleamed yellow through grimy globes but seldom used. Some of the "steadies" of the trial were so sure that there would be nothing until Saturday that they had gone home to superintend their dinners, and failed to come back.

Met the Verdict With Stoicism.

They cleared the courtroom, of course, but those who looked down on the convicted one will never forget the sight. Some say that innocence behaves that way in horrible desperation, others that it was the steely nerves of guilt springing back from the terrible tension; but it did not matter particularly which it was—it was a human being wounded to the quick—a soul in mortal agony.

She took it like a stoic. Through the evening hours, as she waited, none was so blithe as she. Either she was perfectly confident or else she acted as actress never did before. She held a

THE AGENT GOT THE COIN

Developments in the Big Robbery at San Antonio.

PACKED THE MONEY OFF ON A HORSE.

BEELER SEEN DRIVING NEAR THE SPOT WHERE HIS RIG WAS FOUND.

The Culprit Thoroughly Acquainted With the Border Country and His Capture Believed to Be Difficult.

Special Dispatch to the "Chronicle."

SAN ANTONIO (Tex.), December 30.—It transpired to-day that Charles A. Beeler, the missing Wells-Fargo money delivery clerk, was seen driving his wagon at a point in close proximity to the place where the wagon was discovered by the old negro. This discovery removes all suspicion of foul play and proves conclusively that Beeler left the city with the money. Developments to-day also show that while the Southern Pacific package secured contained $50,000, Beeler had other packages containing minor sums, none of which were delivered. The affidavit lodged by the Wells-Fargo people charges the embezzlement of $50,000. It is current that he also had with him additional moneys aggregating $10,000.

The city is full of detectives, all drawn by the large reward of $5000 offered. Beeler is known to be well acquainted with every foot of the border country, and that he is making for Mexico seems to be the general belief. Every precaution has been taken to prevent his crossing over. Investigation shows that a horse was mounted near where the wagon was found and the animal was traced to the public road near by and leading to the west in the direction of the border.

Beeler's absolute familiarity with the Western country, and his large acquaintance there, will, it is expected, render difficult his capture. While the authorities are convinced that he had an accomplice, nothing in the way of substantiation is known.

Brazilian Parliament Closes.

RIO JANEIRO, December 30.—Parliament closed to-day. The Budget expenses are 325,000 contos. The receipts are estimated at 351,000 contos. Extradition with the United States and other republics was approved.

If you want to post your friends about the resources of California send them a copy of the New Year's "Chronicle."

DUAL MONARCHY TO STILL SHARE EXPENSES.

Imperial Decree Maintaining the Present Proportion Between Austria and Hungary.

BUDAPEST, December 30.—The Official Gazette will publish to-morrow, the day when the provisional Ausgleich between Austria and Hungary expires, an imperial decree maintaining the present proportion between the respective shares of expenditures devolving upon the two members of the dual monarchy.

Indescribable confusion marked the closing scenes in the Lower Chamber of the Hungarian diet to-day. The National, People's and Independent parties protested against the unconstitutional conditions which they alleged would prevail by reason of the fact that the provisional Ausgleich will lapse to-morrow. Baron Banffy, the Premier, attempted to speak, but the tumult was so deafening that he could not be heard and it was necessary to suspend the sitting.

When business was resumed the members of the opposition gathered in the center of the floor and kept up an incessant uproar. After repeated violent efforts the Premier finally succeeded in speaking, and he concluded his statement by declaring that all responsibility for the situation rested upon those who had persistently obstructed public business.

The resources of California will be described in the New Year's edition of the "Chronicle."

KRUEGER URGED TO REFRAIN.

Boers Will Not Burn Jameson in Effigy.

PRETORIA, December 30.—Strong representations have been made to President Krueger, urging him to forbid the proposed celebration on January 2d of the defeat of the Jameson raid, when, at the suggestion of the Pretoria Volksstein, the project was to burn Dr. Jameson in effigy.

Owing to the President's action the celebration has been abandoned. There is no doubt that such an observance of Jameson day, as planned, would have led to serious riots.

MRS. LESLIE CARTER'S DEBTS.

The Actress Owes Over Sixty Thousand Dollars.

NEW YORK, December 30.—A meeting of the creditors of Caroline D. Carter, better known as Mrs. Leslie Carter, the actress, was held to-day at the office of the Referee in Bankruptcy, N. A. Prentiss. Several creditors appeared by attorneys, but no claims were proved, and as schedules disclosed no assets a trustee was not appointed. Her liabilities are $63,773. Mrs. Carter was not present.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Facts Are With Us.

They rest upon the surest evidence it is possible to produce, namely, the testimony of those who know. Thousands of people say Hood's Sarsaparilla has cured them of scrofula, catarrh, rheumatism, dyspepsia and other diseases caused by impure or impoverished blood, and now they are in perfect health. You may be one of this number if you will take little soiree. Her attorneys paid her attentions, a little group of friends hovered about her, and the defendant smiled and beckoned and nodded and smiled that strange smile of hers, and looked younger and prettier in the mellow gaslight than during the entire trial. She had even uncovered her hands for the first time and showed them the small, square, cushiony, playful, kittenish hands of a woman who considers herself fascinating. She was flirting with Knight and trying to coquette with McGowan, when suddenly, from a clear sky, this terrible bolt fell upon her. Not since the days at 927 Geary street has she had as good a time as she had last night, and as she can never have again, and just as she was glittering and smiling and preening came those two warning bells which must have carried terror to her soul, as they did to the hearts of nearly every other person present.

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Is America's Greatest Medicine. Sold by all dealers in medicine.

Hood's Pills are the only pills to take with Hood's Sarsaparilla.

Instantly there was wild confusion. Some one sent out for the official reporter. Judge Cook came hurrying in, shaken out of the fixed stare of his judicial expression. Knight came rushing in from a side room, for he knew that this speedy determination boded no good. His face was set and anxious and he bent over Mrs. Botkin and warned her of what might come. The word was passed around the room that the jury had reached a verdict. Women in seats by the stove had a nervous chill and there were plenty of chattering teeth, but they were not Mrs. Botkin's. It was full five minutes from the tap of the bell to the entrance of the jury, and in that time Mrs. Botkin aged ten years. All the smiles died out of her face and she slowly petrified. She gritted her teeth and set her jaws until one could see the tense muscles in her cheeks. Her attorneys, her sisters, braced themselves for the blow and a deathly silence settled over the courtroom, while the faint blue wreaths from still lighted cigars floated up like incense. The Judge warned the crowd against a demonstration whatever the verdict might be, but it is doubtful if those whose tongues cleave to the roofs of their mouths could make a demonstration if they tried.

Of all those interested in the prosecution only the District Attorney, Dunning and Dr. Wolf were present. When the verdict was at last announced Dunning rubbed his cheek and heaved a tremendous sigh, whether of satisfaction or relief or of pity no one could tell. Then he slipped away without one look in Mrs. Botkin's direction.

Handed the Verdict to the Clerk.

The jurors stumbled over their chairs to get to their seats, and in the great silence made a noise that jarred on every nerve. The foreman, J. F. Kennedy, an old man, with a huge grizzled head, rose in his seat and said that the jury had reached a verdict, but no one wanted to read it. Here was no impressive denunciation as in the Durrant case. Instead, Mr. Kennedy handed a folded slip of paper to the clerk, who handed it to the Judge, who read it, dropped it as though it were a live coal, and handed it back to the clerk. And it devolved on Oscar Tolle to tell Mrs. Botkin her fate. He read it, two words at a time, and it sounded as though "We—the jury—find—the defendant—Cordelia Botkin—guilty of murder—in the first degree." It seemed hours before there came that little saving clause, "And we assess the punishment at imprisonment in the State penitentiary for the term of your natural life." The words trickled slowly down over Mrs. Botkin's heart, and she sat with rigid muscles and eyes that never wavered, a graven image of a woman. For a long time she sat there listening while the jury was polled and each man mumbled something affirmative in response to his name. There was another terrible silence, and then the Judge set a week from to-day as the time for sentence. There were some commonplaces from the jury, and still Mrs. Botkin never moved. Her sisters sat quite as still beside her, and only the lips of the Rev. Mr. McClure moved and his eyes were raised as if in prayer, while a strange, peaceful smile spread over his face. But for Mrs. Botkin there were no consolations of religion.

Mrs. Roberts, with a face contracted with grief and horror, asked that the courtroom be cleared, and it was. Sheriff Whelan and Thomas Whelan, the bailiff, who had been in charge of the jury, saw to it themselves. Then it was that Mrs. Botkin leaned back against Mrs. Roberts' shoulder, and the cry went up for water. There was a flickering of the eyelids, a convulsive trembling, a nervous collapse, but no merciful unconsciousness.

She Looks Fit for Any Crime.

Afterward all sorts of wild rumors flew around the corridors that the defendant had fainted, but there was no period of unconsciousness. The water revived her. In a moment she sat erect, opened her eyes wide with a peculiar muscular motion she has, set her mouth in a ghastly smile and clutched madly at air and table. It was in that moment that she looked fit for any crime, but it was a moment when no one could have had the heart to judge her. Even with the momentary relaxation, it was a strange exhibition of nerve.

Her attorneys were talking loudly about her, buoying her up with hope they scarcely felt. "It is but the beginning," said Knight. "This is but the result of that horrible Rosser trial—the idea that somebody must be punished for something. But it is all wrong, and it shall be shown so. Why, those jurors, with all the outside pressure against them, what could they do? Some of them have money in the Police Department, and have failed again and

THE CHARGE OF THE COURT TO THE JURY.

JUDGE COOK'S charge to the jury occupied over an hour. He began with the usual admonitions, the jurors being warned against considering evidence which had been ruled out and cautioned as to the difference between evidence and comments of counsel. Then came a long list of instructions given at the request of the defense. The most important of these was the instruction that the law presumes that a letter postmarked San Francisco was mailed in that city and that the presumption could only be overcome by positive proof to the contrary. The instruction that everything must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt was repeated often and jurors were told to consider the testimony of experts with caution and to make up their own opinions, based on examination and comparison of the handwritings accepted in evidence.

After reading the indictment the Court defined the meaning of a possible doubt, saying that probably no criminal charge could be proved to an absolute certainty. What was demanded, he said, was that the jurors should have a moral certainty of the guilt of the defendant before finding a verdict of guilty. As to the question of motive an extract was read from a charge delivered a few years ago by Judge D. J. Murphy in which it is held that while it was a truth that sane people always had a motive for crime there might be cases in which it was impossible to establish a motive.

The Court briefly compared positive and circumstantial evidence, and in that connection read the rule as laid down by Chief Justice Shaw of Massachusetts in the celebrated Webster case. There were further readings ending with extracts from the Criminal Code, and samples of verdicts which the jury might render. The closing remarks were on the duty of jurors.

There were men on the jury willing to vote for hanging, but something of Christmas peace on earth, good will to men prevailed.

But, given life imprisonment, the long battle for Mrs. Botkin's freedom is but just commenced. Everything will be tried that the law knows. The Delaware witnesses may go home satisfied, but desperate efforts will be made for a new trial and to keep Mrs. Botkin from San Quentin.

It is said that Mrs. Botkin was convicted through one little word that she wrote twice—the word "Love." Once she wrote it on the poor little ball of the baby note. Again she wrote it in a postscript to a letter to her sister, Mrs. McClure. The deadly parallel of those words convicted her. It convinced the jury more than any other one thing. It was love that prompted Mrs. Botkin to the deed and it was love through which she was detected.

Flights of Oratory Entirely Absent.

District Attorney Hosmer made the closing speech of the trial—a speech that was memorable and probably had a great effect on the after results of the day. It was the direct antithesis of all that had preceded it. Hosmer had no Pegasus and he rode no hobby. After the flights of oratory and the feathers that had fallen from wordy plumes, the coolness of Hosmer was a relief. He merely dissected, and his scalpel, while keen, was not wielded with the dagger-like thrusts of the men who had preceded him. Hosmer did not insult any one. Instead, he defended. To him all geese were swans, and he painted in rosy colors the virtues of that "little girl," Sylvia Dettner, that much-abused young man, Rosello, and all those who had been besmirched during the trial. Only as to Mrs. Seeley and Mrs. Arbogast was there a significant silence. When Hosmer was not building up his own case stone by stone, in careful and laborious process, he was busily scraping mud from those who had assisted him, and he had much to say as to the degeneracy of the American bar which permits and even approves such conduct.

Hosmer's statement of the case was not always strictly within the evidence, but his argument had the great virtue of coherency, and he progressed logically from point to point. There was no jumping from point to point like a chamois. Hosmer progressed with easy stages, each step sure and certain. It was here a foothold and there a projecting point for a hand, and never once did he slip or stumble.

Crime Denounced, Criminal Spared.

Through it all was the action of a deliberate and logical mind, calmly analytical, more like a Judge than an advocate, but swinging steadily on to a given point. And, better than all, the overworked Deity who had figured in every sentence during the preceding day, was given a much-needed rest.

Those who had come to hear a roasting of Mrs. Botkin were disappointed. There was bitter denunciation of her crime, but little of the criminal. The crime was diabolical—the criminal was left to the tender mercies of the jury. In regard to Dunning, Hosmer was wisely silent. He commiserated him a little, but judiciously left him in the shadowy background.

In preparation for the occasion, Hosmer's hair was nicely brushed back. Before he had talked long his hair was tumbled over his brow, and he was defying all the influenzas by drinking frozen water. Still he kept steadily on in his cool way, with a voice that rasped but penetrated to the ear insistently and would not be put away. He leaned against the dress circle rail, with the pink candy box, that has taken on a sinister look, before him, and he talked solely to the jury, and not at all to the crowd. When not interrupted, Hosmer is cold-blooded as a fish. It is only when he is interrupted that he gets nervous and excited, and so he went on smoothly spinning the threads that were to entangle Mrs. Botkin's nimble feet.

At first it seemed that Hosmer, like the rest, was going to digress in historical paths and browse in reminiscence. He said something about English history and American colonization, but it was only a brief attack, and he soon recovered. He devoted himself first to the attorneys against him, for Hosmer has borne much during the days of the trial. The very evident disparities be-the supper caused the illness was [illegible]ed by Hosmer, who said:

All the family partook of that supper; only those who ate of the candy were taken sick. There was no evading the issue; the candy spread sickness in the family, and before the end of the fateful week was reached two innocent women had succumbed and died to gratify the lust of a designing woman.

We have seen, or we have read, of the rattlesnake dragging itself along in its slime and preparing to strike its victim. The rattlesnake is one of the most deadly reptiles, and it will strike to kill. But, at least, before it strikes it gives the danger signal. Its rattles sound warning to its victim. So when a person treads upon the serpent in his path, it strikes back with that enmity toward mankind which the Almighty has gifted it with, dating from the time of the first fall.

But the reptile strikes as an act of defense. It does not go out of its way to find its victim. Its victim finds it, and it strikes in obedience to that spirit of self-defense which a divine power has placed in the smallest and meanest of his creatures.

But this cowardly reptile struck the Pennington household in no such fashion. It prefaced its death stroke with words of love. It stole the livery of heaven to serve the devil.

It was not love. It was lust, the lust of a designing woman. To gain her ends it made no difference to her how many innocent victims should be offered up for sacrifice, provided that the one object of her deadly hatred should be stricken.

Hosmer went on to say that there were not half a dozen pieces of candy in the box that were not charged with poison. The mystery that surrounded the deaths could not be understood. The father, who could not understand what had happened, found the candy, and something in the address struck him. He compared it with letters received before and which he had preserved, and found them to be addressed in the same hand. That was where the first suspicion arose.

Motive for Murder Is Outlined.

District Attorney Hosmer asserted that there was no doubt as to the cause of death, every symptom pointing to arsenical poisoning, while both lumps of powdered arsenic had been found in the candies. He said there had been no post-mortem because of the fact that the bodies had been embalmed with embalming fluid containing arsenic.

Hosmer went deep into the subject of motive, reading and repeating testimony showing the love of Mrs. Botkin for Dunning. The anonymous letters were held up as evidence of Mrs. Botkin's desire for Dunning's freedom, in order that she might have him for herself as her husband, without a wife as a rival. Hosmer argued that the anonymous letter written while Mrs. Botkin was in Humboldt county might have been sent to San Francisco to be mailed. The date inside the letter showed little, he said, for the other anonymous letter in evidence bore an inside date one day earlier than the postmark. The word "love" in the note enclosed in the candy-box was compared with that word in the admitted writing of Mrs. Botkin and declared to be conclusive evidence of her guilt. Hosmer made a great point of this, the word of treachery standing as an accuser of the guilty one. In leading up to that point, he said:

This crime was not committed in haste. The poisoner was slow and hesitating, and a long time elapsed before she came to a determination. She was trying to avoid suspicion. It is only natural that she should buy arsenic at the Owl drug store on June 1st and then wait two months before using it. A continent intervened between where the poisoned candy was mailed and where it was to do its work, but the world is not large enough to keep a secret of that kind from exposure. It was a cowardly package with its message of love. It was murder, foul, strange and unnatural.

Attention was called to Dunning's testimony that Mrs. Botkin told him when he returned from Salt Lake that her husband had secured a divorce, the suit naming John P. Dunning as co-respondent. Mrs. Botkin had admitted on the stand that for a time her husband had made her believe that he had secured a divorce. Both letters speak of a divorce.

Both anonymous letters referred to Dunning's paramour as a divorced woman, one of them speaking of Dunning as co-respondent in the divorce suit. Putting these facts together, Hosmer claimed that they showed Mrs. Botkin to be the writer of the anonymous letters, by which it was sought to induce Mrs. Dunning to get a divorce. Hosmer answered every argument made by counsel for the defense, not

MRS. BOTKIN RAGES LIKE A MANIAC IN HER CELL.

BREAKS DOWN UNDER STRAIN

JANUARY 1, 1899—

Her Courage Leaves Her at the Door of the Jail.

ATTORNEYS FOR DEFENSE PLAN THE NEXT MOVE.

HABEAS CORPUS PROCEEDINGS TO COME IN THE SUPREME COURT.

Reliance Placed on the Hope That This State Will Be Held to Be Without Jurisdiction.

All Friday night Mrs. Botkin was on the verge of losing her reason. She was extremely hysterical, shrieking, beating the air, sobbing, tearing her hair and behaving like a mad woman rather than a sane one. She held up in court marvelously, being supported by her pride. The talk about her fainting was sheer nonsense. All that she did to lend color to it was to lean for a few moments on Mrs. Roberts' shoulder and ask for a glass of water. Her eyes were open all the time, her hands moving, and when she was given the glass of water she swallowed without difficulty. No water was thrown in her face, no one beat her hands or rubbed her temples. In a moment or two she sat upright again, beating a tattoo on the table, rolled her eyes, and then appeared as calm as any one. Mrs. Roberts said yesterday: "My sister did not faint at all, nor did she swoon. She merely leaned her head against me and seemed to be gasping for breath, and I asked for a glass of water for her."

After walking quite alone to the car and to the Branch County Jail on the San Bruno road, Mrs. Botkin was placed in the infirmary, where she remained throughout the night, being attended by her two sisters, Mrs. Roberts of Eureka and Mrs. McClure of Healdsburg. During the night she was very violent. She vilified every one in no uncertain language, abused the jury, the Judge and even her own attorneys. But her ravings were those of a delirious child, and her attorneys do not pay the slightest attention to what she says. They know that her distress is but the natural reaction from a long-enforced calm. She is like a spring suddenly released and snapping far out of place. She has been under tremendous tension for days and days, under high nervous excitement for months, and she is, besides, a woman of highly strung and excitable temperament. Mrs. Botkin's calm pulse in the courtroom when the clerk pronounced her doom on Friday night was the result of sheer grit and tremendous physical and mental effort. Her calmness is not the quiet of those who cannot feel—not the unconcern of the bloodless, nerveless temperament. It was pride which kept her from going to pieces in the court.

She threw a glance in the direction of her jurors and would not give them the gratification of a tear. But when she was alone with her sisters she threw off the mask. Under the calm exterior a burning volcano raged. She paced the floor like a caged animal, she shrieked, she wept, she threw herself on the bed. Finally she was quieted, but throughout the night she did not sleep. She was quieter yesterday with the stillness of exhaustion. She had worked her excitement out and was limp with fatigue. She remained in bed during the day and saw only her relatives and most intimate friends. She said that she had been so misunderstood, misjudged and misjudged that she would see no reporters and had no statement to make to the public. She saw no one from any of the papers, and said that any interview or statement purporting to come from her would be entirely false. Mrs. Botkin holds the newspapers responsible for the public opinion against her and the public opinion for the verdict of the jury. She also thinks with Mr. Knight that the recent iniquitous Rosser acquittal had its effect on her conviction, and that she is what Mr. Knight swore she should not be, "a vicarious atonement" for other cases where the Police Department has failed, for one reason or another, to secure a conviction.

Mr. Botkin's attorneys did not visit her yesterday nor send any messages to her. They thought she would be better undisturbed, and they did not care to intrude on her in her grief and terror. They regard her criticisms and railings as perfectly natural under the circumstances. They will call upon her in a few days, when she is calmer.

The reports of interviews with jurors published the morning after the verdict were entirely erroneous and without any basis of fact. It was said that on the first ballot one juror voted for acquittal and two for a verdict of guilty with the punishment fixed at imprisonment for life. This was entirely untrue. The jury took one ballot before going to dinner on Friday night. This ballot was taken immediately after the [illegible] of S. H. Kennedy as chairman, and went merely to the guilt or innocence of Mrs. Botkin. The verdict was all summer. To make his declaration more emphatic he rang for a messenger and sent to his home for his night apparel. The other jurors saw that he was entirely firm, and quickly gave up and came over to his way of thinking. Buckingham's persistency saved Mrs. Botkin's life.

Next to Mrs. Botkin, George Knight was the most astonished person in the courtroom when the verdict was announced. He tried to smile, but the muscles would not work. He was perfectly astounded and looked it. But he quickly pulled himself together, strengthened Mrs. Botkin with his jesting words and his big voice and assured her that this was but the first skirmish. Yesterday Knight was not trying to account for his rebuff. He was planning his next move. He said that he had been told that not a single one of the jurors believed the testimony of Mrs Harris or Bisello. He would say nothing unkind of the jury except that he had been greatly mistaken in it. He thought that Judge Cook's obvious prejudice against the defendant had something to do with her conviction. One juror, he said, was an intimate friend of Judge Cook, and several of them had an inkling that the Judge expected them to convict. And though the defense professed itself satisfied with the instructions it was not satisfied with the dissertation that followed. Of late Knight has been finding things out about some of the jurors—things that worried him. One man had a store under the Baldwin House. Another had failed twice or thrice under suspicious circumstances and could not afford to antagonize the police. A third had been arrested and prosecuted in Sacramento for his conduct in connection with a bank. All these things have been giving Knight food for thought lately, yet he kept up his hope.

And though Mrs. Botkin has been convicted there's a world of difference between conviction and serving a sentence. There are a lot of legal methods left untried, and Mrs. Botkin's attorneys will try them all. As Attorney McGowan said yesterday, "We will fight this to the very last ditch."

Probably this fight will begin next week. Some time during the week a writ of habeas corpus will be sued for in the Supreme Court. It will be alleged that the California courts have no jurisdiction in the case, and the legal fight that will follow will be one of the prettiest ever seen in this State. The case of murdering by mail is without precedent, and what precedent there is for murder begun in one state and completed in another is against the jurisdiction of the courts of the first state. In the section of the code which governs jurisdiction nothing at all is said of jurisdiction over crimes commenced in this State and finished within the boundaries of another. Section 27 of the Penal Code, under which Judge Cook held that he had jurisdiction, is said to apply only to punishment, and the attorneys for Mrs. Botkin will contend, with what success remains to be seen, that this section cannot be stretched to cover jurisdiction which is expressly provided for elsewhere in the code.

George Knight is perfectly confident that the Supreme Court will hold that there is no jurisdiction. If the courts of California have no jurisdiction and Mrs. Botkin cannot be extradited to Delaware she must go free, though morally convicted. Mr. Knight said yesterday that he was absolutely certain that there was no jurisdiction over Mrs. Botkin's crime in California courts. He was also certain that there were several grounds of error in the case—one the refusal of the Judge to charge the jury that it had not been proved that Mrs. Botkin bought lump arsenic. Another of the defense's strong points is that the evidence of Dunning was improperly admitted. It is said that evidence against the character of the defendant is never admissible save when the defendant has himself set up proof of good character. It is said that the admission of the evidence of Dunning on the ground that it went to show motive was improper, because it was not sufficiently closely connected with motive. Mr. Heggerty maintains that it is too far-fetched to show that Mrs. Botkin had an attachment for Dunning, in that other women also were attached to him, and that Dunning, himself, though his conduct might suggest that he wished to be rid of his wife, is not considered to have sufficient motive for the killing. The corpus delicti is another vulnerable point for the defense. It is claimed that the jury is not the ultimate judge of whether the deaths by arsenic poisoning were properly proved or not. Mr. Heggerty says there is not a precedent in all the law books holding that death by poisoning is proved where the symptoms might be those of something else. He says that the only alternative where there is no autopsy is where some one saw the poison administered. The defense did not move for a new trial on Friday night as was reported. The motion will be made before Judge Cook when Mrs. Botkin comes up for sentence. It will undoubtedly be denied, and will then be appealed to the Supreme Court. These are the straws at which the defense catches. The event will prove how good they are.

Meanwhile the Delaware witnesses are hurrying homeward. Of all the fifteen who came across the continent to testify against the poisoner only one greeted the New Year in San Francisco. That one was John P. Dunning. The others began to pack up as soon as the trial ended, and last evening at 6 o'clock ten members of the Delaware party began their journey homeward. In the little crowd were John B. Pennington, Joshua D. Deane, Harry Pennington, Letta Deane, Ethel Millington, Miss Josephine Bateman, Detective B. J. McVey, Thomas M. Gooden, Attorney-General and Mrs. R. C. White and Dr. and Mrs. T. R. Wolf. McVey and Gooden are to go to Delaware by the most direct route and will travel over the central route. The others have more time to spare and will go by way of Denver, so as to get an opportunity to view the famous mountain scenery of Colorado. Drs. Bishop and Downs, who were members of the original party, left for Delaware last Tuesday and are now due in their home town of Dover.

[illegible] pect the defense to take an appeal the attorneys of Mrs. Botkin may remember her narrow escape from the gallows on the trial just ended and think twice before making an effort to get another trial. They may conclude that they do not care for a reversal of the judgment. I, however, do not think that the defense has a chance in the world to save the woman from punishment or to gain her a second trial. California undoubtedly has jurisdiction in the case, and as to seeking a new trial there is no probability of such a move being successful. Judge Cook was very careful and conservative, and whenever a point was debatable he ruled in favor of the defendant."

When asked about the cost of the trial Chief Lees said: "I have not as yet made up my account, but will do so in a few days. The utmost economy within reason has been exercised, and not a dollar has been expended which was not deemed absolutely necessary in the prosecution of the case. This talk about the trial costing the State $40,000 or $50,000 was ridiculous guess work. The sum expended is far less than these guesses. My impression is that when everything is footed up the total will be less than $10,000."

Assistant District Attorney Hosmer, who conducted the prosecution of Mrs. Botkin, has no fears of the poisoner being freed on the technicality of lack of jurisdiction. He believes that the Supreme Court will hold that California had jurisdiction by virtue of section 27 of the Criminal Code, which says that punishment may be meted out to "all persons who commit, in whole or in part, any crime within this State."

John P. Dunning, whose wife was murdered and whose testimony against his former mistress went far toward her conviction, takes more pleasure in the conviction and its consequences than any of the Dover relatives of the murdered women. Dunning said yesterday:

"It is all over at last. I can go back now to New York feeling that I have done what I should have done. It has been bitter enough for me to come out here where I am so widely known and to be compelled to make the unsavory admissions regarding my conduct that have been necessary to meet the ends of justice. How I wish that this whole disgraceful series of incidents in my life could be given to oblivion. I did not have to come out here to testify in this trial. I could have shielded myself from the many degrading admissions that I made on the witness stand simply by staying away. I wished, however, to help the cause of justice. When I reached New York from Porto Rico, where I was in the service of the Associated Press, I learned for the first time of the dreadful crime that deprived me of my wife. Since then my first thought has been to bring the guilty one to retribution. I did not suspect who the criminal was, but I knew. I immediately told the Delaware officials my grounds for knowing, and what I said to them resulted in the arrest of the criminal and her conviction. Never for a single moment have I doubted her guilt.

"I will go back to New York on Monday. There I shall resume my position with the Associated Press, and my dearest wish is that this horrible incident in my life may be forgotten and that I may be allowed peacefully and with remorse for past follies to spend my life for the best good of the one little child that is left me. I shall go directly to New York."

A dispatch from Stockton states that an Associated Press reporter called on Welcome A. Botkin, husband of Mrs. Botkin, yesterday. The reporter of the association which Dunning works for says that Botkin greeted him with profanity. The interview, interesting for its omissions, follows: "No, not a —— word will you or any other reporter get from me," said Botkin. "At the first trouble I opened my mouth and got my foot into it. Yes, I'd have got four feet in it if I had had them. Not a —— —— word will I give out, and you can state that you didn't see me. I wouldn't give the papers a word unless I wrote it myself and signed my name. Will I do it now? No, sir. Not a —— —— word will you get from me; the newspapers would change the reading of it anyway. No, sir, I have nothing to say at all."

It is said that Mr. Botkin is neither disturbed nor worried over the verdict of the jury, seeming much easier than when Mrs. Botkin was first arrested.

POISONER OF NEW YORK WILL BE UNDER ARREST WITHIN TWELVE HOURS.

Chief of Detectives McClusky Believes He Has Solved the Mystery.

HOLDER THAT CONTAINED THE BOTTLE OF POISON.

This is a picture of the silver match and cigar-ash holder that forms an exhibit in the mysterious poisoning case in New York, which is similar to the Botkin case. The receptacle for the matches contained the bottle of alleged bromo-seltzer, but which contained cyanide of potassium. Fifty of the holders were manufactured by A. Lebkuecher of Newark, N. J., and one of them was sent here to Phelps & Adams as a sample. This was in November, 1897. Phelps & Adams sold it to Shreve & Co. The latter firm recollect receiving the trinket and disposing of it about Christmas of last year. Its value was small and no record of the purchaser was kept by the firm.

A New Jersey druggist, after reading that Mrs. Adams and Mr. Cornish had been poisoned in New York after taking a dose of bromo-seltzer, wrote to the New York authorities and stated that it was his belief that a deadly poison might have been developed in the sedative.

NEW YORK, December 31.—The "World" says: Captain George McClusky, chief of the detective bureau, firmly believes that he has solved the mystery surrounding the attempt to kill Harry Cornish, physical instructor of the Knickerbocker Athletic Club, by sending him poison through the mails.

At 9 o'clock last night Captain McClusky stated that he would have the culprit in custody within twelve hours. The man under surveillance was formerly a member of the Knickerbocker Athletic Club. He was at one time a man of high social and financial standing in this city, but in late years through evil habits and evil associations, his descent was rapid.

NEW YORK, December 30.—Assistant District Attorney McIntyre has received a letter to which he attaches a certain amount of importance. It suggests that the poison that killed Mrs. Adams must have developed from bromo-seltzer in the process of decomposition.

"This letter may shed light on this mysterious affair," said he. "It may prove that Mrs. Adams' death was an unfortunate accident and that there is no crime back of it."

The letter in question was sent to Mr. McIntyre by S. J. Russell, a druggist of Jersey City. While reading the account of the Adams poisoning case in the papers, Mr. Russell's attention was arrested by the statement that the glass bottle containing the supposed bromo-seltzer bore a label of a drug company in Baltimore, Md. This recalled to his mind an invoice of bromo seltzer which he had received from that company, but which he had sent back as unfit for sale. He then received from the company a letter stating the company had tried granulating bromo-seltzer, but found that it did not keep well in that form and decided to abandon it.

The question raised by this letter is whether the decomposition of the granulated bromo-seltzer that was manufactured by the Baltimore company is likely to produce a poisonous substance, and, if so, whether that substance is the same poison which killed Mrs. Adams.

There is hope that borders on expectation that the silver-plated trinket received by Harry Cornish through the mails may prove a conclusive clew to the person responsible for the death of Mrs Kate J. Adams and the poisoning of Cornish. It was not a bottle-holder, as it has been represented to be, but a toothpick holder, or ash-receiver. A private mark is stamped in the silver of this little article. It is "No. 514." The toothpick holder or match-stand was made in Newark, N. J., by Frank A. Lebkuecher & Co., manufacturing silversmiths.

There are not fifty matchsafes of that design in the country. But few have been sent into the country [illegible] to the present time. Of these fifty, the one [illegible] retired went to New York, or to one Eastern agents at Hartford, Conn., and if you follow it to the retail store and that store is conducted as it ought to be, you can find the name of the person who bought it.

This afternoon Mr Lebkuecher said that only fifteen of the silver matchsafes of the design sent to Cornish had been made by his [illegible]. Of these one each had been sold in following cities: New York, Brooklyn, [illegible], Baltimore, gredients to have generated a poison and especially cyanide of potassium.

MRS. BOTKIN IS TOO ILL TO BE SENTENCED

And, as Her Attorneys Are Not Ready to Go On, More Time Will Be Requested.

It is hardly expected that Judge Cook will pass sentence on Mrs. Cordelia Botkin to-morrow morning.

When the prisoner comes before the Court for sentence, it is the intention of her attorneys to ask for a new trial and present arguments to show why their request should be granted. As both Mr. Knight and Mr. McGowan have been in Sacramento all the week, it is not likely that they are prepared to go on. Mr. McGowan will come down from Sacramento this evening and it is understood that he will ask for an extension of time when the case is called to-morrow morning.

Before going to Sacramento, Mrs. Botkin's attorneys learned some facts concerning several of the jurors that convinced them that two of them were incapacitated to serve. It is claimed that one allowed his friendship for the prosecution to influence him, and that another expressed an opinion unfavorable to Mrs. Botkin before all the evidence was in.

Mrs. Botkin would not, in any event, be able to appear in court to-morrow morning. Her condition was not as favorable yesterday as on the preceding day. She seemed to have less strength and her temperature was higher. She is confined to her bed and is under the constant care of her sister, Mrs. McClure.

ATTORNEYS FOR DEFENSE PLAN THE NEXT MOVE.

HABEAS CORPUS PROCEEDINGS TO COME IN THE SUPREME COURT.

Reliance Placed on the Hope That This State Will Be Held to Be Without Jurisdiction.

All Friday night Mrs. Botkin was on the verge of losing her reason. She was extremely hysterical, shrieking, beating the air, sobbing, tearing her hair and behaving like a mad woman rather than a sane one. She held up in court marvelously, being supported by her pride. The talk about her fainting was sheer nonsense. All that she did to lend color to it was to lean for a few moments on Mrs. Roberts' shoulder and ask for a glass of water. Her eyes were open all the time, her hands moving, and when she was given the glass of water she swallowed without difficulty. No water was thrown in her face, no one bent her hands or rubbed her temples. In a moment or two she sat upright again, beating a tattoo on the table, rolled her eyes, and then appeared as calm as any one. Mrs. Roberts said yesterday: "My sister did not faint at all, nor did she swoon. She merely leaned her head against me and seemed to be gasping for breath, and I asked for a glass of water for her."

After walking quite alone to the car and to the Branch County Jail on the San Bruno road, Mrs. Botkin was placed in the infirmary, where she remained throughout the night, being attended by her two sisters, Mrs. Roberts of Eureka and Mrs. McClure of Healdsburg. During the night she was very violent. She vilified every one in no uncertain language, abused the jury, the Judge and even her own attorneys. But her ravings were those of a delirious child, and her attorneys do not pay the slightest attention to what she says. They know that her distress is but the natural reaction from a long-enforced calm. She is like a spring suddenly released and snapping far out of place. She has been under tremendous tension for days and days, under high nervous excitement for months, and she is, besides, a woman of highly strung and excitable temperament. Mrs. Botkin's calm poise in the courtroom when the clerk pronounced her doom on Friday night was the result of sheer grit and tremendous physical and mental effort. Her calmness is not the quiet of those who cannot feel—not the unconcern of the bloodless, nerveless temperament. It was pride which kept her from going to pieces in the court.

She threw a glance in the direction of her jurors and would not give them the gratification of a tear. But when she was alone with her sisters she threw off the mask. Under the calm exterior a burning volcano raged. She paced the floor like a caged animal, she shrieked, she wept, she threw herself on the bed. Finally she was quieted, but throughout the night she did not sleep. She was quieter yesterday with the stillness of exhaustion. She had worked her excitement out and was limp with fatigue. She remained in bed during the day and saw only her relatives and most intimate friends. She said that she had been so misunderstood, misquoted and misjudged that she would see no reporters and had no statement to make to the public. She saw no one from any of the papers, and said that any interview or statement purporting to come from her would be entirely false. Mrs. Botkin holds the newspapers responsible for the public opinion against her and the public opinion for the verdict of the jury. She also thinks with Mr. Knight that the recent iniquitous Rosser acquittal had its effect on her conviction, and that she is what Mr. Knight swore she should not be, "a vicarious atonement" for other cases where the Police Department has failed, for one reason or another, to secure a conviction.

Mrs. Botkin's attorneys did not visit her yesterday nor send any messages to her. They thought she would be better undisturbed, and they did not care to intrude on her in her grief and terror. They regard her criticisms and railings as perfectly natural under the circumstances. They will call upon her in a few days, when she is calmer.

The reports of interviews with jurors published the morning after the verdict were entirely erroneous and without any basis of fact. It was said that on the first ballot one juror voted for acquittal and two for a verdict of guilty with the punishment fixed at imprisonment for life. This was entirely untrue. The jury took one ballot before going to dinner on Friday night. This ballot was taken immediately after the election of S. G. Kennedy as chairman, and went merely to the guilt or innocence of Mrs. Botkin. The verdict was unanimous. Every man voted "guilty." The second ballot after dinner was to determine the punishment. On this ballot there were eleven for hanging and one vote for imprisonment for life. This merciful ballot was cast by A. E. Buckingham, a juror who has shown throughout the trial that he was not entirely convinced of Mrs. Botkin's guilt. He it was who recalled Mrs. Harris, the humble rebel witness, to the stand for further questioning. He paid special attention to the testimony contradicting her from the City of Paris people, and seemed to have a doubt. And though he voted that he thought she was guilty, he would not vote for capital punishment. Other jurors argued with him, but in vain. Buckingham is not a stubborn man, but he was not firmly enough convinced of Mrs. Botkin's guilt to help hang her. He said that his mind was fixed, and that no argument would cause him to change it. He could not vote for hanging, and he would not—not if he had to stay there [illegible] a single one of the jurors believed the testimony of Mrs. Harris of Roselin. He would say nothing unkind of the jury except that he had been greatly mistaken in it. He thought that Judge Cook's obvious prejudice against the defendant had something to do with her conviction. One juror, he said, was an intimate friend of Judge Cook, and several of them had an inkling that the Judge expected them to convict. And though the defense professed itself satisfied with the instructions it was not satisfied with the dissertation that followed. Of late Knight has been finding things out about some of the jurors—things that worried him. One man had a store under the Baldwin House. Another had failed twice or thrice under suspicious circumstances and could not afford to antagonize the police. A third had been arrested and prosecuted in Sacramento for his conduct in connection with a bank. All these things have been giving Knight food for thought lately, yet he kept up his hope.

And though Mrs. Botkin has been convicted there's a world of difference between conviction and serving a sentence. There are a lot of legal methods left untried, and Mrs. Botkin's attorneys will try them all. As Attorney McGowan said yesterday, "We will fight this to the very last ditch."

Probably this fight will begin next week. Some time during the week a writ of habeas corpus will be sued for in the Supreme Court. It will be alleged that the California courts have no jurisdiction in the case, and the legal fight that will follow will be one of the prettiest ever seen in this State. The case of murdering by mail is without precedent, and what precedent there is for murder begun in one state and completed in another is against the jurisdiction of the courts of the first state. In the section of the code which governs jurisdiction nothing at all is said of jurisdiction over crimes commenced in this State and finished within the boundaries of another. Section 27 of the Penal Code, under which Judge Cook held that he had jurisdiction, is said to apply only to punishment, and the attorneys for Mrs. Botkin will contend, with what success remains to be seen, that this section cannot be stretched to cover jurisdiction which is expressly provided for elsewhere in the code.

George Knight is perfectly confident that the Supreme Court will hold that there is no jurisdiction. If the courts of California have no jurisdiction and Mrs. Botkin cannot be extradited to Delaware she must go free, though morally convicted. Mr. Knight said yesterday that he was absolutely certain that there was no jurisdiction over Mrs. Botkin's crime in California courts. He was also certain that there were several grounds of error in the case—one the refusal of the Judge to charge the jury that it had not been proved that Mrs. Botkin bought lump arsenic. Another of the defense's strong points is that the evidence of Dunning was improperly admitted. It is said that evidence against the character of the defendant is never admissible save when the defendant has himself set up proof of good character. It is said that the admission of the evidence of Dunning on the ground that it went to show motive was improper, because it was not sufficiently closely connected with motive. Mr. Heggerty maintains that it is too far-fetched to show that Mrs. Botkin had an attachment for Dunning, in that other women also were attached to him, and that Dunning, himself, though his conduct might suggest that he wished to be rid of his wife, is not considered to have sufficient motive for the killing. The corpus delicti is another vulnerable point for the defense. It is claimed that the jury is not the ultimate judge of whether the deaths by arsenic poisoning were properly proved or not. Mr. Heggerty says there is not a precedent in all the law books holding that death by poisoning is proved where the symptoms might be those of something else. He says that the only alternative where there is no autopsy is where some one saw the poison administered. The defense did not move for a new trial on Friday night as was reported. The motion will be made before Judge Cook when Mrs. Botkin comes up for sentence. It will undoubtedly be denied, and will then be appealed to the Supreme Court. These are the straws at which the defense catches. The event will prove how good they are.

Meanwhile the Delaware witnesses are hurrying homeward. Of all the fifteen who came across the continent to testify against the poisoner only one greeted the New Year in San Francisco. That one was John P. Dunning. The others began to pack up as soon as the trial ended, and last evening at 6 o'clock ten members of the Delaware party began their journey homeward. In the little crowd were John B. Pennington, Joshua D. Deane, Harry Pennington, Lelia Deane, Ethel Millington, Miss Josephine Bateman, Detective B. J. McVey, Thomas M. Gooden, Attorney-General and Mrs. R. C. White and Dr. and Mrs. T. R. Wolf. McVey and Gooden are to go to Delaware by the most direct route and will travel over the central route. The others have more time to spare and will go by way of Denver, so as to get an opportunity to view the famous mountain scenery of Colorado. Drs. Bishop and Downs, who were members of the original party, left for Delaware last Tuesday and are now due in their home town of Dover.

The Delaware people are well pleased with California and express approval of the quality of its justice. None of the crowd showed the exultation that would follow the gratification of a desire for revenge. There was no regret that the death penalty had not been imposed, and all appeared satisfied with the result of the trial. Detective McVey, in expressing his individual views, said: "The jury did just right, and if I had been one of the twelve I would have voted for life imprisonment in preference to hanging."

Attorney-General White said that if the unexpected should happen and Mrs. Botkin should secure a new trial, all of the Delaware witnesses would again cross the continent to testify against her.

Chief of Police Lees, who personally conducted the search for evidence against Mrs. Botkin, was well pleased with the outcome of the case. When interviewed yesterday he said:

"The verdict was just. Although I expected ... a few days. The utmost economy within reason has been exercised, and not a dollar has been expended which was not deemed absolutely necessary in the prosecution of the case. This talk about the trial costing the State $40,000 or $50,000 was ridiculous guess work. The sum expended is far less than these guesses. My impression is that when everything is footed up the total will be less than $10,000."

Assistant District Attorney Hosmer, who conducted the prosecution of Mrs. Botkin, has no fears of the poisoner being freed on the technicality of lack of jurisdiction. He believes that the Supreme Court will hold that California had jurisdiction by virtue of section 27 of the Criminal Code, which says that punishment may be meted out to "all persons who commit, in whole or in part, any crime within this State."

John P. Dunning, whose wife was murdered and whose testimony against his former mistress went far toward her conviction, takes more pleasure in the conviction and its consequences than any of the Dover relatives of the murdered women. Dunning said yesterday:

"It is all over at last. I can go back now to New York feeling that I have done what I should have done. It has been bitter enough for me to come out here where I am so widely known and to be compelled to make the unsavory admissions regarding my conduct that have been necessary to meet the ends of justice. How I wish that this whole disgraceful series of incidents in my life could be given to oblivion. I did not have to come out here to testify in this trial. I could have shielded myself from the many degrading admissions that I made on the witness stand simply by staying away. I wished, however, to help the cause of justice. When I reached New York from Porto Rico, where I was in the service of the Associated Press, I learned for the first time of the dreadful crime that deprived me of my wife. Since then my first thought has been to bring the guilty one to retribution. I did not suspect who the criminal was, but I knew. I immediately told the Delaware officials my grounds for knowing, and what I said to them resulted in the arrest of the criminal and her conviction. Never for a single moment have I doubted her guilt.

"I will go back to New York on Monday. There I shall resume my position with the Associated Press, and my dearest wish is that this horrible incident in my life may be forgotten and that I may be allowed peacefully and with remorse for past follies to spend my life for the best good of the one little child that is left me. I shall go directly to New York."

A dispatch from Stockton states that an Associated Press reporter called on Welcome A. Botkin, husband of Mrs. Botkin, yesterday. The reporter of the association which Dunning works for says that Botkin greeted him with profanity. The interview, interesting for its omissions, follows: "No, not a —— word will you or any other reporter get from me," said Botkin. "At the first trouble I opened my mouth and got my foot into it. Yes, I'd have got four feet in it if I had had them. Not a —— —— word will I give out, and you can state that you didn't see me. I wouldn't give the papers a word unless I wrote it myself and signed my name. Will I do it now? No, sir. Not a —— —— word will you get from me; the newspapers would change the reading of it anyway. No, sir, I have nothing to say at all."

It is said that Mr. Botkin is neither disturbed nor worried over the verdict of the jury, seeming much easier than when Mrs. Botkin was first arrested.

HOLDER THAT CONTAINED THE BOTTLE OF POISON.

This is a picture of the silver match and cigar-ash holder that forms an exhibit in the mysterious poisoning case in New York, which is similar to the Botkin case. The receptacle for the matches contained the bottle of alleged bromo-seltzer, but which contained cyanide of potassium. Fifty of the holders were manufactured by A. Lebkuecher of Newark, N. J., and one of them was sent here to Phelps & Adams as a sample. This was in November, 1891. Phelps & Adams sold it to Shreve & Co. The latter firm [illegible] receiving the trinket and disposing of it about Christmas of last year. Its [illegible] was small and no record of the purchaser was kept by the firm.

A New Jersey druggist, after reading that Mrs. Adams and Mr. Cornish had been poisoned in New York after taking a dose of bromo-seltzer, wrote to the New York authorities and stated that it was his belief that a deadly poison might have been developed in the sedative.

NEW YORK, December 31.—The "World" says Captain George McClusky, chief of the detective bureau, firmly believes that he has solved the mystery surrounding the attempt to kill Harry Cornish, physical instructor of the Knickerbocker Athletic Club, by sending him poison through the mails.

At 9 o'clock last night Captain McClusky stated that he would have the culprit in custody within twelve hours. The man under surveillance was formerly a member of the Knickerbocker Athletic Club. He was at one time a man of high social and financial standing in this city, but in late years through evil habits and evil associations, his descent was rapid.

NEW YORK, December 30.—Assistant District Attorney McIntyre has received a letter to which he attaches a certain amount of importance. It suggests that the poison that killed Mrs. Adams must have developed from bromo-seltzer in the process of decomposition.

"This letter may shed light on this mysterious affair," said he. "It may prove that Mrs. Adams' death was an unfortunate accident and that there is no crime back of it."

The letter in question was sent to Mr. McIntyre by S. J. Russell, a druggist of Jersey City. While reading the account of the Adams poisoning case in the papers, Mr. Russell's attention was arrested by the statement that the glass bottle containing the supposed bromo-seltzer bore a label of a drug company in Baltimore, Md. This recalled to his mind an invoice of bromo-seltzer which he had received from that company, but which he had sent back as unfit for sale. He then received from the company a letter stating the company had tried granulating bromo-seltzer, but found that it did not keep well in that form and decided to abandon it.

The question raised by this letter is whether the decomposition of the granulated bromo-seltzer that was manufactured by the Baltimore company is likely to produce a poisonous substance, and, if so, whether that substance is the same poison which killed Mrs. Adams.

There is hope that borders on expectation that the silver-plated trinket received by Harry Cornish through the mails may prove a conclusive clew to the person responsible for the death of Mrs. Kate J. Adams and the poisoning of Cornish. It was not a bottle-holder, as it has been represented to be, but a toothpick holder, or ash-receiver. A private mark is stamped in the silver of this little article. It is "No. 814." The toothpick holder or match-stand was made in Newark, N. J., by Frank A. Lebkuecher & Co., manufacturing silversmiths.

There are not fifty [illegible] of that design in the country. [illegible] to the present time. Of these fifty, the one invoiced sent to New York, or to our Eastern agents at Hartford, Conn., and if you follow it to the retail store and that store is conducted as it ought to be, you can find the name of the person who bought it.

This afternoon Mr. Lebkuecher said that only fifteen of the silver matchsafes of the design sent to Cornish had been made by his [illegible]. Of these one each had been sold in following cities, New York, Brooklyn, [illegible] (Mass.), Newark (N. J.), Baltimore, [illegible]acuse, San Francisco and St. Louis. Two [illegible] sold in Middletown, Conn., and five [illegible] disposed of to firms in Chicago.

Captain McClusky of the detective bureau said to-day that he had ascertained the store at which the toothpick holder was bought, but he refused to say what establishment it is, further than that it is in New York. Captain McClusky regards the clew as the most important one that has been developed thus far.

... ingredients to have generated a poison especially cyanide of potassium.

MRS. BOTKIN IS TOO ILL TO BE SENTENCED

And, as Her Attorneys Are Not Ready to Go On, More Time Will Be Requested.

It is hardly expected that Judge Cook will pass sentence on Mrs. Cordelia Botkin to-morrow morning.

When the prisoner comes before the Court for sentence, it is the intention of her attorneys to ask for a new trial and present arguments to show why their request should be granted. As both Mr. Knight and Mr. McGowan have been in Sacramento all the week, it is not likely that they are prepared to go on. Mr. McGowan will come down from Sacramento this evening and it is understood that he will ask for an extension of time when the case is called to-morrow morning.

Before going to Sacramento, Mrs. Botkin's attorneys learned some facts concerning several of the jurors that convinced them that the men were incapacitated to serve. It is claimed that one allowed his friendship for the [illegible] to influence him, and that another expressed an opinion unfavorable to Mrs. Botkin before all the evidence was in.

Mrs. Botkin would not, in any event, be able to appear in court to-morrow morning. Her condition was not as favorable yesterday as on the preceding day. She seemed to have less strength and her temperature was [illegible]. She is confined to her bed and is under the constant care of her sister, Mrs. McClure.

BRAIN FEVER THREATENING MRS. BOTKIN.

Serious Illness Following Collapse Alarms Her Relatives.

JANUARY 3, 1899.

Restless and Half-Delirious She Raves About the Verdict.

Mrs. Cordelia Botkin is sick. Unless there is a change for the better within the next twenty-four hours Dr. Terrill fears she will have the brain fever.

The reaction from the strain of the trial and the shock of the verdict were a severe tax. The collapse which followed was not, at first, supposed to be serious, and it was not until a night and nearly a day had gone by that her inability to rally alarmed her relatives. Then Dr. Terrill was summoned, and he pronounced the case aggravated nervous prostration. That was last Saturday, and since then the patient has continued to grow worse.

The jail officials have given orders to keep the place as quiet as possible. The inmates of the women's ward were notified yesterday that no uncommon noise would be permitted and they go around on tiptoe and talk in whispers. Strips of cocoanut matting have been laid in the dormitory and hallways to deaden the sound of footsteps.

Mrs. Botkin requires constant care, and of her sisters, either Mrs. McClure or Mrs. Roberts, is with her all the time. They take turns at nursing. The patient has no inclination to converse. About all she says is:

"It is all wrong—the verdict is all wrong. They have convicted an innocent woman."

Over and over again yesterday she repeated these words, as her eyes wandered restlessly. She addressed herself to no one and did not seem to expect or care for a reply.

It is the intention of Attorney Knight to prevent, if possible, sentence being passed on Saturday next. On that day Mrs. Botkin will go to court, if her condition will admit. When her case is called, a new trial will be asked, and both attorneys will present arguments to show why their request should be granted.

The main points on which the lawyer will base his plea for a new trial are: Improper instructions to the jury, improper evidence introduced by the prosecution, and lack of jurisdiction.

In regard to the improper instructions to the jury, the attorney will contend that the prosecution did not prove its case; that there was no post-mortem to show that Mrs. Dunning died of arsenical poisoning; and that without the post-mortem there is no other means of detecting death from arsenic. He will contend that the candy contained lump arsenic, and that there was absolutely no evidence to show that Mrs. Botkin bought that kind of arsenic.

The contention as to the admission of improper evidence will be that the prosecution had no right to attempt to show that the Star drug store sold lump arsenic when Mrs. Botkin could in no way be connected with the purchase.

The defense will put considerable reliance on the plea of lack of jurisdiction.

Should Judge Cook refuse to grant a new trial an appeal will be made to the Supreme Court, the hearing of which may not come up for several months.

Attorney Knight charges the jurors made a superficial examination of the evidence, arguing that had they made a careful analysis they would have consumed more time.

The latest gossip as to the jury's oath of secrecy concerning the happenings in the jury-room is that one of the jurors knew the principal witness of the defense. While the jurors were discussing the case this juror advised them to place no reliance in this witness, giving as a reason that the man's word was not to be depended upon, because he did not pay his debts. The defense has learned, it is said, that this argument was accepted by the jurors. The lawyers for Mrs. Botkin now say that in this way the testimony of the witness on whom they most relied was utterly overcome.

HONOLULU LAWYER ASSAULTS A WITNESS

HONOLULU, March 1.—Attorney A. S. Humphries the other day pleaded guilty to assaulting Frank Davey, a photographer, formerly of San Francisco. Humphries was fined

FRANK DAVEY.

HUMAN DOCUMENTS IN THE ADAMS POISONING CASE.

JANUARY 4, 1899.

Just as Mrs. John P. Dunning was poisoned in Delaware by the contents of an anonymously mailed package, so apparently was Mrs. Kate J. Adams brought to her death in New York on December 28th.

The accounts of the evidence adduced in the trial of Mrs. Botkin, in San Francisco, for the murder of Mrs. Dunning, her babe and her friend, parallel in all important points the prima facie evidence upon which the story of Mrs. Adams's death must be formed.

Mrs. Adams, a widow, adjudged fifty years old by her neighbors, said to be sixty-two by her nearest acquaintances, died suddenly in her apartments, 61 West Eighty-sixth street, immediately after taking a dose of supposed headache medicine which had been given to her by Harry Cornish, her lodger and reputed nephew.

Mr. Cornish, who tasted the powder himself, was made violently ill. Dr. E. F. Hitchcock of 72 West Eighty-seventh street, called in to attend Mrs. Adams, also tasted it, and was nearly prostrated.

The drug came through the mail three days before Christmas in a little blue bottle inclosed in a solid silver bottle stand—a dressing-table trinket.

The bottle bore the blown-in trade mark and the labels of the Emerson Drug Company of

MRS. KATE A. ADAMS

HENRY CORNISH

Baltimore. It was plainly labeled "bromo-seltzer"—a nerve sedative and headache remedy, sold at every drug store on demand, harmless and very generally used without a doctor's prescription.

The packet, a small one, had been received by Mr. Cornish at the Knickerbocker Athletic Club, of which he is the athletic director. No card accompanied the packet and the address was written in a hand unknown to Cornish.

This is the doctor's story: "I was called at 9:30 in the morning and went to Mrs. Adams's apartment, taking a bag containing a stomach pump, a hypodermic syringe and a few antidotes and heart stimulants with me.

"I found Mrs. Adams in agony, Mr. Cornish also very ill and everybody wildly excited.

"I tasted the stuff, a white powder, to determine if possible what it was. I took only an infinitesimal quantity, but instantly I felt dizzy and chilly. I spat it out and went to work trying to resuscitate Mrs. Adams. All efforts were totally unsuccessful.

"I gave Mr. Cornish emetics and stimulants and he revived in a measure. When he was sufficiently recovered he told me the story of his mysterious Christmas package, and related the circumstances of the poisoning.

"One grain of cyanide of potassium is a fatal dose for an adult. Mrs. Adams must have taken about a drachm—nearly sixty grains. I don't know how much Mr. Cornish swallowed. I barely touched my tongue to the powder, and I feel the effects of it yet."

Mr Harry Cornish
Knickerbocker Athletic Club
Madison Ave and Forty-fifth Street
New York City

MRS. BOTKIN MAY GRASP AT THIS STRAW.

Candy-Man Haas Was Mistaken in His Testimony.

JANUARY 7, 1899.

Another Box of Candy Sold the Day the Murderess Bought Hers.

BUYER A LOS ANGELENO.

Ex-Mayor Snyder Recollects Purchasing Box of Sweets on the Fateful Sunday.

[Special Dispatch to "The Examiner."]

LOS ANGELES, January 6.—And now ex-Mayor Snyder is to be dragged into the Botkin murder case, it having been ascertained that he bought a box of candy at the same store and upon the same day that the convicted murderess purchased the sweets which were afterward poisoned and mailed on their deadly errand.

Mrs. Botkins' lawyers having by some means discovered that Mr. Snyder purchased a box of candy upon the same date as Mrs. Botkin, they have used this fact to impeach the testimony of the proprietor of the store who swore during the trial that the box purchased by the convicted woman was the only one of its kind sold during the day.

When seen at the Jonathan Club this afternoon ex-Mayor Snyder expressed surprise that the knowledge of his having purchased a box of candy upon that date should have reached the ears of the attorneys. While admitting that such was the case he denied absolutely knowing whether the box he purchased was similar to that sold to Mrs. Botkin, or in fact, knowing anything about the candy save that he bought and paid for a 60-cent box of "French mixed," which he had never afterward seen and, in fact, had not observed while it was being wrapped up.

That he bought candy upon the same Sunday as that upon which Mrs. Botkin made her purchase he was sure, for the reason that at the time the story was first published and the purchase of the candy was traced to the store in the Phelan building, San Francisco, he had remarked to his wife that it was upon that very day in the same place he had purchased a box of sweets which his little six-year-old boy Ross later made a present to little Dollie Latham, daughter of J. L. Latham of this city. Mr. Snyder said:

It was shortly before the Democratic State Convention and I was on a two weeks' trip in the northern part of the State for rest and recreation, accompanied by my wife and boy. We were stopping in San Francisco, but were to leave the next day for San Jose, where my wife intended to visit Mrs. Latham, who was then stopping with her little girl, Dollie, on the ranch of Mrs. Crowell, some nine miles distant from that city. My little boy, Ross, wanted a box of candy to take to Dollie, and I went out down Market street looking for a confectioner's where I might buy a box. I remember distinctly the fact of its being Sunday, because I had some difficulty in finding a confectionery store open, but finally stepped into the one in the Phelan Building, the name over the door being, I think, Haas. I asked for a 60-cent box of French mixed candy. It was wrapped up and I left, giving the candy to Mrs. Snyder and never seeing it afterwards. It was after the publication of the story of the poisoned candy that I was in San Francisco and remember stopping in front of the place and recalling that my purchase had been made on the same day it was alleged Mrs. Botkin bought the deadly sweetmeats.

That the box I purchased was or was not unlike hers I know nothing about; neither does Mrs. Snyder. I dislike exceedingly to be drawn into publicity in connection with this case, and fail to see what connection there can possibly be with my purchase, save that it was made on the same day.

New York and Cuba Mail Steamship Company

Secnav—
Washington, D.C.
Maine blown up in Havana harbor at nine forty to night and destroyed. Many wounded and doubtless more killed or drowned. Wounded and others on board Spanish man of war and Ward Line steamer. Send light House Tenders from Key West — ~~[struck out]~~ for crew and the few pieces of equipment above water. None has clothing other than that upon him. Public opinion should be suspended until further report. All officers believed to be saved. Jenkins and Merritt not yet accounted for. Many Spanish officers including representative of General Blanco now with me to express sympathy.
Sigsbee.

FACSIMILE, SLIGHTLY REDUCED, OF CAPTAIN SIGSBEE'S MESSAGE TO THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY. "SECNAV" BEING THE TELEGRAPHIC ADDRESS OF THE LATTER. (SEE PAGE 216.)

A SCOTCH MANUFACTURER OF BURNS MANUSCRIPT.

THE POET'S HANDWRITING SO SKILFULLY IMITATED AS TO DECEIVE EXPERTS.

How the Famous Lenox Library of New York Was Victimized by "Antique" Smith.

ACCORDING to R. K. C. Simon, a contributor to the New York Herald, the Lenox Library has been the victim of a professional manufacturer of "Bobbie" Burns manuscripts. In fact, he says the Lenox Library confesses to have been one of the chief victims of a gigantic fraud. He adds:

The last considerable donation to this institution was made by one of its leading trustees and patrons. It consisted of what was supposed to be a most rare and valuable collection of manuscripts and autograph letters of Robert Burns, Sir Walter Scott and many other eminent Europeans, which he himself had purchased while in Scotland from the late James Stillie of Edinburgh at a cost of over $20,000. After having been passed upon by the leading experts of Scotland they were duly presented to the library.

No question as to their genuineness was raised until, by a mere chance, there was brought to light in Edinburgh one of the most daring wholesale forgeries of the century. They were finally sent back to Europe and submitted to the experts of the British Museum, London, who had kindly volunteered their services in the matter, and by them were pronounced a worthless lot of forgeries.

One of the most remarkable facts in connection with the case is that Mr. Stillie, from whom they were purchased, was acknowledged to be the most eminent expert of manuscripts in Scotland, and especially of those of Scott, he having as a boy worked for Scott's publishers in Edinburgh and carried most of his manuscripts between Abbotsford and that city.

Suit was brought by the donor against Mr Stillie, who, however, died before the case was completed and so the matter was finally dropped.

The forgeries were sent back to New York and once again deposited in the Lenox Library where they have since lain, hidden away from the public's gaze.

It is of interest to know that the donor before mentioned also made a similar presentation of manuscripts to the city of Edinburgh, Scotland, which likewise turned out to be spurious.

The story of the first discovery of these forgeries, which led to the trial and conviction of the forger, is as follows. In 1892 the good people of Edinburgh were suddenly awakened to the fact that they had a factory among them capable of turning out, in large or small lots, Burns and Scott manuscripts, Jacobite correspondence, autograph letters of Mary, Queen of Scots, Oliver Cromwell—in short, whatever in the shape of literary relics or national documents happened to be in demand.

The story is a strange one. To the Edinburgh Evening Despatch is due the credit of bringing the truth to light.

Suspicion was first aroused and inquiry made through the circumstance [illegible]

... hitherto unknown Burns or Scott manuscript was to be had for a mere song men naturally began to think that something was wrong.

In a small hut, standing behind Hope Crescent, Leith Walk, Alexander H. Smith, otherwise known as "Antique" Smith, carried on his work of wholesale forgeries.

Smith commenced his business career as an apprentice in a law office, and subsequently became chief clerk to the late Mr. Ferrier, the last representative of an old law firm which had had wide connections with many of the leading families of Scotland.

It is reported that Mr. Ferrier one day told Smith to clear out several boxes full of old documents, which had been gathering during the past years, and that Smith, realizing their value, made a selection of the papers for himself, and thus laid the foundation for what was later to be known as "Antique Smith's Mill."

Among these papers were obviously many genuine manuscripts and autographs, which he succeeded in placing upon the market. The number, however, was limited. Soon he found himself obliged to look around for more in order to fill his fast increasing orders.

Having gained the confidence of the collectors, what more easy than to manufacture as ordered and to substitute his own forgeries? These he executed with a skill compared with which the forgeries of Chatterton and Ireland were but infants' efforts, and as his trade increased he sold them at public auctions or through prominent booksellers to collectors of experience and rank, and also pawned large quantities, which afterward found their way to the auctions of unredeemed pledges.

The ease with which even the most wary can be taken in by forged letters is well illustrated by the famous Shelley and Byron forgeries in 1859.

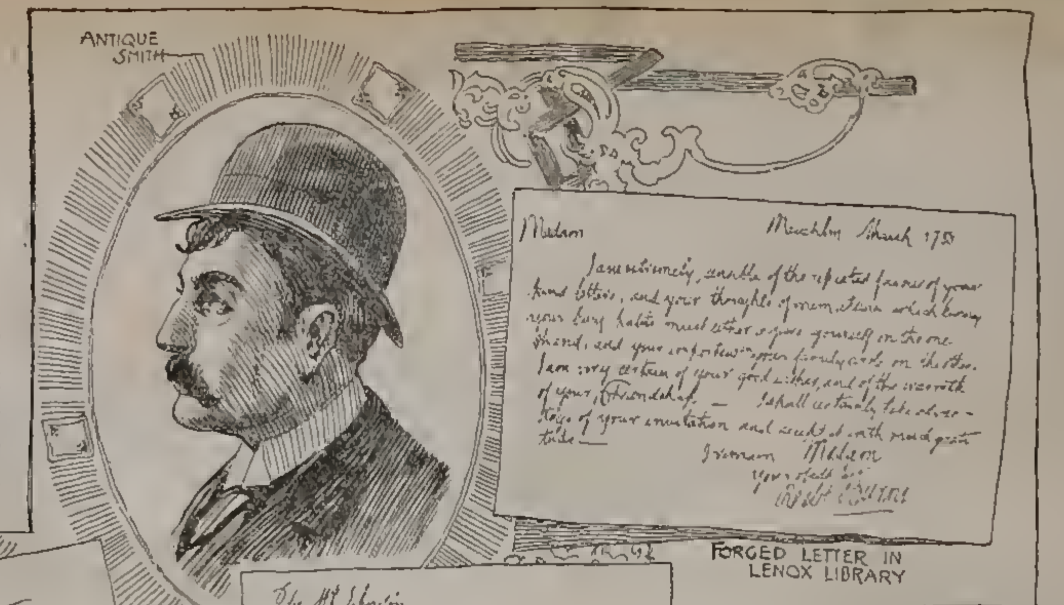
These were sent to the auction rooms of Sotheby & Wilkinson by Mr. White, a London bookseller, and it was at this sale that John Murray, who, it will be remembered, was Byron's own publisher purchased forty-seven letters purporting to be Lord Byron's, for which he paid £123 7s. 6d (about $617).

But to return to our friend Smith. One day in August, 1892, there appeared in the little Ayrshire paper, the Cumnock Express the following modest letter, with introduction:

"Unpublished letter of Robert Burns.

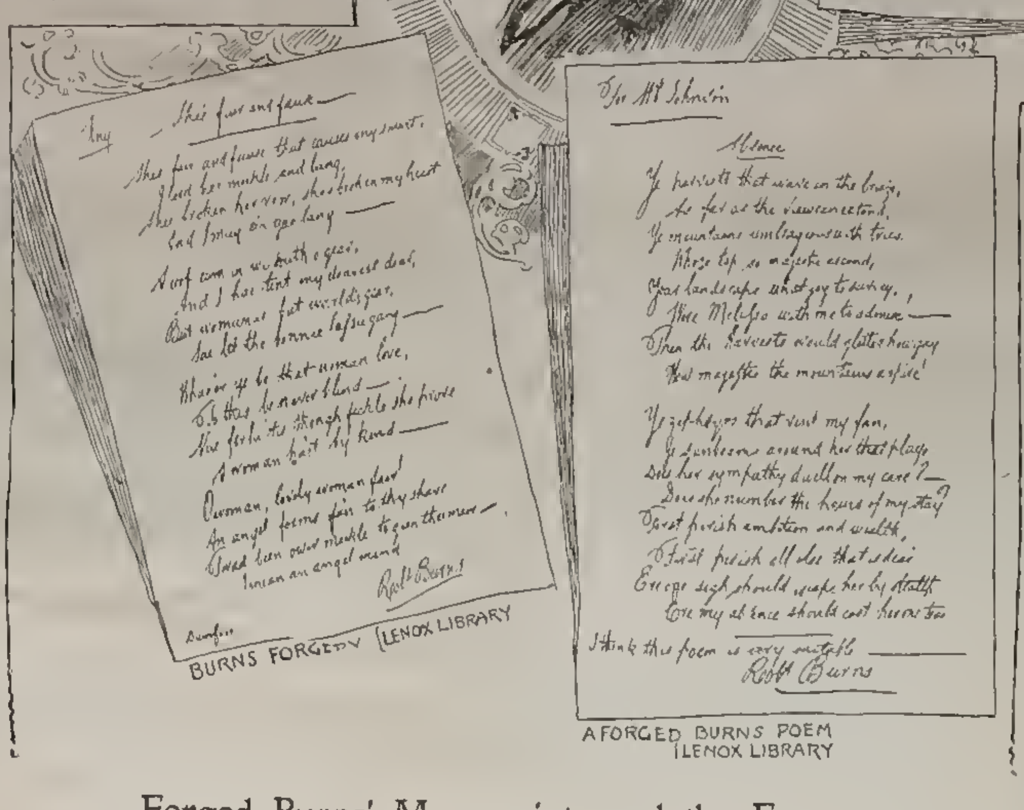
"James Mackenzie, 45 Forest road, Edinburgh, an industrious and intelligent collector of manuscripts, has favored us with a perusal of a letter which has every mark of genuineness, and which has never, so far as we know, been published. It is addressed to John Hill, weaver, Cumnock, of whom, or of his relations or descendants, however, we can find no trace. The year is not given, but as it is dated from Mauchline it would seem to have been written about the time of the poet's [illegible] ... My dear

Sir: It is, indeed, impossible for me to speak upon such a subject as the loss you have suffered. Allow me, however, to send you this expression of my sympathy and sorrow at the loss of a friend. It is another part of ourselves gone when we lose a friend. God keep those we have left, as very few are worthy the praying for, and ourselves probably least of all. I was much



ANTIQUE SMITH

FORGED LETTER IN LENOX LIBRARY



BURNS FORGERY LENOX LIBRARY

A FORGED BURNS POEM LENOX LIBRARY

Forged Burns' Manuscripts and the Forger.

pleased at your expression in your intimation to me, as I am now aware that you understood my meaning and character, and that, although our last meeting was noisy, I hope you took no umbrage at anything spoken by Mr. Nicol, whose character is somewhat noisy in its expression. Believe me that I did not intend to go beyond anything that was unfriendly, and your communication has shown me that. I am waiting to see you. Believe me to be, yours most affectionately, ROBERT BURNS.'"

Here was at length the little clew which, followed up, served to unfold the entire mystery of the Smith forgeries.

Lengthy correspondence followed in the leading Edinburgh dailies between an anonymous correspondent and Mr. Mackenzie and a Mr. [illegible] ... Mr. Mackenzie replied that the letter in question had been submitted to the most experienced critic known, who was prepared, if need be, to give his oath that Burns wrote it, and was perfectly satisfied in his own mind that it was genuine. But, to make a long story short, it was finally sent to the British Museum, London, where it was promptly pronounced "spurious."

It appears that Mr Mackenzie, at this time, also was in possession of quite a number of like forgeries. He had, for instance, two copies of the "Solemn League and Covenant," a very rare document, of which only one copy was known to exist, this being on parchment and worth some £150, also the manuscript copy of Burns' "Scots Wha Hae," and many others, prominent among the [illegible] "Man's Prayer," [illegible] ... by his brother, Robert Burns. The first two stanzas read as follows.

THE POOR MAN'S PRAYER.

Amidst the more important toils of state,
The counsels laboring in the patriotic soil,
Though Europe from thy voice expect her fate,
And thy keen glance extend from pole to pole,

Oh, Chatham, nursed in ancient virtue's lore,
To these sad strains incline a favoring ear,
Think on the God whom thou and I adore,
Nor turn unpitying from the poor man's prayer.

The original poem ... [illegible] ... of Chatham by one "Simon Hedge," laborer.

If Burns had, therefore, written this poem he must have been a greater poetical prodigy than we have supposed and have been contributing verses to the London papers at the early age of 7 under the pseudonym of Simon Hedge.

It was also noted that the Christian name Robert was spelled in full, a thing very seldom done by the poet.

Lord Rosebery, addressing the Scottish Corporation at Edinburgh shortly after this expose, cynically made mention, as among the most recent attractions of that city, of the "Alexandrian Library of Burns Manuscripts and Scott Autographs," and recalled to mind the case of Simonides, a Greek, who, after having deceived Professor Lepsius of Berlin and Sir F. Madden of the British Museum, finally met his match in the late Mr. Coxe of the Bodleian Library, Oxford. The story is as follows.

Simonides one day presented himself at the office of Mr. Coxe and unraveled various genuine manuscripts of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, whose vellum leaves, crumbling with very age, smelled of hoar antiquity.

The shrewd librarian scanned them carefully, and even smelled the ancient documents. The Greek, gaining confidence, now laid before the doctor one more ancient than all the rest which he fully expected would be pronounced by his intended victim as old as our most ancient New Testament manuscripts.

"How old may that be?" asked the Greek.

"About the middle of the nineteenth century," was the dry and crushing reply. Simonides promptly picked up his manuscripts and departed.

But, sad to say, he later succeeded in selling this same document to an overcredulous lord for a good round sum.

The versatility of Alexander Smith in his work was really extraordinary, and he seems to have furnished whatever was in demand. Among the list of his forgeries it is interesting to note the following. A variety of old documents relating to the Jacobite period, letters and autographs of Burns, Scott, Oliver Cromwell, Carlyle, Thackeray, John Bright, Gladstone, Salisbury, Lord Nelson, Mary Queen of Scots, James VI, Prince Charlie, John Knox, [illegible] ...

... punishment for rascality of this nature being very light, he was sentenced to but one year's imprisonment.

We have by no means been free from men of the Smith type in America. The story of Robert Springer, the great "Washington forger," is perhaps, not known to all.

Springer came to America in 1840 and at first made an honest living travelling through the Southern States as a book peddler. After making a little money in this way he finally settled down in Baltimore as a dealer in rare books and manuscripts.

In 1855, at the sale of the papers of an old Baltimore banking house, he found a fortune in the shape of a quantity of checks of General Washington on the Alexandria Bank and also on another in Washington. With these he also secured a number of business letters of Washington, including a large amount of blank foolscap of English manufacture, such as was used in this country until after the Revolution. There were hundreds of the checks, and these he mailed to banks throughout the United States and Canada, stating how they had come into his possession, and asking the recipient to send in return a check for such sum as he deemed the document worth. Usually he received a check for from $10 to $20, and in this way earned a regular income.

But the checks finally gave out, and with the foolscap at hand he now commenced a series of most remarkable forgeries. Among these may be mentioned letters and signatures of Washington, Franklin, Livingston, Lord Nelson and many others. At his trial he claimed to have imposed upon the Prince of Wales, Thiers, Guizot, Napoleon, Metternich and others equally well known. He became a perfect imitator of Washington's handwriting, and being of a fertile brain, he so familiarized himself with Washington's methods of thought and expression that his letters have every appearance of genuineness. At this date there are doubtless hundreds of these Washington forgeries both in the public and private libraries of this country which will never be detected. When arrested in Philadelphia Springer acknowledged having himself written a letter of Washington exhibited among other relics in Independence Hall, and which had been used for the purpose of comparison with any doubtful Washington manuscripts.

Springer died in great poverty in 1876 at the age of 66 years.

But for originality and audacity in this branch of work the late Mr. Shapira of London certainly deserves some mention.

About the year 1878 the entire religious world of England broke forth in rejoicings and hallelujahs.

One morning there had appeared in the London Times the translation by Dr. Ginsburg of a most wonderful old manuscript, which was supposed to be no less a curiosity than the original of the Book of Deuteronomy, from the hand of Moses himself! It consisted of seven numbered and eight unnumbered fragments written in the primeval Hebrew characters, on strips of blackened leather, and was offered for sale to the British Museum by Mr. Shapira for the modest sum of £1,000,000, or $5,000,000.

But, fortunately for the museum, this really gigantic fraud was detected in time, and it was saved from further humiliation.

At his death, in 1880, Shapira's library, which consisted of some really very valuable manuscripts and books, was sold, the above mentioned document fetching £25.

[illegible]

[E]XAMINER, SAN FRANCISCO: SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 8.

CORPORAL WILLIAM F. GEIMANN FALLS A VICTIM OF PNEUMONIA.

Corporal William F. Geimann, one of the most popular officers of the Police Department, died of pneumonia yesterday at his home, 1305½ Golden Gate avenue.

His death was most unexpected, for Corporal Geimann was a strong and vigorous young man, and he was on duty until Tuesday afternoon.

Last Sunday the Corporal said that he had a cold, but he paid little attention to it. On Tuesday afternoon he was so ill that he went from work. His condition was then found to be serious. The case was considered hopeful until 11:30 o'clock on Friday night. Early yesterday morning a quieter condition renewed the hope of the watchers, but at 8:15 o'clock death came in sleep.

THE LATE CORPORAL GEIMANN.

Corporal Geimann was thirty-eight years old, a native of San Francisco. He was a son of William Geimann, the retired tailor. His widow is the daughter of Captain John Mahan, formerly a well-known pilot. There are four children, all under thirteen years.

George, Walter and August Geimann are brothers of the deceased, and two sisters are Mrs. Harry McGowan and Mrs. Frank Fesler.

The funeral is to be held at 10 o'clock to-morrow, the body to be taken from the family residence to the Church of the Holy Cross.

Corporal Geimann was appointed to the police force on October 16, 1891. He was made a Corporal on January 16, 1896, and since that time he had been a clerk in the Chief's office. He was a member of the Native Sons of the Golden West and of the Ancient Order of United Workmen.

MRS. BOTKIN NOT IN COURT.

The Woman Too Ill to Receive Her Sentence.

Sheriff Martin appeared in Judge Carroll Cook's court yesterday morning without Mrs. Cordelia Botkin, whom he had been ordered to produce in court at 10 o'clock, that being the time set for passing sentence of life imprisonment on her for the murder of Mrs. John P. Dunning.

When asked why he had not brought in the prisoner the Sheriff replied that she was too ill to be present, that he visited the Branch County Jail at 9 o'clock yesterday morning for the purpose of conveying her to jail and found her suffering from a severe headache, superinduced by a cold; that she was not able to get out of bed, and that she required the ministrations of the matron of the jail and other attendants. The Sheriff declared that the prisoner was physically incapacitated to obey the court's order.

Attorney Frank McGowan, representing the defendant, asked the court's indulgence, saying that his client had been ill for several days, but he thought she would be well enough to answer the court's summons in a short time. Judge Cook said that he was disposed to allow the request for a reasonable postponement, and that the Sheriff's statement would be accepted as satisfactory.

At this juncture District Attorney Murphy informed those interested that Attorney J. A. Hosmer, formerly Assistant District Attorney, who conducted the prosecution of Mrs. Botkin, is to represent the District Attorney's office throughout future proceedings in the Botkin case. This course is taken for the reason that Mr. Hosmer is acquainted with every phase of the matter.

Judge Cook said that the passing of sentence on Mrs. Botkin would be postponed until next Saturday, the 14th inst.

HER EYES WERE RED AS IF FROM WEEPING.

Mrs. Botkin, Convicted of Murdering Mrs. Dunning, Has Her Sentence Postponed.

When Mrs. Cordelia Botkin appeared in Judge Cook's court yesterday morning her eyes were red, as if she had been weeping and she was devoid of that air of confidence which marked her behavior before her conviction of murder, for causing the death of Mrs. J. P. Dunning by means of poisoned candy.

Before the prisoner was called to receive the sentence of life imprisonment which was prescribed by the trial jury, Attorney Charles Hagerty requested a postponement until Attorney George A. Knight could be in attendance for the purpose of presenting his argument in support of the motion for a new trial.

Mr. Hagerty thought that Mr. Knight could not be present before the 23d inst.

"Before that request is granted we would like to know on what grounds the motion for a new trial is to be urged," said District Attorney Murphy.

"Why, on every legal ground, but mainly on the contention that this court has no jurisdiction," replied Mr. Hagerty.

District Attorney Murphy and Attorney J. A. Hosmer, who still has practical control of the prosecution, consulted briefly, and announced that they had no objection to a reasonable delay in the matter.

"Let the case be set down for January 23d, and at that time counsel will be expected to proceed," said Judge Cook.

Mrs. Botkin seemed disappointed at the postponement. She was considerably agitated, and the dilatory deliberations of the lawyers were plainly irksome to her. She looks as if the suspense has grown burdensome, and doubtless she will have a sense of relief when the ordeal is over.

Mrs. Botkin was attired in a black tailor-made suit, with a white satin bow at her throat, and wore the hat that she wore most of the time during the trial. As usual the courtroom was crowded with men and women anxious to get a glimpse of the prisoner. The services of two policemen were required to keep clear the corridor in front of the courtroom door.

[S]O CALL, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1899.

A FORGER'S PEN MADE THIS NOTE

Sensational Charge Brought by a Witness in a Battle for Half a Million.

Mary Helen Murdock's Claim Against Her Dead Uncle's Estate Declared to Be Based on a Bogus Signature.

MARY HELEN MURDOCK'S note of $100,000, payable twenty years from date, and bearing interest at the rate of 1 per cent per month, purporting to have been signed by the late millionaire William Murdock, the Colusa County rancher, which has long been the subject of wonderment throughout half the continent, has been branded as a forgery.

This note, with interest, now stands against the estate of the dead millionaire as a liability amounting to half a million dollars. If it is a forgery, as claimed by Chief of Police Lees and the best experts in the country, backed by the testimony of a witness, J. F. Turner, who has told the secret of its existence, claim that such it is, the efforts of Becker, the looter of the Nevada Bank, and all of his ilk will fade to those of petty larcenists beside this gigantic conspiracy to swindle the estate of the dead capitalist. It is the forgery of the century, and for the greed of its perpetrators, their daring and reckless pursuit of gold that it was never intended they should share stands without a precedent in the annals of modern crime.

A few years ago William Murdock died in this city, full of years that had known incessant toil. He left a vast estate as well as a niece, Mary Helen Murdock, who had long enjoyed the old man's respect and his love. The old man had been but a few months in his grave when a note, payable to Mary Helen Murdock, bearing date of September 5, 1877, its back disfigured by various assignments, was presented for settlement. The representatives of the estate stood aghast when the note was presented, but it was not paid. Suit for the recovery of the face of the note, with interest as set forth, bringing the amount due up to the sum near $500,000, was commenced, and is now pending in the Glenn County Superior Court. On April 4 next it will go to trial, and E. S. Pillsbury of this city and Attorney Lusk of Chico, who represent the Murdock estate, are confident that they can prove the instrument a forgery, and are preparing their case with that end in view. The deposition of J. F. Turner has been taken, and will be settled and signed to-day. This will place in the hands of Mr. Pillsbury the whole story of the forging of the document, backed by documentary evidence, which will doubtless defeat the effort to loot the estate of the dead capitalist as well as seriously increase the troubles of one or more well-known citizens.

At the time of Murdock's death Turner was a well and favorably known real estate dealer of this city and was enjoying a big income. The forgery, or alleged forgery, of the note occupied his attention for a time, and although he was in no way connected with the alleged swindle except for the purpose of obtaining evidence against those who launched it, it led him into a mire of trouble, from which, after a bitter legal battle, he has just succeeded in extricating himself, and is now in a position to tell his story against those who would give their all to see him behind prison bars. His deposition is an unusual one, in that it sets forth a story seldom heard in a legal trial.

Stripped of its legal phrase, and question and answer form, Turner's deposition contains the following story. He started his story before Notary Mark Lane by telling how Lawrence S. Megginson, whom he accuses of having forged the note, came to his office in the spring of 1892, when he (Turner) was at 4 Sutter street. He continues:

Claiming to be ill at the time and finding that Turner had nice sunny offices nearly furnished, Megginson wanted Turner to let him make them his headquarters and have his mail come there. Turner, the deposition sets forth, consented, and also gave Megginson one of the steel boxes in his safe to keep his papers in. It was not long before Megginson told Turner about having a note for $100,000 against William Murdock, Olimpo [illegible] dated September 5, 1877, and due September 5, 1897, bearing 1 per cent per month interest. He told Turner that the note would amount to $340,000 when due, and that he had bought it for $50,000. He told Turner that Murdock had a pet niece whose name was Mrs. Minnie Murdock, and that Murdock had given his niece the note because he thought more of her than any one else. He told Turner that Murdock was an old bachelor and had been sick a great deal, and that Minnie had always taken care of him when sick and that the old man would always pull Minnie on his knee and kiss her whenever he got the chance, and that for a long time prior to the making of the note he had promised Minnie that some day he would make her a nice present. Megginson said the time came when the old man handed Minnie the note and said to her, "Here, Minnie, is a note that will come due about the time I die, and with care it will be all the money you will want the balance of your life." Megginson also said that the old man told her that he would leave ample property to pay the note when due. Megginson then told Turner how he got acquainted with Mrs. Murdock, whom he called Minnie, and told how she had taken a great notion to him and had told him all about the note.

He said that Minnie was a very nice person and she had always stopped at the same house where he lived when she came to the city and that she had made a confidant of him. He then said that Minnie was afraid she would have trouble with the Murdock heirs about the note, so had agreed to sell him the note for $10,000. He then said she had assigned the note to him and he had assigned it to his brother, William Megginson, in Ohio. Megginson then told Turner that he was to pay Minnie only a few thousand dollars of the amount until it came out of the estate, but to make the consideration right before the heirs he was having his brother send him $1000, $5000 and $10,000 at a time, and he was having it come through the bank, and as soon as he drew it out of the bank he would take it to Minnie, pay it over to her, take her receipt and then at once take the same money and send it back to his brother, and then in five or six weeks his brother would send it back again and he would make another sham payment, and so on.

In this way he was paying the $50,000 to show the consideration all right. "Well," he said, "while he had spent $10,000 of his brother's money, he wanted to let his brother out of it and get some one to go in with him and stand half of the expenses all through, and when the old man died make the fight against the heirs, and after the $50,000 was paid and all expenses the balance would be divided with whoever went in with him." He also said that Minnie had another note for $5,000 that she had got from a banker at Sacramento, which she was to turn over to him for the $10,000, so he would put the whole matter together, which would amount to over $500,000 when due, and there would not be over $100,000 to pay out.

It was about the first of June 1892, when Megginson began to make the offers to Turner. He then showed Turner the note, and when Turner questioned him about the consideration given for the note the first thing Megginson did was to show Turner two deeds signed by William Murdock before a Notary Public, and he said: "You see there is no doubt about the signature being William Murdock's, as it compares exactly with the signatures on the deeds." Turner then noticed that one of the deeds was dated in 1873 and the other one in 1880, and that both deeds were for the same piece of land. Megginson then told Turner that the last deed was given to correct an error in the description in the first deed. Turner then noticed that the name on the note which was dated September 5, 1877, compared exactly with the name on the deed of 1880.

Turner did not then let on to Megginson what his suspicions were, but kept questioning him in many ways, Megginson thinking that Turner intended going in with him. Turner then asked Megginson what guarantee there was that Mrs. Minnie Murdock would not come back on him for the whole amount, after the estate was settled, if he did go in and bear half of the expenses. Megginson then said he would bring Minnie, as he called her, and introduce her, and she would tell Turner that the whole matter was left to him. Megginson did bring a woman to Turner's office whom he introduced as Mrs. Minnie Murdock, and said: "Now, Minnie will tell you all about the note herself." She then told Turner that she had assigned the note to Megginson for $10,000, and that anything that Mr. Megginson did would be entirely satisfactory to her, as she had left the whole matter in his hands.

About this time Turner took Megginson down to see C. P. Robinson, an attorney, as Megginson was very uneasy about his mode of payments. He wanted to make sure that he could not get into trouble with the Murdock estate people. Megginson and Turner went together to ask Robinson some legal questions about the assignment of the note and the mode of his payments for the same. Megginson seemed to be very uneasy about the way he was having his brother send the money here. This was in September, 1892. Megginson, about this time, went over to Oakland to stay a few days to avoid the service of a subpoena [illegible] and a party who wanted to take his deposition, and while over there he wrote to Turner [illegible] tember [illegible], asking him to see Robinson about some matters in connection with the note.

This letter is now in the possession of the attorneys representing the Murdock estate and corroborates the statements made by Turner. This letter the attorneys are zealously guarding, and state that the admissions made by Megginson therein completely substantiate their contention that the note is a forgery, and it will be, after Turner's deposition, probably the first evidence introduced on behalf of the estate tending to substantiate its contention of forgery.

Turner then told Megginson that he would not go in with him unless he (Megginson) would tell him the whole truth, as he did not believe the note was genuine. Turner told Megginson that he believed the note was a forgery, and that unless he took him (Turner) into his confidence and told him all about it and just how it was obtained, he (Turner) would refuse to consider the proposition. Turner, however, gave Megginson to understand that he would go in and fight the matter through if he would tell him the whole truth.

Megginson then took Turner in his confidence and told him all about the matter. Megginson then showed Turner just what the note looked like when it was signed by William Murdock and what it looked like after it was in his hands a few hours.

Still, with this marvelous statement Megginson claimed that Minnie, as he called her, or Mary Helen Murdock (which is her name), believed up to that time and would always believe that her uncle had signed the note for her for $100,000, dated September 5, 1877. Still the note presented for payment was not signed, it is claimed, by the dead man.

The ignorance of Mary Helen regarding the note is explained by Turner in his explanation of how the note was forged. Turner, after he gained the confidence of Megginson and the latter decided to tell Turner all, listened, he says, to the following story of the forgery of the note:

Shortly prior to Murdock's death I called the attention of Miss Murdock to the fact that her uncle had promised her a present some time before, and I told her that if she would take a note which I would draw for $100 and get her uncle to sign it I would then raise it to $100,000 and set back the date a sense [illegible] of $100,000 and set back the date. Mary Helen Murdock did not like the scheme and said she would draw up a note for the full $100,000 and get her uncle to sign it, as she believed that if she rushed in and asked him to sign it he would do so without looking at the note. She drew up a note for $100,000 and then handed it to me and I placed it in my pocket, being afraid that the uncle would read the note, refuse to sign it and ruin our plans. When Miss Murdock wanted to get the note signed I handed her the one I had drawn up for $100. She ran off thinking that I had handed her the note for $100,000 in her handwriting. She came back in a few minutes, handed me the note and said that her uncle had not even looked at the note, had signed it, and handed it back to her. In fact, she had not looked at it herself, and did not know that it was the one I had drawn for $100.

I then took the note and excused myself. I went away intending to raise the note, and it immediately dawned upon me that it was not in Miss Murdock's handwriting and she would immediately discover the deception. I then took the note she had drawn up and endeavored to forge Murdock's signature, but I made a botch of it. In consequence I had two useless notes on my hands. I procured another blank note and traced and copied Miss Murdock's handwriting in the body of the note and then took Murdock's signature from the deed executed in, which was drawn in 1880, and traced it in part and copied the rest. Next morning I presented it to "Minnie" and subsequently it was assigned to me.

Such is the story of the forgery, and Turner avers that later the note was assigned to Megginson's brother, William, who resides in Ohio. Turner, after he secured the story, refused to consider the proposition of entering into the scheme, and when L. S. Megginson found this out he immediately lost heart and referred the note to Mary Helen. Then the safest way out of the difficulty and to close Turner's lips was to have him arrested, Turner says, and this Megginson, aided by one J. F. Frenna, did.

Through all these years Frenna and Megginson have done their best to obtain a conviction that would stick against Turner but without avail.

Now Turner, who claims that the whole thing was a blackmail scheme for the purpose of beating him out of a large amount of property and covering up the forgery, is going to start in on the same fire battles and show up the other side of the case. He claims that every word of the testimony given by both Frenna and Megginson was false and perjured testimony, which he says he can prove in the courts. He is going to show his full hand, which he says will astonish the citizens of the entire State. He promises revelations that will put him in a different light and make Megginson and Frenna site themselves to show that they are not guilty of similar and startling crimes.

With certain documentary evidence and the testimony of Turner, Attorney E. S. Pillsbury is confident in his position and believes that when the case is finally determined he will have secured a judgment branding the note the handiwork of schemers, whose greed for gold led them to overstep themselves and fall when their claim was met in a court of justice.

Peter Dergans Accused of Unfaithfulness to His Trust.

Peter Dergans was arrested last night upon complaint of his brother Andrew and locked up in the City Prison on a charge of forgery. It is alleged that Peter caused a bank book belonging to a third brother, Antone, to be transferred to himself, and that he then drew out all of the money, amounting to $776 18, and deposited it to his own account.

Andrew states that Antone went to the Klondike March 9, 1897, leaving his bank book with Andrew, who, on leaving for the country in the January following, turned the book over to Peter. Antone returned from the Klondike with gold dust worth, it is said, several thousand dollars and went to Austria. He came back here in November and was unable to find Andrew, Peter telling him that he did not know where his brother was. Antone returned to Austria and wrote to Andrew to send him his money. Andrew learned that in April, 1898, Peter had filed an affidavit with the Hibernia Bank that the bank book had been transferred to him. The book contains an assignment dated March 10, 1897, a day after Antone had left for the Klondike. Four different handwritings appear in the assignment. Andrew alleges that Antone's signature is a forgery. Detective Dillon and Policeman John Q[illegible] made the arrest.

Peter Dergans claims that he gave Andrew $[illegible], receiving the bank book and a note for $[illegible] in exchange. This is emphatically denied by Andrew.

HUSBAND'S CLAIM FOR PART OF AN ESTATE.

E. W. Scott Offers to Prove That His Late Wife Made an Olographic Will.

E. W. Scott, surviving husband of Mrs. [illegible]gelle R. Scott, has presented to the Superior Court a document which he alleges to be the last olographic will of his wife. It is a brief memorandum, bequeathing $[illegible] to Mrs. Wealthy Wormer, no mention being made as to the remainder of the estate which is said to be worth $20,000.

If this writing should be accepted as Mrs. Scott's last will the surviving husband would succeed to one-third of the property, whereas by the terms of the will recently admitted to probate he is allowed but a small [illegible].

Public Administrator [illegible], who has been nominated as executor in the will produced by Mr. [S]cott, and Attorney George E. Keene presented arguments in favor of that course, but Judge Coffey said he would hold the instrument presented by Mr. Scott to be merely a [illegible] Mrs. Scott's original will. Mr. Scott gave notice of an appeal to the Supreme Court.

VOL. LXIX. SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1899—THIRTY-TWO P

MRS. BOTKIN IS SENTENCED

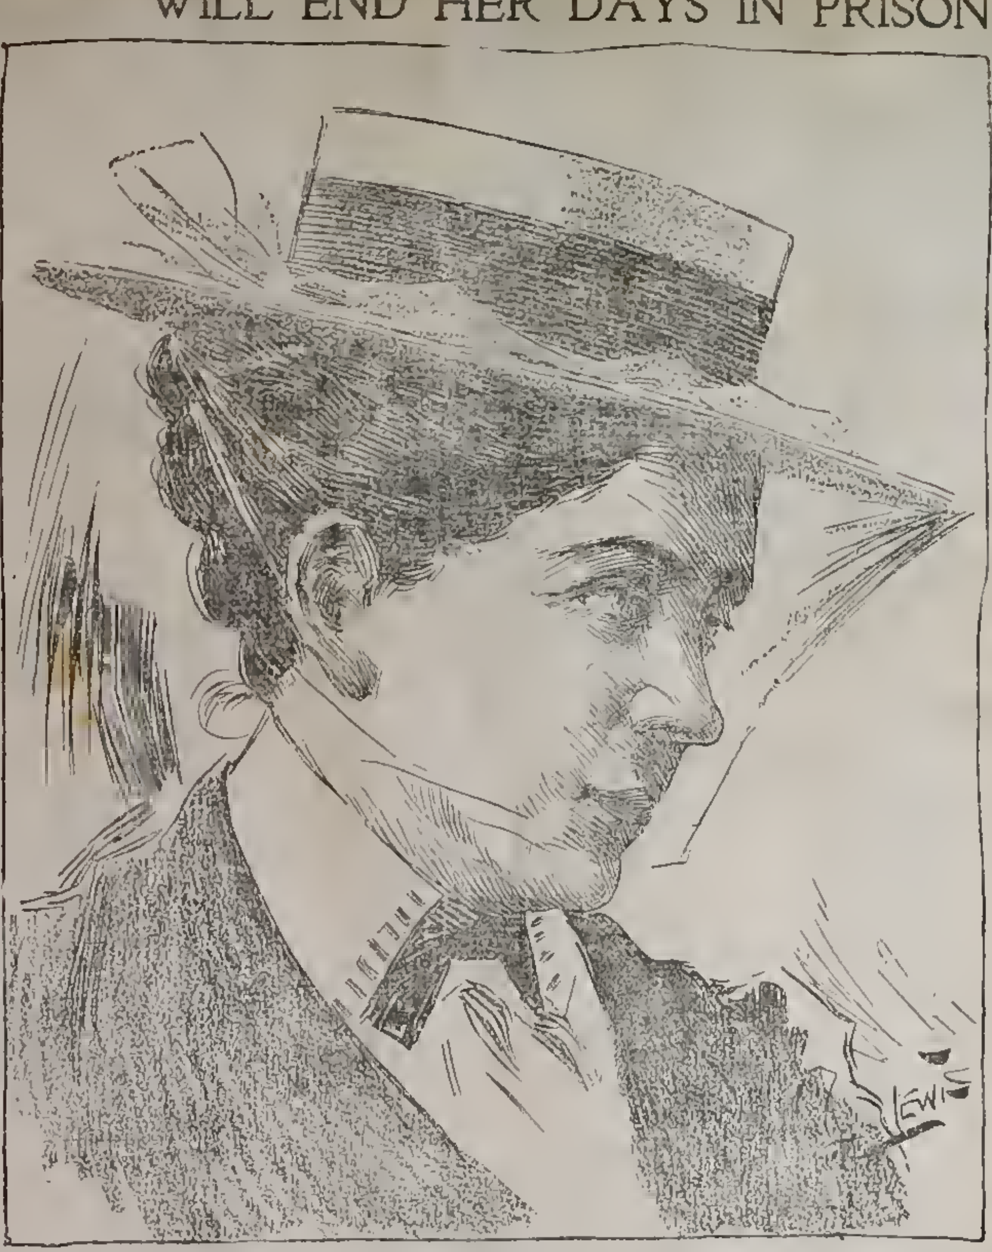
Imprisonment for Life for Poisoning Mrs. Dunning.

JUDGE COOK DENIES HER A NEW TRIAL.

THE PRISONER'S SISTER SUPPORTS HER DURING THE ORDEAL.

An Appeal to the Supreme Court All That Stands Between Mrs. Botkin and San Quentin.

MRS. CORDELIA BOTKIN, WHO WILL END HER DAYS IN PRISON.



Cordelia Botkin has had her future foretold by a grim fortune-teller. Yesterday was doomsday for her, when on her drooping head the words of sentence fell. She heard the name "San Quentin," pronounced with a new meaning and a grim significance and she realized faintly, as from afar off, what it means to be imprisoned within stone walls for natural life, especially when that life is but just in prime and has been filled so far with what some people are pleased to call, "the good things of life." All the rest of her days Mrs. Botkin will be shut up with her memory.

In response to the cold command of the Judge, Mrs. Botkin stood up. She is such a small woman that even when she stood, she did not come much above the shoulders of those who sat. She stood before her Judge with her head dropped in a prayerful attitude. To the downcast woman before him, Judge Cook read the indictment with the dispassionate voice and manner of an automaton. Half way through Mrs. Botkin suddenly raised her head and thereafter she looked the Judge straight in the face. Then came the formal question, "Have you anything to say why sentence should not be pronounced upon you?" The question is like that one in the marriage service where the applicants for the degree of matrimony are asked if they know of any existing obstacles to their union, a question that always brings a breathless moment of suspense while every one thinks how terrible it would be if the stillness were suddenly shattered by a voice.

The deep silence of the awed and crowded court was broken by a voice and the voice was Mrs. Botkin's. A moment she hesitated, while she knitted her brow in the deep wrinkle that has become habitual since she lost her liberty. She put her hand to her throat and tried to swallow. It was as though the voice would not come at her bidding. Then she made her last assertion of innocence in a tone clear and vibrating with emotion. It was not the voice of affectation in which she told her story to the jury, and it rang with feeling.

The Judge had asked Mrs. Botkin if she had anything to say.

"I certainly have," she replied, stifling a tremolo. "As I said at the beginning, I am not guilty of this atrocious crime."

Charles J. Heggerty, one of Mrs. Botkin's attorneys, was not prepared for the impromptu speech. He leaned toward her, said something and tried to pull her into her seat. It was remembered by those who heard sentence pronounced for the first time on Theodore Durrant, in that summer twilight in Judge Murphy's courtroom, that Durrant tried to say something when given his opportunity, but that General Dickinson pulled him into his seat and stood guard over him lest he should commit an indiscretion. Mrs. Botkin, having said her say, perhaps overcome by emotion, for she was trembling in every limb, or maybe thinking that it was all over, sank into her seat. But the Judge had not finished with her.

"Stand up again, Mrs. Botkin," he said in frigid tones.

Mrs. Botkin was trembling and crying softly, but she tried to rise. Her sister, Miss Brown, who was with her, raised her tenderly to her feet. They stood together, Miss Brown's arm about the waist of the sister, who is older than she but much more dependent. Mrs. Botkin leaned against the protecting shoulder of the sister who has been so tenderly devoted to her. It was a striking picture—one woman tall, thin, gaunt and plain, the other short, plump, pretty, essentially feminine—the one good and strong to lean upon, the other weak, faulty, looking for support. Miss Brown suddenly seemed like a mother instead of a younger sister. She has supported herself for years and she is used to buffeting with the world. Mrs. Botkin has always been sheltered, if not protected, and in the hour of her trial she was supremely weak.

Standing, with arms entwined, the two women were sentenced. A stranger could not have told which woman had sinned, as the sentence fell on both their heads. Miss Brown looked steadily at the Judge, and in her eyes there was an angry glitter. Mrs. Botkin clung to his face with her great eyes, while he spoke of San Quentin and the delivery into the custody of the Warden, as though she were a bale of goods, and went on with the sentence to its hopeless, bitter end. In imagination she could see the grassy slopes at the foot of which San Quentin lies ... [illegible] walls and could other questions included in the written motion for a new trial were passed and submitted without argument, and no affidavits were presented in support of such grounds as were based on affidavits.

The question of jurisdiction was not raised on the arraignment of the defendant either by demurrer or otherwise, neither was it raised at any time during the course of the trial either by objections to evidence offered or in the instructions requested by the defendant, or at all.

Now, for the first time since the filing of the indictment herein the jurisdiction of the Court to try the cause is questioned, and in questioning the same the Court is asked by defendant's counsel to say in one and the same breath that it has no jurisdiction to try the cause, but nevertheless will order the same retried.

In the case of People vs. Turner, 39 Cal., 372, the Supreme Court says: "A motion for a new trial presupposes a sufficient valid indictment upon which, with sufficient legal evidence in support of its allegations, a legal verdict and a valid, binding judgment may be pronounced. The statute does not contemplate or authorize a retrial upon an insufficient or invalid indictment, hence, a motion for a new trial cannot properly be based upon any objection to the sufficiency or validity of the indictment or any errors or irregularities occurring in the proceedings before issue of fact joined by plea to a good and sufficient indictment, the object and purpose of a retrial being simply to enable the trial court to avoid the errors and irregularities claimed to have occurred on the former trial to the prejudice of the rights secured to the defendant."

The Court has power to grant a new trial on certain grounds specified in the statute and on none other. In the case of People vs. Laura D. Fair, 43 Cal., 142, the Supreme Court says: "The Court had no power to grant a new trial for such a reason, because it is not one of the grounds upon which only a new trial can be granted."

Section 1181 of the Penal Code enumerates specifically the grounds upon which a motion for a new trial may be granted, and "want of jurisdiction" is not one of them.

On the trial no objection to the jurisdiction of the Court over the subject of the indictment was made, neither was it at any time during the course of the trial objected that the facts proved did not constitute a public offense, therefore, there is no ruling of the Court on this question either on demurrer or motion, or on the trial, which can be classed as an error of law reviewable on motion for a new trial. The question of jurisdiction certainly would not be involved in either subdivision 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 or 7 of section 1181, and as a verdict is "contrary to law" only when contrary to the charge of the Court, it would not be involved in subdivision 6 of said section. There being no other grounds upon which a new trial can be granted, it necessarily follows that unless some other reason than an alleged want of jurisdiction exists the motion made must be denied, and as no other reasons have been called to the attention of the Court, and as the Court is satisfied that the evidence given at the trial is sufficient to sustain the verdict rendered the motion for a new trial is denied.

Immediately after receiving this knock-out blow Attorney Heggerty made a motion in arrest of judgment upon the ground of the insufficient jurisdiction of the court and to cover all the grounds set forth in the motion for a new trial, on statutory grounds and because of the fact that the Grand Jury had no jurisdiction over the subject matter. Thereupon the Judge read a written opinion in which, having anticipated such a motion, he had over- ...

taken it with her into another State, there partaken of it and died?

In either of such cases there would have occurred within this jurisdiction the two main elements of the crime of murder, the act, so far as the defendant could act, and the intent would have united, and all within this jurisdiction. In a poisoning case, where the deceased received, ate and died, all in the immediate presence of a defendant and within the confines of a room, the defendant would be guilty of murder if he handed to the deceased the poison having at the time he so handed it the intent to kill, no further act would be required of him. That the deceased with his own hand conveyed the poison to his mouth would not lessen the defendant's crime. The law would not require the prosecution in such a case, to prove that the defendant not only delivered and handed the poison to the deceased, but also that he by his own hand poured it down the throat of the deceased.

Suppose this case: Jones in a kitchen, believing that Brown is dining alone in an adjoining room and intending to kill Brown places poison in food sent from the kitchen and placed before Brown at the table where he sits. Unknown to Jones a guest, against whom Jones has no evil intentions, is dining with Brown. Both Brown and his guest partake of the poisoned food and as a result die. Jones has not left his kitchen. He did not place the food to the mouth of either. His act consisted merely in placing, with the intent to kill, poison within the reach of one of them. Their eating and their death were but the consequences of his act, which was coupled with an intent to kill. Could it be claimed that Jones was not guilty of the complete crime of murder, and that, too, regardless of whether Brown, his guest or both of them died?

As further examples of my meaning:

First—A willfully and with intent to kill mixes poison in a flask of liquor and hands it to B who by his own hand places it to his lips and dies. This is murder. The act of A was but the delivery. It was the act of B himself that actually produced the result. Yet the act of A made it possible for B to partake. The act of B, as well as his death, were but the consequences of the act of A. The act of A having been coupled with the intent to kill constituted the complete crime of murder—what followed was but the consequence.

Second—A willfully and with intent to kill B, prepares poisoned liquor and leaves it in a bureau drawer, knowing that B will there find and partake of it. B does, without any additional act of A, find and partake, and, as a result dies. The act of B in finding and imbibing is the immediate cause of the death, but the act of A made it possible for such results to follow. Therefore, such act of A, coupled as it was with the intent to kill, being followed by such consequences, constituted the complete crime of murder, and that, too, even though C, against whom A had no evil intentions, had become the victim. The act and the intent of A constituted the crime.

Third—A, willfully and with intent to kill B, who at the time is in another county or state, prepares poisoned liquor and leaves it where B, on his return, can get it. B returns. A is not present, but B partakes of the liquor and dies. The act and intent of A, followed by the consequences which happened on the return of B, constitutes murder.

Fourth—In either of the last-mentioned cases the person who receives the liquor, or finds it, take it to another county or state, and the consequences follow in such other county or state, either resulting in the death of the one who has received or found it, or in the death of some one to whom it is there delivered. No further act of A has been required to produce such consequences. All are the consequences of A's act and intent, which in ... instances ... [illegible] flicted of the poison administered is the locus of the crime, would seem to support the jurisdiction of this Court. Some of the cases are: Green vs. State, 66 Ala., 40; S. C. 41 Am. Rep., 744; People vs. Griffin, 38 Cal., 667; Com. vs. McLoon, 101 Mass., 1; S. C. 100 Am. Dec., 89; State vs. Brown, 16 Kas., 476; State vs. Kelly, 76 Me., 331; Tyler vs. People, 8 Mich., 342; State vs. Gessert, 21 Minn., 369; Riley vs. State, 9 Humph. (Tenn.), 646; Guiteau case, 1 Mackey (D. C.), 498-552-526; ex-parte Rogers, 10 Tex. App., 655; People vs. Staples, 91 Cal., 21; People vs. Hodges, 27 Cal., 340; Rex vs. Williams, 2 Camp., 607; Reg vs. Jones, 1 Cox, C. C., 198; Reg vs. Jones, 1 Dennison, C. C., 558; U. S. vs. Worrall, 2 Dal., 384; Adams vs. People, 1 N. Y., 174.

It would seem, therefore, that it is unnecessary to attempt an interpretation of section 27 of the Penal Code.

It is claimed by the District Attorney that if jurisdiction does not attach by reason of the facts themselves, it does attach by reason of sections 27, 655 and 656 of the Penal Code, when read together, giving them the liberal construction required by section 4 of the same code. It is claimed that such sections mean simply that all crimes created by the laws of this State which are in part committed by persons within this State may be prosecuted under our laws.

The defendant claims that section 27 does not create a crime, but merely provides for the punishment of crimes created by other statutes, and that jurisdiction can only be found in the chapter of the code relating to jurisdiction.

The Supreme Court of this State has held in the case of People vs. McNulty (93 Cal., 436-9) that a statute (S. of Pol. Code) referring exclusively to laws creating a crime, included a statute providing for punishment only.

In a very recent case (People vs. Black, 18 Cal. Dec., 59) the Supreme Court also held that in looking for statutes conferring jurisdiction other sections of the code than those found in the chapter relating to the subject of jurisdiction could be invoked, and that although jurisdiction could not be found in a certain case under that part of the code devoted to such subject it was given by a statute in another part of the code, which provided that a person doing certain things might "be convicted and punished" in the same manner as if such crime had been committed in this State. The word "punishable" used in section 27 is even a broader word than either of those used in the section there construed. Punishable includes not only the extent of punishment possible to be inflicted, but the liability to trial, conviction and punishment.

The question here presented being to a certain extent a new one and there being absolutely no case capable of being produced as a precedent which is, as the saying is, "on all fours" with it, and involving as it possibly does an interpretation for the first time of section 27 of the Penal Code, it should be passed upon by the Supreme Court, the jurisdiction of which extends over the entire State and the decision of which will govern all trial courts in the State in which the question might in the future arise.

I do not feel justified under my views, as hereinbefore expressed, in refusing to pronounce judgment on a verdict of guilty rendered in a case of murder so monstrous and diabolical as the verdict in this case stamps this homicide to have been. The crime is almost unparalleled. Our code requires that its provisions are to be construed according to the fair import of their terms, with a view to effect its object and to promote justice. It would not be the promotion of justice, but rather the promotion of a failure of justice to so construe the statute as to permit a crime so diabolical as this to go unpunished and the criminal unwhipped of justice.

The motion in arrest of judgment is

... ting the case to the Federal ... as a last resort. The ... whether they know predict that the Supreme Court will sustain Judge Cook and that after the proper delay Mrs. Botkin will take her place among the ... women in that populous city, San Quentin. ... that no one thinks that she will remain there for her natural life. They say—these same wise people that under the circumstances, since there is no law that covers her case and since the decisions are based on common sense and a rough sense of justice, that the Justices will unite in petitioning for her pardon after a time, that there will be a friendly Governor some day, that the petition will be quietly pushed when the public has cooled down and the ... sensation shall have been eclipsed by half a dozen newer and bigger ones, and that when that day comes Mrs. Botkin will quietly slip from prison walls and will be no longer the guest of the State.

HOMER HELD FOR TRIAL.

Must Answer a Charge of Embezzlement.

Says His Accuser Had Him Print Bogus Lottery Tickets.

OAKLAND, Jan. 21.—Frank T. Homer, accused of having stolen a printing press from Miss L. J. Burdick, was held to answer before the Superior Court on a charge of embezzlement by Police Judge Mortimer Smith this morning, with bail fixed at $500.

Attorney William White made a strong plea for mercy from the court, drawing a vivid picture of the destitution of Homer's home if he were bound over to the Superior Court. However, Judge Smith decided that the case against the printer was sufficiently strong to warrant his trial by a jury.

According to Homer, he purchased the press from Miss Burdick. He then used it to print

BOGUS LOTTERY TICKETS

For her. Late yesterday afternoon Miss Burdick took the stand and told of the purchase of the press. She testified that she had delivered the press to Homer to be used by him, but that it remained her property. When he sold it she determined to have him arrested for embezzlement.

Attorney W. S. O'Brien, for the defendant, endeavored to learn from her to what use the press was put, but Prosecuting Attorney Leach objected to this line of questioning and the late plaintiff was saved from answering. When Homer was called, however, O'Brien succeeded in getting him to testify about the LOTTERY DEAL.

"What was the work done by you for the plaintiff with the press?" asked the attorney. "Printing lottery tickets," replied Homer, before Leach could object.

It is said that Homer and Miss Burdick carried on a regular lottery ticket printing establishment, having an issue of tickets every month. This interesting revelation to Oaklanders has given rise to a discussion as to whether or not the printing of bogus lottery tickets is a crime. It is an offense to be in the possession of lottery tickets if they are genuine, but if the tickets are bogus it might be claimed that legally they are not tickets at all, and that therefore it is no crime to have them. If this be the case, it is a crime to print genuine lottery tickets, but no crime to print bogus ones. Disposal of bogus tickets, however, would be obtaining money under false pretenses unless the law that declines to protect gamblers from one another removes even that ground of prosecution.

Cordelia Botkin has had her future foretold by a grim fortune teller. Yesterday was doomsday for her, when on her drooping head the words of sentence fell. She heard the name "San Quentin," pronounced with a new meaning and a grim significance and she realized faintly as from afar off what it means to be imprisoned within stone walls for natural life, especially when that life is but just in prime and has been filled so far with what some people are pleased to call "the good things of life." All the rest of her days Mrs. Botkin will be shut up with her memory.

In response to the cold command of the Judge, Mrs. Botkin stood up. She is such a small woman that even when she stood, she did not come much above the shoulders of those who sat. She stood before her judge with her head dropped in a prayerful attitude. To the downcast woman before him, Judge Cook read the indictment with the dispassionate voice and manner of an automaton. Half way through Mrs. Botkin suddenly raised her head and thereafter she looked the Judge straight in the face. Then came the formal question, "Have you anything to say why sentence should not be pronounced upon you?" The question is like that one in the marriage service where the applicants for the degree of matrimony are asked if they know of any existing obstacles to their union, a question that always brings a breathless moment of suspense while every one thinks how terrible it would be if the stillness were suddenly shattered by a voice.

The deep silence of the awed and crowded court was broken by a voice and the voice was Mrs. Botkin's. A moment she hesitated, while she knitted her brow in the deep wrinkle that has become habitual since she lost her liberty. She put her hand to her throat and tried to swallow. It was as though the voice would not come at her bidding. Then she made her last assertion of innocence in a tone clear and vibrating with emotion. It was not the voice of affectation in which she told her story to the jury, and it rang with feeling.

The Judge had asked Mrs. Botkin if she had anything to say.

"I certainly have," she replied, stilling a tremolo. "As I said at the beginning, I am not guilty of this atrocious crime."

Charles J. Heggerty, one of Mrs. Botkin's attorneys, was not prepared for the impromptu speech. He leaned toward her, said something and tried to pull her into her seat. It was remembered by those who heard sentence pronounced for the first time on Theodore Durrant, in that summer twilight in Judge Murphy's courtroom, that Durrant tried to say something when given his opportunity, but that General Dickinson pulled him into his seat and stood guard over him lest he should commit an indiscretion. Mrs. Botkin, having said her say, perhaps overcome by emotion, for she was trembling in every limb, or maybe thinking that it was all over, sank into her seat. But the Judge had not finished with her.

"Stand up again, Mrs. Botkin," he said in frigid tones.

Mrs. Botkin was trembling and crying softly, but she tried to rise. Her sister, Miss Brown, who was with her, raised her tenderly to her feet. They stood together, Miss Brown's arm about the waist of the sister, who is older than she but much more dependent. Mrs. Botkin leaned against the protecting shoulder of the sister who has been so tenderly devoted to her. It was a striking picture—one woman tall, thin, gaunt and plain, the other short, plump, pretty, essentially feminine—the one good and strong to lean upon, the other weak, faulty, looking for support. Miss Brown suddenly seemed like a mother instead of a younger sister. She has supported herself for years and she is used to buffeting with the world. Mrs. Botkin has always been sheltered, if not protected, and in the hour of her trial she was supremely weak.

Standing, with arms entwined, the two women were sentenced. A stranger could not have told which woman had sinned, as the sentence fell on both their heads. Miss Brown looked steadfastly at the Judge, and in her eyes there was an angry glitter. Mrs. Botkin clung to his face with her great eyes, while he spoke of San Quentin and the delivery into the custody of the Warden, as though she were a bale of goods and went on with the sentence to its hopeless, bitter end. In imagination she could see the grassy slopes at the foot of which San Quentin lies, could see its castellated walls, and could hear the boom of its big gate, which, when once it shall have shut behind her, shall never open for her again until it unfolds to allow her corpse to be carried out—that is, if the law exacts its dread penalty. When Judge Cook spoke of her just conviction Mrs. Botkin shook her head slowly but decisively.

When it was all over, Mrs. Botkin, whose face looked lined and gray and old, sank into her seat, and the formal proceedings began to rasp themselves out again. The dramatic moment of the day had gone.

Before the sentence Judge Cook denied everything that was deniable. The motion for a new trial was denied, as was the motion in arrest of judgment. Judge Cook sat alone, without the supporting presence of Judge Angelotti, but he said that the Marin county Judge had assisted him in his conclusions and agreed with them. By this time Mrs. Botkin's attorneys, who had been confident that their arguments on the question of jurisdiction were good, began to fear. As a matter of fact, the Judge did not pass on the question of jurisdiction at all in denying the motion for a new trial. He said:

The only question presented on the argument of the motion for a new trial herein was the question as to whether this Court had jurisdiction to try the defendant for the crime charged in the indictment. All other questions included in the written motion for a new trial were passed and submitted without argument, and no affidavits were presented in support of such grounds as were based on affidavits.

The question of jurisdiction was not raised on the arraignment of the defendant either by demurrer or otherwise, neither was it raised at any time during the course of the trial either by objections to evidence offered or in the instructions requested by the defendant or at all.

Now, for the first time since the filing of the indictment herein the jurisdiction of the Court to try the cause is questioned, and in questioning the same the Court is asked by defendant's counsel to say in one and the same breath that it has no jurisdiction to try the cause, but nevertheless will order the same retried.

In the case of People vs. Turner, 39 Cal., 372, the Supreme Court says: "A motion for a new trial presupposes a sufficient valid indictment upon which, with sufficient legal evidence in support of its allegations, a legal verdict and a valid, binding judgement may be pronounced. The statute does not contemplate or authorize a re-trial upon an insufficient or invalid indictment, hence, a motion for a new trial cannot properly be based upon any objection to the sufficiency or validity of the indictment or any errors or irregularities occurring in the proceedings before issue of fact joined by plea to a good and sufficient indictment, the object and purpose of a re-trial being simply to enable the trial court to avoid the errors and irregularities claimed to have occurred on the former trial to the prejudice of the rights secured to the defendant."

The Court has power to grant a new trial on certain grounds specified in the statute and on none other. In the case of People vs. Laura D. Fair, 43 Cal. 142, the Supreme Court says: "The Court had no power to grant a new trial for such a reason, because it is not one of the grounds upon which only a new trial can be granted."

Section 1181 of the Penal Code enumerates specifically the grounds upon which a motion for a new trial may be granted, and "want of jurisdiction" is not one of them.

On the trial no objection to the jurisdiction of the Court over the subject of the indictment was made, neither was it at any time during the course of the trial objected that the facts proved did not constitute a public offense, therefore, there is no ruling of the Court on this question either on demurrer or motion, or on the trial, which can be classed as an error of law reviewable on motion for a new trial. The question of jurisdiction certainly would not be involved in either subdivision 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 or 7 of section 1181 and as a verdict is "contrary to law" only when contrary to the charge of the Court, it would not be involved in sub-division 6 of said section. There being no other grounds upon which a new trial can be granted, it necessarily follows that unless some other reason than an alleged want of jurisdiction exists the motion made must be denied, and as no other reasons have been called to the attention of the Court, and as the Court is satisfied that the evidence given at the trial is sufficient to sustain the verdict rendered the motion for a new trial is denied.

Immediately after receiving this knock-out blow Attorney Heggerty made a motion in arrest of judgment upon the ground of the insufficient jurisdiction of the court and to cover all the grounds set forth in the motion for a new trial, on statutory grounds and because of the fact that the Grand Jury had no jurisdiction over the subject matter. Thereupon the Judge read a written opinion in which, having anticipated such a motion, he had overruled it in advance. Afterward Mrs. Botkin's attorneys criticised the Judge for the scarcity of the authorities and the number of supposititious cases quoted in this opinion. The Judge's ruling follows:

The indictment in this case charges a murder perpetrated by means of poison, not by personal violence. On the face of the indictment it appears that the poison was prepared in this city and county, and, so far as the defendant could personally administer it, was delivered and administered here, all with the willful and malicious intent to kill. The deceased, however, was not here in person at the time of such delivery and administering of the poison, but subsequently partook of the same and in consequence died. Her death and the actual swallowing of the poison by her occurred in the State of Delaware. Defendant contends that no murder was committed here and consequently that there is no jurisdiction in this Court to try the cause.

After the poison had been deposited where defendant deposited it with the intent to murder and to have deceased manually take the poison and eat thereof, had the deceased come to San Francisco and from such place taken possession of it, returned to Delaware and there partaken of the same and died, would this be the contention? Or, would defendant so contend, had the poison been delivered into the hands of deceased or placed within her reach with the intent that she should partake of the same and thereby die, and thereafter deceased should have taken it with her into another State, there partaken of it and died?

In either of such cases there would have occurred within this jurisdiction the two main elements of the crime of murder, the act, so far as the defendant could act, and the intent would have united, and all within this jurisdiction. In a poisoning case where the deceased received, ate and died, all in the immediate presence of a defendant and within the confines of a room, the defendant would be guilty of murder if he handed to the deceased the poison, having at the time he so handed it the intent to kill; no further act would be required of him. That the deceased with his own hand conveyed the poison to his mouth would not lessen the defendant's crime. The law would not require the prosecution, in such a case, to prove that the defendant not only delivered and handed the poison to the deceased, but also that he by his own hand poured it down the throat of the deceased.

Suppose this case: Jones in a kitchen, believing that Brown is dining alone in an adjoining room and intending to kill Brown places poison in food sent from the kitchen and placed before Brown at the table where he sits. Unknown to Jones a guest, against whom Jones has no evil intentions, is dining with Brown. Both Brown and his guest partake of the poisoned food and as a result die. Jones has not left his kitchen. He did not place the food to the mouth of either. His act consisted merely in placing, with the intent to kill, poison within the reach of one of them. Their eating and their death were but the consequences of his act, which was coupled with an intent to kill. Could it be claimed that Jones was not guilty of the complete crime of murder, and that, too, regardless of whether Brown, his guest or both of them died?

As further examples of my meaning:

First—A willfully and with intent to kill mixes poison in a flask of liquor and hands it to B who by his own hand places it to his lips and dies. This is murder. The act of A was but the delivery. It was the act of B himself that actually produced the result. Yet the act of A made it possible for B to partake. The act of B, as well as his death, were but the consequences of the act of A. The act of A having been coupled with the intent to kill constituted the complete crime of murder—what followed was but the consequence.

Second—A willfully and with intent to kill B, prepares poisoned liquor and leaves it in a bureau drawer, knowing that B will there find and partake of it. B does, without any additional act of A, find and partake, and, as a result dies. The act of B in finding and imbibing is the immediate cause of the death, but the act of A made it possible for such results to follow. Therefore, such act of A, coupled as it was with the intent to kill being followed by such consequences, constituted the complete crime of murder, and that, too, even though C, against whom A had no evil intentions, had become the victim. The act and the intent of A constituted the crime.

Third—A, wilfully and with intent to kill B, who at the time is in another county or state, prepares poisoned liquor and leaves it where B, on his return, can get it. B returns. A is not present, but B partakes of the liquor and dies. The act and intent of A, followed by the consequence which happened on the return of B, constitutes murder.

Fourth—In either of the last-mentioned cases the person who receives the liquor, or finds it, takes it to another county or state, and the consequences follow in such other county or state, either resulting in the death of the one who has received or found it, or in the death of some one to whom it is there delivered. No further act of A has been required to produce such consequences. All are the consequences of A's act and intent, which in the three instances just enumerated constitute murder. Such act and intent of A in those three instances, followed by the same results as in this constitute murder. Why should this, which required no further act of A, not be murder, too? If 2 plus 2 equal 4, then 2 plus 2 minus 0 must likewise equal 4.

If these thoughts be logical it would hardly seem necessary to consider any of the many subtle arguments and supposed precedents which have been pressed on the Court's attention by counsel on the motion in arrest of judgment as well as on the motion for a new trial, argued herein. All of the murderous acts which the defendant in this or any case could herself commit were committed in San Francisco, and with the intent to kill existing here at the time of the commission of such acts, all else is but the sequence to such acts. Every one is presumed to intend the ordinary consequences of his acts, and is unquestionable responsible therefor. Murder by violence, as by a blow, or a bullet, and murder by poison, are clearly distinguishable. In the first personal contact and an act by the hand of the accused is required to accomplish the crime, while in the latter it is the act of the deceased that operates as the immediate cause of death; the act of the accused is complete when he has made it possible for the deceased to do that which produces the result which he intended by, and to follow, his act.

The case is, therefore, distinguishable from the Hall case, which was a killing by violence, and the long line of cases which hold that the place where the blow is inflicted or the poison administered is the locus of the crime, would seem to support the jurisdiction of this Court. Some of the cases are: Green vs. State, 66 Ala., 41, 8. C. 41, Am. Rep., 744; People vs. — 52 Cal., 655; Com. vs. McLoon, 101 Mass., 1, S. C., 100 Am. Dec., 89; State vs. Brown, 16 Kas., 476; State vs. Kelly, 76 Me., 331; Tyler vs. People, 8 Mich., 342; State vs. Gessert, 21 Minn., 369; Riley vs. State, 9 Humph. (Tenn.), 646; Guiteau case, 1 Mackey (D. C.), 498-552-526; ex-parte Rogers, 10 Tex. App., 655; People vs. Staples, 91 Cal., 23; People vs. Hodges, 27 Cal., 310; Rex vs. Williams, 2 Camp., 507; Reg. vs. Jones, 1 Cox., C. C., 198; Reg. vs. Jones, 1 Dennison, C. C., 558; U. S. vs. Worrall, 2 Del., 388; Adams vs. People, 1 N. Y., 173.

It would seem, therefore, that it is unnecessary to attempt an interpretation of section 27 of the Penal Code.

It is claimed by the District Attorney that if jurisdiction does not attach by reason of the facts themselves, it does attach by reason of sections 27, 655 and 656 of the Penal Code, when read together, giving them the liberal construction required by section 4 of the same code. It is claimed that such sections mean simply that all crimes created by the laws of this State which are in part committed by persons within this State may be prosecuted under our laws.

The defendant claims that section 27 does not create a crime, but merely provides for the punishment of crimes created by other statutes, and that jurisdiction can only be found in the chapter of the code relating to jurisdiction.

The Supreme Court of this State has held in the case of People vs. McNulty, 93 Cal., 436-30, that a statute (S. of Pol. Code) referring exclusively to laws creating a crime, included a statute providing for punishment only.

In a very recent case (People vs. Black, 16 Cal. Dec., 89) the Supreme Court also held that in looking for statutes conferring jurisdiction other sections of the code than those found in the chapter relating to the subject of jurisdiction could be invoked, and that although, jurisdiction could not be found in a certain case under that part of the code devoted to such subject it was given by a statute in another part of the code, which provided that a person doing certain things might "be convicted and punished" in the same manner as if such crime had been committed in this State. The word "punishable" used in section 27 is even a broader word than either of those used in the section there construed. Punishable includes not only the extent of punishment possible to be inflicted, but the liability to trial, conviction and punishment.

The question here presented being to a certain extent a new one and there being absolutely no case capable of being produced as a precedent which is, as the saying is, "on all fours" with it, and involving as it possibly does an interpretation for the first time of section 27 of the Penal Code, it should be passed upon by the Supreme Court, the jurisdiction of which extends over the entire State and the decision of which will govern all trial courts in the State in which the question might in the future arise.

I do not feel justified under my views, as hereinbefore expressed, in refusing to pronounce judgment on a verdict of guilty rendered in a case of murder so monstrous and diabolical as the verdict in this case stamps this homicide to have been. The crime is almost unparalleled. Our code requires that its provisions are to be construed according to the fair import of their terms, with a view to effect its object and to promote justice. It would not be the promotion of justice, but rather the promotion of a failure of justice to so construe the statute as to permit a crime so diabolical as this to go unpunished and the criminal unwhipped of justice.

The motion in arrest of judgment is denied.

Thus the last feeble barrier was swept away between Mrs. Botkin and the impending sentence. There was a little hum and buzz in the courtroom, where attorneys who think nothing of these things and whose clients were not in any immediate jeopardy, chatted and laughed softly, while Mrs. Botkin's liberty was wiped out with a phrase. Then came the sentence. As soon as Mrs. Botkin was in her seat Attorney Frank McGowan was on his feet, excepting to the passing of judgment on the express ground that the court was without jurisdiction. He asked for a stay of proceedings for thirty days, but the Judge said that he could do nothing until there was a motion for appeal before him, though there was no doubt but that a certificate of probable cause would lie. That ended it all for Mrs. Botkin. The woman under sentence of life imprisonment was conducted from the courtroom where the most bitter hours of her life have been spent. She had lost much of her vivacity of movement and had tempered her gait until it was sober and slow, suiting her somber garments, her age and her sad case.

There now remains to Mrs. Botkin her appeal to the Supreme Court of the State, with possibly some hope of get-

Most

Says I
B

OAKL
mer, ac
ing pre held to Court o
Police morning
Allor strong drawing lullon bound o ever, J case ag
ly stro jury.
Accor
the pre used it
(no
For be Miss B of the illed to Hom
It rem
sold it reated
Allor
fendan to wha Prosec to this plaintif
When O'Brien testify
"Wh for the the at els," re object.
It is dick ca printin of tick ing rev rise to not the els is
In the
If they are bo gally that th them.
to prin crime of bog obtaini unless gamble
even th

FATE OF CORDELIA BOTKIN HANGS IN THE BALANCE

The Matter of the Court's Jurisdiction Has Been Argued and Submitted.

IF section 27 of the Penal Code—presumably the only barrier that stands between the condemned murderess, Cordelia Botkin, and liberty—had nerves it would quit its job. No statutory enactment that ever crept between the leaves of a work of law has been the subject of more wrangling and the genius of the city is at variance as to its intent, its meaning, its effect and its legality. Mrs. Botkin, whose crime has no precedent, and District Attorney Murphy thanks God that it is so, was up again before Judge Cook yesterday, but the center of attack and censure was directed, not at the criminal, who sat smiling at her counsel, but at puzzling section 27, and the end is not yet. Yesterday's meeting in Judge Cook's court was occasioned by a desire on the part of defendant's counsel to argue the matter of jurisdiction. Judge Angellotti of Marin occupied the bench with Judge Cook and next Saturday they will decide whether or not the woman whom twelve men with naught but justice in mind have determined should pass her remaining days in prison for an appalling crime shall suffer for her sins or walk from the court room free, amenable to no law yet framed.

Mrs. Botkin was represented by George A. Knight and Frank McGowan, while District Attorney Murphy and John A. Hosmer, who prosecuted the prisoner, and Chief Lees represented the forces of the State.

Mr. Knight first took the floor, and after remarking that as the court had an associate he would go more fully into the details of the crime charged, proceeded to give a history of the case from the sending of the poisoned candy to the death of its partakers, a duty which District Attorney Murphy also performed when his time for argument came. Concluding the history of the case Knight launched out into the matter of jurisdiction. When the matter of extradition was argued Knight and associate counsel contended that the State of Delaware had nothing to do with the case at bar and admitted that the case could be tried in this State.

The District Attorney contended that the prisoner could not be tried in this State, but urged her extradition. The status of the case is now reversed, Knight holding that the courts of this State have no jurisdiction, the District Attorney contending that they have. Knight won in the first instance and it is the consensus of opinion that he will win in the matter of jurisdiction. The law is peculiar and Knight proceeded to take advantage of its peculiarities. Knight, when he entered into his peroration on jurisdiction, took an opening shot at the District Attorney.

"The representative of the people would not have dared to suggest that this court had jurisdiction," he said, "had there been no popular clamor, no outcry. But the people raised their hands in horror at the thought that this woman should escape, and the District Attorney demanded the trial of this woman whom he knows, even though she admitted the crime charged, is not amenable to the laws of California."

Knight then addressed the court and asked if a man should purchase a gun in this State and go to Nevada and there murder the State executive, could he be tried under section 27 of the Penal Code, which provides that "a person is punishable in this State for any crime committed in whole or in part in this State?" This is the only law the District Attorney can find to authorize him to try the accused, and he has clutched at it to appease the clamor of the horrified public." Mr. Knight then began the citation of authorities.

The case of Stewart vs. Jessup, reported in the nineteenth volume of the American Reports, was cited. Stewart was arrested and confined in Pennsylvania for obtaining property (a carload of horses) in New York under false pretenses. The Pennsylvania court released the prisoner, however, holding that Stewart could not be punished in one State for a crime completed in another. In its opinion in this case the court said that "it may be assumed, as a general proposition, that the criminal laws of a State do not bind and cannot affect those out of the territorial limits of the State."

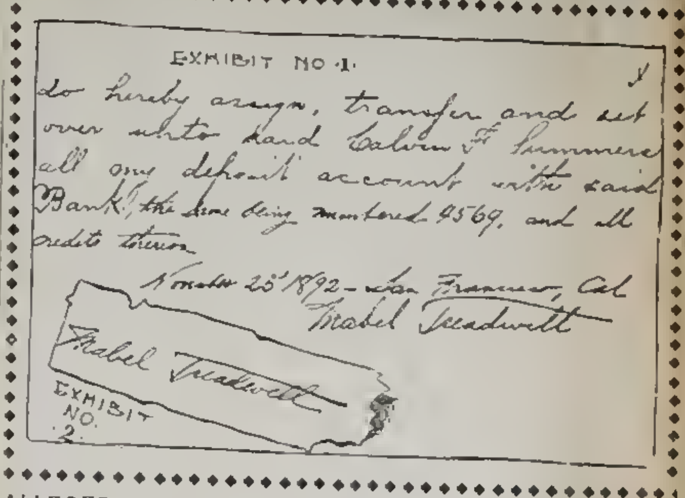
If it is the law that the criminal laws of one State cannot bind those out of its territorial limits, then this prisoner should go free, he said, for the authorities of ages agree that in the crime of murder the crime is completed where the blow was struck, and the blow in this case was struck in Delaware, not in California. Citation followed citation, but that most directly bearing on the case was taken from "Horton on Criminal Law, which holds that "where poison administered in one jurisdiction operates in another the latter jurisdiction is that of the trial." Other citations proved that it has long been held that where injury was inflicted in one county and had its effect in another the latter was the proper place for trial, as is the case when a murder is committed across the boundary line of a State and when lottery tickets are mailed from one country to the other. A quotation from an Ohio case which reads, "The overt act of poisoning is not merely the prescription and furnishing the same, but its consequences. So where poison is prescribed and furnished in one county and the victim takes it in another, and there dies, the latter county is the place where the crime is consummated and the jurisdiction for trial rests." Knight fortified his position well with such citations and then said: "If the court does not see fit to grant the defendant a new trial which will result in her ultimate acquittal we will not be dismayed. We will take our exception and go to the Supreme Court, where we have no fear of the result."

Hosmer was on his feet before Knight had ceased talking, and as Knight took his seat began: "It is urged that the verdict heretofore found against Cordelia Botkin cannot stand; that if a crime was committed at all it has been committed in the State of Delaware. In consequence we are brought face to face with a heinous crime, together with the contention that there is no remedy. It would then appear that what is intended as a remedy for crime acts as a license for lawlessness. Such a condition is not the policy of the constitution and it cannot be held that the laws of the land are so deficient as to be inoperative in the face of the conditions which confront us. Section 655 of the Penal Code (section 27 came in at this point for a rest) provides that an act or crime declared punishable by this code is not less so if punishable elsewhere unless it is specifically set forth." Mr. Hosmer then quoted law as far back as the memory of man runneth and contended that the act of Mrs. Botkin in sending the poisoned candy through the mail was as complete a delivery as though she had placed it in the hand of her victim with her own. Section 27, he said, should be liberally construed, and so construed Mrs. Botkin could not escape, and hence he asked that the judgment be confirmed and sentence imposed.

District Attorney Murphy, after giving another brief history of the case, cited some authorities, and McGowan took the floor. McGowan followed in the footsteps of Knight for an hour or so and then submitted the case.

The court took the case under advisement and Mrs. Botkin returned to jail. Saturday she will know her fate, or, at least, will know whether she must appeal to the court of last resort for her liberty. No court can give her back her good name or her happiness.

VITAL POINT IN DISPUTE BETWEEN EXPERT AND JUDGE.



ALLEGED FORGED WRITING AND GENUINE SIGNATURE.

DANIEL T. AMES, a handwriting expert, gives it as his opinion that the assignment presented by Calvin F. Summers in his suit against the California Savings and Loan Society for $14,000 is a forgery. This testimony was presented in open court yesterday before Judge Troutt and a jury. Mr. Ames said that in his opinion the paper was a clever imitation of the handwriting of the late Mrs. Mabel Treadwell, who was Summers' sister. It purports to convey and set over to Summers all her claim to the money in question. Mrs. Maude Treadwell Nolan, a daughter of Mrs. Treadwell, has disputed the genuineness of the paper, and the trial of the case has already occupied nearly a month, with a prospect of extending two or three weeks longer.

As the result of the suit in a great measure rests on the authenticity of this document, the battle over its genuineness is very warm. Judge J. V. Coffey of Department 9 of the Superior Court, when called as a witness recently, said that in his opinion the assignment appeared to be in the handwriting of Mrs. Treadwell, and Attorney W. S. Goodfellow testified that it so closely resembled Mrs. Treadwell's writing that he would not have distrusted its genuineness if it had not been presented by Mr. Summers.

In the accompanying illustration Exhibit No. 1 shows the disputed signature and Exhibit No. 2 is of a signature admitted to be genuine. Another genuine signature was submitted to Mr. Ames, which he said more nearly resembled the disputed writing, but he objected to what he described as a failure to simulate the peculiar and distinguishing characteristics of Mrs. Treadwell's chirography.

FEBRUARY 13, 1899.

MEGGINSON WILL BE TRIED FOR PERJURY

Tables Are Turned by J. F. Turner.

STARTS FOR HIS PERSECUTOR

CIVIL SUITS AND CRIMINAL ACTIONS UNDER WAY.

The Former Affects the Title to $140,000 Worth of Property and the Latter the Defendant's Liberty.

Lawrence S. Megginson, accused of having forged the celebrated note, now aggregating with principal and interest a round half million of dollars, against the estate of the late William Murdock, has troubles on hand at the present time calculated to occupy his earnest attention for some months to come. To-morrow morning suits will be filed in the Superior Court of Placer County against Megginson by J. F. Turner, whom Megginson is said to have long endeavored through various and strange ways to land in prison, but with signal failure.

These suits directly affect the title to some $140,000 worth of property, all of which Turner alleges Megginson obtained from him through fraud. In addition to the suits Turner will further augment Megginson's troubles by swearing out warrants for his arrest on four charges of perjury. Megginson's whereabouts is not definitely known to Turner and his attorneys at the present time, but they say they can find him when the time for the first move comes.

According to the allegations made by Turner the property for which the suits will be filed came into the possession of his persecutor through a system of confidence operating and swindling that few men would have the courage to father. Regarding the suits, the causes which led to their instigation and the manner in which Megginson completed his alleged swindle, J. F. Turner said last evening:

"Lawrence S. Megginson was introduced to me about May 1, 1892, by Forrest S. Rawley, at Rawley's office, 137 Montgomery street. Megginson at once called upon me at my office, No. 4 Sutter street. He told me he had some money he would like to invest so as to get some interest out of it. I took some money from him, but not without first securing him well for it. In this way Megginson gained my confidence. About one year before this time, or in the year 1890 or '91, some parties who claimed to own a mine in El Dorado County, known as the Lone Jack mine, persuaded me to let them have $500 to open up the lead. They guaranteed me that the title to the mine was perfect, and that the mine was out of debt. I let them have the $500, and at the end of one month they wanted $500 more in order to put the mine on a paying basis. I let them have another $500, and when that was gone they wanted more money. I consented to furnish the money, and bored a compartment shaft 115 feet and ran several hundred feet of drifts, paying for all the work $40,000.

"Just as this amount of money had been paid a party called upon me and informed me that there was a judgment against the mine for $10,000, which the owners of the mine had kept covered up. I had become a director of the company and was elected president, but I made up my mind to buy the judgment and to sell the mine out under the same and to dissolve the Lone Jack Company to pay the parties for the deception they had practiced upon me. The mine was then worth at least $150,000. Megginson, as stated, having gained my confidence, and being at my office every day, I said to him one day: 'Megginson, if I should put in your name a property worth at least $150,000 and have it sold out and bid in by the Sheriff in your name, and have the Sheriff issue his certificate in your name and then allow the right of redemption to expire, so that the property would be all clear in your name, would you, as soon as the Sheriff made the deed to you, deed it over to me?'

"Then I told Megginson that I, being a director of the company, and also president of the same, in the event I put the property in his name I would have to depend entirely upon his (Megginson's) honor to deed it back to me. Megginson then said to me:

"'You know whether or not you can trust me for one dollar or one hundred and fifty thousand, for you can trust me for the one sum the same as you can for the other.'

"I, believing that I could trust him for any sum, and having the most implicit confidence in Megginson at that time, sent his attorney to Placerville and bought the judgment before referred to, and took an assignment of the same.

"I then had the judgment assigned to Megginson. Then I employed lawyers at Placerville in the name of Megginson and had the property sold by Sheriff's sale, having it bid in in the name of Megginson. Then I paid all of the expenses, but did so in the name of L. S. Megginson. I then sent the Sheriff at Placerville $150 and had the Sheriff's certificate issued to, or in the name of, Lawrence S. Megginson.

"Then the wait for six months commenced. The six months ran out and Megginson sent another party up to Placerville with the Sheriffs' certificate and got the Sheriffs' deed of the property, and instead of deeding it over the same day to me, as he had so faithfully promised, he deeded it to his brother in Ohio, whose name was William Megginson. I was at once advised of the deed going on record in the name of William Megginson, and employed lawyers, and before 12 o'clock that night had, through the aid of the telegraph company, filed in El Dorado County an injunction suit against both Megginson and the Sheriff of that county. I afterward had to abandon that suit and bring suit in the United States Circuit Court against William Megginson, for he was a non-resident, and Megginson's idea was to get the property into the hands of a so-called innocent purchaser and a third party, also being a non-resident.

"L. S. Megginson shortly after that time went on the stand in the city of San Francisco and swore that he was up in El Dorado County, and finding that there was a good mine with a judgment against it that could be bought for about $10,000 he sent to his brother and got the money and bought the mine.

"Megginson and one J. P. Frenna succeeded in swearing me into jail, and while I was there the suit brought against William Megginson in the United States Circuit Court was tried, and there, through the testimony of L. S. Megginson, I lost the case. I then appealed to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, and there it was found that the case in the United States Circuit Court had not been properly tried. The decision of the higher court gave me a part of the property, but by this time it had cost me more than its value."

Turner says that as he understands that E. S. Pillsbury will be looking for Megginson to serve papers he is going to have him arrested on four charges of perjury, and then he will be where Mr. Pillsbury can reach him at any time.

M. ALPHONSE BERTILLON.

72 5	19 3	27 5	3. 4	36
	16 8	11 9	r. orangé f.	22 Avril 1853
81	5 6	9 9	ad. j. r. m.	Paris
95.6	3 8	47 8		4e

Barbe Ch r f — Cheveux Ch f
Peau jaunâtre — Sang m — Corpulence m

Nom et Prénoms Bertillon, Alphonse
Né le 22 Avril 1853, à Paris 4e Arrondt.
Fils de Adolphe Louis et de Zoé Guillard
Profession Chef du Service d'Identification — résidence Rue Littré, 7
Relations Gallus Müller à Joliet (Illinois)

Marques particulières et cicatrices.

I. Léger point cic. à 8 sous coude gauche externe. Petite cic. en V cavité ext. 2e art. 3e gauche post.	III. Lég. point creux à 15 sous lob. au pointe ext. sourcil droit. Nævus à 5 avant lobe gauche. Lég. cic. rect. obl. à dcl. 5 bosse
II. Lég. cic. c. h. cav. dep. 3e phal. Mé. droitant. Point cic. 1re art. O. droit post.	IV. frontale droite. Petite verrue à 2 sous lobe droit.
	V. 2 lég. fur. écart de 3 obl. ext. à 5 dessus à droite 7e et 1 de col.
	VI.

Ten years ago M. Alphonse Bertillon was 36 years of age. His system of anthropometric signalments had been brought to practical test and was already in operation in France, he being the Chief of the Bureau of Identification in Paris. At this time (1889) Herr Gallus Muller, of the penitentiary at Joliet, Illinois, visited the French metropolis and Bertillon placed himself at the disposal of Muller that the latter might have the benefit of describing him according to the new method. The above is a copy of the original card marked on that occasion.

M. ALPHONSE BERTILLON.

Few private individuals enjoy a wider or more favorable reputation than Alphonse Bertillon, whose system for identifying criminals has been quite generally adopted throughout the civilized world and bids fair to come into universal use. On the 11th instant M. Bertillon was formally and most graciously received by Emperor William of Germany, who conferred upon him the Order of the Crown. This is only one of many honors that have been bestowed upon the deviser and perfector of a system that has proven of such signal value in the arrest and conviction of criminals.

On another page two other small portraits are produced with his measurements and a description taken according to the rules of his own system, which can scarcely fail to interest and instruct.

CHARGE OF FORGERY IN THE MUROOCK CASE.

J. F. Turner Implicates Lawrence S. Meggison, His Former Associate, in Making a $100,000 Note.

J. F. Turner has given his deposition in the contest of the suit of Mrs. Mary Helen Murdock against the estate of the late William Murdock for $100,000 and interest at 7 per cent a year for twenty-two years, by which he implicates Lawrence S. Meggison in the alleged fabrication of the note on which the claim is based. Mr. Turner's deposition is now part of the records in the case.

The story which Turner says Meggison told him is substantially that Meggison and Mrs. Murdock, who was William Murdock's daughter-in-law, planned the making of the note; that they had Mrs. Murdock draw two notes, one for $100 and another for $100,000, the note showing $100 on its face to have a blank space left so that the word "thousands" could be written in; that Mrs. Murdock took the $100 note, as she supposed, and went to William Murdock, that when she returned she reported that he had signed the paper without looking at it, that Meggison didn't like the looks of the signature, as it was so carelessly written and was little more than a scrawl; that he attempted to fix up the $100,000 note, but made a botch of it, and so discarded both of them and made a new note, tracing Mrs. Murdock's handwriting in the body and tracing William Murdock's handwriting from an old letter in the signature, so that the entire note is in Meggison's handwriting.

I communicated my impressions to my chiefs, who approved all my steps, and the application of Esterhazy was rejected. His insistence, however, only increased my uneasiness regarding him, and I resolved to obtain a specimen of his handwriting. I was immediately struck with the similarity of his handwriting with that of the bordereau and forthwith I had the letters of Esterhazy, which were in my possession photographed and showed the photographs to Major Du Paty de Clam and M. Bertillon (the handwriting expert), between August 25th and September 5th."

Colonel Picquart, continuing, said De Clam on seeing the writing forthwith declared it was that of Mathieu Dreyfus, the brother of Captain Dreyfus.

The witness, continuing, said: "You know, he maintained, the bordereau is the joint work of Alfred and Mathieu Dreyfus.

"Bertillon said: 'That is the writing of the bordereau.' Bertillon tried to discover where I had obtained the handwriting, but the only information I imparted was that it was current and recent handwriting. Bertillon then suggested that it was a tracing, and ended by saying that if it was current handwriting it could only have emanated from some one whom the Jews had been exercising for a year in imitating the handwriting of the bordereau.

"At M. Bertillon's request I left the photographs with him. When he returned them he said he adhered to his opinion, and earnestly asked to see the original. When I saw beyond a doubt that the handwriting of the bordereau was Esterhazy's, and seeing that documents mentioned therein might have been supplied by Esterhazy, that the words 'I am going to the maneuvers' could perfectly well apply to Esterhazy, and that Esterhazy had secret assistance at his disposal to copy a document so voluminous as the 'firing manual,' I resolved to consult the secret dossier to see what part of the treachery might be ascribed to Dreyfus, and to assure myself whether the dossier contained anything indicating Esterhazy.

"I frankly admit that I was stupefied on reading the secret dossier. I expected to find matters of gravity therein, and found in short nothing but a document which might apply just as much to Esterhazy as to Dreyfus, an unimportant document mentioning d'Arignon, and a document which it seemed absurd to apply to Dreyfus, namely, the 'cette canaille de D——' document.

"Lastly, I recognized a report appended, in the handwriting of Gonse, which appeared to be at least as worthless as the second document. It was then evening. I had stayed late alone at the office in order to examine the document thoroughly. I thought it over during the night, and the next day I explained the whole situation to General de Boisdeffre. I took to his office the secret dossier, the facsimile of the bordereau, the petit bleu and the principal papers connected with my investigation of Esterhazy.

JANUARY 28, 1899.

NEW TRIAL

Is Asked for by Mrs. Botkin, the Poisoner.

Question of Jurisdiction Argued by Her Attorneys.

The argument on the motion for a new trial in the now celebrated case of Cordelia Botkin, under conviction for the murder by poison of Mrs. John P. Dunning, began in Department Twelve of the Superior Court Saturday morning.

Judge Angelotti of Marin county, having been invited by Judge Carroll Cook to take part in the hearing, occupied a seat upon the bench. Perhaps no better illustration of the waning of public interest in a great case could be found than was afforded by the diminished attendance in the court room. There was

A NOTABLE ABSENCE

Of the crowds that during the trial thronged the City Hall corridors, packed the court room to the point of suffocation and made the life of the court room officials a burden. The fact of conviction and the general public satisfaction with the result of the trial has appreciably minimized the value of Mrs. Botkin as a drawing card, as they say at the theaters.

Mrs. Botkin, as the person most vitally interested, was there, as a matter of course. She was calm, self-possessed and to outward appearance, at least, not deeply concerned in the issue which means either liberty or life imprisonment. If the confinement in the County Jail has been a strain upon the nerves of this remarkable woman—if she has been, as has been represented in some of the newspapers, close to the point

OF BREAKING DOWN,

There was nothing in her demeanor Saturday morning indicative of the slightest mental perturbation.

Mrs. Botkin was accompanied by her attorneys, George A. Knight and Frank McGowan.

The people were represented by John A. Hosmer and District Attorney D. J. Murphy.

The opening argument on the motion for a new trial was presented by Attorney Knight, who was abundantly fortified by a large and formidable array of law books.

At the outset Mr. Knight stated that the defense relied solely upon the legal proposition that the crime having been consummated in Delaware, the State of California had absolutely no jurisdiction to try the defendant. He held that section 27 of the penal code, under which Mrs. Botkin was indicted, did not confer jurisdiction. Much was made of the fundamental proposition that the laws of the State could not have any extra territorial effect. There was, he said, no section in the penal code that makes the act

CHARGED IN THIS CASE

A crime. The act of mixing poison with food is made by the law of California a felony, punishable by ten years' imprisonment.

He took the position that if jurisdiction attaches where the fatal blow was given, as the authorities which he cited seemed to show, there was obviously no jurisdiction in the Superior Court of this State.

"This indictment, if your Honors please," exclaimed Mr. Knight, dramatically, "sets out facts that oust this court of jurisdiction!"

Mr. Knight said that the law of this State was defective and expressed the opinion that it would be competent for the Legislature to pass a statute that would make the act charged to Mrs. Botkin a felony, punishable with death, but he contended with much earnestness that the court had no power to read the crime of murder with the 27th section of the Penal Code.

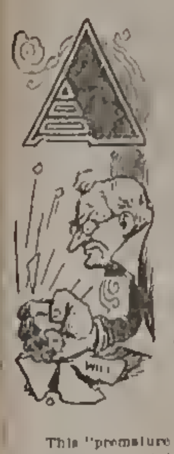
John A. Hosmer followed Mr. Knight with the opening argument for the People. Mr. Hosmer made a very able and strong presentation of the reasons why the motion for a new trial should be denied. He contended that section 27 of the Penal Code, which authorizes the punishment in this State of crimes committed in whole or in part in this State, meant just

WHAT IT SAID.

And conferred ample jurisdiction upon the courts of this State. Mr. Hosmer cited numerous authorities in support of the State's position. He was followed after the noon recess by District Attorney Murphy and a closing argument for the defendant was made by Attorney Frank McGowan.

PICTURESQUE VERBIAGE OF THE "WILL SMASHER."

Attorney George M. Curtis of New York Tells What He Thinks of the Fair Estate Trial and California's Climate.



ATTORNEY GEORGE M. CURTIS of the New York bar, who came to California, heralded as "the great will smasher," to participate in the Fair estate litigation, has issued a pamphlet giving his views of that important litigation and incidentally passing judgment on California's courts, lawyers and climate.

Touching the late Senator James G. Fair's fortune, Mr. Curtis says that he has learned that it was only $15,000,000, instead of $40,000,000, as at first reported.

After referring to Senator Fair's humble origin and lack of early culture, Mr. Curtis adds:

Mrs. Fair is said to have been a woman of positive personal beauty, but utterly without education. Of this couple were born several children, of whom two were daughters, and they, at the present time, are considered among the very exclusive few who are entitled to inhabit that "holy of holies," the inner sanctuary of "McAllister's Four Hundred," and the children of Mrs. Fair give the social law to the frequenters of "Sherry's" and the residents of Newport.

Coming to events during the trial Mr. Curtis gives it as his opinion that "the marriage of Mrs. Craven's daughter Margaret to the wealthy brewer, Henry Koehler of St. Louis, was a very grave mistake of policy, because its effect was to take from Mrs. Craven, in a great degree, the sentiment of personal sympathy with which she had inspired the jury."

This "premature marriage," as he calls it in another place, according to his view, lost the support of three jurors. Upon the disagreement of the jury former Judge Slack, who presided at the trial, pronounced Mrs. Craven's deeds to be forgeries, on the ground that the blanks used by the Notary Public in attesting the acknowledgments were not in existence prior to Fair's death, and this is deemed an infirm premise by Mr. Curtis from which to deduce so important a conclusion.

With considerable glee Mr. Curtis relates that he and his associates objected "on purely legal grounds" to the introduction of the "pencil will," but he assures the reader that all of Mrs. Craven's lawyers were delighted when the court ruled against them. Having gone thus far, Mr. Curtis discloses the fact that he advocated the introduction of the marriage contract, but that his position in this regard was negatived by Attorneys D. M. Delmas, C. S. Denson and W. W. Foote. The "smasher" calls him W. H. Foote.

Deep regret marks Mr. Curtis' comment on Martin Kelly's interference on behalf of Mrs. Craven and the suspicion created during the trial that Kelly and his companions had attempted to solicit evidence in her behalf. The unpleasant incident is summed up.

This teaches us the moral lesson that there is no cause so strong and pure that it can afford to receive the aid of those whose moral bias leads them, by indirection rather than by direction, to the end desired.

Mrs. Margaret Craven-Koehler receives her due of praise as:

That tall and winsome bride, that beautiful and attractive girl, that highly cultured woman, the daughter whose devotion to her mother was so touching and pathetic.

Mrs. Craven's high character, the writer said, could be appropriately judged by the elevating influence she had on Senator Fair. If she directed the making of the pencil will it was a testimonial to the purity of her motives, as there was nothing in the will for herself, but only good for others. The deeds were sufficient for Mrs. Craven, "and in the presence of $15,000,000 what is a paltry million to be given to one who possessed Senator Fair's love, affection and esteem?" exclaimed Mr. Curtis. Then he answered his own question:

I look at the will itself. See how broad and truly catholic it is. The Hebrews are remembered. The Protestants are remembered. The Roman Catholics are not forgotten, all in charity, he in his dying hour, having no prejudice in favor of or against any religious belief; leaving every man his choice to travel heavenward on his own selected road. Here you have recorded for all time, and bound in the history of this trial, the will, the last determination of a man whose spirit, whether guided by Mrs. Craven or stimulated by his own magnanimity, whose spirit took all the world to his heart. And great, good and generous must have been the influence that the lady exercised over him, the fruit, the bright consummate flower of their relations is a will, which is an honor to human nature.

Chief of Police I. W. Lees receives a scoring as "that formidable person who was actively engaged in the interest of the Fair heirs."

Notwithstanding former Judge Slack's adverse decision, Mr. Curtis holds him in esteem as a learned, upright and unbiased jurist. "His patience surpassed any example of that virtue I have ever seen," is the writer's conclusion.

That the barrister from New York found foemen worthy of his steel in California he admits. Here is his tribute to Attorney Garret W. McEnerney:

Mr. McEnerney strikes one immediately with the consciousness of his great mental strength. He is in no sense a person of imagination, but I doubt that in a close, connected legal argument affecting either a mere question of law or a constitutional principle, he has his superior in the State of California, and those people who believe that the golden age of the California bar is departing, will change their minds, if they have an opportunity ever of listening to the logical utterances of this phenomenal young man.

Attorney Charles S. Wheeler is also appreciated by Mr. Curtis, as this extract will indicate:

I do not believe that Mr. Wheeler can be more than thirty-five years old, yet in all my wide professional campaigning, I have never met a man who, in my judgment, was his intellectual superior. He is one of the best cross-examiners in the profession, and in fact reminded me very much of our own Judge Fullerton, who seemed to be inspired in that branch of the profession.

Attorneys W. M. Pierson and Robert Mitchell and S. C. Denson were likewise complimented by Mr. Curtis.

United States District Judge De Haven was one of Mrs. Craven's attorneys before he was appointed to the Federal bench. Of him Mr. Curtis writes:

Judge De Haven's character is mirrored in his face. It is a perfect poem of integrity, intelligence and honor.

Of the leading counsel for Mrs. Craven the following estimate is offered:

Mr. Delmas is a man of very strong dramatic power, of a fine personal physique, and evidently not only a student of the law, but a classical and belles lettres scholar. His voice is very musical, and highly cultivated. I think however, he is a man who would do much better alone in a case than in the company of associates because his mental construction is such that I think he chafes at even suggestion.

Attorneys W. W. Foote and John Garber are placed in the list of great lawyers of the country on the authority of Mr. Choate.

The peroration is an apostrophe to the great State of California:

I love the State of California! Its future possibilities are enormous! Of course to an extent its political and legislative life is more or less controlled by the Southern Pacific Railway, of which the ruling genius is Collis P. Huntington, probably a man who possesses as much individuality, financial and political influence as any other man in this country. It will take some time to emancipate California from the thralldom imposed by a great corporation. . . . Land of sunshine, eternal perfume and flowers, land of brave men and beautiful women, [illegible] the Almighty has created with a smile, fulfilling the destiny of your origin you are the Elysian of the national [illegible] as you have been in the days gone the treasure-house of the Republic.

KYTKA HOLDS THE MURDOCK NOTE A FORGERY

Opinion of the Well-Known Expert.

CORROBORATED BY TURNER

LEES WITH THE DEFENSE IN THE PENDING SUIT.

Letter Is Also Held Which Bears Out Assertions That L. S. Megginson Was the Prime Mover to Collect $500,000.

The deposition of J. F. Turner, in which he charges one L. S. Megginson with having forged the big note now amounting to $500,000 against the estate of the late millionaire and rancher, William Murdock, was signed yesterday and is now a part of the suit in which the genuineness of the note is to be determined. Turner's deposition, telling how the big forgery, or alleged forgery, was executed, has been published. In addition to this invaluable evidence placed in the possession of the defense in the action by Turner, there are other points held by Chief Lees, which, together with the opinion of Expert Theodore Kytka, who is confident that the instrument is a forgery, will doubtless prevent the collection of the note, which stands without a precedent, if it is a forgery, as alleged, for cunning and clever execution. The only trouble with the note is that it is too cleverly executed. It bears too much resemblance to the handwriting of Mary Helen Murdock, from which the body of the note, it is contended, was copied, and the signature has been declared by Kytka, as alleged by Turner, to have been traced in part and copied in part by a clever hand.

Chief Lees has long been in possession of many of the facts testified to by Turner. When the existence of the famous note first became known Lees was taken into the case by Attorney Lusk of Chico, who is associated with E. S. Pillsbury to prosecute the interests of the dead millionaire's estate against the holders of the instrument. Lees immediately detailed Byram and Egan to interview Turner, who gave the officers a portion of the facts and placed in their possession a letter written by Megginson substantiating Turner's allegations. This letter, it is held by counsel for the estate, will prove Megginson's complicity in the alleged forgery and will win them their case. The letter reads:

"OAKLAND, Cal., Sept. 20, 1895.

"Friend Turner: After thinking matters over I have come to the conclusion that we must look out for the note and the collecting of the same, and I do not wish to be placed in a position that would lead to perjury in any way. Now one thing. When my brother comes back, why not let him assign to Mrs. Murdock and count on all the past as borrowed money and all paid back? After a while we will buy the same and put it in good shape. Call Robinson's attention to this. I am stopping at 326 Washington, Sacramento House. Will come over to-morrow eve. Call at your office. Yours,

L. S. MEGGINSON."

As stated by Turner, Megginson, in order to make it appear that he had paid a consideration of $80,000 to Mary Helen Murdock for the note, had sent to his brother, William Megginson, who resides in Ohio, and procured several thousand dollars which he paid Mary Helen Murdock, taking her receipt therefor. Mary Helen would then return the money, L. S. Megginson would return it to his brother and when the time for another payment came the money would again be shipped to this city and another payment made. In this way it was made to appear that a consideration was being paid for the note, but finally Megginson lost heart and determined that this course would necessitate his committing perjury. Hence he wrote the letter to Turner explaining his fears, and this letter, it is contended, will result in his downfall. It is being closely guarded and will be until the end of the trial, as it is a declaration from the pen of Megginson confessing criminal connection in the case, and with it the attorneys for the defense are confident of saving for the heirs of the late William Murdock the round sum of $500,000.

Turner, as stated, did not put all the facts in the possession of Chief Lees at that time. Megginson had locked arms with J. P. Firmo, the Italian barber, and they were scheming as to how Turner could be jailed for good. Turner refused to tell the entire story at the time, nor would he agree to give any further information until they promised him that he would not be called upon to give his deposition in the matter, until he had fought the charges they had made against him to the end. Turner said he would never make any statement to any one or any newspaper until he had beaten every charge they had made or could make against him. At the time Turner would have had Megginson and Firmo arrested for perjury, but he knew that it would be of no use for him to have them arrested at that time, as in his opinion the District Attorney's office would dismiss any charges against them on the ground that Turner was trying to destroy and break down the people's witnesses.

Turner now says his time has come, although it has taken him almost five years to beat his enemies. He has lived up to his former resolutions, and as the end has now come for which he has so long waited he will bring his persecutors before the people and give them the hardest fight they ever had to save themselves from a life in prison.

On Trial for Forgery.

Peter Dergans is on trial before acting Police Judge Barry, charged by his brother, Antoine Dergans, with forgery. Dergans is accused of transferring by fraud an account in the Hibernia Savings Bank of $[illegible] in the name of his brother Andrew to his own name and of obtaining the money. He denies the charge, and says that his brother Andrew, now in Austria, gave him the account. Peter is steward for the Golden West Hotel.

ROAMINGS OF A MURDERESS.

Mrs. Cordelia Botkin Attracted Attention on Market Street.

She Was Recognized by Hundreds of People Whom She Met.

HER JAUNTY APPEARANCE.

Stylishly Habited in a Tailor-Made Gown She Blithely Tripped Along.

Mrs. Cordelia Botkin paraded Market street Friday afternoon, greatly to the surprise of the passers-by, who supposed they had seen the last of Mrs. Botkin in public when she was sentenced to the State prison for life for the murder of Mrs. John P. Dunning.

Mrs. Botkin was becomingly and stylishly habited in a black tailor-made suit, with a stylish hat, surmounted by streaming plumes that proudly nodded to and fro as she made her way among the crowd. She showed by her demeanor that she had lost none of her hauteur, and returned with scorn the inquisitive glances of those she met. Her features became familiar to the public on account of her portraiture in the newspapers during her long trial, and many who had never seen her before recognized her at once and bestowed on her the attention which her unexpected appearance warranted.

That Mrs. Botkin was in the custody of a Deputy Sheriff was not apparent to the casual observer, for there was no indication of restraint and nothing to show that she was not as free as any other woman in the city to come and go as she pleased. The officer was not in uniform, and though he kept near his prisoner, he made no manifestation of authority, permitting the woman to take her time in seeking her destination.

Arriving at a building near the corner of Market and Powell streets, Mrs. Botkin entered, pushing her way through the throng, and tripping blithely to the elevator ascended to one of the upper floors. When she again appeared on the street there was the same manifestation of interest on the part of the spectators, and she continued to be the center of observation until she took her departure for her temporary home in the Branch County Jail, near the Ingleside race course.

Sheriff Martin was asked the reason for permitting Mrs. Botkin so much freedom, and replied: "The woman was suffering from a severe toothache, which threatened to turn into serious neuralgic inflammation. She applied for permission to visit her dentist on the ground that she was not able to induce him to visit the jail to perform the operation. Instructions were sent to the jail to have the dentist go out there if possible, and if that could not be arranged then Mrs. Botkin might be permitted to make the trip, guarded, of course, by a reliable officer, who was instructed to keep close watch, and in fact not to let his eyes off her for a moment. He was also ordered to take her no place except to the dentist's office, and to return her to the jail immediately the dentist's operation was finished. I will be greatly surprised to learn that these orders were not carried out implicitly. Of course, as this was done in the daytime it was impossible to hide Mrs. Botkin from the eyes of those who met her on Market street, and in fact no such thing was attempted. She was safely in custody and there was no danger that she would or could escape."

IT'S A FORGERY.

Theodore Kytka, handwriting expert, having at the instance of Chief of Police Lees examined the $500,000 note filed as a claim against the estate of the late William Murdock, has pronounced the same to be a forgery. L. S. Megginson has been accused by J. F. Turner of having forged the note, and it is said the accusation will be taken up and investigated by the Grand Jury.

SENTENCES.

MARCH 25, 1899.

James Creegan, Forger, Gets a Two-Year Term.

Murderer Daniel O'Shea Must Spend 21 Years in Prison

James Creegan, one of the Nevada Bank forgers, was taken before Judge Dunne Saturday morning and upon the representation that he had not alone pleaded guilty, but had rendered valuable assistance to the [illegible] curing the punishment of Charles [illegible] er, the prince of forgers [illegible] the moderate punishment of [illegible] imprisonment at Folsom penitentiary.

The Nevada Bank case [illegible]

W. A. BOTKIN ASKS FOR A DIVORCE.

He Seeks His Freedom From the Fair Cordelia.

MARCH 8 1899.

Her Conviction of Murder the Only Ground Alleged.

They Were Married in Kansas City Nearly Twenty-Seven Years Ago.

Botkin and Mrs. Arbogast Will Shortly Be Free to Marry.

Knight & Heggerty Filed Their Bills of Exceptions on Appeal With Judge Cook This Morning.

Fresh trouble has fallen upon the ample shoulders of Mrs. Cordelia Botkin, the convicted murderess of Mrs. John P. Dunning. While she lingers within the confines of the Branch County Jail, impatiently awaiting the appeal to the Superior Court that she hopes will result in her liberation, to her comes the sad news of her husband's defection in the hour of trial.

With the County Clerk this morning were filed papers in which Welcome A. Botkin, the husband of the convicted murderess, asks the courts to set him free from the wife of his bosom. He seeks his divorce upon the ground of her conviction of a felony, not reckoning upon the possibility of a reversal of the judgment against her. As, however, the ground stated is legal cause for a demand for divorce, there is small expectation of any resistance to the suit on the part of Mrs. Botkin.

The complaint is brief and to the point. The plaintiff states that he was wedded to the fair Cordelia in the month of September, 1872, at Kansas City, Mo. The issue of the marriage is one son, Beverly Botkin, aged 26 years. Botkin's one cause of complaint against his wife is that on the 30th day of December last she was convicted by a jury of the crime of murder in the first degree, and on the 4th day of February sentenced to imprisonment for life for her crime.

A significant fact in connection with the suit is the divorce secured a few weeks ago by Mrs. Clara Arbogast from her erring spouse. Mrs. Arbogast, it will be remembered, figured conspicuously in the Botkin case, and there was evidence that Mrs. Botkin told John P. Dunning more than once that her husband wanted to get rid of her, so that he might marry Mrs. Arbogast. It remains now to be seen whether, after a reasonable time has elapsed, the two divorced parties will come together in holy matrimony.

Messrs. Knight and Heggerty, attorneys for Mrs. Botkin, made the first move in the pending appeal this morning by filing with Judge Carroll Cook the proposed bill of exceptions. The bill contains nearly 600 pages of manuscript and includes every exception taken by the defense at the trial to rulings of the court, instructions of the Judge and so forth. To this District Attorney Murphy is allowed twenty days in which to prepare amendments, after which it will be Judge Cook's business to settle the bill. That done the bill will be printed, and with the filing of it and the transcript of testimony in the Supreme Court the appeal will have been perfected.

Becker and Creegan being convicted of having forged and passed a draft for $22,000, were sentenced to life imprisonment. The Supreme Court granted a new trial, holding that the testimony of the accomplice, Frank [illegible], alias Seaver, had not been corroborated. Subsequently Creegan turned State's evidence and Becker pleaded guilty and was sentenced to San Quentin for a term of seven years. District Attorney Murphy made a plea of mercy in Creegan's behalf. He said the defendant had rendered valuable assistance to the State and that the officers of the Nevada and Crocker-Woolworth banks joined with him in requesting a light sentence. Creegan has now been in jail for three years.

The prosecution will now admit [illegible] to bail upon his own [illegible] the story of this famous [illegible] finished.

Other sentences [illegible] Dunne were as follows: [illegible] grand larceny, five years [illegible] Daniel O'Shea, who [illegible] heart. Julia Keeley [illegible] guilty to murder [illegible] twenty-one years [illegible] William Ward [illegible] San Quentin [illegible]

How I Detect Forged Signatures

Daniel T. Ames, the Most Famous Hand-Writing Expert in This Country, Explains the Secrets of His Craft.

Special to the Sunday Call.

PROFESSOR DANIEL T. AMES is regarded as the foremost authority in the country on questions of disputed handwriting. In the thirty odd years over which his experience extends, he has been consulted in some 1500 cases, including the most important ones that have turned on questions of disputed handwriting. He was one of the experts called in to pass upon the celebrated Morey-Garfield letter and the Cadet Whitaker case at West Point; the Fair will case in San Francisco, which involved an estate of $20,000,000; the Hunter-Long forgeries in Philadelphia, the recent Botkin murder trial in San Francisco and the more recent Molineux case in New York. He was also one of the eleven experts in different localities consulted in the Dreyfus case.

Mr. Ames studied law in his earlier years, has been a teacher of handwriting and is himself an expert penman. He therefore has unusual qualifications for giving expert testimony in legal cases involving matters of handwriting. Mr. Ames for a long time was a resident of New York City, but now makes his headquarters in San Francisco. He is at present engaged in the preparation of a book on the "Science of Handwriting and the Detection of Forgery," in which he is embodying the results of his long experience and trained observation.

Every year sees an increase in the number of important civil and criminal cases that turn on questions of disputed handwriting. In the past twelve months my own office has been consulted in over 150 of them. Two of those in which I have appeared recently—the Botkin trial in San Francisco and the Molineux case in New York—related to the crime of murder. In the latter, so far as it has gone, the only convincing testimony brought out is that of handwriting experts, five of whom agreed in pronouncing the address on a poison package submitted in evidence to be in the hand of the accused man.

In answer to the question, "Do you consider that the identity of handwriting can be determined beyond the possibility of mistake?" Mr. Ames replied unhesitatingly "I do." If I could not say that I would not go on the witness stand and give testimony which may help to convict a man of crime.

"To understand the principles on which an expert in handwriting bases his work consider for a moment how a person's style of writing is developed. He begins by copying the forms set for him by a teacher. He approximates more or less closely to these forms. His handwriting is set, formal and without character. As soon as he leaves off following the copybook, however, his writing begins to take on individual characteristics. These are for the most part unconscious. He thinks of what he is writing, not how. In time these peculiarities which creep gradually into a man's writing become fixed habits. By the time he is, say 25, his writing is settled. After that it may vary, may grow better or worse, but is certain to retain those distinguishing marks which in the man himself we call personality. This personality remains. He cannot disguise it, except in a superficial way, any more than he can change his own character.

No Man Signs His Name Twice Alike

"It follows that no two persons write exactly the same hand. It is easy to illustrate this. Suppose, for example, that among 10,000 persons there is one hunchback, one minus his right leg, one with an eye missing, one bereft of a left arm, one with a broken nose. To find a person with two of these would require probably 100,000 people; three of them 1,000,000; four of them 100,000,000. One possessing all of them might not be found in the entire 1,400,000,000 people on earth. Precisely the same with different handwritings—the peculiar and distinguishing characteristics of one would no more be present in others than would the personal counterparts of the authors be found in other individuals.

"It is more surprising, at first thought, to be told that no person ever signs his name even twice alike. Of course, theoretically, it cannot be said that it is impossible for a person to write his name twice exactly in the same manner. A person casting dice might throw double aces a hundred times consecutively. But who would not act on the practical certainty that the dice were loaded long before the hundredth throw was reached in such a case? The same reasoning applies to the matter of handwriting with added force, because the chance of two signatures being exactly alike is incomparably less than the chance of the supposed throws of the dice.

"This point came up in the Howland will case, tried in New Bedford, Mass., some years ago. Three signatures in dispute were exactly alike. Forgery was alleged. Professor Pierce of Harvard, who was called to give expert testimony in the case, entered into an elaborate mathematical calculation to find out how many times, on the law of chance, it would be necessary for a man to write his signature before he would have three exactly alike. He found the number to be 2,666,000,000,000,000,000,000. This is a figure considerably higher than a man could reach if he devoted himself exclusively to the task of signing his name for an ordinary lifetime. Of course the number of chances of identical repetition would be multiplied or diminished according to the number of characters in the signature, but in any event the possibility of exact repetition would be too remote to be taken into consideration. It follows, therefore, that an identical reproduction of a signature is a prima facie indication of forgery.

"Probably many persons will not believe that it is impossible for them to write their own names twice alike. For them it will be an interesting experiment to repeat their signatures, say 100 times, writing them on various occasions and under different circumstances, and then to compare the result. It is safe to say that they will hardly find two of these which do not present some differences, even to their eyes, and under the examination of a trained observer, aided by the microscope, these divergencies stand out tenfold more plainly.

Individuality in Writing.

"Many cases of forgery hinge on this point, the forger having copied another person's signature by tracing one in his possession, but such attempts are always more easy to detect than those in which the forger carefully imitates another's hand. The latter is the usual procedure. The forger secures examples of the signature or writing which he desires to imitate. Then he practices on it, trying to reproduce all its striking peculiarities. In this way he sometimes arrives at a resemblance so close as to deceive even his victim. Still there is always present some internal evidence to prove that the writing is not the work of the person to whom it is attributed. Likewise it will reveal the identity of the person who actually wrote it, if specimens of his natural hand are to be had for comparison. It is impossible for a man to carry in his mind and to reproduce on paper all the peculiar characteristics of another man's writing, and at the same time to conceal all his own. At some point there is certain to come a slip when the habit of years asserts itself and gives the testimony which may fix the whole production on the forger beyond the shadow of a doubt.

"There was a good illustration of this in the Fair will case, which was one of the greatest forgeries ever attempted in this country, involving, as it did, the disposition of an estate of $20,000,000. The forger was familiar with Fair's handwriting and had a number of examples of it to guide his work. In the main the forged will is a fair approximation to the millionaire's own hand, although full of tell-tale evidences of its true nature. But if other evidence had been lacking, there was a single letter in one word which was sufficient to prove the spurious character of the document.

"When the forger came to write the letter 'q' he evidently had no example of Fair's 'q' to go by. He hesitated over the matter, for there is a distinct break between the 'q' and the preceding letter in the word 'bequeath.' At length he made a conventional "q" and went on with his imitation of Fair in the remaining letters of the word. The same form of the 'q' is repeated wherever the forger had occasion to use the word in the remainder of the document. This was damning evidence. It happened that Fair wrote a peculiar 'q' and never varied its form. The difference is plainly evident in the accompanying picture. Fair could never have written the 'q' as it appeared in the contested document, and the contrast was made all the more startling by the close resemblance in the remainder of the word.

"The little things are the ones that count most with the handwriting expert in making his examinations, for the reason that they are no less characteristic than the more prominent peculiarities and are more likely to be overlooked by the person who tries to disguise his hand. The crossing of t's and the dotting of i's become matters of large moment in making comparisons of disputed handwritings. There is probably no matter in conjunction with a man's ordinary writing in which he gives less thought than the way he makes these crosses and dots. For that reason they are in the highest degree characteristic. And it is precisely because of their apparently slight importance that the person who sets out to imitate another's handwriting or to disguise his own is likely to be careless about these little marks and to make slips which will be sufficient to prove his identity.

A Forger Who Wrote Too Well.

"Imitations of signatures are usually written in a laborious and painstaking manner. They are, therefore, decidedly unlike a man's natural signature, which is usually written in an easy fashion. The imitations show frequent pauses, irregularities in pen pressure and in the distribution of ink and contain other evidences of hesitation. Not infrequently the forger tries to improve on his work by retouching some of the letters after he has completed a word. Microscopic examination brings out all of these things and makes them tell-tale witnesses.

"One common error of the forger who sets out to imitate another's signature is in exaggerating the peculiarities and unique features of the original. There was a striking instance of this in the Collom-Blaisdell case, in Minneapolis. Blaisdell was a wealthy contractor and Collom was his lawyer. Blaisdell had a peculiar signature, that of a heavy, untutored hand little accustomed to writing. Collom was familiar with the signature. When, as was charged, he set out to forge his client's name, he naturally imitated this peculiar writing as closely as he could. But, being a better writer than Blaisdell, he had difficulty in carrying out this attempt. In striving to reproduce the tremor which appears in Blaisdell's signature he overdid the matter."

A statistician, who evidently did not think enough of crediting to include it in his summing up, has estimated that an average man of 70 years of age has worked [illegible] days, has slept [illegible] has amused himself [illegible] days, has walked 12,000 miles, has been ill [illegible], has partaken of 36,000 meals, and eaten 16,000 pounds of meat, and [illegible] pounds of fish, eggs and vegetables, and drunk [illegible] gallons of fluid.

Expert Daniel T Ames as He Appears in Court Illustrating His Work

Daniel T. Ames, the most famous handwriting expert in America, tells how he detects forged signatures, in next Sunday's Call.

— Bull —

ALFRED FULLER'S HEIRS CLAIM A WOMAN FORGED HIS WILL

MARCH 8. 1899.

OROVILLE, March 7.—A sensational will contest, involving several well-known people of Chico, is about to begin in the Superior Court of Butte County. The heirs of Alfred Fuller, a well-known citizen of Chico, deceased, will file a petition to estop the probate of an alleged holographic will by which the testator bequeathed all but $1000 of his estate to Mrs. Minnie Houseworth, who was in no way related to him. The heirs will allege that the will, which was filed for probate on October 19, 1898, thirteen months after the death of Alfred Fuller, is a forgery. As the witnesses to this document are men of prominence this contest, involving as it does their reputations for truth and integrity, excites more than ordinary interest.

June 9 1897
I desire that Mrs. Minnie Houseworth hav all of my property at my death except I reserv one thousand dollars to be equely divided between all leegal heirs to my estate
A. Fuller

Signed as witnesses after being requested to do so by Alfred Fuller He declaring this to be his will and that he had signed it we therefore in his presence and in the presence of each other signed our names as witnesses
August 3rd 1897. J Ellis Rodley
J M Garner

MISS MINNIE HOUSEWORTH.

DR J. ELLIS RODLEY.

Dr. J. Ellis Rodley, a prominent physician and Mayor of Chico, and J. M. Garner, a well-known farmer, are the witnesses. They swear that the deceased on the 3d of August, 1897, came to the office of Dr. Rodley with a document which he said was his will and that at his request they attached their signatures thereto as witnesses. The paper was dated June 9, 1897, and Dr. Rodley added a superscription reciting the incident and the request of August 3, after which he and Garner affixed their signatures.

Before signing the will Dr. Rodley advised Fuller to go to an attorney and have his will properly drawn. Fuller refused to adopt the suggestion, saying that "a Fuller never had his will drawn but what he died a very short time afterward." The testator requested the witnesses to keep the fact of his having made a will a secret.

This incident in itself was not at all strange, but in the light of subsequent developments the Fuller heirs are inclined to look upon it with suspicion. They do not accuse either Dr. Rodley or Mr. Garner of conspiracy, but they cannot understand why the will was not found for a year after the decedent's death. Then the strange manner in which the document was found and a sensational charge against the man who delivered it to the devisee add to the mystery.

Soon after Mr. Fuller's death a vigorous search was made for a will. Mrs. Houseworth was most anxious to find it, as according to her testimony before the probate judge Fuller had told her he had made a will giving all his property to her. She claimed Fuller was in love with her for many years and only the interference of his brother prevented their marriage.

The Fuller heirs have engaged Knight & Heggerty of San Francisco to conduct their contest and Mrs. Houseworth is represented by Joseph D. Sproul. Theodore A. Kytka, the San Francisco handwriting expert, has been employed to expert the alleged forged document. The sum involved is in the neighborhood of $40,000, which will be increased if any portion of the estate of Emellion Fuller, who died before his brother Alfred, should be included in the estate of the latter.

What Fuller did with his will after having made it or to whom he entrusted it is still a mystery. About a year after his death, after all search had been fruitless, the document was sent by mail to H. Cormack, a reputable citizen of Butte County, who had been one of Fuller's close friends. Mrs. Houseworth, the beneficiary, obtained the paper and offered it for probate. During the preliminary probate proceedings she swore that Cormack had, without legal right, retained the will in his possession, and surrendered it only on a promise that he would receive $2000. This charge created a big sensation here and in Chico. Cormack denied the charge and said he had nothing to do with the paper further than to receive it and deliver it immediately to Mrs. Houseworth. The beneficiary under the alleged will denied that undue influence had impelled Fuller to bequeath to her his property and declared that the only consideration was the love he bore her, that they had been well acquainted for a number of years and that the testator did not wish his relatives to benefit by his thrift and frugality.

The story of the will as told in Chico is as follows:

Alfred Fuller was a very old man at the time of his sudden death in September, 1897. He was known as a shrewd, suspicious and careful old farmer-miner, sordid to a miserly degree and a pronounced woman-hater. He never said a kind word for the opposite sex and when it was announced that he had executed a holographic will, bequeathing all his property to a woman, his acquaintances were greatly surprised and those who knew him best shook their heads wisely and declared the document should be treated with suspicion. The old bachelor's antipathy to women was attributed to a disappointment in love when he was a young fellow back in the States.

On his arrival in Northern California, in 1852, Fuller went into the mines and was fairly successful, returning to Chico with several thousand dollars. This sum he immediately invested in various enterprises and in a few years his fortune amounted to over $30,000. After the death of his brother, Emellion Fuller, some years ago, Alfred was appointed executor and administrator of his estate, which amounted to upward of $75,000. The management of this sum, together with his own property, was a task which greatly worried the old man, and as years went by he became suspicious of every person who acted in a friendly manner toward him. He believed every one was after his money. His heart became bitter against all his relatives, and he was especially chary in his relations with women. He often expressed a fear that some one would attempt to get his wealth from him before he died and felt sure that after his death his estate would be the prey of some person or persons who had no claim to it. He took a morbid interest in the details of the Blythe, Sharon and Fair litigations and seemed to think similar attempts to steal his estate would be made.

He died quite unexpectedly in the fall of 1897 and no will of any kind was found among his papers. His estate and also that of his brother went into the hands of Public Administrator E. M. Woodman, who still has charge of the properties. Shortly after his death a note for $15,000 drawn in favor of Dr. A. J. Landis of Chico was presented against Alfred Fuller's estate. It was alleged to have been given in consideration for medical services rendered and bore no interest. The note was payable in two years from the date it bore. The claim was repudiated by the public administrator and suit was brought to collect and this litigation is now pending.

Several months after Fuller's death rumors began circulating that he had left a will, which could not be found, and that Dr. J. Ellis Rodley and John Garner had witnessed the document. These reports aroused greater interest in the case as many of Fuller's friends declared that he strongly disliked these two men and never neglected an opportunity to speak ill of them. Much speculation regarding the devisee and the terms of the alleged will was indulged in, but neither of the witnesses enlightened the anxious public. Dr. Rodley told a half dozen people that he had, at the deceased's request, witnessed his last will and that he also had called John Garner into his office to act in the same capacity. The doctor did say that the beneficiary named was a woman well known in Chico, but he did not disclose her name.

Interest in the case began to flag and had almost died out when one day last August H. Cormack, a well-known and respected citizen of Butte County, received through the mail an envelope postmarked Chico. In the envelope was the long missing will, but no letter of explanation as to why it was sent to him accompanied the testament. The will was written on an old piece of blank book paper, evidently a leaf torn from a book. The writing and spelling were very poor. Mr. Cormack, after recovering from his surprise, immediately notified Mrs. Houseworth and told her how it came into his possession. Mr. Cormack delivered the will to the devisee and it was soon after offered for probate before Judge John C. Gray of Butte County.

Then followed another sensation. Mrs. Houseworth, under oath, declared Cormack had illegally retained possession of the will and demanded $2000 before he would deliver it. In order to obtain the precious paper she consented to pay that sum when she came into the estate. She also swore that Cormack had pledged her not to mention his name in connection with the case. Cormack's reputation for honesty, rectitude and probity had never before been questioned and every one who knew him was surprised and on all sides the woman's story was discredited.

Under instructions from Judge Gray the Grand Jury began an investigation into the alleged illegal detention of Fuller's will and the alleged attempt at extortion, but nothing has as yet come of the inquiry.

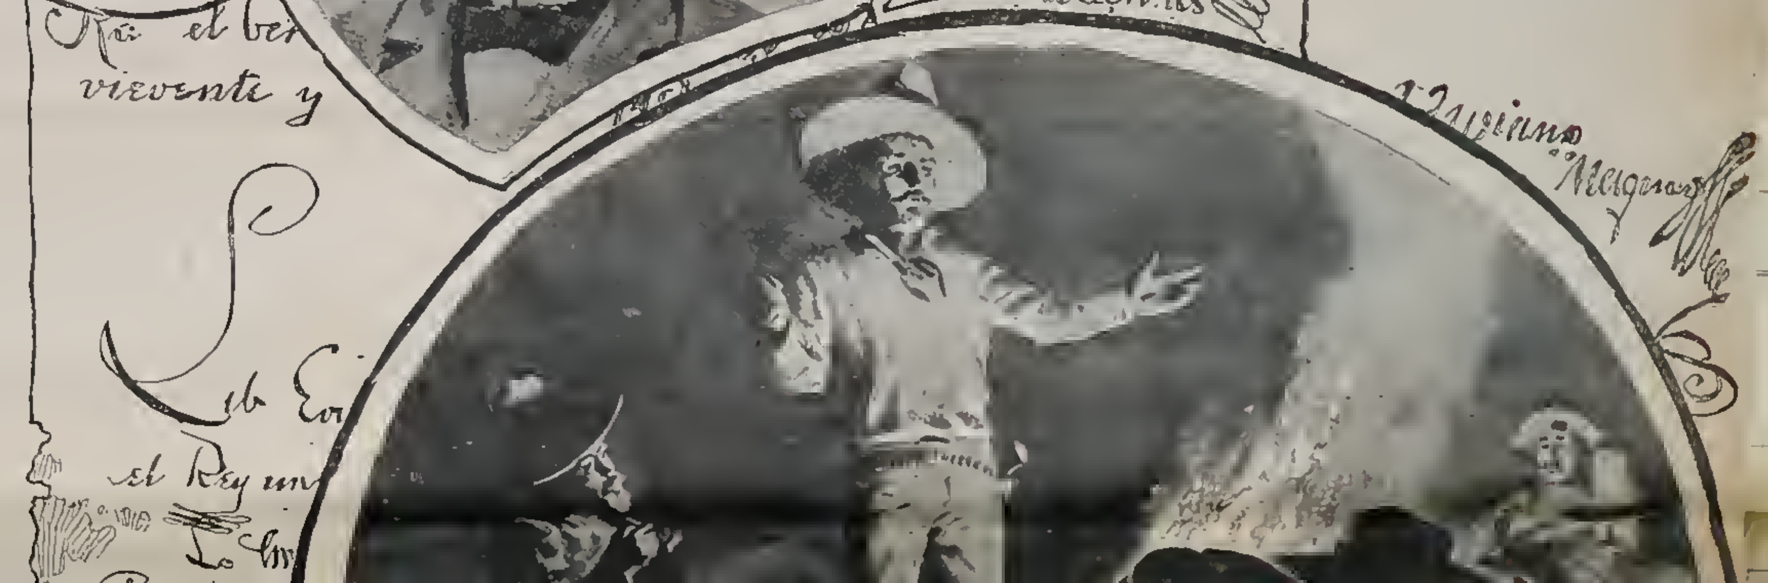
Mr. Cormack was one of Fuller's closest friends and the mysterious sending of the will to him, months after a futile search had been made for it, is considered by the Fuller heirs as a part of the scheme to deprive them of their rights. The heirs allege in the contest that this procedure was simply to add weight to the forgery. Cormack repudiates the whole affair and says he had nothing to do with it further than to receive the will in the strange manner detailed and that he immediately delivered it to Mrs. Houseworth.

It is further alleged by friends of Alfred Fuller that he did not have any high regard for Mrs. Houseworth, although she maintains that he loved her and at one time would have married her had not Emellion Fuller interfered. These same people assert that the deceased also had a strong antipathy for Dr. Rodley and John Garner, whose signatures as witnesses are attached to the alleged will. Garner and Fuller are said to have had business troubles some years ago.

Dr. J. Ellis Rodley is one of the leading physicians of Chico and is Mayor of the city. He came from Missouri eleven years ago. John Garner is a farmer. Mrs. Minnie Houseworth was formerly Mrs. West. Her first husband died, leaving her in comfortable circumstances, but she has lost most of her property. She married Houseworth afterward, but the couple are now living apart, the husband being somewhere in Southern California. None of Fuller's acquaintances were ever aware or suspected that he was devoted to the woman. It is hardly possible that a man of Fuller's habits and temperament could have courted or shown marked attention to any woman without it being noticed and exciting gossip.

CONFESSION OF PERALTA-REAVIS, THE KING OF FORGERS.

The land that Reavis tried to steal by means of his forged documents covered a larger area than the States of Vermont and New Hampshire combined. It was located partly in Arizona and partly in New Mexico.



THERE is a gaunt, white-haired, white-bearded man living in Denver to-day. His shoulders stoop, his clothes are worn and threadbare, hanging loosely from a bony frame. Often he is seen on the street with a dark-eyed woman of olive complexion who still retains traces of fierce Andalusian beauty. The pair are always accompanied by two children, twins, who have inherited the features and eyes of their mother. The four live in a lodging-house and at times they are hard pressed for the necessities of life.

The man is James Addison (Peralta) Reavis and the woman is his wife. He planned and barely failed of executing the most gigantic fraud that was ever conceived against this Government. At one time he had a fortune of millions within his grasp. Such famous men as Robert G. Ingersoll, Roscoe Conkling, Collis P. Huntington, William S. Wood, Reuben H. Lloyd, Phil B. Thompson, John W. Mackay, Ed S. Stokes, Bourke Cockran, Charles Crocker, J. M. C. Curry and H. D. Money espoused his cause and helped fight his case in the courts.

In the end, when his scheme was on the verge of success, when he was about to receive title from the Government to 12,500,000 acres of land valued at $100,000,000, the Government succeeded in convicting him of conspiracy to defraud the Government. His scheme was exploded and he was sentenced to serve two years in a New Mexican prison. He served his sentence.

A few days ago he wrote a confession of the entire conspiracy. According to his statements the Government, although it spent $100,000 in defending the case, never hit upon the real facts. His conviction, he says, was secured upon a mass of false and perjured testimony. He himself, however, tells for the first time how he conceived and executed the fraud.

He tells how he met an Andalusian girl whose parentage was unknown, how he married her and built about her a mythical lineage proving that she was the descendant of one of the noblest families of Spain and the sole heir to the Peralta land grant of Arizona. He tells how he searched the archives of Spain and forged and stole ancient documents, [illegible]

REAVIS' confession is as follows:

I am of Scotch-Welsh antecedents with a traditional Spanish extraction in the [illegible]

[illegible] at her disposal and returned to St. Louis.

Four years had elapsed since I had [illegible]

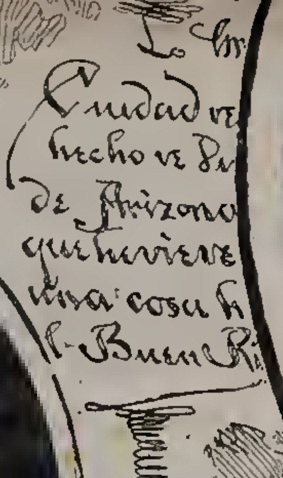
[illegible] gan to take shape in my mind.

During these travels I met a young Spanish girl. Her features rather inclined to the Jewish type; her eyes were large and of darkest hazel, a profusion of black and silken hair hung in a great mass below her waist, the delicate lines of her body and her exquisite grace and fascination told of noble Spanish ancestry. She was of splendid physique, elastic step and a superb dancer. She was at home in the water or on a horse and was an adept with rod, gun or lariat.

I inquired into the history of this child of nature and found that she had been reared from her earliest recollection in the fastness of the mountains remote from civilization. No one knew the history of her birth. Investigation only threw a deeper mystery about her parentage. From a baby she had only Indian children for playmates, having been raised by a ranchero's family who sold her into bondage to John W. Snowball and wife. Those who might have known her history had died, and the ranchero claimed that the child was an Indian waif whose parentage was unknown.

I became infatuated with her and also saw in her a possible heir to the Peralta grant. I induced her to accompany me and returned to San Francisco. I made a satisfactory showing of a partial title (which I had forged with the aid of the Willing title) and John W. Mackay stood sponsor for me to go to Spain for the purpose of completing the title and determining of what lands the grant actually consisted. I had a guarantee of $500 per

(Continued on Page Thirty-Two.)



HOW THE IDEA OF THE GREAT LAND FRAUD ORIGINATED BESIDE A REMOTE CAMP-FIRE IN ARIZONA.

ONE OF REAVIS'S PURCHASED ANCESTORS.

Da Sofia Laura Michaela

REAVIS' confession is as follows. I am of Scotch-Welsh antecedents with a traditional Spanish extraction in the remote generations. Three of my great grandparents fought in the revolution. I was reared in Henry County, Mo. In May, 1861, at the age of 18, I enlisted in the Confederate army and during my life as a soldier committed my first crime. I forged an order and being successful in this I raised a furlough, and before this expired I surrendered to the Union forces.

After the war I worked as a street car conductor but subsequently opened a real estate office in St. Louis. I was successful in forging a title to sustain a tax title to some valuable land I had bought, not knowing the title was imperfect. But these are incidents in which there is little interest. However, success in these early evils sowed the seed that later sprang forth into the most gigantic fraud of this century.

The plan to secure the Peralta grant and defraud the Government out of land valued at $100,000,000 was not conceived in a day. It was the result of a series of crimes extending over nearly a score of years. At first the stake was small, but it grew and grew in magnitude until even I sometimes was appalled at the thought of the possibilities. I was playing a game which to win meant greater wealth than that of a Gould or a Vanderbilt. My hand constantly gained strength, noted men pleaded my cause and unlimited capital was at my command. My opponent was the Government and I baffled its agents at every turn. Gradually I became absolutely confident of success. As I neared the verge of triumph I was exultant and sure. Until the very moment of my downfall I gave no thought to failure. But my sins found me out and as in the twinkle of an eye I saw the millions which had seemed already in my grasp fade away and heard the courts doom me to a prison cell.

Now I am growing old and the thing hangs upon me like a nightmare until I am driven to make a clean breast of it all, that I may end my days in peace.

The first I ever knew of the Peralta grant was when Dr. George M. Willing walked into my real estate office in St. Louis and told me that he had a land grant of fabulous proportions in Arizona and wanted me to take hold of it. After a number of interviews I decided to give my whole time to the matter.

Just as I was about to start for the West my health gave away completely and I was forced to abandon the trip. For two years I remained an invalid at my father's home in Vernon County, Mo. One night I had a dream that warned me that I should start for California. I left immediately with scarcely any money and without preparations for the journey. Once in California my health improved and after two more years I returned to my father's home for my wife. She refused even to see me and to appease my conscience I placed what means I had accumulated at her disposal and returned to St. Louis.

Four years had elapsed since I had talked with Willing.

About this time I received a letter from Mrs. Willing reciting the death of her husband and proposing that I resume the grant matter. I entered into a contract with her and returned to California. Here my money ran out and I went to work on the Los Angeles Daily Star. Subsequently I worked on daily papers in San Francisco and all the prominent extreme Western papers. During these months the land grant was in my memory but I did not have the means to examine further into the matter.

The contest between Jay Gould and the Southern Pacific railroad was then at its height. The Southern Pacific right of way as surveyed ran through the Peralta grant. I went to Huntington, Stanford and Crocker with the Willing title and they advanced me money to trace its authenticity.

I went immediately to Arizona and there, after much patient research and a trip to Mexico, learned that the Willing title was purely mythical. The way of it was this: October 20, 1864, in Black Canyon, Yavapai County, Arizona, there existed a mining camp, the principal persons of the camp being Dr. George M. Willing of St. Louis, Don Antonio Pablo Peralta, his son Miguel Peralta, Don Jose Ybarra, M. Bernatto Guiness, Don Rafael Machado, Don Manuel Ramon and Charles Lovejoy, a friend of Willing. Among these originated the idea of the Peralta grant. Another mythical person executed a deed of this parole grant to Dr. Willing, the paper reciting that the grant had been ceded to the father of the maker of the deed by the King of Spain for military services in 1758 and that he had been forced to abandon it on account of hostile Indians. It embraced 300 square leagues of land located along the Gila River, thirty leagues from east to west by ten leagues wide, resting its western border upon the eastern line of the Pima reservation.

One of the alleged witnesses, M. Bernatto Guiness, was a Frenchman who afterward located in business in Los Angeles, Cal., but died before he explained his part in the matter, as did also Don Antonio Pablo Peralta. The only other Mexican, Don Rafael Machado of Rosario, Lower California, affirmed that a Spaniard named Miguel Peralta made the deed. The writing was more that of Don Pablo, and he suited the hero of Willing's tale better than Miguel Peralta.

Willing represented that he had given a pack train of sixteen mules, valued at $22,000, for the land. This recites in a nutshell all I could determine about the grant.

Becoming certain that Pinalto, the name given as the maker of the deed, was a myth, I forged the documents necessary to shift the title into the Peralta family. Immediately the Peraltas became so numerous that I realized that a title in their names would never do. After considering the matter several months I decided to again shift the title into some noble family of Spain that had become extinct.

In the meantime I traveled much in the towns where I could gain information concerning the men who might be interested in this title. I talked with old residents and stored my mind with many incidents that proved of great value in later years. But I will pass quickly over this period and come down to the time when the great fraud as it was presented to the Government be-

... my investigations ... grant existed, and ... a noble family in Spain named ... that was now extinct. Therefore, with these two pictures I pushed aside the mass of forgeries that I had accumulated around "the Willing title," ignored all the past theories and started out entirely anew.

First I traced the history of the Peralta family and found that the name originated in a title Pera (a pear) alta (high), Peralta signifying a high pear. The family originated in conferring a dukedom upon one Enrique Carillo.

... then I built ... conform with what I had ... old rancher would tell me ... stranger who had gone through part of the country in a certain ... and about his wife dying. I would ... and fit my story to this circumstance, and if I succeeded I had a witness who would go on the stand and swear to the facts.

Then, too, it was not so difficult to change ancient records. All t...

High Jenks At The Crawford.

A novel luncheon was given last night at the Crawford by Carl Eisenschimel, the celebrated expert in handwriting who is to testify for the defense in the Mullock case. Those present were several newspaper correspondents, detectives and Theodore Kytka, who has prepared the most wonderful photographic exhibit of signatures to prove the forgery of the $100,000 note, ever known.

Not only were the lunchers distinguished but the menu, though limited, was rare indeed. From Manila the host had received from his son, a soldier there, curious foods used by the Filipinos. Besides there was Salami from Paris, fromage de Willows, pates des Langouvilles and extract of malt and hops from Sacramento. The affair lasted till after midnight.

known, how he married her and that she was the descendant of the sole heir to the Peralta land searched the archives of Spain
how he and his wife were recei

REAVIS' confession is as foll
I am of Scotch-Welsh an dents with a traditional Spa extraction in the remote ge tions. Three of my great gr parents fought in the revolutio was reared in Henry County, Mo
May, 1861, at the age of 18, I enl in the Confederate army and du my life as a soldier committed my crime. I forged an order and b successful in this I raised a furlo and before this expired I surrend to the Union forces.
After the war I worked as a st car conductor but subsequently op a real estate office in St. Louis. I successful in forging a title to sum a tax title to some valuable land I bought, not knowing the title was perfect. But these are incident which there is little interest. Howe success in these early evils sowed seed that later sprang forth into most gigantic fraud of this centu
The plan to secure the Peralta g and defraud the Government ou land valued at $100,000,000 was not ceived in a day. It was the result series of crimes extending over ne a score of years. At first the stake small, but it grew and grew in ma tude until even I sometimes was palled at the thought of the poss ties. I was playing a game whi win meant greater wealth than th a Gould or a Vanderbilt. My hand stantly gained strength, noted pleaded my cause and unlimited tal was at my command. My opp was the Government and I baffl agents at every turn. Gradually came absolutely confident of su
As I neared the verge of triumph exultant and sure. Until the ver ment of my downfall I gave no th to failure. But my sins found m and as in the twinkle of an eye the millions which had seemed a in my grasp fade away and hea courts doom me to a prison cell
Now I am growing old and th hangs upon me like a nightmare
I am driven to make a clean br it all, that I may end my days in The first I ever knew of the grant was when Dr. George M ing walked into my real estate o
St. Louis and told me that he land grant of fabulous proport
Arizona and wanted me to take it. After a number of interview cided to give my whole time to th ter.
Just as I was about to start
West my health gave away con and I was forced to abandon t
For two years I remained an at my father's home in Vernon
Mo. One night I had a dream warned me that I should start f fornia. I left immediately with ly any money and without prepa for the journey. Once in Califo health improved and after tw years I returned to my father for my wife. She refused ever me and to appease my cons placed what means I had accu

CONFESSION OF REAVIS

Continued from Page Seventeen.

month and earned additional money as a correspondent for San Francisco and New York newspapers.

In Spain I gained admittance to the archives under the pretext that I was hunting up newspaper stories. During many months I searched these archives and pondered over the thing. I found that the Peralta family was extinct and that the Peraltas in Arizona and Mexico were descendants of the servants of the family who had taken the name of the house.

One day as I was making the rounds of the curio shops I came across two ivory portraits of great excellence, evidently a husband and wife of Spanish nobility belonging to the period closing the eighteenth century. I purchased these pictures and they were the foundation upon which I built the mythical superstructure that all but stood against the efforts of the Government and the great expenditures of money to tear it down.

I told my wife—for after coming to Spain I had legally married this Spanish beauty, having lived until then under a secret marriage agreement—that these portraits were of her great-grandparents.

Now the reader must understand that my investigations had proven that no grant existed, and that there had been a noble family in Spain named Peralta that was now extinct. Therefore, with these two pictures I pushed aside the mass of forgeries that I had accumulated around "the Willing title," ignored all the past theories and started out entirely anew.

First I traced the history of the Peralta family and found that the name originated in a title Pera (a pear) alta (high), Peralta signifying a high pear. The family originated in conferring a dukedom upon one Enrique Carrillo.

Then I selected another defunct family named Silva and made my hero the issue of these families and called him Silva de Peralta.

I made the records show that in the winter of '61 and '62 the second baron was compelled to abandon Sonora on account of the French invasion, and thereupon set out for Spain via Los Angeles and San Francisco. In the meantime—May 1, 1822—he had married and to him was born a daughter who married Don Jose Ramon Carmen Maso y Castillo September 20, 1858. With this daughter and her husband he set out upon his journey. They were delayed at the crossing of the Santa Ana River near San Bernardino, Cal., by the excessive floods of that season, where there was born of the daughter a pair of twins, a girl and boy. The latter and mother dying, were buried in one coffin at San Salvador. The father proceeded en route to San Francisco. This child surviving was christened Sofia Loreto Micaila Maso y Silva de Peralta.

Such was the mythical lineage I built for my Spanish bride. You may wonder how I was able to prove all these details that happened in this generation. I will tell you how. I had visited towns in California in which I laid the early history of my wife. I talked with old settlers and found that there had been these incidents in the past and then I built the story of my wife to conform with what I had been told. An old rancher would tell me about a stranger who had gone through that part of the country in a certain year and about his wife dying. I would try and fit my story to this circumstance and if I succeeded I had a witness who would go on the stand and swear to the facts.

Then, too, it was not so difficult to change ancient records. All that was necessary was to add a son or daughter to families whose last descendant had died several generations prior to the time I did my work, then marry this son and daughter and I had connected the families and started the lineage.

All my work was characterized by absolute simplicity. In every town in Mexico and Spain are public scribes to whom you may go and they will copy or write anything you ask. By going to different scribes and using caution none of them suspected the purpose to which I put their writings. Indeed, they do so much copying that any particular piece of work soon slips from their mind. Then it was easy to slip out pages and insert papers in the records of the archives because I was given the greatest liberty in my work. Patience was required in the task and I possessed that quality in abundance.

Recurring to the work in Spain, I recall that I had stuffed the archives there in two cities, Madrid and Seville, before I sought any copies; in other words, I always did my work in that line before I began an investigation, depending upon the investigation to develop the work that I had deposited in the archives, and for this reason it took me a great while to do a very little. I found no inconvenience in any of this work from the simplicity with which the officials received me, as I was always on the outlook for curiosities to mention in my correspondence.

After completing my work in Mexico I took a rest of some three weeks to allow the matter to season, and then I made formal application for a search. The custodian found this portion of the archives fairly glued together with age, so was completely "off his feet," certifying with zeal to all this find, which went forward to startle the world and set at naught all criticism insomuch that my supporters declared that the Government would be compelled to confirm the grant in the Supreme Court regardless of what the lower court should, would or could do.

Thus "not a farthing for corruption" was the motto.

During all this time I never had an accomplice. I did my work absolutely alone; therefore there could not possibly have existed ground for a charge of conspiracy to defraud the Government and all the evidence introduced by the Government to that end for the purpose of conviction was false and vicious. When I started in I could not speak or write Spanish. I hired public scribes in Mexico and Spain to do my copying. During the latter part of our visit in Spain my wife and myself were received in noble families and were entertained lavishly. The public is familiar with my trial and how the greatest men of this country pleaded my case.

To estimate the expenditures on either side of this case would lead into differential calculus. It has been said that I expended a quarter of a million dollars, yet the half would strike nearer the mark, and I would not make a guess for the Government, understanding as I do the various avenues for Klondiking Uncle Sam in such matters. The Assistant District Attorney in his review before the jury at the trial upon a charge of conspiracy to defraud the Government, a simple misdemeanor, stated that the Government had expended $45,000 to convict me and he hoped the jury would consider that part and not disagree. Yet this trial did not cost me one nickel, and the good reason was, I had it not.

The Government said: "We consider this one of the greatest schemes to perpetrate a fraud on the Government that was ever attempted in this country, or possibly in any other. It has been carried on successfully for over a quarter of a century, and a large amount of money obtained, based upon its supposed and really prima facie genuineness, and for a quarter of a century, every year continuously, as we will be able to show to the court, there has been a persistent, intelligent and aggressive effort to manufacture their claim from top to bottom. * * * I will say frankly to the court that this case, as it stood, unchallenged by the Government, would have required this court to confirm to the original grantee, for the benefit, really of the present claimants. * * * They have presented their claim based on properly authenticated documents, which, as translated into English and before being analyzed, make as clean and complete a case of a grant as we have ever had before this court. It seemed to us that it was strange that there should come from Spain and Mexico so many documents of the greatest dignity, certified by the keepers of the archives, fortified again by the certificates of our own officials, making them thereby prima facie evidence in this court."

Collis P. Huntington said: "While I have not entered into the details of the title, I have not had time, but my old friend, Charles Crocker, who examined into it thoroughly, believed in it, and I shall do all I can to aid you."

Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll said: "I have not examined into the matter as carefully as Frank Hurd has, but I am satisfied that your wife is entitled to that property—she is a charming woman and deserves to succeed. Come to my office and make your headquarters, you are more than welcome." And at another time he said: "Yes, if it will be of any advantage to you, elect me president of your company."

Roscoe Conkling said: "If this title stood for a tract of land here in New York I would consider it unimpeachable; as it is there is so much politics in the matter that I cannot say just what will be the outcome, yet I find a perfect title in this woman, Mrs. Reavis."

John W. Mackay said: "I consider that Mrs. Reavis has as good title to that immense property as I have to this hat I hold in my hand, and I paid my own money for it."

Charles Crocker said: "While I have always had absolute confidence in your wife's title to the grant, I think you will succeed better without our active support than with it, since our sins would be weighty for you to bear."

To which I involuntarily responded, my wife and niece being present: "I would gladly be billed for heaven in a hand-basket laden with your sins," such was my admiration for that great son of toil. He was an indefatigable worker to the last and without question he was not only the first, but most important of all my supporters; and he left the title question to his attorneys, thereby bringing the entire syndicate of attorneys and politicians of the Huntington syndicate into the scheme through a liberal distribution of shares of stock in the Casa Grande Improvement Company, which was organized for the purpose of furthering the schemes in view, the least of which was the confirmation of the Peralta grant with its estimated value of $100,000,000, the ultimate object of the syndicate being the irrigation of 15,000,000 acres of land.

I shall close with the exact words with which I closed the case before the court of private claims—throwing my eyeglasses upon the table between myself and the court I said: "I would not give the value of these glasses to win that immense estate and be compelled to assume the responsibilities involved in a confirmation by your honors, even with all the fictitious values that have been bestowed upon it; yet, for the honor of my family, I shall fight on; yes, to the bitter end."

High Jenks At The Crawford.

A novel luncheon was given last night at the Crawford by Carl Eisenschimel, the celebrated expert in handwriting who is to testify for the defense in the Murdock case. Those present were several newspaper correspondents, detectives and Theodore Kytka, who has prepared the most wonderful photographic exhibit of signatures to prove the forgery of the $100,000 note, ever known.

Not only were the lunchers distinguished but the menu, though limited, was rare indeed. From Manila the host had received from his son, a soldier there, curious foods used by the Filipinos. Besides there was Salami from Paris, fromage de Willows, pates des [illegible] and extract of malt and hops from Sacramento. The affair lasted till after midnight.

BLINKED IN UNACCUSTOMED SUNSHINE AFTER BEING IMMURED FOUR YEARS IN JAIL

A.H. DEAN.

JAMES CREEGAN.

LEFT PLEASANT PRISON LIFE.

FREE once more, unhindered in his movements, absolutely unrestricted in his personal acts, A. H. Dean, alias Frank Seavers, stepped from the city jail yesterday and blinked in the bright sunshine.

It was a novel feeling for Dean, as he is known on the prison record, for he has been immured for nearly four years. Originally there was a criminal charge against him, but that was abandoned long ago in consideration of his "turning State's evidence" against his accomplices in the noted Woodland Bank forgery, whereby a draft for $12 was raised to $22,000. Although tacitly absolved from responsibility for his participation in the crime, Dean was detained as a witness for the prosecution, and it was on his testimony alone that the District Attorney based hope of securing conviction of Charles Becker and James Creegan.

Although the law allows the police authorities great latitude in detaining witnesses whose testimony is deemed requisite for the enforcement of justice, there is doubt of their ability to keep such a person in durance for four years should an appeal be made to the courts. Dean, therefore, was to a certain extent a willing prisoner, but he profited by his position sufficiently to secure for himself all the comforts that an indulgent municipal government could afford under the circumstances.

It would be difficult to find cozier, more comfortable quarters in San Francisco than the apartments occupied by Dean during his incarceration. His suite consists of a bedroom and kitchen, containing all the conveniences requisite to an ideal bachelor's den. The kitchen contains a serviceable gas range with all sorts of cooking utensils, from chafing dishes to frying pans, griddles and waffle irons, together with coffee boilers and tea pots.

Soon after Dean's departure from jail his absence was discovered by "Tom Spot," the handsome black-and-white cat that has been his companion ever since he went to jail. The affectionate creature seemed greatly perturbed by the straying of his friend, and with soft wails went about the premises peering into the corners, hoping to find him.

The release of Dean came about through the conviction of those engaged with him in the forgery. The worthless draft was so well executed that it was taken by the Nevada Bank of San Francisco, went through the clearing-house and was accepted by the Crocker-Woolworth Bank. A dispute arose as to which bank should bear the burden of the loss, and the litigation touching this question is still pending in the Supreme Court of California.

Dean was the originator of the scheme. He came to San Francisco in 1895 and rented offices in Montgomery street, holding himself out to be a speculator in real estate. After opening an account with the Nevada Bank he began a system of drawing out and paying in money that gave him the appearance of being a man in active business. After inducing Becker and Creegan to come to California, he secured a draft drawn by the Bank of Woodland on the Crocker-Woolworth Bank for $12. This paper he gave to Creegan, who passed it to Becker, and Becker changed it so that it called for $22,000.

The spurious paper was "laid down" by Dean, and he was assisted in getting away by Becker and Creegan. A man named Joseph McClosky, alias J. M. Shaw, was charged with complicity.

Dean was arrested in Minnesota, and at once turned State's evidence. McClosky was brought back from Philadelphia and acquitted. Becker and Creegan were convicted and sentenced to State's Prison for life. The Supreme Court granted them a new trial, pending which Creegan confessed and offered to convict Becker, whereupon Becker pleaded guilty, throwing himself on the mercy of the court. Creegan finally followed Becker's example, and Dean was at once set free, all the participants in the crime having been legally disposed of by the courts. Becker was sentenced to the State Prison at San Quentin for seven years, and yesterday on motion of District Attorney Murphy, Creegan was let off with a penalty of two years in the State Prison at Folsom. Mr. Murphy said that W. H. Crocker, President of the Crocker-Woolworth Bank, and President I. W. Hellman of the Nevada Bank of San Francisco, as well as Chief of Police Lees had joined in asking for mercy for Creegan at the hands of the court.

Judge Dunne said he felt it his duty to recognize these recommendations that were so strongly urged by the District Attorney,

YDA ADDIS STORKE TRIAL CONTINUED

Delay is to Allow Defendant to Secure Expert Witnesses.

Ames and Kytka, Handwriting Experts, Have Been Called.

The trial of Yda Addis Storke, indicted by the grand jury for libel, was continued this morning upon motion of attorneys for the defendant until April 17. The trial was set for to-morrow, but was continued to allow Mrs. Storke to secure expert witnesses on handwriting who are now out of the state. The famous expert, Ames, was subpoenaed, but finding that he was in New York, Max Gumble of San Francisco was called, but he too was abroad. It being learned that Ames will be in the state early in April, the continuance of the trial was asked and granted. Another expert that will figure in the case when it comes to trial is Theodore Kytka of San Francisco, who has been called by the state.

Interest in Mrs. Storke's case has not abated in spite of the many delays, but rather grows as time passes and more of the developments of a sensational nature that are promised leak out. Mrs. Storke claims that persons interested in the prosecution have attempted to prevent the case from ever being tried.

The jury that was drawn when the trial was set will be expected to serve at the postponed trial, notice to that effect having been given those in the venire.

Storke Case Continued.

The case of Yda Addis Storke which, had it been tried today, would have caused so much excitement has been continued until the 17th of April. The postponement was made that the defendant might secure the testimony of competent experts on handwriting. The same venire of jurymen will hold over to the new date.

YDA ADDIS' TRIAL POSTPONED.

The Defendant Wanted Time To Procure a Handwriting Expert.

Yda Addis Storke's attorney's appeared in court yesterday and presented a motion for a continuation to enable her to secure an expert on handwriting. The motion was granted and April 17th set for the trial.

The trial was originally set for today.

The case against Yda Addis Storke was to come up tomorrow morning in the Superior Court was posponed until April the 17th the same jurors that were to act tomorrow will be used when the trial comes up.

TWO YEARS FOR CREEGAN

MARCH 26, 1899.

A Light Sentence Given the Nevada Bank Swindler.

DEAN, WHO CASHED THE FORGED DRAFT, SET FREE.

HE HAD BEEN IN THE CITY PRISON MORE THAN THREE YEARS.

Had a Suit of Cells to Himself, Where He Entertained Visitors and Brewed Famous Tea.

After nearly four years of suspense the last of the famous trio of bank robbers who obtained $22,000 from the Nevada Bank on a forged draft has had his punishment for that crime settled by the court. James Creegan, the middleman, who planned and backed the coup by which the bank was defrauded, was sentenced to two years' imprisonment in the penitentiary on his plea of guilty. A. H. Dean, who bought the draft of $12 that was afterward raised to $22,000 and cashed it, was set free according to the promise made him when he turned State's evidence soon after the commission of the crime.

Creegan and Becker appeared before Judge Dunne in the Superior Court yesterday. District Attorney Murphy entered a plea of guilty for Creegan and asked leniency. He called attention to the facts that Creegan had aided the State in the case of Becker, the most dangerous of the three swindlers, and that the banks victimized favored a mild sentence. Judge Dunne set Creegan's sentence at two years' imprisonment at San Quentin, while Dean was ordered released from custody.

The story of the swindle has been told many times. Creegan, Becker and Dean planned it in the East. Dean came here and established an account at the Nevada Bank. He drew on it and made deposits, thus making himself familiar to the bank's officials. He traveled about the State and bought drafts at various places, all in furtherance of the scheme arranged. One day he purchased a draft for $12 at the Bank of Woodland. Becker and Creegan were on the scene by this time, and overnight Becker, the "Prince of Forgers," altered the figures and writing on the draft so that it called for $22,000.

Dean cashed it and with the gold in bags the three men fled eastward. Dean was caught in St. Paul and "peached" on his confederates, who were captured in Newark, N. J. This was in May, 1895, and it was not until a few weeks ago that Becker, after one trial and the beginning of another, pleaded guilty and was sentenced to serve seven years. Creegan had turned against him on the offers of a short sentence from the police, and the promise made then was redeemed yesterday, when he escaped with but two years' imprisonment.

Dean has been in the City Prison since his arrival here under arrest. In more than three years of life there he became as familiar to visitors and himself as familiar with the routine of the institution as the jailers. He had a suit of cells away from all other prisoners and just off the office, which were furnished simply but with taste. Here he had many guests, some who came for curiosity's sake and others who professed a friendship for the swindler. He assisted with the clerical work of the prison, and in the past year or so has been working on an index of criminal records to which he had cleverly adapted the library card system. Chief Lees allowed him many liberties. For months after his arrest he went out occasionally to theaters, prizefights and other entertainments. These favors were curtailed later, but he still had his meals from restaurants and lacked none of the little things which tended to make existence agreeable.

With much time on his hands Dean read a great deal and studied teas. He discovered a blend of several varieties which won him some fame. Many have drunk tea with Dean, and none ever failed to acknowledge that their experience was a revelation. They had not known what tea might be until then. To the policemen on duty in the prison their afternoon and evening cup of the beverage, served a la Russe, was the delight of their watch.

Dean has no fixed plans for the future. He would like to put his knowledge of teas to practical use and hopes to establish a business of selling his blends in packages to a high-class trade. He is a man of resources and has no fears of not making a good living in the future. His wife and family live in New York city, where he will join them in a few days.

MARCH 27, 1899.

GEORGE BIDWELL.

FAMOUS FORGER COMES TO HIS END IN SORROW.

His Wonderful Career of Crime and Its Atonement.

Plundered the Bank of England of Five Million Dollars.

He and His Brother Austin Were Swindlers on a Colossal Scale.

His Death Said to Be Caused by Mourning for This Brother.

Career of the Bidwells, Their Prison Life in Newgate—Books of Their Crime Written as a Warning.

George Bidwell, the forger, one of the most remarkable criminals who ever dazed and horrified the civilized world, died in Butte, Mont., yesterday—died, it is said, of a broken heart. His brother, Austin, his fellow-partner in crime and lifelong ally, died just three weeks before, and the older brother, the father in affection and crime—old, broken and desolate—could not survive him. So in the same month these parallel lives of great misdirected talent, wonderful cleverness in trickery, enormous crime, riotous enjoyment, bitter, relentless punishment and suffering and a final attempt at atonement, came to an end, leaving behind them a story that points its moral with black and terrible distinction.

The brothers had been reaping the strange harvest of their crime and its punishment by selling books which tell the story of their early descent of the slopes that lead to crime, the tremendous scheme by which they cut a slice of $5,000,000 out of the heaped-up treasure of the Bank of England, its surprising, startling success, and the horrible years that followed in Newgate Prison. These books, one written by George Bidwell, and a late one by Austin Bidwell, called "From Wall Street to Newgate," aim to show how hideous is crime—worse, how unprofitable it is, as the criminal surely and inevitably meets his inferno in this world. But beyond this effort of repentance and attempt to guide by example the lives of young men away from an alluring carnival of wickedness they read like a story more remarkable than any ever conceived by the most lurid sensationalist of fiction. The lives of kings are petty compared with the colossal scale on which the Bidwell brothers conducted their operations. The Bank of England, Lionel Rothschild himself, was their toy. They helped themselves to millions from the coffers of the bank as they would have picked wild flowers in the field. They enjoyed every luxury that New York, London, the continent could afford, and a game whose high excitement and acute danger makes the imagination faint. They were men of fascinating personality, unequaled nerve, brain, concentration and cleverness. They might almost have founded an empire—and they used their whole mental and physical equipment to enrich themselves by theft, committed on a magnificent scale, but still ugly, black, ignoble and utterly despicable theft.

George, the elder brother and leader; the one who has just died, was a Napoleon of crime—a man of indomitable and fearless will. He knew no higher law of any kind than his own determination. He would win at all hazards. It was he who induced the younger, more pliable, graceful and susceptible Austin to enter the arena of crime. After reaching the summit of their design, stealing vast sums of money, and over-reaching the limit of their freedom, the huge tether they had made for themselves, he applied his powerful energy to the undoing and righting of the mischief he had wrought. After fourteen years in Newgate, years of illness, insanity almost, and torture, he was released as a ticket-of-leave man, and returned to his home in America. He at once wrote the book giving an account of his crimes and punishment, which was to be used as a lever to free his brother. This accomplished, the rest of his life has been one of atonement. With his brother he was in San Francisco some ten years ago lecturing. Up to his death he was traveling about the country lecturing and selling the books, "From Wall Street to Newgate." Now, near the close of his three score years and ten, he has gone to a final rest, after living a life of volcanic fullness and exaggeration, tremendous force and the strangely checkered emotions of sin. The clinging affection which made him lure the younger man to the crime whose reward was countless showers of gold, broke the tendons of his life when that object was gone.

Austin, the younger, the one with the bearing of a gentleman, the manners of a charmer, tells in his story, written some years after that of George Bidwell, the story of their crimes.

The two began their lives as boys in a simple, plain home in Hartford, Conn. They had a common school education, then started for themselves, slipping by slow and easy stages into the pathways of black dealing. They were early associated with a gang of thieves who subsidized the police into winking at their crimes, and executed robbery after robbery with perfect impunity. Austin was sent to Europe to negotiate some stolen bonds, and it was there that the project of the Bank of England forgeries was conceived.

He found that in this great institution there was one flaw—that acceptances offered for discount were not sent to the acceptors for verification of signatures. Money could be drawn on forged checks to an unlimited extent, and those whose names were thus used would not, in the natural order in which the business was transacted, be notified for five or six months.

By a stroke of really magnificent audacity Austin Bidwell established his credit at the bank. He posed as a Mr. F. A. Warren, dressed and lived like a prince, by large expenditures at the leading tailors, hotels, etc., gave the impression that he was an American silver king. The bank officials, thoroughly duped, received him with the greatest deference. He presented among a number of genuine bills, many of his own manufacture, and was ready to escape to other lands with his plunder of millions before the bills became due and discovery was certain.

Noyes, a friend whom they had taken into their scheme and employed as a clerk, was caught in the act of presenting a forged check, and arrested at once. George Bidwell and Macdonald, the fourth member of the swindling quartet, were arrested soon after, Macdonald at quarantine. Pinkerton, the famous detective, had seen the Bidwell brothers in London and recognized them as New York forgers. The pursuit was started at once.

Austin Bidwell went to France and married, then to Spain and finally to Havana to enjoy his spoil. Love, riches and happiness spread before him. He was only 28, rich to magnificence, living in luxury in a sunny, caressing land.

But fate found him out. Captain John Curtin of Pinkerton's staff, now of Curtin's Detective Agency, in this city, interrupted the young swindler at a banquet. There was a scene; Curtin was shot and Bidwell escaped temporarily, but only temporarily—Newgate awaited him.

The trial was swift and sure; the sentence—imprisonment for life.

A long account of Austin Bidwell's life in prison follows. It is a human document of extraordinary interest, revealing the strange workings of the human mind in solitude, the great suffering and endurance, the unutterable longing, the repentance forced out of wickedness like blood out of a stone. The forger read his Bible through three times, at the rate of a chapter a day, until its lessons sunk into his heart. He learned to read and write fluently in Latin, French, Spanish and Italian. But these diversions alone could not keep him from insanity. He needed the sympathetic touch of some form of life. He trained a rat to do various tricks and to love him. The prison authorities saw his affection for the little animal and killed it. He went and took up a beetle, next trying to discover some intelligence in it. This, too, was taken from him. He trained the flies in his cell; he clung for sympathy and companionship to every insect that fluttered towards him.

The years in prison had been sorrowful ones for George Bidwell. He was ill and half insane most of the time. The authorities claimed that he was feigning illness and tortured him to make him confess it. Finally, in 1887, fourteen years after his imprisonment, the medical officer of the prison certified that his speedy death was certain, and he was released to die. He recovered and from that moment his efforts to release his brother and the other partners in his crime was unceasing. He wrote the book giving an account of their crime, and with the proceeds sent his sister to England to intercede with the English authorities.

The Home Secretary was appealed to many times in vain. Money and influence were brought from all quarters to effect the release of the man who had been despairing and raving in prison for twenty years—from 1873 to 1893. One day, however, a gallant act in saving the life of a fellow prisoner, coupled with continuous good behavior, worked in his behalf. The Home Secretary relented, and Austin Bidwell returned to the world again. Although in his early years destitute of all moral sense and conscience, Bidwell was a man of sensitive temperament and acute sensibilities, and no one, however disposed to abhor his crime, could read the account of his sufferings in prison and the terrible reaction of ecstasy on his release without feeling that he paid the penalty of his wrongdoing.

Austin's wife, whom he had so adored in that flowery period when he escaped to Cuba with the plunder from the Bank of England, played a singular part in the melodrama of wealth, love and sin. She secured a divorce from Bidwell, only to marry Good, a clerk who identified her husband as one of the London bank forgers.

Noyes and Macdonald were released about a year later, and so the criminal phase of the story ended.

But the life phase has only just ended with the death of the Bidwell brothers. They carried about the story of their crime with them and lived upon it. Broken, crushed in mind and body by the heavy hand of the law which played the avenger so unsparingly, they could stand only as specters of warning to all the young men of the land, saying, "Read the story of our lives, and learn that crime at its greatest height is only failure."

AUSTIN BIDWELL.

FORGERY IN A REAL ESTATE DEAL.

Eugene B. Stock, Erstwhile President of the National Commercial Bureau of Los Angeles, Arrested.

LOS ANGELES, March 27.—Eugene B. Stock, erstwhile President of the National Real Estate and Commercial Bureau of this city, was arrested to-day upon a charge of forgery. This action was the outgrowth of a civil suit lately tried by Judge Shaw, in which Elizabeth B. Nave and Alexander H. Nave, her husband, secured the setting aside of certain deeds executed in the exchange of 100 acres of wild land in Missouri for a ten-acre ranch at Monrovia in this county. Stock was the principal defendant, the others being Helen Holter Stock, his wife, J. McCarthy and Hattie E. Thomson. During the trial such evidence of forgery was elicited as caused an investigation by District Attorney Rivers with the result that he issued a complaint charging Stock with the commission of the crime. This was sworn to by A. H. Nave and a warrant for Stock's arrest was issued by Justice James.

The complaining witnesses allege that the property to be traded was not of the value represented and that one of the deeds in the deal was forged. The affair is intricately complicated and there is reason to believe that the defendant may explain the occurrence.

EXPERT AMES SAYS MURDOCK DIDN'T SIGN

WILLOWS, April 7.—When the Murdock case was called this morning Daniel T. Ames, the celebrated expert on handwriting, took the witness stand and gave to the jury his theory of why William Murdock did not sign the $100,000 note. This tedious evidence consumed all the day, and the defendant's attorneys had just finished with Ames when court adjourned at 5 o'clock. Hiram L. Johnson will cross-examine Ames in the morning, after which Experts Kirkech and Eisenschimel will have their innings. The plaintiff will not put on any expert testimony.

EXPERTS IN THE MURDOCK CASE

Adepts in Handwriting to Bewilder Jurors in Willows.

Detectives Have Been for Months Noting the Opinions of The Citizens.

[Special Dispatch to "The Examiner."]

WILLOWS, April 5.—Each talesman of the one hundred in attendance at the proceedings of the great Murdock case is to-night scratching his head in an endeavor to recollect what sort of an opinion he has ever expressed as to the merits of the case, for the proceedings of to-day show conclusively that for months the county has been full of detectives, spotters and make-believe hired men.

Opinions, with the accompanying names, dates and places were thrown up to the surprised talesmen to-day with annoying accuracy, and the spectators enjoyed the discomfiture of these good citizens much more than did the objects of it.

General Barnes arrived this afternoon and was in attendance at the afternoon session and entered into the proceedings with a keen interest. The attorneys on each side seem to be carrying chips on their shoulders, and the citizens are being treated to some fine samples of high-grade sarcasm.

The outline of the plan of battle on both sides can easily be deduced from the line of juror questioning. The plaintiff will contend that the $100,000 note was given for moneys advanced to William Murdock by Samuel Murdock, cousin of William and father of Gawn Murdock, who is the husband of plaintiff, and that the note was made payable twenty years from date so as to fall due about the time Mrs. Murdock's sons became of age. One of these sons is cashier of the Bank of Orland, this county, and the other is employed in a hardware store there. The defendants have plainly shown their cards, and their contention is forgery, pure and simple.

That the jury will be covered up and buried in expert testimony is a foregone conclusion. Dan Ames, Carl Eisenschimel and T. Kytka, the noted experts, are here with their apparatus and exhibits and will all appear as witnesses for the defense. The latter is building a laboratory out near the courthouse and the same paraphernalia used in the Fair case will be a factor. Photographs eleven feet high will be introduced, and loops, pothooks and penmanship peculiarities will be exhaustively dwelt upon.

The examinations to-day were conducted by Attorney Frank Freeman for the plaintiff and F. C. Lusk for the defendant. Grove Johnson argued the points of challenge and was in a sarcastic humor. General Barnes addressed the court but once. The questions of "Did you not on such and such a day say to Mr. So-and-so that you believed this note to be a forgery?" were decidedly annoying, but were relished by the spectators. But five jurors have been passed, and when the peremptory challenges are used some of the passed twelve will no doubt be trotted down and out.

A witness will be put on the stand to-morrow in an endeavor to discover certain details as to an alleged expressed opinion denied to-day by Hugh Nelson, a well-known Willows citizen, and local people are looking forward to the appearance of the witness.

In separate sheet, in colors, published because of universal demand, Markham's famous poem, "The Man With the Hoe," free with next Sunday's "Examiner."

HARD WORK TO GET JURORS AT WILLOWS.

A Handwriting Expert Arrives With a Carload of Apparatus to Work in the Murdock Case.

WILLOWS, April [illegible].—W[illegible] standing [illegible] where the ownership of [illegible] glittering [illegible] At the depot they saw almost a carload of photographic app[illegible] belonging to T. Kytka, the handwriting expert [illegible] will figure [illegible] in the Murdock case. The [illegible] to all this saw [illegible] who arrived on to-day a [illegible] had heard of in the city dailies.

The work of [illegible] slowly. The tendency with [illegible] of the talesmen [illegible] that [illegible] expressed themselves that they did not believe Murdock would [illegible] It has [illegible] plaintiffs have had [illegible] about the county interviewing [illegible] The plaintiff's counsel challenged one of the old settlers in the [illegible] Nelson. When asked if he had on the day before expressed an [illegible] was a forgery he said he had not. He was promptly challenged [illegible] made to show that he had [illegible] Judge Pirkey passed the matter until to-morrow morning, when proof will be offered [illegible] franchise the old settler.

Five jurors were [illegible]

ATTEMPT TO BE MADE TO IMPEACH A JUROR

WILLOWS, April 6.—The work of selecting a jury in the Murdock note case involving May Helen Murdock's claim for $100,000 went on to-day and but little progress was made. The examination of talesmen was searching, both sides exercising great care. Four were passed, but none accepted. No peremptory challenges have been used by either side. At the close of the session Attorney Freeman for the plaintiff announced that he would produce witnesses at the opening of court to impeach Juror Nelson, who declared while being examined that he had never discussed the case.

Mrs. Theodore Kytka arrived from San Francisco today. She is the wife of one of the experts in the Murdock case.

Peter McGlade's Trial.

The trial of Peter McGlade, charged with having forged warrants upon the city treasury while employed in the office of the Superintendent of Streets, was postponed yesterday morning for one week. The continuance was asked by Assistant District Attorney Black on the ground that one of the witnesses for the prosecution, Handwriting Expert Theodore Kytka, was in Willows as a witness in the famous Murdock note case.

RENEWS HER FIGHT FOR FAIR'S MILLIONS

MRS. CRAVEN WANTS A BIG ALLOWANCE FROM HIS ESTATE.

Alleges She Is the Widow of the Dead Capitalist and Is Entitled to $5000 a Month.

Mrs. Nettie R. Craven-Fair filed a certain petition in the Superior Court yesterday for a family allowance from the estate of the late James G. Fair. The petitioner, as in the application filed some months ago, set forth that she is the surviving widow of the dead capitalist.

She states that no allowance whatever has been made to her as such surviving widow from the estate, which is valued at $12,[illegible], the income from which is $[illegible] a year. She represents that an allowance from the estate of $5000 a month should be made for her maintenance, and asks that the order for the allowance be made to take effect from the 28th day of December, 1894, the date of Senator Fair's death.

It is said that the filing of the petition heralds the opening of the battle by Mrs. Craven-Fair to establish her relation to the dead capitalist. W. W. Foote and Denson, Oatman & Drinkhouse represent the petitioner and will prosecute the action when it is called for hearing before Judge Troutt on May 1. In addition to the application for an allowance there is another requesting intervention in the proceedings looking to the probate of the will of the 21st. This will be attacked by Mrs. Craven.

Experts Galore.

Three of the most celebrated experts in the country on handwriting are now in Willows and will be witnesses in the Murdock case.

Daniel T. Ames of New York is known all over the world and he has figured prominently in many celebrated cases. Carl Eisenschimel is another gentleman who has been called upon to testify in many remarkable cases. He lives in San Francisco.

T. Kytka who will be remembered as an important expert witness in the "Fair Will Case" and in the Botkin case is also here. Mr. Kytka brought with him tons of photographs and apparatus. He is building a laboratory out of the Gere place and the exhibits he will show in Court will be something interesting. Photographs eleven feet high will be shown to the jury and we will hear lots of things about handwriting from these three eminent gentlemen.

LEGAL CONTEST FOR A FORTUNE

Famous Murdock Case Comes to a Trial.

Special Dispatch to The Call.

WILLOWS, April 4.—The celebrated Murdock case came up for trial this afternoon and the work of empaneling the jury begun. Only three talesmen were examined, but no jurors were sworn. At least a week will be consumed in getting a jury. The courtroom was crowded, many women being present.

William Murdock, a wealthy rancher of Glenn County, residing near Willows, died about the 8th day of January, 1894. He was unmarried, and left an estate valued at upward of $300,000. After the probate of his estate was commenced a claim was presented by Mary Helen Murdock, wife of one of the large ranch owners in that section, for $100,000 and a large amount of interest. The claim was based on a promissory note for $100,000, dated September 5, 1877, payable twenty years after date and bearing interest at 1 per cent a month, and purporting to have been signed by William Murdock. The note was as follows:

$100,000 WILLOWS [?], Sept. 5, 1877.
Twenty years after date I promise to pay to the order of Mary Helen Murdock the sum of one hundred thousand dollars ($100,000), with interest at the rate of 1 per cent per month until paid, principal and interest payable in United States gold coin. WILLIAM MURDOCK.

The attorneys representing the estate were loud in their denunciation of the note, and attempts were made to show by affidavits published in the newspapers that William Murdock never signed the note nor had any occasion to sign a note for that amount. The executors, strangely enough, while protesting that the note was not genuine, never acted on the claim, alleging in the papers filed that they did not do so because they did not know whether it was genuine or not. They have never up to this time either rejected or allowed the claim. It was currently reported at that time that one of the executors had remarked that the note was genuine and "had Bill Murdock lived a week longer it would have been settled."

When the executors failed to act on the claim suit was begun by the claimant to establish the validity of the note. It was found that the action was prematurely brought, so it was dismissed. Immediately after the note became due the present suit was commenced in accordance with the probate law, which provided that suits upon claims not due when presented must be commenced within two months after the claim becomes due. The note fell due on September 5, 1897.

Up to this time no word had come from the claimant regarding the history of the note, she biding her time apparently until she had her day in court. But during the course of the litigation the executors took Mrs. Murdock's deposition and the real consideration of the note was made public for the first time.

It appeared from the deposition that Sam Murdock was the father of Gawn Murdock, husband of the plaintiff. They had two small children. Sam was a cousin of William Murdock, the deceased. Away back in 1851 Sam was engaged in the sheep business with his son, Gawn, and they had thousands of sheep running on Government land. From these sheep and their wool, which brought high prices in those days, Gawn and his father cleared large profits annually. William Murdock also at that time was in the sheep business, and besides was buying and taking up Government land. Samuel had absolute confidence in William's integrity, often remarking that "Bill was better than any bank." Year by year he loaned his surplus savings, together with some thousands of dollars he received from the estate of his father, John Murdock, over to William Murdock for safe keeping. This course was strongly opposed by his son Gawn, and was the cause of frequent quarrels between father and son. Between Samuel and his daughter-in-law, the claimant, the best feeling always prevailed, and Samuel was especially fond of his two grandchildren.

This situation culminated in 1876 with a dissolution of partnership between Gawn and his father, Gawn paying the father a large sum of money, which was turned over to William. Shortly after this William induced Samuel to leave his son's house and to demand more money under threats of a lawsuit, William claiming that Gawn had not paid Samuel enough in the settlement. To avoid trouble Gawn paid his father $20,000 more. Samuel then came back to the house, and on the day the note was made William Murdock came to the ranch and he and Samuel had a settlement. A balance of the amount due Samuel from William was struck and the note in question was made, payable to his daughter-in-law, for the benefit of the two grandsons. He had it made payable twenty years after date, so that it would fall due about the time the boys became of age. Samuel did not want his son Gawn to handle any of his money. The note was carefully preserved and now is exciting most intense interest throughout the whole northern part of the State.

The executors claim that several months before his death William Murdock heard of the note and instituted an inquiry as to its holder. It is claimed that those around him avoided letting Mrs. Murdock know of his serious illness, evidently being fearful that she would call and see him. She was not even notified of his funeral.

The defense urged against this note is that it is a forgery.

The plaintiff is represented by Cannon & Freeman, attorneys of this city, and Charles L. Donohoe of Willows, and the defense by F. C. Lusk of Chico, Richard Bayne, E. S. Pillsbury and W. H. L. Barnes of this city, and others.

Validity of a Big Note on Trial in Glenn County.

ALLEGED CLAIM ON THE MURDOCK ESTATE.

AMOUNT INVOLVED OVER THREE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS.

Niece of a Dead Pioneer Says the Document Was Given Her Over Twenty Years Ago to Settle a Loan.

WILLOWS, April 4.—A case involving the validity of a note, the principal and interest of which amounts to $300,000, was commenced in Glenn county's Superior Court this afternoon. The case is that of Mary Helen Murdock against the executors of the estate of William Murdock, deceased, and the proceedings will be of great interest to the people of Northern California, the story of the action being known to nearly every one and the facts being unusual.

William Murdock was an old settler in this section, and died in 1894. After the probate of his estate was commenced a claim was presented against his estate by Mary Helen Murdock, wife of Gawn Murdock of Orland, for the amount of the note. Mrs. Murdock claims that the note was given in consideration of a debt due from William Murdock to Samuel Murdock, her husband's father. It was further understood that the money was to be for the benefit of her children, who are the grandchildren of Samuel Murdock. Upon the refusal of the executors to act on the claim suit was commenced.

The defendants, Adam Compton, W. P. Harrington and B. H. Burton, the executors, claim the note is a forgery, and the case will be bitterly fought. Grove L. Johnson, W. P. Thompson, Frank Freeman, C. L. Donohoe and W. M. Cannon are the attorneys for the plaintiff, and General W. H. L. Barnes, Richard Bayne, F. C. Lusk and Ben F. Geis appear for the executors. Famous handwriting experts, including Dan T. Ames of New York, are here, and over eighty witnesses have been subpoenaed.

The securing of a jury commenced to-day. Judge Pirkey is presiding. The parties to the suit are very well known in this section and interest in the case is intense.

The estate is appraised at over $300,000. The will made an equitable distribution to one sister and several nephews and nieces. Many persons have lost confidence in the holders of the note since it came to light. Murdock was known to be a very wealthy man many years before his death. Nobody ever knew of his owing a dollar. He was exceedingly close, had no vicious habits and stuck close to his home, attending to his work. He had a large amount of money in the bank for several years. He visited little or none with the niece who holds the note. People here generally do not believe the note is genuine, but little is said. During the whole afternoon only three jurors were passed. It is expected that it will take two weeks to secure a jury, people being much disinclined to serve.

MURDOCK NOTE COMES TO TRIAL

Litigation That Involves Over a Third of a Million Dollars.

An Imposing Array of Attorneys Lined Up for the Great Battle.

TO BE DECIDED BY A WILLOWS JURY

Famous Experts in Handwriting Summoned as Witnesses---Charge of Forgery Is Made.

WILLOWS, April 4.—Willows put on a lively appearance to-day, the influx of over 200 persons in attendance on the celebrated Murdock $100,000 note case, the proceedings of which commenced this afternoon, giving the town an appearance of real life. This case bids fair to become famous in the annals of California's courts, and that the battle will be fought with the greatest stubbornness on both sides the preliminaries prove. Eminent attorneys have been engaged, Grove L. Johnson, W. P. Thompson, Frank Freeman, W. M. Cannon, C. L. Donohoe appearing for the plaintiff, while General W. H. L. Barnes, F. C. Lusk, Richard Bayne and B. F. Geis are representing the defendants.

The case rests on the validity of a certain promissory note dated September 5, 1877, for $100,000, with interest at 1 per cent per month, made payable to Mary Helen Murdock twenty years from date and signed William Murdock—a wealthy farmer and one of the early settlers here. He died in 1894 leaving a large estate.

Suit for the amount due at maturity, about $340,000, was commenced by Mrs. Murdock as soon as the note became due, the executors refusing to act on her claim. Last September the attorneys for the estate required Mrs. Murdock to appear and explain how she got the note and the facts as to the consideration. She stated in her deposition that the note was given for money loaned to Mr. Murdock. The executors of the estate claim that the note is a forgery.

Mary Helen Murdock is the wife of Gawn Murdock of Orland, this county, both of whom are well known in this section. The executors of the William Murdock estate are Adam Compton, his nephew; W. P. Harrington, the Colusa banker, and B. H. Burton, cashier of the Bank of Willows.

Daniel T. Ames, Carl Eisenschimmel and T. Kytka, the famous handwriting experts, are now at Willows. All of the counsel are here but General Barnes, who is expected to-morrow.

The work of securing a jury was commenced this afternoon, but the citizens seem shy of serving, judging from the excuses made.

The plaintiff's attorneys waived a jury, but the defense demanded one.

Oral Pirkey, Superior Judge of this county, is presiding. The case promises to be sensational.

EXPERTS IN THE MURDOCK CASE

Adepts in Handwriting to Bewilder Jurors in Willows.

Detectives Have Been for Months Noting the Opinions of The Citizens.

[Special Dispatch to "The Examiner."]

WILLOWS, April 5.—Each talesman of the one hundred in attendance at the proceedings of the great Murdock case is to-night scratching his head in an endeavor to recollect what sort of an opinion he has ever expressed as to the merits of the case, for the proceedings of to-day show conclusively that for months the county has been full of detectives, spotters and make-believe hired men.

Opinions, with the accompanying names, dates and places were thrown up to the surprised talesmen to-day with annoying accuracy, and the spectators enjoyed the discomfiture of these good citizens much more than did the objects of it.

General Barnes arrived this afternoon and was in attendance at the afternoon session and entered into the proceedings with a keen interest. The attorneys on each side seem to be carrying chips on their shoulders, and the citizens are being treated to some fine samples of high-grade sarcasm.

The outline of the plan of battle on both sides can easily be deduced from the line of juror questioning. The plaintiff will contend that the $100,000 note was given for moneys advanced to William Murdock by Samuel Murdock, cousin of William and father of Gawn Murdock, who is the husband of plaintiff, and that the note was made payable twenty years from date so as to fall due about the time Mrs. Murdock's sons became of age. One of these sons is cashier of the Bank of Orland, this county, and the other is employed in a hardware store there. The defendants have plainly shown their cards, and their contention is forgery, pure and simple.

That the jury will be covered up and buried in expert testimony is a foregone conclusion. Dan Ames, Carl Eisenschimel and T. Kytka, the noted experts, are here with their apparatus and exhibits and will all appear as witnesses for the defense. The latter is building a laboratory out near the courthouse, and the same paraphernalia used in the Fair case will be a factor. Photographs eleven feet high will be introduced, and loops, potbooks and penmanship peculiarities will be exhaustively dwelt upon.

The examinations to-day were conducted by Attorney Frank Freeman for the plaintiff and F. C. Lusk for the defendant. Grove Johnson argued the points of challenge and was in a sarcastic humor. General Barnes addressed the court but once. The questions of "Did you not on such and such a day say to Mr. So-and-so that you believed this note to be a forgery?" were decidedly annoying, but were relished by the spectators. But five jurors have been passed, and when the peremptory challenges are used some of the passed twelve will no doubt be knocked down and out.

A witness will be put on the stand to-morrow in an endeavor to disprove certain denials as to an alleged expressed opinion denied to-day by Hugh Nelson, a well-known Willows citizen, and local people are looking forward to the appearance of the witness.

HARD WORK TO GET JURORS AT WILLOWS.

A Handwriting Expert Arrives With a Carload of Apparatus to Work in the Murdock Case.

WILLOWS, April 5.—Willows people are standing open-mouthed and aghast at a scene where the ownership of $340,000 in glittering $20 pieces is in question. At the depot they saw almost a carload of photographic apparatus belonging to T. Kytka, the handwriting expert of Fair will fame, unloaded for use in the Murdock case. The country is puzzled. In addition to all this, saw W. H. L. Barnes, who arrived on to-day's train, and whom they had heard of in the city dailies.

The work of securing a jury proceeds slowly. The tendency with most of the talesmen is to say that they had expressed themselves that they did not believe Murdock would have given such a note. It has already developed that the plaintiffs have had emissaries about the county interviewing the panel of jurors. The plaintiffs' counsel challenged one of the old settlers in the person of Hugh Neilson. When asked if he had on the day before expressed an opinion that the note was a forgery he said he had not. He was promptly challenged and an offer made to show that he had so stated. Judge Pirkey passed the matter until to-morrow morning, when proof will be offered to disfranchise the old settler.

Five jurors were obtained to-day.

ATTEMPT TO BE MADE TO IMPEACH A JUROR

WILLOWS, April 6.—The work of selecting a jury in the Murdock note case involving May Helen Murdock's claim for $100,000 went on to-day and but little progress was made. The examination of talesmen was searching, both sides exercising great care. Four were passed, but none accepted. No peremptory challenges have been used by either side. At the close of the session Attorney Freeman for the plaintiff announced that he would produce witnesses at the opening of court to impeach Juror Neilson, who declared while being examined that he had never discussed the case.

ELEVEN JURORS SECURED.

Great Interest Manifested in the Murdock Case.

WILLOWS, April 6.—Eleven jurors have been secured to pass upon the validity of the note against the estate of William Murdock. The jury will probably be completed to-morrow. The case excites more interest than any other ever tried in this section. The taking of testimony will probably begin to-morrow afternoon.

STILL HAGGLING OVER THE JURY

Eleven Talesmen Have Been Selected in the Murdock Note Case.

The Defendant Makes Her First Public Appearance, Smartly Gowned.

A SENSATION THAT PETERED OUT

A Floral Tribute by General Barnes--- Challenges Almost Exhausted on Both Sides.

WILLOWS, April 7.—Three peremptory challenges by the plaintiff and two by the defense, eleven jurors passed and one on the grill, tells the story of the Murdock case proceedings up to this afternoon's adjournment. A stir was caused in court this morning when questions were asked a talesman as to a visit made to his house the evening before by Ben F. Geis, an attorney for the defense. This talesman, F. Jordan, a well-known citizen of Willows, and testified that he did not say in the presence of his daughter and another lady that he believed the original note in question was for one hundred dollars and that three ciphers had been added by Mrs. Murdock. The juror testified this morning that the attorney had not addressed him the evening before while at his house, and the only words of his to the attorney were, "I suppose they are going to send me to San Quentin."

The expected sensation did not materialize, for the attorney stated to the court under oath that his visit was made openly, and was for the purpose of ascertaining from the daughter certain facts which might necessitate calling her as a witness. The court fully exonerated the attorney.

It seemed a difficult matter to get the twelfth juror this afternoon. Nearly every talesman had either expressed himself about the case or held an opinion which disqualified him. Judge Pirkey announced that he would have an unbiased jury if it took all summer.

The plaintiff, Mrs. Mary Helen Murdock, made her first appearance in court this afternoon. She was the cynosure of all eyes, but did not seem to be conscious of it. Mrs. Murdock is quite an attractive-looking woman, and she was smartly gowned. Many of the spectators had never seen her, and the general remark was that she was a much younger-looking woman than the general idea led people to expect. She seemed much interested in the proceedings, and the arguments of the attorneys received her full attention.

As if to prove to the court, jury and spectators that he did not believe in the peppered bouquets spoken of in "The Examiner," General Barnes, who arrived in court late, before taking his seat presented Grove L. Johnson with a rosebud to-day, and made his most polite bow with the proffered blossom.

It is generally believed that the jury will be sworn to-morrow morning. Court will then adjourn until Monday afternoon. To-day's "Examiners" arrived shortly before the opening of the afternoon session, and the first published photograph of the celebrated note came in for a great share of attention. "Examiners" were soon at a premium, as there has been a general desire to see what this famous note looked like.

Plaintiff has but one more peremptory challenge. Two can yet be exercised by defendants. The jurors who have been passed are F. X. de Jarlais, Silvester Mapes, C. H. Seborn, Isaac Miller, C. A. F. Vestnet, I. M. Neideffer, W. L. Grinstead, G. E. Wright, A. F. Harder, J. G. Carmichael and J. L. Beuder.

FIND TWELVE MEN TO THEIR LIKING

The Jury in the Murdock Note Case Is Completed.

Eight Farmers, Three Blacksmiths and One Laborer Compose the Panel.

[Special Dispatch to "The Examiner."]

WILLOWS, April 8.—Twelve citizens of Glenn county stood in the jury-box of the Superior Court this morning with their right hands uplifted and swore to do their duty in rendering a verdict in the matter of the great Murdock note case.

The jury was accepted by both plaintiff and defendants before the noon hour. Ten of the eleven names of the talesmen published in "The Examiner" to-day are members of the sworn jury. The names of the twelve men who will say whether or not the signature in this note is a forgery are:

F. X. DE JARLAIS,	W. L. GRINSTEAD,
SILVESTER MAPES,	G. E. WRIGHT,
C. M. SEBORN,	A. F. HARDER,
ISAAC MILLER,	J. G. CARMICHAEL,
C. A. F. VESTNER,	ALBERT EMERALD,
I. M. NEIDEFFER,	T. B. DRAKE.

Eight of these men are farmers, three are blacksmiths, and one is a laborer. None of them are men of wealth.

To-day's proceedings were a repetition of the questioning of the four preceding days, but a real sample of forceful oratory by General Barnes, and the breathless moment when the jury was suddenly accepted, furnished the crowd of spectators plenty of interest.

General Barnes argued for thirty-five minutes as to the qualifications of a certain talesman, declaring in the course of his talk that the genuineness of the signature to the note was the one issue involved, and making a dramatic reference to the trembling hand of the forger as it traces through the sinuosities of a signature.

Grove L. Johnson replied and, styling himself "only a country lawyer," said that a bad example had been set by the "leader of the San Francisco bar" in discussing the merits of the case at this time.

Johnson's challenge of the talesman was sustained.

The acceptance of the jury came unexpectedly, and when Attorney Freeman for the plaintiff said, "We accept the jury," the announcement created a stir.

Attorney Lusk said that the jury was satisfactory to the defense, and the twelve men were sworn in.

One peremptory challenge was left each side when the acceptance came.

Judge Pirkey announced an adjournment until 2 o'clock Monday afternoon, when the great battle for nearly a half million dollars will commence.

The plan of battle seems to have been clearly outlined in the examination of talesmen during the week. The experts, Ames, Kytka and Eisenschimel, pronounce the signature to the note to be a bungling forgery, while the plaintiff's attorneys say with an easy confidence that they will prove that the note is a good one, and that the circumstances of the transaction, termed queer by some, will be fully and satisfactorily explained.

It is predicted that the trial of the case will develop some startling sensations.

The interest in the celebrated case increases daily and the courtroom will be crowded when the fight begins on Monday.

Kytka's Kurious Killer.

Artists are full of fads, and Theodore Kytka the celebrated authority on chirography and photographic expert, is no exception.

Mr. Kytka's fad is out of the ordinary. He is a "crank" on firearms—particularly pistols. Mr. Kytka has a collection of pistols of every known make and ... He is an authority on pistols, is Kytka. Not only that, but Mr. Kytka is a wonderful pistol shot and has broken records with some of his pet shooting irons.

But the one pet pistol of Mr. Kytka is something worth looking at, and a Journal reporter had the pleasure of seeing this weapon and of being told about it. This gun is a curiosity. It was made in Austria (and by hand) and the explosive agent is dynamite. It is a curious looking weapon, but is the very acme of perfection in such an arm. Cartridges are placed in a steel chamber and one ball can be fired or six can be shot at one time in the space of an instant. There is no report. Only a puff like that made by a hod-carrier when he lights his clay pipe.

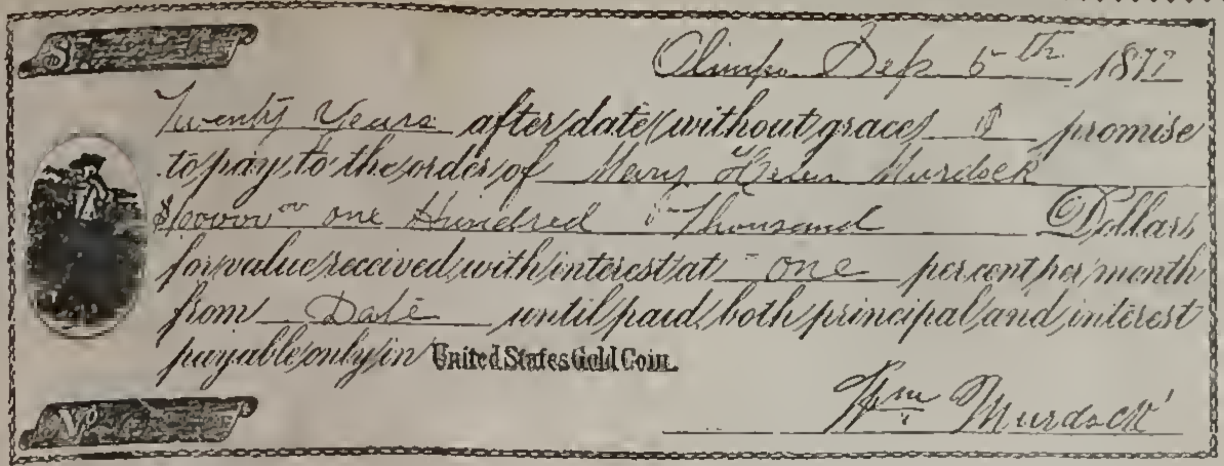
This gun is therefore like the "Vesuvius" which coughed up earthquakes at Santiago; and in comparison with any ordinary pistol, Kytka's Austrian terror is as a river boat carrying 1776 cannon compared to this same earthquaking "Vesuvius."

When these six bullets reach their mark they make a clean wound and there's no probing—they go through. Mr. Kytka and chief of police Lees of San Francisco are warm friends and they have made some interesting experiments with the weapon, such as sending the six balls through a solid piece of ... hardwood from a considerable distance, etc.

Mr. Kytka has a shooting gallery fitted up at his home and a favorite pastime is to take a company down stairs and shoot quarter dollars and dimes for the ladies, as souvenirs.

It struck the reporter that the dynamite pistol would be the thing for cats. A cat, you know, has nine lives. One shot calls everything off with six of the animals lives and we are prone to believe that when a hoodlum cat feels this procession of bullets plowing through his anatomy and finds six of his existences gone in such a mysterious manner that it's dollars to doughnuts the other three would be scared out of him on the spot.

PEOPLE FLOCK TO WILLOWS, AS TO A COUNTY FAIR, TO ATTEND TRIAL OF THE FAMOUS MURDOCK NOTE CASE



Olimpo Sept 5th 1877

Twenty Years after date (without grace) I promise to pay to the order of Mary Helen Murdock $100,000 one Hundred Thousand Dollars for value received, with interest at one percent per month from Date until paid, both principal and interest payable only in United States Gold Coin.

No. 93 Wm Murdock

NOTE ON WHICH THE CELEBRATED GLENN COUNTY CIVIL SUIT IS BASED.

The paper is claimed by defendants to be a forgery. Should the Court hold it to be valid, the judgment for plaintiff will be in the neighborhood of $500,000, because of the compounding of interest.

WILLOWS, April 6.—The end of the third day's proceedings in the Murdock note case finds eleven jurors passed, with an argument on as to the plaintiff's challenge of the twelfth. It is very probable that a jury will be sworn in to-morrow to pass upon the validity of the celebrated note.

Citizen Nelson, who denied making certain statements about the note, was excused this morning when a witness swore that such statements were positively made to him. The work of keen-eared detectives was much in evidence again to-day, and all of this serves to make the usually dry proceeding of selecting a jury quite breezy and interesting. Then, too, General Barnes was in a merry mood. He and Grove L. Johnson handed many peppered bouquets to one another.

The different opinions garnered by the numerous inquisitions are various and would fill a large volume. The attorneys have delivered long dissertations on the subject of what constitutes an unqualified opinion, and the harassed jurors are beginning to regret that they were ever able to hold such a boomerang-like article. The subject of expert testimony is also coming in for a great deal of attention in juror questioning.

There was much curiosity manifested in the courtroom to-day when the attorneys, in company with the three famous handwriting experts, repaired to the Judge's chambers, carrying with them cases of apparatus and a bundle of checks and books, the latter presumably containing specimens of the chirography of the man whose name is signed to the note in question.

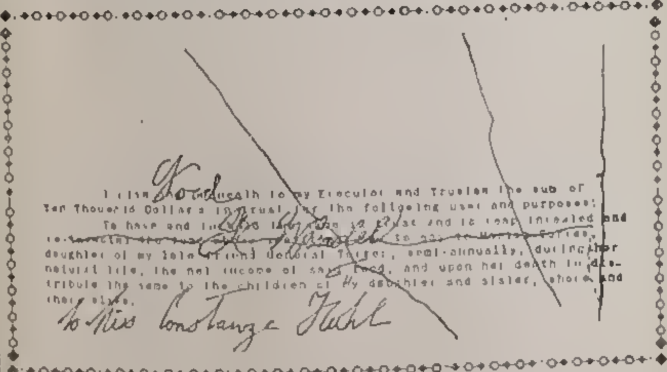
The nature of this celebrated note, it being payable twenty years after date, and bearing interest at 1 per cent per month, enters largely into the questioning of talesmen, and in a way that shows that the plaintiff's attorneys do not want to be obliged to remove any entertained prejudice as to the giving of such a document. When a juror testifies that he has remarked that he thought the transaction singular, or queer, he is in for a grilling. All of the penmanship experts present are witnesses for the executors, the holder of the note, as far as can be learned, relying on other than expert testimony to prove her case. As the case progresses, the confidence of the defense in their ability to prove the paper a forgery becomes more manifest. That witnesses will be hauled over the coals is a surety, and developments are awaited with the keenest interest.

The town is crowded, hotels are full and the influx continues. Mrs. Mary Helen Murdock, the plaintiff, is not present. It is understood that she will arrive from her home to-morrow. Her husband and two sons have been present each day.

THE EXAMINER, SAN FR.

HER NAME CUT FROM THE WILL, BUT STILL SHE DEMANDS HER LEGACY

Apr. 16-



I give and bequeath to my Executor and Trustee the sum of Ten Thousand Dollars in trust, for the following uses and purposes: To have and to hold the same in trust and to keep invested and to pay the net income to Marian Torres, daughter of my late friend General Torres, semi-annually, during her natural life, the net income of said fund, and upon her death to distribute the same to the children of my daughter and sister, share and share alike.

Void H. Windel

to Miss Constanze Habl

THE ODD CHANGE IN HENRI WINDEL'S WILL.

MISS MARIAN TORRES has made an application to the Superior Court for a legal interpretation of the will of the late Henri Windel. According to the petition of Miss Torres she holds that she is entitled to the interest on $10,000 to be held in trust by the executor of Windel's will, and she complains that there seems to be a disposition on the part of others interested in the estate to deprive her of this revenue.

Windel's will, as filed in court, bears on its face several erasures. The clause pertaining to Miss Torres provided that the sum of $10,000 should be invested for her benefit, the net income to be paid to her semi-annually and at her death the principal to be distributed share and share alike to the children of the testator's daughter and sister.

This entire clause was subsequently crossed out and across it was written, "Void. H. Windel," and words were added purporting to substitute Constanze Habl as beneficiary.

The writing bears a resemblance to that of Windel, the deceased, and its genuineness has not yet been questioned. Attorneys for Miss Torres take the position that even if Windel did obliterate the clause in this way, yet Miss Torres is entitled to the legacy mentioned in the will. Their contention is that the original intention of the testator was expressed when he executed the will in the presence of competent witnesses who testify that at that time he was of sound and disposing mind; that if he wished to alter the disposition of his estate he ought to have proceeded in the regular and legal way of executing a codicil, with the necessary witnesses, so that the question of his mental condition at the time of the proposed change could be shown, that the law does not countenance capricious changes of this kind in testamentary documents that have been executed with all the formalities required by the code; that as Windel's original will was duly acknowledged it must stand as the accepted expression of his intention, since the alteration bears no such proof of authenticity.

On behalf of the next of kin it will be argued that neither woman named in the clause is entitled to the money, since the name of Miss Torres was erased, and though Miss Habl's name is clearly written at the bottom the words which purport to give the money have been stricken out.

Supplement Willows

The Big Murdock Note.

Willows is just now filled to overflowing with people, having to do in some capacity with the Murdock note case, which is on trial in our Superior Court. One hundred jurors have been subpoened and all appeared but two. Nearly one hundred witnesses are in attendance, including such notables as Daniel T. Ames, the hand-writing expert from New York, who figured so prominently in the Fair Will case. There is besides, handwriting experts Carl Eisenschimel and T. Kytka, not less noted than Daniel T. Ames.

Judge Oval Pirkey seems to exactly fit the place, and acts as if the place fit him. At the opening of the case, Attorney F. C. Lusk asked that the record be made to show that W. H. L. Barnes and Richard Bayne of San Francisco, and Ben F. Geis of Willows, appear with him as Defendant's Counsel. Plaintiff's array of Counsel consists of Grove L. Johnson of Sacramento, W. P. Thompson of Fresno, Frank Freeman and W. W. Cannon of San Francisco and C. L. Donohoe of local fame. The Jury had been demanded by the Attorneys for the executors of the Murdock estate, who are defendants, the other side having waived a Jury.

The big note which causes all this commotion is as follows:

$100,000 Olimpo Sept. 5th, 1877.

Twenty years after date (without grace) I promise to pay to the order of Mary Helen Murdock $100,000 One Hundred Thousand Dollars, for value received, with interest at one per cent per month from date until paid, both principal payable in United States Gold Coin.

No. 93 Wm. Murdock.

The holder of this note asks that the estate of William Murdock, deceased, hand over the sum of $340,000, including interest on same. The matter truly presents a strange incident in human affairs.

Gawn Murdock and his family are among the most respected and best known of all old settlers in the Orland country. Gawn Murdock's name has stood as a synonim of honesty and integrity in all his business relations, for years and years.

On the other hand, we have in the deceased Wm. Murdock, one of the rich old California bachelors, that had not permitted himself to owe anyone a dollar for years past, so far as was known. He was one of the known rich men of upper California and had glittering gold piled away in the banks for which he had no particular use except to pay his debts, if any he owed. He was of the plain and saving sort, without vicious habits or extravagant ideas. He had heard before he died, that it was claimed that such a note was out, but he emphatically denied having ever given it. Whether he did or did not, is a question of fact that will be determined by the best means devised by human invention. Because that it is an unusually large note, is no reason why Mrs. Murdock should not collect it, if it be determined that the money is rightfully due her, just the same as if the sum amounted to only $10.

On the other hand, so vast a fortune as is represented by the Murdock estate, is a very tempting bait to human frailties in these hard times. We shall watch the progress of the trial with a great deal of interest and will try to furnish our readers with as much of the proceedings as our space will permit, giving the striking incidents as they may occur.

THE QUICK AND THE DEAD SLEEP SIDE BY SIDE THROUGH TWO MONTHS OF ARCTIC DARKNESS

Walter Wellman Tells the Story of His Explorations and Discoveries on His Polar Voyage, Which Include Startlingly Strange Experiences.

"WE FOUND THE SURFACE OF THE ICE IN AN ALARMING STATE OF UPHEAVAL"

MR. WELLMAN'S EXPLORATIONS.

Walter Wellman, the American explorer, has returned from his explorations in Franz Josef Land, which he undertook more than a year ago with an idea of perhaps reaching the North Pole and, at best, penetrating further north than any previous explorer had ever succeeded in reaching. He has arrived in England with his party of four Americans and five Norwegians. He tells in his own words the story herewith presented of his trip and the successes with which it met. While he failed to reach the pole, he is still hopeful that it can be done through Franz Josef Land. That he did not proceed farther north was due to an accident which befell him and compelled him to return to civilization for treatment, which he is now undergoing in England.

He established a station, which he called Fort McKinley, in Franz Josef Land which he confidently believes may be successfully used to reach the pole with some future expedition. Not only this, he has discovered a new [illegible] [illegible] the rigors of the climate. The story of his death, and the heroism of his sole companions, are graphically described and intensely interesting:

sole companions, are graphically described and intensely interesting:

Here is how Mr. Wellman describes the expedition:

By Walter Wellman.

Our party consisted of nine members, four of whom were Americans and five Norwegians. The Americans were Evelyn B. Baldwin, Quirof Harlan, physicist and photographer; the medical officer and myself. Our five Norwegian sailors were Bernt Bentzen (who was with Nansen on the Fram), who unfortunately lost his life, Paul Bjoervig, Daniel Johansen and two brothers named Emil and Olaf Ellefsen.

The objects of the expedition were twofold, first to complete the exploration of Franz Josef Land, of which the north and northeast parts were practically unknown, and second, to make, if possible, a high latitude, or even the Pole itself. The first part we were able successfully to accomplish, and the second we should have been able to achieve at least to the extent of advancing nearer to the Pole than any previous explorers, but for an accident to myself.

Our party assembled at Tromso on June 26, 1898, and thence sailed in the sealer Frithjof for Archangel, where our Siberian dogs, eighty-three in number, were embarked. From Archangel we steamed north in the direction of Cape Flora, Franz Josef Land, the headquarters of the Jackson-Harmsworth expedition. On July 23d we stepped ashore, and went to Elmwood, the depot made by Mr. Jackson.

The Union Jack, which had been run up on the flagstaff there when the British party left, was still floating in the breeze, and the lonely Arctic settlement remained in exactly the same condition in which it had been left. We had hoped to find some traces of Andree here, but were disappointed. We effected an entrance into the log house, having Mr. Harmsworth's permission, and took on board our steamer a small collapsible house to serve as our depot.

For the information of subsequent travelers, and also as a measure of precaution, we left some letters on the table of the log house and, after carefully refastening the doors, re-embarked to our ship. Before sailing we ran up an American flag on the pole underneath the British ensign. We steamed due east towards Cape Tegetthoff and reached there July 30th. Landing, we set to work to establish our head depot.

The provisions, sledges, etc., were all sent ashore, and on August 3d the steamer returned to Norway. Our headquarters were erected on a shelving beach, where twenty-five years previously Payer had set foot on Franz Josef Land. His was the only expedition that had ever been there. At the back precipitous basaltic cliffs rose to an elevation of 1,400 feet; in front was the dreary expanse of ice and sea. Our depot consisted in part of the small hut which we brought from Cape Flora, eighteen feet in diameter, circular in form and roofed with canvas, and an adjoining storehouse, built of lumber which we had brought from Archangel.

The Stars and Stripes were run up and the place was named Harmsworth House. My plan now was to use the remainder of the summer establishing an outpost as far north as possible and accumulating there stores and equipment. To this end Mr. Baldwin and a party of Norwegians started on August 5th with sledges, dogs and small boats over the ice, myself and the remainder of the party intending to follow in a few days. This we afterward found ourselves unable to do because of the sudden break up of the ice and the rough seas.

Meantime Mr. Baldwin penetrated as far as Cape Heller on the coast of Wilczek Land. Here he established an outpost and remained to await the arrival of our party. I sent two of the Norwegians back after them to recall them, finding our way blocked. These came up with them about September 28th. Nearly three weeks later they started back, leaving Bernt Bentzen and Paul Bjoervig behind to care for the outpost. After great hardships they reached us on October 30th.

We then settled down for the winter, spending our time hunting and in taking scientific observations. We had a number of exciting experiences with bears and walruses, but luckily escaped unhurt from all. The winter passed quickly and though attended by great discomfort none suffered injury, so when on February 18th the sun returned we were ready to proceed north without delay.

During the latter days of February there is little light. We stumbled along like drunken men in the deep snow and rough ice. On February 27th we came in sight of Baldwin's outpost, which he had named Fort McKinley. It is an odd circumstance that as we approached the mass of snow under which the hut was buried, the thought ran through my mind, "What if one or both of the men should be dead!"

As I advanced towards the tunnel which led down into the hut a man appeared at the mouth, rifle in hand. Instinctively I knew something was wrong. The man was Paul Bjoervig, and as he shook my hand the tears came into his eyes, and he said:

"Poor Bentzen is dead!"

It was true. Taken ill early in December, and steadily growing worse, he had been tenderly nursed by his comrade, Bjoervig. The two men had been close companions in Norway, and right glad were they of this chance to spend the winter together in a far northern hut, only twenty or thirty miles east of a similar hut in which two of their countrymen, Nansen and Johansen, had passed the winter of 1895-96.

Before Bentzen was taken ill the two comrades had talked, perhaps only half seriously, of the possibility of one or the other dying, and they made a mutual promise that in such an event the survivor would keep the body of his dead comrade in the hut till help came, instead of trying to bury it in the rocks, where bears and foxes might get at it.

"Of course you have buried Bentzen," I said to Bjoervig.

"No," he replied, "he lies in there," pointing to the hut. "I kept my promise."

At first I could not believe it possible that the quick and the dead had slept side by side through nearly two months of Arctic darkness. But there, in one end of the gloomy little hut, side by side, lay two sleeping bags. In one were the remains of Dr Nansen's former comrade, carefully covered, and in the other Bjoervig passed his lonely life. It would be difficult to imagine a more dreadful ordeal for test of human courage than this brave Norwegian had endured, and we were surprised to find him not only sane, but cheerful.

He had had no books, no companions but dogs, little to do; and how do you suppose this sailor managed to keep up his spirits? By reciting aloud over and over again the writings of Ibsen and other Norwegian poets, whose works he knew by rote—a remarkable instance, I take it, of the power of literature to afford solace even to a humble man through a terrible experience.

Next day he gathered stones and built a tomb, in which our dead comrade was carefully buried, a few fitting words being spoken as we all stood round. On that day we had 70 degrees of cold. Bentzen was a splendid fellow, and it seemed a queer dispensation of fate that he who had passed unscathed through the three years of the Fram's voyage should at last be buried in the eternal ice, a victim of some unknown disease.

After a delay of ten days, due to severe storms, our party of five, including Bjoervig, pressed northward, each man with a sledge and team of dogs. Notwithstanding storms and rough ice, by March 20th we were at latitude 82, east of Rudolf Land, discovered by Parker in 1874.

Our prospects at this time were most reassuring. We had everything we needed—tent, canvas canoe, plenty of food, men and dogs in good condition. We had passed through the period of darkness and greatest cold and had three months or more of the most favorable season before us. We were all confident of being able to reach at least the 87th parallel of latitude, and perhaps farther, before turning back.

It goes without saying that we suffered as men must always suffer on sledging expeditions in temperatures ranging from 25 to 45 below zero. Sleeping in a tent, with no fires for heating or drying, with blankets and sleeping bags frozen stiff like sheets of metal, requiring two hours of the heat of one's body to thaw them into wet wrappings. But all this is endurable by hardy men, and we were all in fine form and spirits, confident of our ability to push forward an average of nearly a degree per week thereafter.

Then occurred a seemingly trivial accident, which turned our satisfactory advance into a precipitate retreat. While struggling with my sledge and dogs in rough ice at the head of the party my right leg was bruised and sprained by a fall in a snow-hidden crevasse. At first the injury did not appear serious, though it was painful, and without saying anything to my companions I went on that day. Next morning I was lame, but, doubling my sledge with Bjoervig's, continued yet another day. Still I did not realize the seriousness of my hurt, and if something had not occurred to turn us back, we should have passed on so far that I should never have been able to return alive. But, fortunately for me, fate intervened.

The night of March 22d we were encamped upon thick, apparently safe ice, some ten miles from land, in calm weather. There was not the slightest sign of danger, even to our alert practiced eyes.

About midnight we were awakened by the ominous sounds of ice pressure. Before we could get out of the tent the ice opened underneath our sleeping bags, and, stepping out, we found the surface in a most alarming state of upheaval.

The ice was in violent motion, deep, water-filled crevasses yawned and a number of dogs and small sledges had been crushed. In the darkness and storm it was impossible to see in what direction, if any, safety lay, and we did not know at what moment we should find ourselves thrown into the water, there to be overwhelmed by the avalanches of ice.

We stood our ground, however, and managed to save most of our equipment and provisions. In doing so it was necessary to take chances of death by stepping upon pieces of ice already tilted at an angle of thirty degrees or more, their lower edges in the sea. My brave Norwegian comrades knew no such word as fear, and after a half-hour's struggle we reached a place of safety.

Some of our instruments and all our dog food were lost in the upheaval, and while it would have been possible to go on for a time the condition of my leg demanded retreat.

I continued walking, or rather stumbling, for two or three days more. At last, unable, unassisted, to get upon my feet when I chanced to fall in rough ice, and my leg being swollen to nearly twice its natural size from foot to thigh, there was nothing to do but go upon a sledge and be dragged by men and dogs back to headquarters and medical attendance. Forced marches by my devoted comrades, and the consequent shortening of the time during which I was compelled to remain in the field, saved my life.

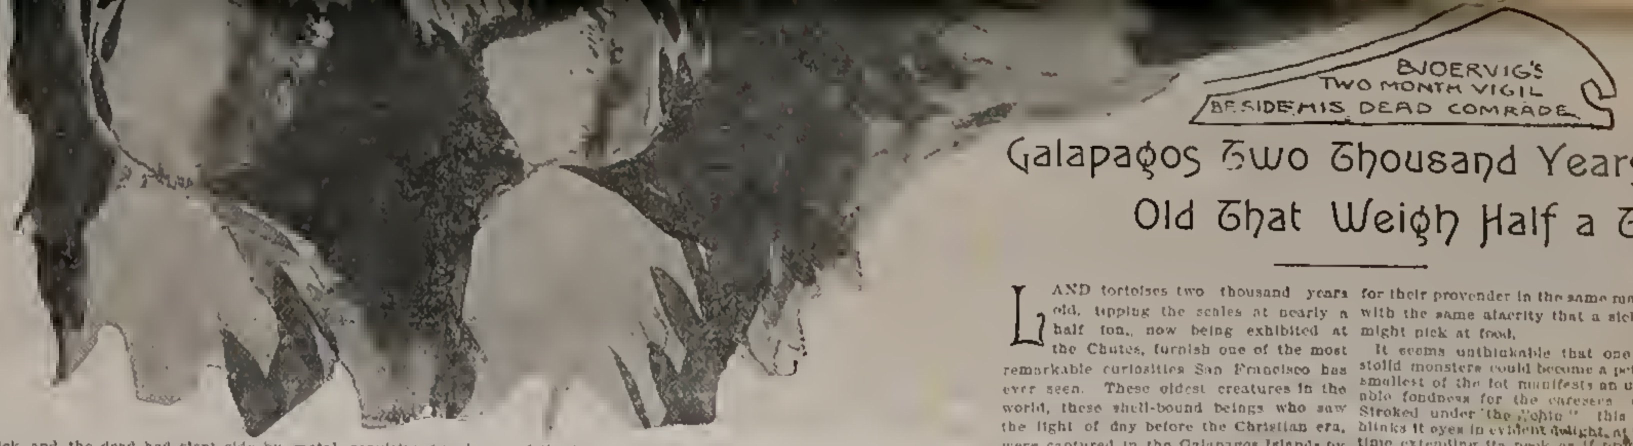
The point at which we turned back was about twenty-five miles northwest of the Freeden Islands, where Dr Nansen landed in 1895, and north of these islands we saw and took the bearings and photographs of three islands and a very large land, none of which had been seen by either Payer or Nansen. We were also able wholly to clear up the mystery of Payer's so-called Dove glacier, which simply does not exist, as Dr. Nansen had in part shown.

When we returned to the Harmsworth House I was under medical care. Mr. Baldwin, however, again took the field. Leaving the headquarters accompanied by four Norwegians, he examined the unknown region to the east of Wilczekland and made valuable discoveries, among them a new land which was totally unknown.

It lay thirteen miles east of Wilczekland—a large ice-covered island nearly as large as Wilczekland, and extending to 64 degrees east longitude. Several smaller islands were also discovered during this journey. After a week spent in the exploration of the land, the party sledged westward into Austria sound, and thence southward to Fort McKinley. Here two boats and provisions which had been left there were taken upon the sledges and hauled back to Cape Tegetthoff, the party arriving there on May 30th, having had an eventful but successful journey of five weeks' duration. The newly discovered land was named Graham Bell land, after the President of the National Geographical Society of America. Still another exploring journey was made by Mr. Harlan, and later a trip by steamer, the result being a fairly complete survey of the unknown and unmapped parts of the archipelago.

The whole party having then assembled at headquarters, we embarked on the sealer Capella on July 27th from Tromso and arrived safely in Norway.

I still believe it possible to reach the North Pole by Franz Josef Land, but whether or not I shall make another effort in that field I am unable to say.



Galapagos Two Thousand Years Old That Weigh Half a Ton.

LAND tortoises two thousand years old, tipping the scales at nearly a half ton, now being exhibited at the Chutes, furnish one of the most remarkable curiosities San Francisco has ever seen. These oldest creatures in the world, these shell-bound beings who saw the light of day before the Christian era, were captured in the Galapagos Islands by Captain Thomas and his crew of the schooner Julia E. Millard.

Huddled together in a repulsive group they present a very uncanny spectacle. The shell, dark colored and blocked off in irregular divisions, is the most striking feature. It is very convex, heavy and completely ossified. They have no occasion for endeavoring to change their coloring similar to their environment, for the shell is almost impenetrable. When you step upon the creature you can almost imagine that your feet are touching stone. The illusion is further carried out by this patriarch of the group by his remaining absolutely impassive to his burden. Only by dint of prodding the exposed portions of his anatomy can this queer thing be transformed into a beast of burden. Turned on his back this tortoise is the image of abject helplessness. One might suppose that this impotent creature would remain in that undignified position twenty centuries more, unless some outside force overcame its own inertia.

After a hurried inspection of the shell, which is such a wonderful part of the tortoise make-up, the attention is immediately drawn to the motive power and head. The tortoise is supposed to have derived its name on account of the curious way its fore legs are bent. When in repose the fore legs seem to protrude forward like mighty horns, blunt and resembling an alligator's skin in appearance. The tortoise is club-footed, the toes are distinct, the whole mechanism being developed for terrestrial life. Its elephant-like feet show great ruggedness and are fully capable of carrying the stupendous weight as century follows century.

Most repellant to the spectator is the large head, which is comparable to the head of a snake to a certain extent. Its lusterless eyes gaze around in half-sullen, half-languid glance at its new habitat. Its nose is very blunt and resembles two holes driven in a block. The mouth is quite a formidable, pretentious-looking affair, but destitute of teeth, having merely horny sheaths with sharp edges, which serve it in mastication. It is amusing to watch the cumbersome creatures devour the watermelon which is placed before them. Distending their jaws to their utmost limit, they lunge for their provender in the same manner and with the same alacrity that a sick chicken might pick at food.

It seems unthinkable that one of these stolid monsters could become a pet, but the smallest of the lot manifests an unmistakable fondness for the caresses of man. Stroked under the "chin" this tortoise blinks it eyes in evident delight, at the same time extending its neck as if proud of this scrawny possession.

While the unsightly appearance of these Galapagos renders them noteworthy, the thing which stamps them is their almost incomprehensible longevity. "Three score years and ten" simmers into insignificance when compared with a score of centuries. The tortoise carries the key which unlocks the secret door of his age on his back. The scientist by scrutinizing and collating the lines on the tortoise shell can determine to a nicety the age of this quasi-immortal being. Charles Darwin, when visiting the Galapagos Islands, saw the buzzards swoop down and capture the newly hatched tortoises, but it was his belief that the full grown only died by accident, such as falling over precipices. The inhabitants of the islands substantiated this theory.

Now, why is it that death's sickle is shattered when it encounters the tortoise? Is there an elixir of youth in the far-off Galapagos Islands? According to some inscrutable plan of Providence the tortoise is built to withstand the ravages of time. A recent writer throws some light on this abstruse subject. He maintains that the tortoise's body is spared the whole of that exhausting process of collapse and expansion which we call breathing, the shell is as rigid and unbending as a rock. Chest expansion is out of the question. Respiration is effected by the tortoise by inhaling air by means of producing a vacuum with its tongue and then swallowing the air like so much water, its capacious lungs receiving it. This little energy saving device adds numerous years to the life of the tortoise.

As mentioned above, this being has no teeth. It can munch its food by means of sharp, horny edges in its mouth, which do not wear out or drop out. They are always in order, and a usage of 500 years does not injure them so much as one bag of sweetmeats does the teeth of a child. So the tortoise can have no adequate idea of a toothless state, which would ultimately mean death. They have great "reserve force." If circumstances are such that it is impossible to obtain food for several months the tortoise calmly fasts until food is found. Sailors who visited the Galapagos in early times soon discovered this. They would capture easily the tortoises and deposit them in the hold of the ship, leaving them there without food or drink for months before slaughtering them.

As the tortoise can swim it is in no danger of drowning. It dies hard. It is extremely tenacious of life, surviving injuries which nothing else could. The heart of a decapitated tortoise continues to throb for many hours after every drop of blood has been drained from its body. The whole body seems to angrily resent the cessation of life's activity.

THE WORK GOES ON.

Ten Jurors Are Passed In The Murdock Note Case.

The Examination Of Talesmen Is Painstaking And Tedious To A Degree.

These jurors have been passed:

F. X. DeJARLAIS ISAAC MILLER
F. J. RYAN JOHN J. HULL
S. MAPES H. DOMONOSKI
C. M. SEHORN C. A. F. VERTNER
J. M. NEIDEFFER W. L. GRINSTEAD

Slowly moves the big case, like a ship starting from the ways. The vessel that bears all the hopes of the plaintiff has been builded with minutest care about the frame work of a dead man's alleged desire. From stem to stern and from turret to keel she is as trim as skillful hands can make her. Ahead lies a perilous voyage, beset with storms and reefs innumerable. The defendant's attorneys await like wreckers to shoal the ship whose honest purpose they deny. To those without the case the hurricane will doubtless afford a fascinating spectacle. To those within, it will probably afford opportunities that are rare and experiences that will become historic. The elements are gathering. The drawing of the jury is like the choosing of the ancient gods to sit upon a fray. In their hands lies the issue. For their fitness they are being weighed in a hair-balance and tested with a blow-pipe.

The Murdock case was called in the Superior Court yesterday morning at ten o'clock. Judge Pirkey stated that until further notice Court would convene at 9 a. m. and at 1:30 p. m.

The unwilling jurors had finished offering excuses and thirty-nine of them had been excused.

Yesterday's proceedings began with the examination of F. J. Ryan of St. John. In response to questions by Mr. Lusk, Ryan stated that he was a client of C. L. Donohoe, but that he had never discussed this case with him. He disclaimed any prejudice or opinion in the matter.

Mr. Lusk challenged Ryan because he was a client of one of plaintiff's attorneys. Mr. Freeman warmly protested the challenge, and it was finally disallowed.

Sylvester Mapes of Germantown had read articles bearing on the case in the Call though he could quote none of them. Mapes had done business with the Bank of Orland in which the plaintiff's son is employed, but the subject of the case had never been broached. Mapes was unchallenged.

H. B. Elliott remembered the death of William Murdock. He had been a friend of the deceased and from his knowledge of the man he did not believe it probable that he would execute such a note as the one in evidence.

The questioning of Elliott was resumed after the noon recess. It was elicited that the juror had a more or less clearly defined opinion which had been expressed. Mr. Lusk thought that this was only such as any juror might hold before hearing the evidence. Mr. Johnson addressed the Court with a plea for dismissal of Elliott, alleging that his bias discredited him. The Court concurred and the juror was excused.

C. M. Sehorn was taken in hand by Mr. Freeman and in answer to questions told all about himself. He disavowed a present interest in the Willows Journal. He had not discussed the case at length and believed himself impartial. He was not challenged.

Hugh Neilson was next examined. He had known the deceased Wm. Murdock, but had had no business relations with him. The matter of the juror's opinion was a little uncertain. He was open to conviction but he did not seem positive that he was at the present time uninfluenced. He said he had never expressed an opinion or a prejudice with regard to the case. The plaintiff's counsel questioned him closely on this point. He re-affirmed his statement. Plaintiff's counsel then moved a continuance of the juror's examination until this morning when witnesses could be heard. The motion was granted.

John Mann was asked many questions. He had more or less knowledge of the matters involved. He stated in reply to a question that he inclined toward an opinion with regard to the note. He was on the stand when Court adjourned.

THURSDAY'S SESSION.

Judge Pirkey took the bench promptly at 9 o'clock. All the talesmen answered to their names.

J. H. Soeth asked to be excused from further attendance because his turkey ranch needed immediate attention. Mr. Johnson facetiously agreed to consent on condition that Soeth send him a turkey. The juror was excused.

The case of juror Neilson was taken up. The plaintiff's side had two witnesses on hand to prove an expressed opinion. Bud Drew was called to the stand. Mr. Drew stated that he and held conversation with juror Neilson in front of Justice West's courtroom on Wednesday of last week. They had talked of the Murdock deposition and Mr. Neilson had said that it "looked like a thin story." He was not cross examined.

J. C. Zumwalt was placed on the stand. He had discussed the case with juror in question over a game of checkers on the famous board in Leddy's shoe shop, some time ago. He quoted Mr. Neilson as saying that he "did not believe Bill Murdock would give such a note." Cross examination was waived.

After he had examined Mr. Neilson, Mr. Lusk addressed the Court at some length. He claimed Neilson's eligibility. The attorney thought the juror had only such an undefined opinion as any intelligent man would hold.

Mr. Johnson went to some pains to illuminate the prejudiced condition of the jurors mind. He demanded unbiased jurors.

The Court sustained plaintiff's challenge and excused Mr. Neilson.

John Mann's name was again called. He was challenged for cause and excused by the Court.

John J. Hull expressed himself as having no opinion and no prejudice. He could mete out justice even to a banker. He had not discussed the case. He was passed by both sides.

Henry Domonski was questioned at length concerning his opinion or lack of opinion in the matter. Just before the noon recess Mr. Johnson challenged on the ground of bias and under the section relating to principal and client. At the afternoon session the Court disallowed the challenge.

Five additional jurors were summoned to the box. They were C. A. F. Vertner, Henry Jameson, J. M. Neidoffer, Chas. Scribner and W. L. Grinstead. R. B. Dunning was excused on account of sickness.

Juror Vertner was lead through the intricacies of expert testimony. He said he would give preference to expert opinion. He thought he could try the case impartially. He was allowed to pass.

J. M. Neidoffer knew little about the case. He was in no wise prejudiced. He was not challenged.

Charles Scribner admitted that a close personal knowledge of Gawn Murdock would influence his opinion wherever the latter was concerned. He was challenged by Mr. Lusk. Mr. Johnson demurred, but withdrew the objection. Scribner was excused.

W. L. Grinstead gave satisfactory answers to the numerous questions asked him and he was passed.

Henry Jameson is being examined at the hour of going to press.

BATTLE BEGUN FOR A FORTUNE

Opening Statement in the Murdock Suit.

PLAINTIFF AVERS THE NOTE IS GENUINE.

TWENTY YEARS' WANDERINGS OF THE PRECIOUS DOCUMENT IN THE CASE.

Defendant Interposes a Technical Objection That May Throw the Action Out of Court.

Special Dispatch to the "Chronicle."

WILLOWS, April 10.—The courtroom was crowded this morning, when Attorney W. M. Cannon arose to make his opening statement for the plaintiff in the now celebrated Murdock note case, in which Mrs. Gawn Murdock seeks to recover from the estate of William Murdock on an alleged note for $100,000 and interest at 1 per cent per month from the date of its issuance, twenty-two years ago. Attorney Cannon began by referring to the date of William Murdock's settlement on the farm, where he died, in 1860. He engaged in stock-raising and got hold of all the Government land he could. His cousin, Samuel, was also a stock-raiser on Stony creek, in partnership with his son, Gawn, the husband of the plaintiff. Samuel, from year to year, was loaning William large sums of money. Gawn, the son, objected, and finally had a falling out with his father, and a dissolution of partnership followed. Gawn paid his father a large sum of money, which also went to William. The father and son were never good friends thereafter.

In the fall of 1877 Samuel and William agreed to meet at the home of Gawn and settle their financial affairs. In the presence of Mrs. Gawn Murdock, of whom Samuel was always very fond though he disliked her husband, and wanted it understood that none of his money should ever go to him. It was found that $100,000 was due to Samuel. The plaintiff had two young sons, whom William Murdock also had great affection for. William agreed to make a note that would come due about the time the children came of age. A note was drawn in favor of Mrs Murdock on September 5, 1877. She took the note and rolled it around a slate pencil or lead pencil, rolled tinfoil around it and placed the package in a long, thin vial. This was put into another bottle, and these in still another. The last bottle was corked and sealed and all put in a tin can and the can stopped up. It was then taken to a certain spot and buried.

There the note remained for ten years, according to plaintiff, until 1887, when it was taken up by Mrs. Murdock and taken to Sacramento by her. She had negotiated for the purchase of some real estate, and wanted to use the note in a deal. While the note was in Sacramento it was seen by several persons who, Cannon stated, are entirely disinterested, and will be here to tell what they saw. After that the note was placed in the possession of Gawn Murdock, plaintiff's husband. It was by him placed in a private box and put in the Orland Bank, where it remained until 1890. It was then turned over again to Mrs. Murdock, who took it to San Francisco. She turned the note over to L. S. Migglison, and the latter to his brother, who was in the State of Ohio. It was by him, in 1894, turned back to the possession of the plaintiff, Mary Helen Murdock, who has never ceased to be the owner of the document since that time. In 1894 she gave it to her attorneys.

Counsel further stated that he would prove by reputable witnesses that one of the executors stated in the town of Willows that if Murdock had lived one or two weeks longer the note would have been compromised. He said they would show that Murdock knew all about the note. Every single fact would be proved by living eye-witnesses, who could be prosecuted for perjury if they swore falsely. Cannon said the other side was depending upon witnesses to swear the note out of court on mere opinions, witnesses hired to come here and swear, at so much per swear.

The first witness placed on the stand was Gawn Murdock, the husband of the plaintiff. Grove L. Johnson handed the witness the precious document which is to make him and his family independently rich if his wife is successful in her suit. Witness was cool and deliberate and was inspiring the audience with a confidence in the cause of the plaintiff when Attorney Richard Bayne brought the proceedings to an abrupt stop by an objection to the introduction of the note on the ground that it had never been presented for allowance to the executor in the manner required by law and therefore the plaintiffs had no standing in court. If the objection should be sustained it would be the end of plaintiffs' case.

General Barnes insisted on having the matter argued out at this time and the Court wanted counsel to argue it and present authorities. The jury was excused and counsel given until 9:30 o'clock to-morrow to prepare arguments and the court adjourned till that hour.

THE WOMAN WHO HOLDS THE FAMOUS HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLAR NOTE

MRS. MARY HELEN MURDOCK.

WILLOWS, April 9.—The central figure in the great battle for a fortune which will commence in the Superior Court of Glenn county to-morrow is Mrs. Mary Helen Murdock, the woman whose name is written in the celebrated $100,000 note as payee. Mrs. Murdock presents this note and asks a jury to give her over a quarter of a million dollars, the amount of the principal and twenty years' interest—an amount which, if she gains will leave an immense estate insolvent and make the last will and testament of William Murdock a worthless paper. When this note was presented to the executors of William Murdock's estate after his death in 1891, they refused to act on the claim and suit was brought to recover the amount. Many lawyers of California are arrayed for and against the claim, and twelve men have been sworn to decide whether Mrs. Murdock is entitled to an immense fortune or is guilty of being a party to a felony. The sole issue is whether or not the signature of William Murdock to the note is a forgery.

Mrs. Murdock and her husband, Gawn Murdock, have lived near Orland, Glenn county, many years. Gawn is a son of Samuel Murdock, who was a cousin of William Murdock, the man whose name is signed to the note. Mrs. Murdock has two sons, one a cashier of the bank of Orland, the other a hardware merchant at the same place. The note is dated 1877, and Mrs. Murdock claims that it was given for money advanced by her husband's father, and was made payable twenty years after date, so as to fall due about the time her sons became of age.

The case will be a memorable one.

MRS. MURDOCK'S FIRST VICTORY

Call

Famous Note Introduced in Evidence.

Special Dispatch to The Call

WILLOWS, April 11.—The attempt of the attorneys for the defense to prevent the introduction in evidence of the note which is the basis of Mary H. Murdock's claim to a large share of the estate of the late William Murdock failed to-day. After the argument of counsel on the point raised yesterday had been concluded, Superior Judge Pirkey ruled in favor of the plaintiff, and the note was introduced as part of the evidence in the case.

Gawn Murdock, the plaintiff's husband, continued his testimony. He said he was in Chico when the note was made in September, 1877. When he went back a few days later he was shown the note. During the time he was in Chico after the note was signed he met ... Murdock, and the uncle told him that he had been at the home of the witness and had made the note for $100,000 in full settlement of the accounts between ... and Samuel Murdock, and had ... the $20,000 the witness had paid to ... Murdock a few days before ... reaching home Gawn, at his wife's request, made a copy of the note, as father had requested a copy. The witness said that he saw many times money paid to William Murdock by his father (Samuel), these transactions running from 1861 to 1877, the date of the note.

After he returned home from Chico ... made a copy of the note the original ... put into a glass bottle. This bottle ... sealed, put into another bottle and ... larger bottle placed in a powder-can ... buried in the stable, where it remained for ten years. In 1887 the note was ... up and taken to Sacramento, where a ... was being negotiated for a lot of ... the note to be used as part of the purchase price. The note was at ... presented to William Murdock by the ... sons who were expecting to take it ... William Murdock said it was all ... and would be paid at maturity.

The witness testified that William Murdock acknowledged the note in Sacramento in 1890. The witness positively identified the note as the one he saw ... his return from Chico. He was ... the stand at the adjournment of court.

GREAT LEGAL BATTLE OVER THE FAMOUS $100,000 MURDOCK NOTE IS FAIRLY ON PROMINENT FIGURES IN THE MURDOCK LITIGATION AT WILLOWS.

WILLOWS, April 10.—It was an imposing array of attorneys, handwriting experts and men of affairs that assembled in Judge Pirkey's courtroom to-day, when the contest over the famous Murdock $100,000 note came on for trial, the jury having been selected and the preliminaries cleared away. When court convened there were present all the principals in the suit, several of the heirs under William Murdock's will and as many attentive listeners of both sexes as the chamber would accommodate. The plaintiff seemed to drink in each word uttered by her attorney in his opening statement, and plainly showed by her serious demeanor that she realized that the battle was on.

It took just thirty-five minutes for W. M. Cannon, one of the attorneys for Mrs. Helen Murdock in her suit for a fortune, to tell the court and jury this afternoon why the plaintiff asked a verdict in her favor. Attorney Cannon made no attempt at eloquence, treating in an easy, conversational way what he promised to prove.

Mr. Cannon commenced by telling how the note read and stated that the refusal of the executors either to reject or allow the claim amounted to a rejection of it; that suit was brought and the executors denied the execution of the note, virtually charging forgery. The attorney told of the early settlement in this section of William Murdock, whose name is signed to the note; of the fact that William's cousin, Samuel, who lived near him, had a son Gawn, who is the husband of plaintiff, and that Gawn had two sons, Stanley and Edwin, and of the splendid reputation of Gawn Murdock and family, who enjoyed the confidence and respect of the community.

As to the note's consideration, the attorney went back to 1861, when Samuel loaned William $1,000 and continued placing large yearly profits from his sheep-raising industry in the hands of William. He said he would prove that when Gawn went into partnership with his father, the son objected to the loaning of so much money to William and that the disputes between father and son resulted in strained relations, which culminated in Samuel leaving Gawn's home and going to reside with William for several months. It was then that William told Samuel that Gawn had not made a just settlement with Samuel. Samuel prepared to sue his son, and, to avoid a lawsuit, Gawn paid his father $20,000 in money and notes.

The attorney stated that the relations between Mrs. Mary Henry Murdock and Samuel were very friendly, and that Samuel's affection for his two grandsons was great.

Finally a settlement between William and Samuel was to be effected. The two men met at the house of Gawn, Mrs. Murdock alone being present with them, and struck a balance, which, with $20,000 there turned over to William by Samuel and the destroying of two promissory notes held by Samuel against William, one of which was for $26,000, made the total amount $100,000. At Samuel's request a note was made in the name of Mrs. Murdock and made payable twenty years from date, so as to become due about the time her boys became of age and to be for their benefit. The note was wrapped around a pencil and covered with tin-foil, then placed in a vial and sealed, the vial placed in a bottle which was corked, that bottle placed in another, and that one put in a can which was buried. This, the attorney said, remained buried for ten or eleven years, was then dug up and taken to Sacramento for a business purpose, where it was seen by persons who would so testify. It was then placed in possession of the plaintiff's husband, who placed it in the vault of the Orland Bank. It remained there until 1890, was then taken to San Francisco and put in the hands of a person there, was taken to Ohio and finally came back into the hands of the plaintiff.

Mr. Cannon said it would be proved that William admitted at various times the execution of the note and told the facts of the consideration. He stated that they would prove that one of the executors acknowledged that he knew of the note and stated that had William lived a week longer the note would have been made the subject of a compromise. He closed by saying that these things would be proved by testimony of persons known to be honest and truthful, and not by deductions and opinions of experts hired at "so much per swear."

Gawn Murdock, husband of the plaintiff, was called to the stand. He testified that he met William Murdock in Chico in September, 1877; that William told him he had made a settlement with witness' father and had given Mrs. Murdock a note for $100,000. Witness told him it was a bad way of doing business.

Upon Gawn Murdock's return home his wife showed him the note.

"Is this the note your wife showed you?" asked Grove L. Johnson, handing the witness the celebrated paper.

"That is the note," answered the witness.

Attorney Johnson then offered the note in evidence.

At this juncture Attorney Richard Bayne, for the defense, objected to the introduction of the note, claiming it irrelevant and incompetent. He claimed the plaintiff had no standing either in a Probate or any court, bringing up the point, already passed on by a former Superior Judge here on demurrer, that the note was never presented to the executors according to law, in that the paper was not properly described nor was any consideration shown.

This technical point put a stop to any further testimony and the point will be argued to-morrow morning. The jury was excused until the afternoon session.

Nothing else is talked of here but this case.

HISTORY OF THE MURDOCK NOTE TOLD IN COURT

MRS. MARY HELEN MURDOCK.

WILLOWS, April 10.—The taking of evidence in the celebrated Murdock note case, involving the validity of a note for $100,000, with interest amounting to $250,000, alleged to have been drawn by the late William Murdock in favor of Mrs. Gawn Murdock, the wife of a relative, began in the Superior Court here to-day. There was an immense array of legal talent on either side. Attorney William Cannon, in his opening statement to the jury, gave for the first time the facts regarding the note which is alleged by the defense to be a forgery. He declared the paper was executed by William Murdock in settlement of money due the decedent's brother, Samuel. The latter requested that the note be made out in favor of his daughter-in-law, to become due at about the time his grandchildren became of age. This was done and before the note became due and was presented William Murdock died.

Mr. Cannon said the note bore date of September 6, 1877, and was for $100,000, payable twenty years after date, with interest at 1 per cent a month. He told of William Murdock coming to this section in early days; how he raised cattle and sheep and acquired land. He had a cousin, Samuel Murdock, who had a son, Gawn W. Murdock, husband of the plaintiff. Mr. and Mrs. Gawn Murdock had two sons, Stanley and Edwin. Explaining the consideration for which the note was given Attorney Cannon went back to the time of 1861-62. Samuel Murdock was raising sheep. He loaned William $1000. After this and up to 1877 he loaned William other large sums of money, as there was a big profit in wool and sheep and these profits were placed in William's hands. Gawn went into partnership with his father and objected to turning over the earnings to William. A bitter feeling sprang up between Gawn and his father on this account. In 1876 the partnership was dissolved. A settlement was effected in 1876, by which Gawn agreed to pay to his father $15,000 for his interest. This amount was turned over to William by Samuel. Between 1876 and 1877, when the note in controversy is alleged to have been made, the feeling between father and son became so bitter that Samuel left the house of Gawn and stayed with his cousin, William, for two months. During this stay William told Samuel that Gawn had not made a just settlement with him. Gawn was threatened with a lawsuit, and to avoid it paid his father $20,000 in cash and notes. This was a short time prior to the execution of the $100,000 note by William Murdock to Gawn Murdock's wife.

Samuel had returned to Gawn's house in the meanwhile. Mary Helen Murdock's relations with her father-in-law were always friendly and the affections of William Murdock seemed centered on his two grandchildren, the sons of the plaintiff. Finally there was a settlement between William and Samuel. They met at Gawn's house and Mrs. Murdock was present when, in the settlement, the balance was struck at $100,000. At Samuel's request the note was made payable to Mrs. Murdock, but was to be for the benefit of the two grandsons, Edwin and Stanley. The note was made payable twenty years after date, so as to fall due about the time the boys became of age. As to the interest rate Attorney Cannon said the usual rates in those days were from 1½ to 1½ per cent a month and the rate given in the note really was lower than usual. Subsequently, and up to the time of William Murdock's death, Mr. Cannon said, it would be proved beyond dispute that William admitted at various times the execution of the note and the facts as to the consideration.

The attorney said he would show that Mrs. Murdock, the payee, took the note and that it was buried on the premises. The note was wrapped or rolled around a pencil, then placed in a vial, corked and sealed; then placed in a larger bottle and corked and then in another bottle, also corked. This bottle was placed in a tin can, which was topped with a saucer, and buried. It remained buried for ten or eleven years—until 1887 or 1888. Attorney Cannon said he would prove that one of the executors, before the existence of the note was made public, acknowledged that he knew of it and that, if Murdock had lived one week longer the note would have been compromised. Said Mr. Cannon:

"The issue in this case is clearly drawn. On the one hand the jury will be called upon to say whether it accepts the sworn testimony of the people whose reputation for truth, honesty and integrity is beyond reproach; the testimony of witnesses who will give facts which came under their own observation, or whether the jury will accept the opinions, inferences and deductions of experts who do not testify as to facts, and who are hired by the defense in this case to come into court and swear this note out of court and swear the charge of forgery upon the plaintiff in this action at so much per swear."

Gawn Murdock, husband of the plaintiff, was the first witness called. He told of the business transactions between his father and William Murdock. He identified the note as the one signed by William Murdock in 1877.

Grove L. Johnson, for the plaintiff, asked that the note be introduced in evidence. This was objected to by General Barnes, on behalf of the defendants, on the ground that the note could not be introduced, as the claim never had been properly presented to the executors. The argument on this question will take place to-morrow, the jury having been excused until 2 o'clock. If the defendants' point is good the case ends. Plaintiff's attorneys, however, contend that it certainly will be knocked out.

A Case That Will Compel Attention Throughout the Length and Breadth of the Land.

Features That Place It Among the Remarkable Litigious Contentions of the Century.

Payment Demanded on a Twenty-Year Note for $100,000, Drawing One Per Cent a Month.

Defense Will Attempt to Prove That the Plaintiff Is Trying to Brazen Out a Bold Forgery.

WILLOWS, April 10.—This community unreservedly declares itself ready to be damned if the Murdock note case is not a stronger drawing card than the Glenn County Fair.

To fully grasp the significance of this verbal venture one must be appreciative not only of the habitual conservatism of speech—the shunning of profane emphasis and adjuration of hyperbole observed by these simple folk, but realize the high degree of magnetism attached by them to their harvest exposition of farm products and its incidental attractions. It is the one great social event in their year — the annual break in the homely routine of their lives. And it is unfortunate for all concerned that their estimate of its magnificence cannot be thoroughly absorbed by the distinguished strangers who have come among them and supplanted in their admiration some of its stellar features.

General W. H. L. Barnes shows no elation of spirit at being regarded as a more interesting exhibit than the dropsical squash, nor does George L. Johnson appear gratified that he has eclipsed the tufted hog. Other legal lights of lesser brilliance apparently derive no joy from the unavoidable consciousness that they occupy a more exalted place in the public vision than ever was attained by the human-faced chicken or the five-legged calf. And if the eminent experts in chirographic analysis were blind and deaf they could not seem less flattered by the reverential awe with which they are gazed at and audibly discussed.

But the most conclusive evidence of the County Fair's comparative littleness is afforded by the congested condition of the hotels. Never in the town's career have so few unoccupied rooms been in evidence. Scores of talesmen and witnesses from all parts of the county are here, and many of them are accompanied by healthy-looking women and shy children, all eager to enjoy the free show. While the men spend their days sweltering in the courthouse or tailgating with tobacco-tainted saliva the sward adjacent thereto, the wives and daughters are touring the shops or visiting their town acquaintances. The streets are ablaze with gaily-striped shirtwaists and straw hats extensive as to brim. For thermometers under awnings register from 90 to 100 degrees.

AN EXTRAORDINARY CASE

It is no ordinary case that has thus excited Glenn county's interest. It possesses features which would compel the attention of communities much more accustomed to sensational happenings, and before its present trial has progressed very far its developments will be discussed beyond the boundaries of California.

The story, briefly told, is that Mary Helen Murdock is endeavoring to collect from the estate of William Murdock, deceased, payment on a note for $100,000 and interest at 1 per cent a month since the date of issuance, twenty-two years ago. William Murdock was a bachelor, whose cousin, Samuel, a widower, was father of Gawn Murdock, husband of the plaintiff in this case. William died on January 8, 1891, leaving an estate valued at $100,000. After the probate of his will was commenced Mrs. Gawn Murdock presented the note and demanded payment. With accumulated interest, her claim now amounts to $250,000. The executors of the estate protested that the note was not genuine, and their attorneys pronounced it a forgery. Then the claimant began suit to establish the validity of the note, but as the time for payment had not matured, the action was dismissed as premature. When the note became due, on September 6, 1895, the present suit was commenced, in accordance with the probate law, which provides that suits upon claims not due when presented must be commenced within two months after the date of maturity. This is the first time the case has been brought to open trial.

It is the prominence of the parties involved no less than the unusual phases of the plaintiff's claim that makes the case possess such interest for the people of Glenn county. The Murdocks were among the early settlers in the Sacramento valley, and "Bill" and "Sam" were as well known to the argonauts as "Gawn" and his wife and their two strapping sons are familiar to the succeeding generations of farming folk. "Bill" was a bachelor of thrifty—almost miserly—habit, who made his wealth by wool-growing. It is told that so frugal was he while acquiring his thousands that he deprived himself of life's luxuries and even stinted his outlay for necessaries. Whenever he came to visit Willows he brought along his own horsefeed, to the openly-expressed disgust of the liverymen, and made the hotelkeepers angry by carrying his own food in his pockets. As long as his apparel could be worn with respect to common decency he never patronized the clothing dealers. So, while making money, he made no friends.

"Sam" was also in the sheep business, but on a less extensive scale than his cousin. He inherited a considerable estate from his father, and his son Gawn lived with him. Early in the 70's Gawn married Mary Helen Ashurst, daughter of a Tehama county farmer, and the couple have lived together ever since. One of their sons is cashier of the bank at Orland and the other young man is in the hardware business at the same place. While the community is divided in opinion as to the genuineness of the wife's claim, there seems to be unanimous respect for her husband and sons, who are sturdily with her in her fight.

To people unacquainted with the parties in the case its interest consists in the great amount of money involved and the unusual features of the alleged transaction. Promises to pay $100,000 are not signed every day, nor is it usual to give a note for any amount payable twenty years from date of signature and drawing interest at the rate of 1 per cent a month during the interim. Then there is the fact that the alleged signer of this note was a niggardly old bachelor while its holder was a young married woman who sets up no plea of kinship or any material consideration whatever. To say nothing of the additional fact that the existence of such a document was not known to the old man's closest friends until he was on his deathbed, when, it is claimed, he pronounced it a forgery. These are features so uncommon as to attract widespread attention, and their investigation in open court by some of the ablest attorneys in California will be closely followed by millions of people who never before heard of Glenn county or its multitudinous Murdocks.

The plaintiff's case is handled by George L. Johnson of Sacramento, W. P. Thomson of Fresno, W. M. Cannon of San Francisco and Charles L. Donohue and Frank Freeman of Willows. For the defense the array of legal talent is no less imposing. It embraces General W. H. L. Barnes, E. S. Pillsbury and Richard Bayne of San Francisco, C. F. Lusk of Chico and Ben F. Geis of Willows.

Defendants in the suit are the executors of the William Murdock estate, consisting of B. H. Burton, cashier of the Bank of Willows; W. P. Harrington, cashier of the Colusa County Bank, and Adam Compton, farmer, a nephew of the deceased woolgrower and the principal beneficiary by his will. Burton and Harrington are heavy stockholders in the Bank of Willows.

THE PLAINTIFF'S CASE.

Mrs. Murdock's claim is clearly set forth in a deposition made by her to the executors, but her attorneys have some cards in reserve which they will not play unless their hand is forced.

It will be set forth that Samuel Murdock, father of plaintiff's husband, turned his surplus earnings over to his cousin William for safe keeping, and that this course was strongly opposed by his son Gawn. As a consequence, there were frequent quarrels between Samuel and his son, but between the elder man and his daughter-in-law good feeling always existed. This situation came to an end in 1816 [illegible], when father and son dissolved partnership, the latter paying a large sum of money for retention of the property, which was duly added to the hoard that Samuel had from time to time entrusted to William's custody. Then it was claimed by William that Gawn had not paid his father enough in the settlement, and a demand for $20,000 more was made, which Gawn paid, to avoid trouble. This final settlement was made on the day that the note for $100,000 was signed.

On this memorable occasion there were present in Gawn's house at Olimpo the three men, Mrs. Murdock and her two young children. When a settlement of William's account with Samuel was attempted it was found that all the money entrusted to the former for safe keeping was not available, and the balance of the amount due was transferred from Samuel to his daughter-in-law for the benefit of his two grandsons, of whom he was very fond. That was how the note in question came into being. Mrs. Murdock filled in the blank places, and William signed it then and there. Samuel had it made payable twenty years after date, so that it would fall due about the time the boys would become of age. If Samuel had not been on unfriendly terms with Gawn, the note would have been made payable to him instead of his wife. The rate of interest—1 per cent a month—was not unreasonable at that time, when 1½ per cent was freely paid on short loans.

While the note was carefully treasured, a great many people saw or heard of it before it attained maturity, say Mrs. Murdock's lawyers. It has been handled by witnesses who will be produced and it has figured as a collateral security. One of the present defen[illegible] [illegible] W. H. [illegible] the [illegible] W. [illegible] Murdock [illegible] that note could have been [illegible]. It is further [illegible] by George L. Johnson and colleagues that F. C. Lusk, one of the attorneys for the defense, was William Murdock's legal adviser for some time prior to the old man's death, and that while so acting he knew of the note being held by Mrs. Murdock, and discussed it with his client.

THE PLAN OF DEFENSE

To win its case, the defense must prove either forgery or no consideration, and from hints dropped here and there by General Barnes in court, it is inferred that he purposes to establish both, also that the trial will be prolific of insulting insinuations as to the plaintiff's character.

It will be claimed that Samuel Murdock's earthly possessions never exceeded in amount or value the sum of $18,000, and that his cousin William could not possibly have been indebted to him, as alleged by plaintiff. Witnesses will be called to testify that on his deathbed William denied having signed the note held by Gawn's wife, or any promise to pay anyone at any time a sum exceeding $[illegible]. Then the signature on this note will be compared with undisputed specimens of the dead man's chirography, to show that he did not make the former. This is where the experts will come in. Three of them—Daniel T. Ames, Carl Eisenschimmel and T. [illegible] have been here a week preparing photographic exhibits and noting the characteristics of William's penmanship.

In the line of defense it is also intended to be shown that the note held by Mrs. Murdock first came to light in 1893, about a year prior to the death of its alleged signer, when a San Francisco man named Megginson tried to sell it to Senator Stewart of Nevada. Megginson claimed that Mrs. Murdock had told him she had an uncle who was very rich and about to die, and that the note would be payable on its maturity from his estate, which was more than ample to meet its demand. The Senator wanted an explanation as to the "value received" mentioned in the note, but Megginson was unable to give it. If the consideration was valid, the Senator said, he would cheerfully buy the note for the price asked, $[illegible] in cash, but he must be satisfied on that point. As a result of this interview Mrs. Murdock went to Nevada and saw Senator Stewart, who, in the presence of his attorney, asked her what the consideration for the note had been. She replied that her "uncle" desired that she should inherit all his riches, but did not want to mention that fact in his will, so he gave her the note instead of making her his sole legatee. The attorney opined that such a consideration was absolutely null, and the negotiation was declared off right there.

After that, it is claimed, Megginson took the note to Toledo, Ohio, and there tried to dispose of it to his brother, a wealth man. It had been indorsed by Mrs. Murdock, and the Ohio Megginson advanced $500 on it, pending his investigation of its validity. As a result of his inquiries he indorsed it back to Mrs. Murdock, and it bears both indorsements now.

It is the evident theory of the defense that the note is the outcome of a scheme concocted by Megginson and Mrs. Murdock to raise money by selling it, and that, failing in that object, they deemed it safer to assert its genuineness than to destroy it, because its existence had become known to several people who might prove troublesome if they suspected forgery. So it was presented for collection to the executors, and when they repudiated it Megginson became scared and fled the country. Attorneys for the estate say that he confessed to fraud.

Attorney Lusk states that an intimation of the note being in existence came to him while William Murdock was nigh to death, and that he asked the old man if he had ever signed such an obligation. The answer was a flat negative, supplemented with a desire that the claim be protested by the heirs.

Mrs. Murdock is not mentioned in William's will, but her husband was bequeathed $[illegible]. The remainder of the big estate, consisting of lands, livestock, bonds, stocks and cash, was divided in varying proportions between Mary Compton, sister of the deceased, who lives near Chico, and her children, Adam, Henry, Ira, Mary and Lizzie, Hearn Murdock, brother of the deceased, of Lake county, and his three children; Hanse Murdock, another brother, and Gawn Murdock, a cousin of deceased.

READY FOR THE FRAY

Taking everything into consideration, it appears remarkable that an impartial and intelligent jury to try this case was impaneled within a week. Every man in the county knew the Murdocks, or some of them, and for five years the note has been a standard topic for the gossips. The case in all its bearings has been discussed in general merchandise stores and [illegible] circles and at church sociables and district [illegible] and other places where men or women congregated, and every man capable of forming an opinion [illegible] [illegible] harboring one [illegible], with the belief that Sheriff Stanton had a hundred talesmen on hand when the case was called, and was ready to [illegible] a [illegible]

[illegible] jury [illegible] [illegible] unless [illegible] [illegible] Murdock [illegible] [illegible] the court [illegible].

They [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] ship. The [illegible] appealed to and [illegible] upon the [illegible] of [illegible]. [illegible] man, and that will [illegible] minded that [illegible] comparatively [illegible] mind you will [illegible] woman is [illegible] her rights [illegible] round of capitalist [illegible] hand, or [illegible] the jury [illegible] little property, and it will be [illegible] emphasis and at later interest [illegible] the proposition [illegible] claim [illegible] validity of this plaintiff [illegible] rule, he cannot consistently [illegible] own last will and testament [illegible] tected by the law which he [illegible] vaged.

The defense is [illegible] tracted [illegible] George L. Johnson [illegible] [illegible] responsible for the [illegible] that the fight will be over [illegible] couple of weeks. His [illegible] declares, will [illegible] ly out of the enemy's [illegible] their case a [illegible] wreck [illegible] Barnes and his confreres say [illegible] about what their collective [illegible] but their corps of photographic and handwriting [illegible] are kept [illegible] ly at work.

J. V. CRAWFORD.

THE MURDOCK TRIAL.

WILLOWS, April 10.—The plain[tiff's] case in the matter of the Murdock note case has been clearly defined by counsel and her husband is now [illegible] examined in her behalf.

Attorney W. M. Cannon outlined the jury the case as they [illegible] prove it, and the latter [illegible] listened to by an immense crowd.

The circumstances as to the [illegible] of the note were told [illegible] the [illegible] jury and made a [illegible] impression [illegible] the hearers. The consideration [illegible] $100,000 note, is told, was the [illegible] entrusted to William Murdock by [illegible] Murdock, the father of Gawn, [illegible] the husband of the plaintiff.

When the balance of the account [illegible] struck, [illegible] given to William [illegible] Sam and the note made [illegible] Mrs. Murdock for the benefit of [illegible] her sons, who would come of age [illegible] the time the note was made [illegible]. The [illegible] told [illegible] to the [illegible] "uncle," [illegible] in a sealed bottle [illegible] dug up after ten years.

Mr. Cannon said they would [illegible] that William Murdock admitted the note and the consideration at various times. They would prove that [illegible] [illegible] admitted the note and [illegible] would have been [illegible] William died another [illegible].

He said they would prove by [illegible] many the facts from honest witnesses who were well known [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible]. He [illegible] listened to with [illegible] interest.

COURTROOM AT WILLOWS AND SOME OF THE PEOPLE CONNECTED WITH THE MURDOCK CASE

THE MURDOCK CASE GOES ON

Motion for a Nonsuit Is Denied by the Court.

JURY TO OECIOE THE STATUS OF THE NOTE.

NEPHEW GAWN TELLS HOW HIS WIFE HAPPENED TO RECEIVE IT.

Witness Did Not See the Document Executed—Swears His Uncle Acknowledged the Validity of the Paper.

Special Dispatch to the "Chronicle."

WILLOWS, April 11.—The Courthouse was again packed this morning with people interested in the Murdock note case. The entire morning session was occupied by the attorneys in arguing for and against the motion for nonsuit, made by the defendant on the ground that it had not been presented for payment in the manner required by law. The motion was denied at the opening of the afternoon session. Defendants' counsel reserved the usual exception and the taking of testimony was resumed.

Gawn Murdock, the husband of the plaintiff, was called. Report had had it that Murdock had said that he had seen the note made and delivered. Numbers had said if he swore to that they were willing to believe in the validity of the note. Rumor had been at fault, however, as Murdock stated that he was not even at home when the note was drawn or signed. Grove L. Johnson conducted the direct examination and the witness was asked but very few questions, merely identifying the note as the one shown to him by plaintiff on his return home from Chico, where he was on the date the note is alleged to have been drawn.

General Barnes conducted the cross-examination. Witness had fallen out with his father, Samuel Murdock, in 1872 because the father had persisted in loaning so much of his money to William Murdock.

"On the 4th of September," said the witness on cross-examination, "I went to Chico on business and did not return until [illegible] or 9th. While I was away the deal was made whereby my father had settled with William Murdock, and had had this $100,000 note drawn up by my wife and made payable to her, in order, as he said, that neither I nor Cam Ashurst should ever get a cent of his money. While I was at Chico I met Uncle Billy Murdock on Main street, and he said to me, 'Hello, Gawn, there is no use of your being mad at me any more. I have settled with your father by giving my note for $100,000. I also got from your father the $20,000 which you had paid to him in your and his settlement.' I said, 'I do not think the note is any good.'

"He had told me that he had made it payable to Mary, my wife. I asked him why he did that, and he replied that Sam had required it to be so, so that neither I nor Cam Ashurst should ever get a cent of the money when he was dead. I told Uncle Billy that he might not be worth a cent when he died, and that I thought it was a very funny way of doing business, and that I did not believe that he had given any such a note. When I went home, I asked my wife if she had taken such a note, and she told me she had. I do not know where she kept it, but she got it and had me make a copy of it, but I don't know the reason for it. I sealed it up in a glass vial and put it in a powder-can and buried it in one corner of the barn. It remained there until 1881 or 1885, when I went with my wife and dug it up. It had never been touched until then. It was as bright as the day it was buried. My wife took charge of it and took it to Sacramento. I saw William Murdock at the State Fair in conversation with Mrs. Murdock and a Dr. Hicks, who was a piece-horse man. My wife had taken the note there to be used in a transaction in which she intended to purchase some land, but did not consummate the trade.

"I always considered the note the property of Mrs. Murdock, and that I had nothing to do with it. When I saw Uncle Billy in Sacramento in 1887, I do not know whether I said anything to him about the note or not. I do not think I did. I saw him again in Sacramento in 1890, and my wife was with me, but she did not have the note. I talked to him about the note and he said the note was all right, and would be paid when due. There was a man there at that time of the name of Meggison, whom my wife had got acquainted with in San Francisco. She introduced him to me. He asked William Murdock about the note and said that my wife wanted to borrow some money on it. Uncle Billy told Meggison that the note was all right and would be paid when due.

"I do not know whether the copy of the note is in existence now or not. I do not remember that my father ever talked to me about the note at all. I do not know that there is a living person that ever heard me talking with William Murdock about the note. My father had bought a piece of land of William Murdock and had the deed made to my wife. I thought that he ought to have it made to me and I was mad about it. I do not even know personally that Mary Helen Murdock was present when the trade was made. The land mentioned was purchased and the deed made to my wife in 1872. In 1880 May 12th, I had found out that the deed was [illegible] and went to Orland with Uncle Billy and took another deed. The notary was the cashier of the Orland Bank and we went there to have the work done. The note was lying in that bank at that very moment, but neither Uncle Billy nor myself referred to it in any way."

General Barnes took the witness over all the monied transactions where William Murdock had received any money from Samuel or the witness, from their earliest dealings, and all that could be traced as having passed to William from either or both of them amounted to less than $40,000. Recess was announced till 9 o'clock to-morrow morning.

BANKED HIS WEALTH UNDER THE WOODPILE

A Queer Old Citizen Was the Late Samuel Murdock.

His Son Gawn Tells the History of the $100,000 Note.

UNBROKEN BY EXAMINATION

The Witness Sus'a'ns a Searching Inquiry Without Halting in H s Testimony.

[Special Dispatch to "The Examiner."]

WILLOWS, April 11.—Gawn Murdock, husband of the woman who holds the $100,000 note against the Murdock estate, was permitted to-day to tell his story of the circumstances that led to the existence of that valuable scrap of paper. It was a queer narrative, but with all its strangeness a connected one and as such stood the brunt of searching cross-examination without a break.

The forenoon was taken up in arguments as to the plaintiff's standing in court, the defense objecting to the introduction of the note, contending that her presented claim to the executors was not according to law. Attorneys Bayne, Barnes, Cannon and Johnson cited scores of authorities and read todo rections with astounding divergence of construction. Judge Pirkey overruled the objection of the defense, however, and the examination of Gawn Murdock was continued from the point where it was interrupted as told in to-day's "Examiner."

Answering Grove L. Johnson, witness said that when his wife showed him the note he made a copy of it and returned the original to his wife. He then told of it being buried, substantially as told in the attorney's opening statement. After burying the note in the barn he did not see it until about 1885, when he dug it up, in company with his wife. He found the note in the sealed vial, unaltered, and took it to Sacramento during the State Fair, for the purpose of a business transaction proposed by his wife. Several years after this his wife gave him the note, which he put in a tin box and deposited in the Orland Bank. In the fall of 1890 he returned it to his wife, and next saw it at the offices of certain San Francisco attorneys, in 1891 and 1897, and next yesterday, when it was handed to him on the witness stand to identify.

"Take the witness," said Attorney Johnson to General Barnes, and the spectators caught their breath and gave eager attention.

Mr Murdock was closely questioned as to his movements to and from his home at the time the note was dated, September 5, 1877, and stated that he left home on September 4th and returned home several days later. He was interrogated carefully as to his wife's movements at that time, the drift of the questioning being that Mrs Murdock might have been away from home at the date the note was signed. The witness said he had no personal knowledge of her being home, but found her at home when he returned, about September 9th.

Mr Murdock testified that, prior to his return home he met William, at Chico. William said to him "Hello, Gawn. You needn't be mad at me any more. I got $20,000 from your father and we have made a settlement."

William than told witness that he had made a note to "Mary" for $100,000, payable twenty years from date. Witness replied that such a note was no good, as the maker might not be worth a cent in twenty years.

General Barnes handed the note to witness and had him read it to the jury. He was then asked as to how he could identify it at this time, and he replied that the written portion of the note, other than the signature, was in his wife's handwriting; that his father, Samuel, asked her to write it, as he could not write, although he read a little.

Mr. Murdock didn't know the particulars of the settlement between William and Samuel when this balance of $100,000 was struck, and as to $20,000 being given to William by Samuel, he didn't know about that, nor that the money was "dug up in two cans and carried away in two sacks."

The number "93" in the left lower corner of the note was the subject of questioning, which suggests it as being important.

The note was handed to the jury to inspect and it was passed around.

As to the amounts loaned William by Samuel, father of witness, he remembered amounts turned over of $5,600 in 1862, $2,000 in 1863, $11,000 in 1872, $5,000 in 1876 and $20,000 in 1877. Witness said that Samuel kept large sums of money under his bed or beneath the wood pile. He did not know who figured the $100,000 balance.

Mr Murdock told of the strained relations between himself and his father Samuel and of his dislike for William. He objected, he said, to his father turning money over to William, and disliked William on account of his deeding a piece of land to witness' wife instead of to him. When the partnership with his father was dissolved he paid his father $8,000. Samuel left the home of witness and went to settle with William. William then said the [illegible] between the son and father was not just [illegible] years wrangling during which William wrote the witness telling him he [illegible] here to settle the matter, the witness paid his father $20,000.

General Barnes questioned witness in detail as to the visit to Sacramento [illegible] the note was taken there. Mr Murdock said his wife introduced him to [illegible] Meggison from whom his wife wanted to borrow money. They met William Murdock in the fair pavilion on the occasion and talked of wishing to borrow money on the note. William then remarked that the note was all right and he would pay it when due.

Witness said he had often talked of the note in the presence of his father, who told the wife of witness to take care of it.

The cross-examination was severe, and General Barnes' inflections were such as to suggest his belief that the story was a fairy tale. But the witness made a good impression, and, as his reputation is of the best, the first testimony for the plaintiff has elated her attorneys. The defense wore an expression which says, "Just wait until you hear us," and the counsel in particular believe they will knock all props from under the story.

It is believed by many that the defense will contend that Gawn Murdock has been led to believe certain things by his wife and will center their heaviest batteries on her.

The cross-examination of Murdock will be concluded to-morrow morning and, if rumors are to be believed, a witness for plaintiff will then appear who will give testimony most surprising.

The courtroom is packed with people, for it is believed that something is going to drop soon.

THE MURDOCK NOTE SUIT.

Trial of the Celebrated Case in Progress at Willows.

Features That Place It Among the Remarkable Legal Battles of the Century.

Plaintiff's Counsel Relates the Circumstances as to the Giving of the Note, and Outlines to the Jury the Case They Promise to Prove—Taking of Testimony Begun.

WILLOWS, April 10—This community unreservedly declares itself ready to be durned if the Murdock note case is not a stronger drawing card than the Glenn County Fair.

To fairly grasp the significance of this verbal venture one must be appreciative not only of the habitual conservation of speech — the shunning of profane emphasis and adjuration of hyperbole—observed by these simple folk, but realize the high degree of importance attached by them to their harvest exposition of farm products and its incidental attractions. It is the one great social event of the year — the annual break in the homely routine of their lives. And it is fortunate for all concerned that their estimate of its magnificence cannot be thoroughly appreciated by the distinguished strangers who have come among them and supplanted in their admiration many of its stellar features.

General W. H. L. Barnes shows no chafing of spirit at being regarded as a more interesting exhibit than the dropsical squash, nor does Grove L. Johnson appear gratified that he has eclipsed the fatted hog. Other legal lights of lesser brilliance apparently derive no joy from the unavoidable consciousness that they occupy a more exalted place in the public vision than ever was attained by the human-faced chicken or the five-legged calf. And if the eminent experts in chirographic analysis were blind and deaf they could not seem less flattered by the reverential awe with which they are gaped at and audibly discussed.

But the most conclusive evidence of the County Fair's comparative littleness is afforded by the congested condition of the hotels. Never in the town's career have so few untenanted rooms been in evidence. Scores of talesmen and witnesses from all parts of the county are here, and many of them are accompanied by healthy-looking women and shy children, all eager to enjoy the free show. While the men spend their days sweltering in the Courthouse or irrigating with tobacco-tainted saliva the sward adjacent thereto, the wives and daughters are haunting the shops or visiting their town acquaintances. The streets are ablaze with gaily-striped shirtwaists and shiny hats extensive as to brim, for thermometers under awnings register from 90 to 100 degrees.

AN EXTRAORDINARY CASE.

It is no ordinary case that has thus excited Glenn County's interest. It possesses features which would compel the attention of communities much more accustomed to sensational happenings, and before its present trial has progressed very far its developments will be discussed beyond the boundaries of California.

The story, briefly told, is that Mary Helen Murdock is endeavoring to collect from the estate of William Murdock, deceased, payment on a note for $100,000 and interest at 1 per cent. a month since the date of issuance, twenty-two years ago. William Murdock was a bachelor, whose cousin, Samuel, a widower, was father of Gawn Murdock, husband of the plaintiff in this case. William died on January 8, 1891, leaving an estate valued at $400,000. After the probate of the will was commenced Mrs. Gawn Murdock presented the note and demanded payment. With accumulated interest, her claim now amounts to $350,000. The executors of the estate protested that the note was not genuine, and their attorneys pronounced it a forgery. Then the claimant began suit to establish the validity of the note, but as the time for payment had not matured, the action was dismissed as premature. When the note became due, on September 5, 1897, the present suit was commenced, in accordance with the probate law, which provides that suits upon claims not due when presented must be commenced within two months after the date of maturity. This is the first time the case has been brought to open trial.

It is the prominence of the parties involved no less than the unusual phases of the plaintiff's claim that makes the case possess such interest for the people of Glenn County. The Murdocks were among the early settlers in the Sacramento Valley, and "Bill" and "Sam" were as well known to the old-timers as "Gawn" and his wife and their two stripling sons at present. In the succeeding generations of farming folk "Bill" was a bachelor of thrifty—almost miserly—habit, who made his wealth by wool-growing. It is told that no [illegible] while acquiring his thousands [illegible] When [illegible] he [illegible] his own [illegible] expressed [illegible] liverymen and made the [illegible] by carrying his own [illegible] his pockets. As long as he appeared to be worn with respect to common decency, he never patronized the clothing dealers. So, while making money, he made no friends.

"Sam" was also in the sheep business, but on a less extensive scale than his cousin. He inherited a considerable estate from his father, and his son Gawn lived with him. Early in the '70s Gawn married Mary Ellen Ashurst, daughter of a Tehama County farmer, and the couple have lived together ever since. One of their sons is cashier of the bank at Orland, and the other young man is in the hardware business at the same place. While the community is divided in opinion as to the genuineness of the wife's claim, there seems to be unanimous respect for her husband and sons, who are staunchly with her in her fight.

To people unacquainted with the parties in the case its interest consists in the great amount of money involved and the unusual features of the alleged transaction. Promises to pay $100,000 are not signed every day, nor is it usual to give a note for any amount payable twenty years from date of signature and drawing interest at the rate of 1 per cent. a month during the interim. Then there is the fact that the alleged signer of this note was a niggardly old bachelor, while its holder was a young married woman who is in no degree of kinship or any material consideration a wholesaler. To say nothing of the additional fact that the existence of such a document was not known to the old man's closest friends until he was on his deathbed, when, it is claimed, he pronounced it a forgery. These are features so uncommon as to attract widespread attention, and their investigation in open court by some of the oldest attorneys in California will be closely followed by millions of people who never before heard of Glenn County or its multimillionaire Murdocks.

The plaintiff's case is handled by Grove L. Johnson of Sacramento, W. P. Thompson of Fresno, W. M. Cannon of San Francisco, and Charles L. Donohue and Frank Freeman of Willows. For the defense the array of legal talent is no less imposing. It embraces General W. H. L. Barnes, E. S. Pillsbury and Richard Bayne of San Francisco, F. C. Lusk of Chico and Ben F. Geis of Willows.

Defendants in the suit are the executors of the William Murdock estate, consisting of B. H. Burton, cashier of the Bank of Willows; W. P. Harrington, cashier of the Colusa County Bank, and Adam Compton, farmer, a nephew of the deceased wool-grower and the principal beneficiary by his will. Burton and Harrington are heavy stockholders in the Bank of Willows.

THE PLAINTIFF'S CASE.

Mrs. Murdock's claim is clearly set forth in a deposition made by her to the executors, but her attorneys have some cards in reserve which they will not play unless their hand is forced.

It will be set forth that Samuel Murdock, father of plaintiff's husband, turned his surplus earnings over to his cousin William for safe keeping, and that this course was strongly opposed by his son Gawn. As a consequence, there were frequent quarrels between Samuel and his son, but between the older man and his daughter-in-law good feeling always existed. This situation came to an end in 1876, when father and son dissolved partnership, the latter paying a large sum of money for retention of the property, which was duly added to the hoard that Samuel had from time to time entrusted to William's custody. Then it was claimed by William that Gawn had not paid his father enough in the settlement, and a demand for $20,000 more was made, which Gawn paid, to avoid trouble. This final settlement was made on the day that the note for $100,000 was signed.

On this memorable occasion there were present in Gawn's house at Olimpo the three men, Mrs. Murdock and her two young children. When a settlement of William's account with Samuel was attempted it was found that all the money entrusted to the former for safe keeping was not available, and the balance of the amount due was transferred from Samuel to his daughter-in-law for the benefit of his two grandsons, of whom he was very fond. That was how the note in question came into being. Mrs. Murdock filled in the blank places, and William signed it then and there. Samuel had it made payable twenty years after date, so that it would fall due about the time the boys would become of age. If Samuel had not been on unfriendly terms with Gawn, the note would have been made payable to him instead of his wife. The rate of interest—1 per cent. a month—was not unreasonable at that time, when 1½ per cent. was freely paid on short loans.

While the note was carefully treasured, a great many people saw or heard of it before it attained maturity, say Mrs. Murdock's lawyers. It has been handled by witnesses who will be produced, and it has figured as a collateral security. One of the present defendant executors, W. H. Burton, knew of its existence during William Murdock's lifetime, and has since said that "had old Bill Murdock lived a while longer that note would have been lifted." It is further alleged by Grove L. Johnson and colleagues that F. C. Lusk, one of the attorneys for the defense, was William Murdock's legal advisor for some time prior to the old man's death, and that while so serving he knew of the note being held by Mrs. Murdock, and discussed it with his client.

THE PLAN OF DEFENSE.

To win the case the defense must prove either forgery or lack of consideration, and, from hints inadvertently dropped by General Barnes in court, it is inferred that he purposes to establish both, also, that the trial will be productive of interesting insinuations as to the plaintiff's character.

It will be claimed that Samuel Murdock's earthly possessions never exceeded in amount or value the sum of $18,000, and that his cousin William could not possibly have been indebted to him, as alleged by plaintiff. Witnesses will be called to testify that on his deathbed William denied having signed the note held by Gawn's wife or any promise to pay any one at any time a sum exceeding $150. Then the signature on this note will be compared with undisputed specimens of the dead man's chirography, to show that he did not write the former. This is where the experts will come in. Three of them—Daniel T. Ames, Carl Eisenschimmel and T. Kytka — have been here a week preparing photographic exhibits and noting the characteristics of William's penmanship.

In the line of defense it is also intended to be shown that the note held by Mrs. Murdock first came to light in 1890, about a year prior to the death of its alleged signer, when a San Francisco man named Megginson tried to sell it to Senator Stewart of Nevada. Megginson claimed that Mrs. Murdock had told him she had an uncle who was very rich and about to die, and that the note would be payable on its maturity from his estate, which was more than ample to meet its demand. The Senator wanted an explanation as to the "value received" mentioned in the note, and Megginson was unable to give it. If the consideration was valid, the Senator said he would cheerfully buy the note for the price asked, $5,000 in cash, but he must be satisfied on that point. As a result of this interview Mrs. Murdock went to Nevada and saw Senator Stewart, who, in the presence of his attorney, asked her what the consideration for the note had been. She replied that her "uncle" desired that she should inherit all his riches, but did not want to mention that fact in his will, so he gave her the note instead of making her his sole legatee. The attorney opined that such a consideration was absolutely void and the negotiation was declared off right there.

After that, it is claimed, Megginson took the note to Toledo, O., and there tried to dispose of it to his brother, a wealthy man. It had been indorsed by Mrs. Murdock, and the Ohio Megginson advanced $500 on it, pending his investigation of its validity. As a result of his inquiries he indorsed it back to Mrs. Murdock, and it bears both indorsements now.

It is the evident theory of the defense that the note is the outcome of a scheme concocted by Megginson and Mrs. Murdock to raise money by selling it, and that, failing in that object, they deemed it safer to assert its genuineness than to destroy it, because its existence had become known to several people who might prove troublesome if they suspected forgery. So it was presented for collection to the executors, and when they repudiated it Megginson became scared and fled the country. Attorneys for the estate say that he cannot be found.

Attorney Lusk states that an intimation of the note being in existence came to him while William Murdock was nigh to death, and that he asked the old man if he had ever signed such an obligation. The answer was a flat negative, supplemented with a desire that the claim be protested by the heirs.

Mrs. Murdock is not mentioned in William's will, but her husband was bequeathed $1,000. The remainder of the big estate, consisting of lands, livestock, bonds, stocks and cash, was divided in varying proportions between Mary Compton, sister of the deceased, who lives near Chico, and her children, Adam, Henry, Ira, Mary and Lizzie, Gawn Murdock, brother of the deceased, of Lake County, and his three children; Hanse Murdock, another brother, and Gawn Murdock, a cousin of deceased.

READY FOR THE FRAY.

Taking everything into consideration, it appears remarkable that an impartial and intelligent jury to try this case was impaneled within a week. Every man in the county knew the Murdocks, or some of them, and for five years the note has been a standard topic for the gossips. The case in all its bearings has been discussed in general merchandise stores and sewing circles and at church sociables and district reunions and other places where men or women congregated, and every man capable of forming an opinion was believed to be harboring one. It was with this belief that Sheriff Stanton had a hundred talesmen on hand when the case was called, and was ready to produce a hundred more when the first batch was excused. Superior Judge Pirkey had made arrangements to spend the summer, if necessary, in securing twelve good men and true, and the contending attorneys were prepared to talk each other into imbecility before they would yield a point of possible vantage in that jury box. Yet before forty of the first venire had been examined the panel was completed. In a week's time twelve men were found who could read and write, understand the nature of an oath and respected it, and had considered the Murdock note case without forming an opinion thereof that could not be nullified by the testimony of witnesses, the pleadings of counsel and the court's instructions.

They will have no easy time of it, these marvels of conscientious citizenship. Their latent prejudices will be appealed to and their emotions played upon like so many violins in the hands of virtuosos. Not one of them is a rich man, and they will frequently be reminded that this is a [illegible] wherein a comparatively poor woman—a woman, mind you, gentlemen, who were born of woman—is [illegible] her rights from a crowd of capitalists. On the other hand, every one of the jurymen has a little property, and he will be told with emphasis and at brief intervals that if the preposterous claim — putting it mildly—of this plaintiff is upheld by his vote, he cannot consistently expect his own last will and testament to be protected by the law which he has outraged.

The defense is cramped for a protracted siege. Grove L. Johnson, however, is responsible for the assertion that the fight will be over within a couple of weeks. His first witness, he declares, will sweep the wind completely out of the enemy's sails and leave their case a helpless wreck. General Barnes and his confreres say nothing about what their collective sleeves contain, but their corps of photographers and handwriting sharps are kept steadily at work.

TAKING OF TESTIMONY BEGUN.

When court convened to-day the plaintiff's case was clearly defined by her counsel, and her husband was examined in her behalf. Attorney W. M. Cannon outlined to the jury the case as they promise to prove it, and the interesting story was listened to by an immense crowd. Circumstances as to the giving of the note were told the court and the jury, and made a strong impression on the hearers. The consideration of the $100,000 note was told. Then money was advanced to William Murdock by Sam Murdock, father of Gawn, husband of the plaintiff. When the balance of the account was struck $20,000 was given William by Sam, and the note was made payable to Mrs. Murdock, for the benefit of the two sons, who would come of age at the time the note was made payable. The jury was told as to the note being buried, encased in sealed bottles and dug up after ten years.

Attorney Cannon said he would prove by the testimony and facts and from honest witnesses, and not by experts who testify to deductions and opinions.

Gawn Murdock, husband of the plaintiff, testified that he met William Murdock in Chico on September 1, 1877, and that William said: "I have made a settlement with your father, and given a note to your wife for $100,000, payable twenty years from date."

When the witness returned home his wife showed him the note. He was handed the note in question, and said that it was the one his wife showed him. He said the signature was William Murdock's. He knew his writing well.

When Grove L. Johnson offered the note in evidence the defense objected, bringing up the point as to the plaintiff having no standing in court, as the note was not presented to the executors according to law.

This point will be argued to-morrow morning. The jurors were excused until to-morrow.

THE PLAINTIFF'S CASE

Attorney Cannon Outlines What His Side Proposes To Prove---The Hearing Of Witnesses Begins.

At 2 o'clock Monday afternoon the trial of the Murdock note case was resumed. A large number of spectators were present. A score of ladies were in the court room and Judge Pirkey gallantly improved the first occasion to provide them with good seats.

Both sides consenting, the Court fixed the hours for daily session from 10 to 12 a. m. and 2 to 5 p. m.

Counsel of both sides concurring, Mrs. D. C. McCallum was sworn as a court reporter to assist her husband, the regular official.

All was in readiness for the actual trial to commence and Attorney Cannon stepped before the jury box to outline to the jury what the plaintiff proposes to prove. Mr. Cannon talked in a simple, earnest tone. The speech showed careful preparation and the points followed in natural sequence. Its delivery consumed about forty minutes. Once General Barnes interrupted to object to the statement at this time that the defense claimed criminality.

The following is an epitome of the opening statement: The time has arrived when the doors are to be thrown wide open and the whole world shall know all. First to the issue. A promissory note, dated September 5, 1877, payable twenty years after date, for $100,000, at 1 per cent per month, was executed by William Murdock on the day of its date. A claim based on it was presented to the executors, who neither rejected nor allowed it, and this suit is brought to recover the amount.

Every contention will be proved by people well known and thoroughly creditable.

The speaker digressed long enough to compliment the intelligence of the jury and the competency of the Judge.

Facts of Relationship.

William Murdock came to California in 1855 and settled on Angel slough in 1858. In 1860 he moved to Kanawha. He engaged in cattle and sheep raising, acquired government land, and grew to possess large means. His cousin, Sam Murdock, lived at Stony Creek in 1860 where he engaged in stock raising also. He, too, prospered. Sam's son, Gawn, became his partner. Gawn has lived nearly all his life at Orland. He is the husband of the plaintiff, Mary Helen Murdock. They have two sons, Edmund and Stanley. Sam's father lived at Grizzly Bend. Gawn Murdock is noted in the community for his sterling integrity. His name is a synonym for honesty. The plaintiff is the faithful partner of his joys and sorrows.

History of Consideration of Note.

In 1862 Sam loaned William $4,000 he had received from his father, and thereafter Sam yearly turned over to William the profits of his business. Gawn objected to this procedure; difficulty ensued and in 1876 the partnership was dissolved. Gawn agreed to buy out his father for $15,000. He paid $5,000 down, which sum was turned over to William. Sam left Gawn's house. He remained with William several months in 1877, during which time the latter persuaded him to demand a greater purchase price from Gawn. To avoid difficulty, Gawn then paid $20,000, part cash and the balance in securities. On September 5, 1877, Sam, William and Mary Helen Murdock assembled at Gawn's house to settle between Sam and William. A balance of $100,000 was struck and the note executed. This sum was intended as an inheritance for plaintiff's sons, Edmund and Stanley, and hence made payable twenty years from date. One per cent per month was a low rate at that time. There was always best of feeling between William and plaintiff. In making this note two previous ones were cancelled.

Afterwards William Murdock affirmed this note and its consideration to several parties. Words will come from the graves of William and Sam Murdock to refute the scandalous charges that have been made.

ORAL PIRKEY.

The Superior Judge who is presiding over the Murdock trial. Though of brief experience on the bench he is winning golden opinions for his able conduct of the exacting case.

Whereabouts of The Note.

Shortly after it was given, Mrs. Murdock wrapped it around a pencil; enclosed this in tinfoil; this in a vial; sealed this in a second vial, and this again in a third put this in a tin can; covered it with a saucer and buried it. After ten years (in 1887) the note was unearthed and taken to Sacramento where it might be needed in a purchase of land. Here it was seen by several persons. It was given to Gawn Murdock who put it in his private box in the vault of the Bank of Orland. In 1890 the note was sent to L. S. Megginson at San Francisco. In 1891 he sent it to his brother in Ohio, who in turn sent it back to Mrs. Murdock in 1894. Since that time it has been in the possession of plaintiff's attorneys.

"We shall prove to you that after the death of William Murdock one of the executors admitted that he knew of the note and that had William Murdock lived a week or two longer, it would have been compromised.

We will prove all this by well known witnesses. Will you hear them or will you accept the mere opinions of hired witnesses who come here to swear this note a forgery at so much per swear?"

General Barnes stated that the defendants would reserve their opening statement until all the plaintiff's testimony is in.

Mr. Cannon asked defendants' counsel to present the claim filed by Mrs. Murdock in 1891. The latter did not have these at hand.

Mr. Cannon asked defendants' counsel to admit the death of William Murdock, the appointment of Messrs. Harrington, Burton and Compton as executors, and the filing and proving of the will. The request was declined, and Clerk Sale was sworn as a witness. Mr. Sale testified to the papers filed in the estate.

Gawn Murdock on the Stand.

The Plaintiff then called Gawn Murdock to the stand.

The witness testified that he was 68 years old; was born in Ireland; came to America when 11 years old; lived successively at Grizzly Bend, Jacinto and Stony Creek. Wm Murdock was his father's cousin. He had seen the note. Mr. Johnson handed the note to him and he identified it. In September, 1877, he saw Wm. Murdock in Chico. William said he had just been to the ranch and settled with Sam; that he had given the $100,000 note. William said that he did not want him (Gawn) or Cam Ashurst to get any of the money. Gawn told William he didn't like the note; he objected to its running for so long a period. He went home from Chico and his wife showed him the note. He knew William Murdock's signature and recognized that of the note to be his.

Mr. Bayne objected to the introduction of the note in evidence. The plaintiff had filed her claim with the executors before the note became due and no explanation of its circumstance had been given. This point was argued and overruled by former Judge Moody. Judge Pirkey overruled it, but reconsidered his motion and asked that the matter be argued, as it was of too great importance to be passed lightly. It was decided to devote this morning's session to the point at law. The Jury was excused until 2 p. m., to-day. Mr. Bayne raised the additional point that the note has been endorsed and is therefore not payable to plaintiff.

TUESDAY'S SESSION.

The morning session was devoted to the argument of the defendant's objection to the introduction of the note.

A boquet of flowers relieved the austerity of the judicial desk.

Mr. Bayne argued his point at length, endeavoring to show the Court wherein the letter of the law had not been followed.

Mr. Cannon and Mr. Johnson then presented their view of the point at issue.

The argument of counsel are not produced since they are purely legal and not of general interest.

Judge Pirkey reserved his decision until after the noon recess.

When the afternoon session began Judge Pirkey at once decided the point submitted to him. He discussed the objection and stated that it resolved itself into a question of whether the note on its face was sufficient evidence as a claim. The Court believed it was, and the objection was overruled.

Gawn was recalled to the witness stand. He made a copy of the note when it was first shown him by his wife. He gave the copy to his wife. Witness told of the burying of the note just as narrated in the statement to the jury. Ten years after it was dug up and taken to Sacramento to the State Fair, where he saw Wm. Murdock. Six months later he received the note and placed it in the Bank of Orland. In the fall of 1890 he took out the note and gave it to plaintiff. He next saw the note in 1894 at Reddy & Campbells in San Francisco, and again in 1897 at Cannon & Freeman's

Cross-Examination By General Barnes

Witness talked to Wm. Murdock in Chico the 8th or 9th of September. William said he had received the $20,000, ($8,000 cash and two notes on Cam Ashurst and Bill Watkins) witness had paid his father Sam. Witness has kept an account with Bank of Orland since its organization about 1887. In Chico William told witness he (Gawn) needn't be mad at him any more since he had settled with Sam. Witness' quarrel with "Uncle Billy" began in 1872 because Sam paid $11,000 to William. Witness also disliked William because he had deeded a piece of land to his wife instead of to him. Subsequently he saw Sam pay $4,000 to William. Sam had kept the money under the wood pile. Witness had told William in Chico that he thought the note no good because William might have no money when it was due. William did not want Gawn or Cam Ashurst to have any of the money. Witness did not know of his personal knowledge that the plaintiff was at home on September 5, 1877. Previously plaintiff had gone to Allen Springs. Witness again identified the note. He testified that the writing of the note was by the plaintiff and the signature by William. Plaintiff had written out the note at Sam's request. Witness recalled very little of what his wife had said to him about the note when he first saw it. Sam Murdock did not read or figure. Witness did not know who figured out the $100,000 amount. Sam moved back to Gawn's in August before the note was made. Sam went to Chico and returned, on September 3rd.

General Barnes asked many questions concerning the whereabouts of William, Sam, Gawn and plaintiff about the time the note is said to have been given.

When William first told Gawn in Chico that he had given the note Gawn did not believe it. Witness remembered that Sam had turned over $5,600 to William in 1862; $2,000 in 1863; $17,000 in 1872; $5,000 in 1876; $20,000 in 1877.

The plaintiff had suggested the method of making up the note. Witness did not know the exact amount William owed Sam at the time the note was made.

General Barnes plied the witness with a long string of questions to ascertain from what transaction each of the sums paid by Sam to William was obtained. Witness' father owed him $10,000. Witness paid him $5000 in addition for his interest in the ranch. William persuaded Sam that he was underpaid. Sam demanded more. Witness then paid him $20,000—$8,000 in cash, the balance in securities.

A Daily Edition.

In line with its established policy of giving the people the best news in the best form, the PROMOTER will issue it daily during the continuance of the Murdock note case. In ordinary times neither the quantity nor quality of local news justifies a more frequent edition than that of every other day, but this big case at law is of special interest and a special effort will be made to keep our readers posted on its developments from day to day. The daily will be served to our subscribers without extra charge.

BUSINESS DONE WITHOUT BOOKS

How Gawn Murdock and His Father Sam Managed Their Affairs.

William Told Megginson That the Note Given Mary Helen Would Be Paid.

OBJECTION TO PLAINTIFF TESTIFYING

Argument on an Important Point in the Willows Case Will Be Made To-Day.

[Special Dispatch to "The Examiner."]

WILLOWS, April 12.—Gawn Murdock, the husband of Mary Helen Murdock, who is suing the executors of William Murdock's estate for $310,000, was cross-examined until 3 o'clock this afternoon by General Barnes, but although the witness could not remember some details, his testimony was quite strong and was given in a decidedly straightforward manner. The matter of partnership between the witness and his father, Samuel Murdock, was exhaustively gone into. It would seem that no books were kept, that Sam made sales of wool, sheep and other stock and took the money without consulting witness. When a settlement came up between them witness paid his father $5,000 in cash and canceled a charge of $10,000 against him on account of certain former transactions, making $15,000, the total amount of the settlement. At that time witness took a receipt from his father.

Witness was then questioned about his meeting with L. S. Megginson, to whom the note was first transferred by indorsement. He met Megginson while with his wife in the pavilion at Sacramento in 1890. They talked about the note, and Megginson said he would advance Mrs. Murdock money on it if it were good. The witness said that William Murdock was in the pavilion, and that they had better talk with him. They met William and after introducing Megginson, the latter told him that Mrs. Murdock wished to borrow some money on the $100,000 note, and wished to know if the note was all right. William replied that the note was good and that it would be paid when due. After a few interrogations as to the two indorsements on the note, one transferring the title from Mrs. Murdock to L. S. Megginson on November 5, 1890, and the other from L. S. to W. H. Megginson on October 16, 1891, the answers to which questions witness could not give, General Barnes said: "That is all."

The "surprise" referred to in to-day's "Examiner" was the testimony of T. J. Kirkpatrick, at one time Justice of the Peace. Mr. Kirkpatrick is sixty-five years of age and he has lived on Stony creek, near the Murdock place, for forty-three years. Mrs. Mary Helen Murdock is a sister to Kirkpatrick's wife. Witness testified substantially as follows:

I knew William Murdock intimately. In the year 1874 I heard a conversation between William and Sam at the Murdock home. [illegible] The conversation was about [illegible] William wanted Sam to [illegible] a note held by Mary. William wanted the interest reduced from 12 to 10 per cent. Sam would not agree. Later I had a conversation with William at my house. We talked about Sam and of the fact of his wanting to leave everything to his grandsons. I told William that Sam had been to see me and that I had drawn up an affidavit for him as to the indebtedness between them [illegible] that Sam wanted it to protect his grandchildren.

This affidavit was handed to witness and he was asked if that was the one referred to. He said it was. Witness stated that William read the affidavit and said that it was all right. Judge Pirkey overruled Barnes' objection to admitting the document in evidence and Grove L. Johnson read the affidavit. It was dated [illegible] October 31, 1874, and stated that money was loaned William from year to year and that affiant trusted to William to keep the books, etc. It closed in these words:

I have settled with William Murdock and have taken a note from him for the amount due me dated September 5, 1877, and made payable to Mary H. Murdock for the benefit of my two grandsons, Edmund and Samuel Murdock, and due twenty years from date.

General Barnes' cross-examination was brief and elicited no new facts.

The name of Mrs. Mary Helen Murdock was then called. The plaintiff was sworn and she had just answered the question as to her name, when General Barnes made an objection as to plaintiff testifying. The objection was made under a section which says that one who brings suit against executors of a deceased person cannot testify as to facts occurring before the death of such person. This would shut plaintiff out from telling of the transaction. The point will be argued to-morrow morning.

MURDOCK EXCUSED

T. J. Kirkpatrick Testifies for the Plaintiff.

Story of the Day's Proceedings Up to the Hour of Adjournment.

[illegible]

The cross examination by General Barnes of witness Gawn Murdock, yesterday afternoon, was principally as to the movements of witness at and about the time the $100,000 note is dated, September 5th, 1877, and as to the business transactions between William and Samuel Murdock (father of witness) and between witness and his father. The whereabouts of the note in all these years, was also gone into fully. Testified that he did not know of his own knowledge that his wife was at home on the day the note was dated. When he saw William Murdock at Chico, William said: "You needn't be mad any more. Your father gave me $20,000 and I have given Mary my note for $100,000, payable in twenty years." Said the writing in the note was that of his wife. Did not know how the $100,000 balance was arrived at. As to loans from Samuel to William, knew of $5,600 in 1862; $2,000 in 1863; $1,000 in 1872; $5,000 in 1876 and the final $20,000 in 1877. After settlement of witness with his father when partnership was dissolved, he paid his father $5,000 in cash and gave notes for a balance of $20,000, his father claiming the former settlement unjust.

The details of burying the note, digging it up, and about where it was taken, was then gone into. (This morning's examination tells that story.)

It was but a few minutes after 10 o'clock this morning when the jurymen had answered to their names and witness Gawn Murdock was again on the stand to be further cross-examined.

Witness desired to make a correction in his testimony, saying that if he stated that the last time he saw Wm. Murdock was at the Orland Bank when a deed was signed, such statement was incorrect, the last time he saw Wm. Murdock was at the ranch of witness. Testified, answering General Barnes, that he did not know the expenses of Samuel and family when they came to California were paid by William. Said expenses were paid by his father. Said his father started business with about 600 or 700 sheep, that was in 1851. Witness had some money when he was 15 years of age which was given him by his great uncle, Joseph McCafford. The sum was $2,000. Understood that the money, which was in his father's name, was used in the purchase of sheep. Witness went into partnership with his father in 1861, was to own one-half of the stock and was to do the herding. All the business witness engaged in was that with his father up to 1876. His father never had any stock outside of that belonging to the partnership. Not all loans from Samuel to William was that from the partnership earnings; $4,000 of it was from an inheritance.

Didn't think the loan of $5,600 made in 1862 was money from partnership business. All other moneys after this was sales of sheep, wool, etc., belonging to witness and his father. This money was simply "taken" by Samuel without consulting witness. When land was bought with partnership moneys, as far as he knows, deeds were made in name of witness. When sales were made, father of witness most of the time attended to such sales and usually kept the money.

His father knew that deeds were made in name of witness.

Down to 1876 don't think they had but little land. When settlement with his father came he paid his father $5,000 in [illegible] charged him with $10,000, the [illegible] being account [illegible] to [illegible]. His father agreed to this, [illegible] receipt from his father, Cannon and [illegible] all errors, had receipt [illegible] (the) barnes asked the attorneys to produce it and it was handed over. Was shown to witness by Barnes and witness identified it. (Marked as defendant's exhibit 5.)

Testified that the receipt was in his (witness) handwriting. General Barnes read the document, which was written in the first person, as: "Today I have settled with my father," etc., etc., and was signed by Gawn W. Murdock and Samuel Murdock, with a cross for the mark of latter. The jury inspected the paper.

Resuming, witness said the $5,000 paid his father was in full for sheep, land and everything owned by the partnership. The settlement was really for $15,000, the balance of $10,000, being an amount he considered over Samuel's partnership share loaned to William. No set valuation was put on the stock on hand. Could not tell how the amount of settlement was arrived at, but the sum of $15,000 was struck as the amount which would be mutually satisfactory. The $5,000 paid his father was from sale of stock and was money be believed his father had no interest in. Afterwards gave his father $20,000 when an unjust settlement was claimed; ($5,600 of this was in cash from sale of grain; balance was in notes.) One note was from Caut Ashurst and was for about $10,000, the other was a note from one Watkins for $2,000. Witness didn't know if he voted in 1877; couldn't remember as to voting or election; thought his precinct was called Olimpo. Said the precinct was changed to Orland and that he was instrumental in the change.

Did not know that there was an election on September 5, 1877, the day note was made. Did not know whether or no William Murdock voted on that day at Kanawha. General Barnes read the ticket as voted for on that day.

A certain visit made by witness at home of Gawn Murdock Sr. at Upper Lake was gone into. Witness did not remember that he spoke there of his father's financial condition, and said that he did not say there that his father was never worth over $25,000. Never said there that he had a row with his father because deeds for land were put in name of witness, nor that he had "got the best of the old man."

A trip made by witness and wife from Bartletts to Ukiah was brought up. They stopped at Gawn Sr.'s house. Did not remember that his wife Mary Helen, told Gawn Jr. that he ought to go over and make up with Uncle Billy so that he might get some of his money, as Bill was worth over a million dollars. Didn't remember of saying that William had about $300,000 in the bank and didn't owe anything, nor that William was worth more than the Glenn estate, as it was heavily in debt, and that William didn't owe anything.

Witness told of going to State Fair in 1887. Didn't remember the race where "Yolo Maid" won in three straight heats. Saw William at Sacramento then. Witness and wife called on Dr. Hicks, whom his wife knew. Didn't remember how the note was carried, but his wife had it.

Met Megginson in 1890 in Pavilion at Sacramento. Wife introduced them. They talked of the note, as to its being good. Witness said that William was there and had better talk with him. They found William alone in pavilion; Megginson was introduced, Megginson told William that Mrs. Murdock was talking of borrowing some money on this $100,000 note and wanted to know if it was good. William replied that the note was good and he would pay it when due.

The matter of the two endorsements which appear on the back of the celebrated note came in for some attention. One of these endorsements is that of an assignment or transference to L. S. Megginson dated in 1891, and the other, dated 1891, an assignment from L. S. to W. H. Megginson.

Objections galore came up in the course of General Barnes' questioning as to these endorsements, the grounds being that the questioning was not proper cross-examination and the matter only hearsay with witness.

The courtroom was crowded in the afternoon, the fair sex being in the majority. General Barnes in his continuance of the cross-examination of Gawn Murdock, took up the matter of these endorsements and the man Megginson. Witness said he had never seen Mr. Megginson at his (witness) home. Couldn't recollect of seeing the note at all between 1890 and 1894. In the year 1890 thought he, very probably, borrowed money.

A mortgage of something over $11,500 made in September, 1889 to Bank of Orland, mortgage being on property of witness, was referred to by General Barnes, and reference made as to Mrs. Murdock trying to borrow money at that time. Witness remembered the mortgage but not the date; did not remember of his wife's trying to borrow money then. Did not remember particulars as to Samuel setting up witness' brother Alexander in business. Did not recollect particulars as to his loan to Caut. Ashurst.

(Continued on page 4.)

Attorney Johnson offered in evidence a paper as to an agreed settlement between witness and his father, made September 3, 1877, at Chico, in the office of Mr. Halleck, a Notary. Witness testified that the paper was drawn up in presence of himself and father at Mr. Halleck's office, and to his best recollection it was there read. Attorney Barnes objected to the document's introduction, claiming the paper only hearsay, and not attested or acknowledged in any legal form. Witness did not know that the paper was read in the presence of himself and father. Witness kept the paper and there was no copy of it. Attorney Johnson read the paper. It recited a settlement between Samuel Murdock and Gawn W. Murdock and gave certain details as to such settlement and acknowledgement of money, notes, etc. The paper was put in evidence, Judge Parkey overruling the objection. Answering General Barnes, witness testified that this settlement was made after his father returned from his stay at William's house; about a week afterwards, he thought. "That is all" said General Barnes.

Attorney Johnson then asked witness as to his leaving home on the first days of September, 1877 for Chico. His wife was not at home when he left home on the 4th, his wife was home when witness returned. When he settled with his father, he allowed his father all claims as to loans made to William Murdock. Never had any regular yearly settlements in the partnership business with his father. His father made most of the sales.

General Barnes asked witness as to who went to Allen Springs with him in 1877. He named the parties. Witness was excused.

T. J. Kirkpatrick was called. Testified was 65 years of age, lived at Stony Creek, lived there 43 years; brother-in-law of Gawn Murdock; Gawn married his wife's sister. Knew William Murdock intimately; and William was the seventh or eighth man he met in California. In 1878 heard a conversation between William and Samuel. The two men, himself and Mary Helen Murdock were present at Murdock's house. The conversation was about a reduction in interest William wanted Samuel to make on a $100,000 note held by Mary; wanted interest reduced from 12 per cent to 10. Sam would not agree to lower the interest. Later had a conversation with William at house of witness; talked about Samuel and of his "willing" his property to his grandsons and leaving his other relatives out. Witness asked William if he succeeded in getting the interest lowered; William answered that he had not. Witness told William that Samuel had been to see him and had witness draw up an affidavit as to William's indebtedness to Samuel in order to protect his (Samuel's) grandchildren.

This affidavit was shown witness and he said in answer as to whether that was the affidavit: "Yes, sir; that is the paper."

Testified that William read the affidavit at that time and said it was all right.

After the overruling of an objection as to its admittance attorney Johnson read the document. It was dated October 31, 1879, at Olimpo. It commenced: "I, Samuel Murdock, will make a true statement," etc., and went on to say what the statement would be as to William Murdock's business transactions with him.

It recited as to different amounts loaned William, and mentioned the $20,000 loaned William, and the taking of a note dated September 5, 1877 payable to Mary H. Murdock for benefit of grandsons Edmund and Stanley. It was witnessed by T. J. Kirkpatrick as Justice of the Peace.

After recess, General Barnes, questioned witness closely as to the affidavit, the making of it and particulars.

Mr. Kirkpatrick was excused and Mrs. Mary Helen Murdock, the plaintiff, called to the stand. General Barnes objected to the witness giving testimony and the matter was being argued when court adjourned.

AFFIDAVIT OF A DEAD MAN.

Samuel Murdock Acknowledged a Debt to His Brother.

HIS STATEMENT OF THEIR DEALINGS IS PRODUCED.

THE JUSTICE OF THE PEACE WHO MADE IT [illegible] ON THE STAND.

Document a Hard Blow to the Defense, Which Claims That It Has Been Manufactured.

Special D[illegible]

WILLOWS, April 1[illegible].—A [illegible] was landed in the [illegible] of the defense in the celebrated [illegible] note [illegible] to-day when the attorneys for Mrs. [illegible] Murdock introduced in evidence an affidavit made in 1879 by Samuel Murdock detailing his financial relations with William Murdock, who it is alleged by the complainant signed the celebrated note in 1877.

The [illegible] Thomas J. Kirkpatrick, a brother-in-law of Gawn Murdock, was called to the stand. He swore that when a Justice of the Peace on October 31, 1879, he had drawn up the following affidavit for Samuel Murdock:

October 31, 1879—Olimpo, Colusa County, California: I, Samuel Murdock, will make a true statement of the business transactions that have existed between myself and William Murdock, both of Colusa county, State of California. Particulars [illegible]. I began loaning money to said William Murdock in the years of 1861 or '62, I will not say which, and did continue to loan to the said William Murdock my money until 1877. The first he borrowed from me was money that was left to me by my father's estate and my brother, William Murdock, who had previously died in [illegible].

I let him have $[illegible] the first loan. I then loaned him the money that I sold my wool and sheep for from year to year, and trusted to William Murdock to keep the accounts, as I had no education. I think he kept the books as correct as he could until the last transaction, the settlement with Gawn Murdock. I loaned him $5,000 in April, 1876, and when I made my final settlement with Gawn Murdock I loaned William Murdock $20,000 the 5th of September, 1877, which was about two thousand.

I have settled with William Murdock and have taken a note from him for the amount due me, dated September 5, 1877, and a note payable to Mary H. Murdock for the benefit of my two grandsons, Edmund and Samuel Murdock, and due twenty years from date. His

SAMUEL X MURDOCK
Mark.

"State of California, county of Colusa—On this, the 31st day of October, 1879, before me, T. J. Kirkpatrick, Justice of the Peace in and for Stony Creek township, Colusa county, personally appeared Samuel Murdock, known to me to be the person whose name is subscribed to the within instrument, and he acknowledged to me that he executed the same. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and private seal, having no seal of office, the day and year in this certificate first above written.

"T. J. KIRKPATRICK, Justice of the Peace."

This document, which the defense declares a forgery, was not known to exist by any one but those immediately interested in the prosecution of the case, and its exhibition in court and identification by Kirkpatrick was a stunning blow to the lawyers for the defense. Kirkpatrick, a man of 65, who has lived for forty-three years at Stony Creek, sixteen miles from here, was formerly a Baptist minister. He is known by every one in Glenn county, and his startling story of William Murdock's admission of the existence of the $100,000 note, together with the affidavit drawn so many years ago, struck like a voice from the grave. It created consternation on the other side, and General Barnes, when he recovered from his astonishment, pronounced Kirkpatrick's testimony perjury and the document a rank forgery.

Kirkpatrick followed Gawn Murdock on the stand. He was closely cross-examined by the defense, but his plain replies to the questions of the lawyers made a deep impression on the jury. He said that Gawn Murdock and he had married sisters, and he had a lifelong acquaintance with the Murdocks. In 1879 he heard a conversation between William and Samuel Murdock at the latter's house about a reduction in interest that William wanted Samuel to make on a note for $100,000 held by Mary Helen Murdock, Gawn's wife. William urged that 10 per cent and not 12 per cent a year was sufficient, but Samuel, Gawn's father, would not agree.

Later Kirkpatrick talked with William about the matter and of Samuel's disposing of his property to his grandsons in the note made to his son's wife, to the exclusion of his children. Kirkpatrick said he had asked William if he had succeeded in having the interest on the $100,000 note lowered, and William replied in the negative. The witness informed William that Samuel had had him (witness) make for him a statement of his (William's) indebtedness to him, to which Samuel swore. Samuel could not write himself and said he did this to protect his grandchildren after his death.

When the affidavit was handed to Kirkpatrick to identify he said it was the same he had written and affixed his seal to in 1879 and which he had shown to William. He testified that William had read it and acknowledged its correctness.

Attorney Grove Johnson, for the complainant, who had been questioning Kirkpatrick, halted here and turned over the witness to General Barnes, leading counsel for the defense. Barnes was stumped and a recess was taken, during which Barnes, Lurk, Hayes and [illegible], attorneys for the defense, put their heads together. They had been utterly unprepared for the evidence of Kirkpatrick as to William Murdock's

TROUBLES PATCHED UP.

James Treadwell Compromises With the Girl He Beat.

MANY LEGAL TWISTS AND TURNS AT SAN JOSE.

THE [illegible] DAMAGE SUIT AGAINST THE YOUNG [illegible] TO BE WITHDRAWN.

Lawyers' Efforts to Fix Have the Couple Are Vain, and They Are Said to Have Gone East Together.

Special Dispatch to the "Chronicle."

SAN JOSE, April 1[illegible].—There were sensational developments here to-day in the matter of the trouble that James [illegible]

[illegible]

MURDOCK EXCUSED

T. J. Kirkpatrick Testifies for the Plaintiff.

Story of the Day's Proceedings Up to the Hour of Adjournment.

The cross examination by General Barnes of witness Gawn Murdock, yesterday afternoon, was principally as to the movements of witness at and about the time the $100,000 note is dated, September 5th, 1877, and as to the business transactions between William and Samuel Murdock (father of witness) and between witness and his father. The whereabouts of the note in all these years, was also gone into fully. Testified that he did not know of his own knowledge that his wife was at home on the day the note was dated. When he saw William Murdock at Chico, William said: "You needn't be mad any more. Your father gave me $20,000 and I have given Mary my note for $100,000, payable in twenty years." Said the writing in the note was that of his wife. Did not know how the $100,000 balance was arrived at. As to loans from Samuel to William, knew of $5,600 in 1862; $2,000 in 1863; $9,000 in 1872; $5,000 in 1876 and the final $20,000 in 1877. After settlement of witness with his father when partnership was dissolved, he paid his father $8,000 in cash and gave notes for a balance of $20,000, his father claiming the former settlement unjust.

The details of burying the note, digging it up, and about where it was taken, was then gone into. (This morning's examination tells that story.)

It was but a few minutes after 10 o'clock this morning when the jurymen had answered to their names and witness Gawn Murdock was again on the stand to be further cross-examined.

Witness desired to make a correction in his testimony, saying that if he stated that the last time he saw Wm. Murdock was at the Orland Bank when a deed was signed, such statement was incorrect; the last time he saw Wm. Murdock was at the ranch of witness. Testified, answering General Barnes, that he did not know the expenses of Samuel and family when they came to California were paid by William. Said expenses were paid by his father. Said his father started business with about 600 or 700 sheep; that was in 1858. Witness had some money when he was 15 years of age which was given him by his great uncle, Joseph McGifford. The sum was $2,000. Understood that the money, which was in his father's name, was used in the purchase of sheep. Witness went into partnership with his father in 1861; was to own one-half of the stock and was to do the herding. All the business witness engaged in was that with his father up to 1876. His father never had any stock outside of that belonging to the partnership. Not all loans from Samuel to William was that from the partnership earnings, $1,000 of it was from an inheritance.

Didn't think the loan of $5,600 made in 1862 was money from partnership business. All other moneys after this was sales of sheep, wool, etc., belonging to witness and his father. This money was simply "taken" by Samuel without consulting witness. When land was bought with partnership moneys, as far as he knows, deeds were made in name of witness. When sales were made, father of witness most of the time attended to such sales and usually kept the money.

His father knew that deeds were made in name of witness.

Down to 1876 don't think they had but little land. When settlement with his father came he paid his father $5,000 in cash and charged him with $10,000, the charge being account former business transactions. His father agreed to that. Took receipt from his father, Cannon and Freeman, attorneys, had receipt. General Barnes asked the attorneys to produce it and it was handed over. Was shown to witness by Barnes and witness identified it. (Marked as defendant's exhibit 3.)

Testified that the receipt was in his (witness) handwriting. General Barnes read the document, which was written in the first person, as: "Today I have settled with my father," etc., etc., and was signed by Gawn W. Murdock and Samuel Murdock, with a cross for the mark of latter. The jury inspected the paper.

Resuming, witness said the $5,000 paid his father was in full for sheep, land and everything owned by the partnership. The settlement was really for $15,000, the balance of $10,000, being an amount he considered over Samuel's partnership share loaned to William. No set valuation was put on the stock on hand. Could not tell how the amount of settlement was arrived at, but the sum of $15,000 was struck as the amount which would be mutually satisfactory. The $5,000 paid his father was from sale of stock and was money he believed his father had no interest in. Afterwards gave his father $20,000 when an unjust settlement was claimed; ($8,000 of this was in cash from sale of grain; balance was in notes.) One note was from Cam Ashurst and was for about $10,000; the other was a note from one Watkins for $2,000. Witness didn't know if he voted in 1877, couldn't remember as to voting at election; thought his precinct was called Olimpo. Said the precinct was changed to Orland and that he was instrumental in the change.

Did not know that there was an election on September 5, 1877, the day note was made. Did not know whether or no William Murdock voted on that day at Kanawha. General Barnes read the ticket as voted for on that day.

A certain visit made by witness at home of Gawn Murdock Sr at Upper Lake was gone into. Witness did not remember that he spoke there of his father's financial condition, and said that he did not say there that his father was never worth over $25,000. Never said there that he had a row with his father because deeds for land were put in name of witness, nor that he had "got the best of the old man."

A trip made by witness and wife from Bartletts to Ukiah was brought up. They stopped at Gawn Sr's house. Did not remember that his wife, Mary Helen, told Gawn Jr. that he ought to go over and make up with Uncle Billy so that he might get some of his money, as Bill was worth over a million dollars. Didn't remember of saying that William had about $300,000 in the bank and didn't owe anything, nor that William was worth more than the Glenn estate, as it was heavily in debt, and that William didn't owe anything.

Witness told of going to State Fair in 1887. Didn't remember the race where "Yolo Maid" won in three straight heats. Saw William at Sacramento then. Witness and wife called on Dr. Hicks, whom his wife knew. Didn't remember how the note was carried, but his wife had it.

Met Megginson in 1890 in Pavilion at Sacramento. Wife introduced them. They talked of the note, as to its being good. Witness said that William was there and had better talk with him. They found William alone in pavilion; Megginson was introduced; Megginson told William that Mrs. Murdock was talking of borrowing some money on this $100,000 note and wanted to know if it was good. William replied that the note was good and he would pay it when due.

The matter of the two endorsements which appear on the back of the celebrated note came in for some attention. One of these endorsements is that of an assignment or transference to L. S. Megginson dated in 1890, and the other, dated 1892, an assignment from L. S. to W. H. Megginson.

Objections galore came up in the nature of General Barnes' questioning as to these endorsements, the grounds being that the questioning was not proper cross-examination and the matter only hearsay with witness.

The court-room was crowded in the afternoon, the fair sex being in the majority. General Barnes in his continuance of the cross-examination of Gawn Murdock, took up the matter of these endorsements and the man Megginson. Witness said he had never seen Mr. Megginson at his (witness) home. Couldn't recollect of seeing the note at all between 1890 and 1894. In the year 1890 thought he, very probably, borrowed money.

A mortgage of something over $11,500 made in September, 1889 to Bank of Orland, mortgage being on property of witness, was referred to by General Barnes, and reference made as to Mrs. Murdock trying to borrow money at that time. Witness remembered the mortgage but not the date; did not remember of his wife's trying to borrow money then. Did not remember particulars as to Samuel setting up witness' brother Alexander in business. Did not recollect particulars as to his loan to Cam. Ashurst.

Attorney Johnson offered in evidence a paper as to an agreed settlement between witness and his father, made September 3, 1877, at Chico, in the office of Mr. Halleck, a Notary. Witness testified that the paper was drawn up in presence of himself and father at Mr. Halleck's office, and to his best recollection it was there read. Attorney Barnes objected to the document's introduction, claiming the paper only hearsay, and not attested or acknowledged in any legal form. Witness did not know that the paper was read in the presence of himself and father. Witness kept the paper and there was no copy of it. Attorney Johnson read the paper. It recited a settlement between Samuel Murdock and Gawn W. Murdock and gave certain details as to such settlement and acknowledgement of money, notes, etc. The paper was put in evidence, Judge Pirkey overruling the objection. Answering General Barnes, witness testified that this settlement was made after his father returned from his stay at William's house; about a week afterwards, he thought. "That is all" said General Barnes.

Attorney Johnson then asked witness as to his leaving home in the first days of September, 1877 for Chico. His wife was not at home when he left home on the 4th, his wife was home when witness returned. When he settled with his father, he allowed his father all claims as to loans made to William Murdock. Never had any regular yearly settlements in the partnership business with his father. His father made most of the sales.

General Barnes asked witness as to who went to Allen Springs with him in 1877. He named the parties. Witness was excused.

T. J. Kirkpatrick was called. Testified was 65 years of age; lived at Stony Creek; lived there 43 years; brother-in-law of Gawn Murdock; Gawn married his wife's sister. Knew William Murdock intimately; and William was the seventh or eighth man he met in California. In 1878 heard a conversation between William and Samuel. The two men, himself and Mary Helen Murdock were present at Murdock's house. The conversation was about a reduction in interest William wanted Samuel to make on a $100,000 note held by Mary; wanted interest reduced from 12 per cent to 10. Sam would not agree to lower the interest. Later had a conversation with William at home of witness; talked about Samuel and of his "willing" his property to his grandsons and leaving his other relatives out. Witness asked William if he succeeded in getting the interest lowered; William answered that he had not. Witness told William that Samuel had been to see him and had witness draw up an affidavit as to William's indebtedness to Samuel in order to protect his (Samuel's) grandchildren.

This affidavit was shown witness and he said in answer as to whether that was the affidavit "Yes, sir, that is the paper."

Testified that William read the affidavit at that time and said it was all right.

After the overruling of an objection as to its admittance attorney Johnson read the document. It was dated October 31, 1879, at Olimpo. It commenced: "I, Samuel Murdock, will make a true statement," etc., and went on to say what the statement would be as to William Murdock's business transactions with him.

It recited as to different amounts loaned William, and mentioned the $20,000 loaned William, and the taking of a note dated September 5, 1877 payable to Mary H. Murdock for benefit of grandsons Edmund and Stanley. It was witnessed by T. J. Kirkpatrick as Justice of the Peace.

After recess, General Barnes, questioned witness closely as to the affidavit, the making of it and particulars.

Mr. Kirkpatrick was excused and Mrs. Mary Helen Murdock, the plaintiff, called to the stand. General Barnes objected to the witness giving testimony and the matter was being argued when court adjourned.

Sensation in the Note Case.

OLD AFFIDAVIT IS PRODUCED

DESCRIBES THE DEAL BETWEEN THE BROTHERS.

Former Justice of the Peace Kirkpatrick Says William Murdock Admitted Having Executed the Note.

Special Dispatch to The Call.

WILLOWS, April 12.—When the Murdock note case was resumed this morning Gawn Murdock, husband of the plaintiff, was on the stand and his cross-examination was continued by General Barnes. He repeated much of his testimony of yesterday, giving dates and the sums of money given by Samuel Murdock to William Murdock. The witness told his story in a simple, straightforward manner that carried conviction.

The next witness was T. J. Kirkpatrick, a prominent farmer and a brother-in-law of the plaintiff, and it was during his examination that the first genuine surprise or sensation of the trial was sprung. Witness testified that he was Justice of the Peace in 1877 and 1878 in the township in which G. W. Murdock and Samuel Murdock lived. Samuel Murdock, William Murdock and himself were very friendly. Witness was the adviser of Samuel in the latter's lifetime. Two years after the day of the signing of the note in question Samuel called on the witness and said he wanted him to act as guardian of his grandchildren (the children of plaintiff) and if anything should happen to him (Samuel) before the note came due he wanted witness to see that the money went to his grandchildren. In order that Kirkpatrick should be advised as to particulars, Samuel Murdock wished to make an affidavit, and did swear to the following:

October 31, 1879. Olimpo, Colusa County, California. I, Samuel Murdock will make a true statement of the business transactions that have existed between myself and William Murdock, both of Colusa County, State of California, Postoffice Kanawa. I began loaning money to said William Murdock in the year of 1861 or '62, I will not say which, and did continue to loan to the said William Murdock my money until 1877. The first he borrowed from me was money that was left to me by my father's estate and my brother William Murdock, who had previously died in Grizzly Bend, Butte County. I let him have that the first loan. I then loaned him the money that I sold my wool and sheep for from year to year and trusted to William Murdock to keep the accounts as I had no education. I think he kept the books as correct as he could until the last transaction, the settlement with Gawn Murdock. I loaned him $5000 in April, 1876, and when I made my last settlement with Gawn Murdock I loaned William Murdock the $20,000 the 5th of September, 1877, which was about two years ago. I have settled with William Murdock and have taken a note from him for the amount due me, dated September 5, 1877, and made payable to Mary H. Murdock for the benefit of my two grandsons, Edmund and Samuel Murdock, and due twenty years from date.

(his)
SAMUEL X MURDOCK.
(mark)

State of California, County of Colusa.

On this the 31st day of October, 1879, before me, T. J. Kirkpatrick, a Justice of the Peace in and for Stony Creek Township, Colusa County, personally appeared Samuel Murdock, known to me to be the person whose name is subscribed to the within instrument, and he acknowledged to me that he executed the same.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and private seal, having no seal of office, the day and year in this certificate first above written.

T. J. KIRKPATRICK,
Justice of the Peace.

This affidavit he showed to William Murdock, two months after it was made, and, the reasons for making it having been explained, William Murdock said it was all right.

The introduction of this document, which looks as old as it purports to be, created a sensation.

The witness also testified to having been present at a conversation between Samuel and William Murdock in 1878, at which time William was trying to induce Samuel to reduce the interest on the note from 12 per cent to 10 per cent per annum.

WITNESS MURDOCK.

The Plaintiff's Husband Is Undergoing A Most Searching Cross-Examination By General Barnes.

Apr. 12 -

The cross-examination of witness Gawn Murdock, husband of plaintiff was concluded this afternoon by General Barnes. The examination was thorough and far reaching. The witness answered questions in a simple straight-forward manner.

At the press hour yesterday afternoon Gawn Murdock was on the witness stand. His subsequent testimony follows:

William did not attend Sam's funeral. For about twelve years previously William did not visit Sam's family. Witness had spoken to Wm. Murdock about the note in September, 1890, at the State Fair pavilion at Sacramento. William then said that the note was all right and would be paid when due. This was said in the presence of L. S. Megenson, from whom plaintiff wished to borrow money.

Witness had talked to his father Sam about the note. At the time the note was made Sam's immediate relatives were his son Gawn, his daughter Mary Ann, and the children of each.

Of the $11,000 turned over by Sam to William in 1872, $2,000 was in payment for a tract of land deeded by William to plaintiff.

A portion of the written deed was in the possession of plaintiff's counsel. By request it was handed the witness who identified it. It was placed in evidence by the defendants over the plaintiff's objection. This deed had been found defective in 1890 and a new one was made out. This was produced and introduced in evidence in the same manner as the other.

The last time witness saw William was on the occasion of William's signing the deed at the Bank of Orland. No reference was made to the note at that time.

At this period Court adjourned until ten o'clock this morning.

WEDNESDAY SESSION.

When Court was called this morning Gawn Murdock, who was on the stand, stated that he wished to make a correction. Mr. Johnson had informed him that he had testified that the last time he saw Wm. Murdock was on the occasion of the signing of the deed in the Bank of Orland in 1890. This was a mistake. Witness had seen William at a later date than this.

Witness told of his father's family coming from Ireland to the United States in 1854. He denied that the transportation expenses had been paid by Wm. Murdock. With $2,000 given him by his mother's uncle, Joseph McGifford, in New York witness had gone into the sheep raising business with his father Sam in 1861. Witness stated that a part of the money loaned by Sam to William were profits arising from the partnership business of Sam and Gawn and a portion of the money therefore belonged to Gawn though it was all claimed by his father Sam. So far as witness remembered the deeds of all lands purchased by him for the partnership were made out in his own name. The money used in the purchase was profits from [illegible] of sheep. Witness' father knew that he (Gawn) was having the deeds made out to himself and not to the partnership [illegible] formed for part of their [illegible]ested.

[illegible] witness dissolved the partnership [illegible] his father he agreed to give Sam $15,000 for his share. Gawn claimed that $10,000 of the money Sam had loaned William belonged to him. This was counted in the transaction and the balance of $5,000 was paid in gold coin. Witness had taken a receipt for this $5,000.

Upon inquiry by General Barnes this receipt was produced by plaintiff's attorney, identified by witness, and placed in evidence. This receipt was a statement written out by the witness, bearing date of April 26, 1876 and signed by him and Sam, the latter making his mark. It was signed at Gawn's house.

This receipt was submitted to the scrutiny of the jury.

Witness did not recall just how he and his father arrived at the $15,000 settlement. Sam said he would be satisfied if Gawn paid him $5,000 in cash and called their account square. Witness thought the partnership property was worth about $30,000. A quarrel followed this and a second settlement was made in 1877. Gawn paid Sam $20,000, of which $5,00 was coin, $10,000 in notes of Cam Ashurst, and $2000 in a note of Bill Watkins. Three Ashurst notes were for money loaned. This money had come out of the partnership, but witness claimed it it belonged to him.

Witness lived in Olimpo precinct. He did not know whether he voted in 1877. He was instrumental in having Olimpo included in Orland precinct in that year. Witness did not know whether Wm. Murdock voted that fall.

He was in the woods with Gawn St., and Gawn G. Murdock near Upper Lake in September, 1891. Witness denied that Gawn St., had said that he understood Sam to be worth $50,000. Witness denied that he had talked at that time about the settlement with his father, or that he had said that he "got ahead of the old man," or that he made a number of statements concerning the settlement, which statements were read to him by General Barnes.

At Gawn Sr's in the fall of 1887 plaintiff did not say to Gawn G. that he ought to make up with William so as to get a part of the million dollar estate. Witness also denied making at that time a number of statements which counsel read to him.

Witness was requestioned about the visit of himself and wife to the State Fair in 1887. His wife had the note with her. She wanted to buy property in Sacramento and trotting horses.

Witness first met L. S. Megenson in Sacramento in 1890. Megenson talked like he would loan some money on the note if the note was all right. Witness, plaintiff and Megenson went together and hunted up Wm. Murdock in the pavilion. Megenson asked about the note for $100,000. William said it was all right and would be paid when due. Megenson has since visited witness at Stony Creek.

General Barnes questioned witness about the endorsements on the note, one of Nov. 6, 1890 to Lawrence S. Megenson and one of Oct. 15, 1891 to Wm. H. Megenson. Mr. Johnson objected but was overruled.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Witness testified that L. S. Megenson was at his home at Stony Creek in 1891, and again one week ago. Witness knew that note was endorsed to W. H. Megenson, but he never saw the man.

Witness borrowed $11,500 from Bank of Orland in 1890 on a mortgage. In 1891 he borrowed $15,000 from S. P. Union and paid at the Orland Bank.

Sam Murdock deeded all his land in Tehama county to his grandsons before he died.

In 18[illegible] Sam took more than 1,000 sheep out of the partnership flock and gave them to witness' brother Alex to start him in business. Witness told of buying property from Cam Ashurst and paying $12,000 for it out of the partnership fund.

The written second settlement between witness and his father was produced in Court. It was made out by a Notary Public in Chico named Samuel Hallett. General Barnes questioned witness regarding this paper.

With this the cross-examination closed.

Re-Examination by Mr. Johnson.

In reply to Mr. Johnson witness stated that his father Sam died March 31, 1880.

While the partnership existed, Sam made most of the sales, and there was no settlement between father and son at stated periods.

Mr. Johnson had no further questions and the witness was excused.

T. J. Kirkpatrick of Stony Creek was then called by the plaintiff.

IS IT FORGERY?

Attorney Lusk Says That is the One Issue.

The Third Day of the Great Murdock Case Finds Ten Jurymen Passed —The Proceedings.

Apr — 13 -

As we went to press yesterday afternoon, C. M. Sehorn had been passed as a juryman without challenge.

Isaac Miller of Butte City was called. Mr. Miller is slightly deaf but said he could hear an ordinary conversation. Mr. Miller did not remember of conversing about this case with either Mike Casey or Van Branham and did not recollect saying on the 23rd of February last that this was a "scheme of the lawyers to make money." He might have said so, however. After the questioning of attorneys Freeman and Lusk, Mr. Miller was passed.

Hugh Nelson was called and the "Leddy Checker Club" came in for its day in court. The members of the champion chess and checker club of Northern California were actually accused of talking! A chess player talk! Attorney Freeman positively asked Mr. Nelson what the checker club said about this case. (Had the members been in court, there would have been a riot.)

Mr. Nelson answered that to the best of his knowledge he didn't know what they said.

"Did you not, on April 4th, say to Tom Drew on the streets of Willows that you did not believe 'Uncle Billy' ever gave this note?" asked Mr. Freeman.

"I don't think I saw Tom Drew yesterday" answered Mr. Nelson.

After close questioning, Mr. Nelson flatly denied that he had so stated to Drew, and Mr. Freeman announced to the Court that he would put a witness on the stand to prove the statement.

Judge Pirkey told Mr. Freeman to produce his witness this morning.

John Mann who lives near Butte City was called. Mr. Mann was very straightforward in his answers. He looked the attorneys square in the eyes and had no hesitation in replying to questions. Said that Casey called on him and talked about horses and incidentally mentioned this case. Might have told Casey that he thought this an unreasonable note but had no fixed opinion. Could do justice to plaintiff and had no prejudice either way. Attorney Freeman challenged Mann, his grounds being the state of juror's mind and his opinion acknowledged. Attorney Lusk was questioning Mr. Mann when adjourning time came.

At nine o'clock this morning Court was called to order.

Proceedings were opened by attorney Freeman, who stated that Tom Drew was not in town. He called Bud Drew, a brother of Tom, to the stand and questioned him as to a conversation with Mr. Nelson held on March 30th (last Wednesday). Mr. Drew's recollection was not very clear as to the conversation, except that this case was discussed, the drift of Mr. Nelson's conversation being that Mrs. Murdock's claims made a "thin story."

Mr. Freeman then called J. C. Zumwalt and the "Leddy Checker Club" was again delved into. Mr. Zumwalt testified that Mr. Nelson told him that he "didn't believe Wm Murdock ever gave such a note." The defense did not care to question these witnesses. In response to Mr. Lusk's questions Mr. Nelson stated that Mr. Zumwalt was a truthful man and what he said was very probably true.

Mr. Lusk argued against the challenge for twenty minutes; Mr. Johnson following in a fifteen-minute talk. Mr. Lusk said that as the case hinged on the one fact: "Is the signature to the note a forgery?" He thought Nelson a qualified juror, having no opinion as to that.

Mr. Johnson argued that Nelson showed a decided bias. Judge Pirkey agreed with him and Nelson was excused, the defense excepting.

John Mann was then excused by Judge Pirkey, Mr. Mann having stated that he would go into the box with an opinion which would be hard to change. Defense filed an exception.

John J. Hull, who lives near Newville, was called. Had heard the case spoken of in a general way. Had heard said that it "was not a just debt." Had never talked with Casey, Branham and the two Drews. He was passed.

Henry Domonocki, residing near Germantown, was called. Milton French had talked with him about the note in a general way. Said that Casey had called on him at election time and talked about the case. Ca[illegible] had dinner at his place. Domonocki said that he thought it strange that Mr. Murdock should make such a will as he did, allowing this note to be in existence. Had no real opinion as to the matter. Attorney Freeman asked him if he did not say to Mr. Casey that "French couldn't be made to believe the note was genuine and neither could I." Answered that to the best of his recollection he did not. The plaintiff's attorney challenged the juror on grounds of certain business relations testified to between the juror and Cashier Burton, one of the executors.

(Continued on third page.)

General Barnes argued the point for the defense, Mr. Johnson following. These two gentlemen showered bouquets at each other which contained many buds of high-colored oratory. The Judge reserved his opinion until after the noon recess.

When court convened for the afternoon session Judge Pirkey announced that he had carefully looked up the matter of the business relationship between Domonocki and the bank and that he would overrule the challenge and pass the juror. Plaintiff's attorney excepted.

Seven jurors were now in the box having been passed and the names of five summoned citizens were then called by the Clerk. The names drawn were: C. A. F. Vestner, I. M. Neideffer, Charles Scribner, W. L. Grinstead and H. Jamison.

Mr. Vestner, who lives near Orland, was quickly passed, his answers to questions proving satisfactory.

I. M. Neideffer, who also lives near Orland, was called. He proved satisfactory to both sides and was passed.

Charles Scribner, a resident of Newville, said that he had heard some talk about the case. Had heard a Mr. Laur say that he doubted the validity of the note. Had heard a Mr. Morgan say the same thing. Could pass fairly on the merits of the case. Answering attorney Lusk, Mr. Scribner said that his brother Jim was in partnership with Ed. Murdock (son of Gawn Murdock) in the hardware business at Orland. It would take evidence to change his opinion of the case; the opinion being based on his acquaintanceship with Gawn Murdock. Relations between the families of Scribner and Gawn Murdock were friendly and could be called intimate.

Mr. Lusk challenged the juror for cause and argued that the case of excused juror Elliott was similar; that Scribner had plainly shown a biased feeling on acc[ount] of the personal relations with the Murdocks. Judge Pirkey was about to [say] that he did not care to hear further argument when Mr. Johnson arose and s[aid] that he would withdraw objections to the challenge in order to show that he practiced what he preached. Judge Pirkey said that he honored Mr. Scribner for his loyalty to his friends, but a clear prejudice and bias was shown and Scribner was excused.

W. L. Grinstead of the Butte City country was called. Said that he had remarked that the transaction was a "irregular" one. Mr. Grinstead's answers were quite satisfactory and he was passed.

When twelve citizens have been passed the attorneys for plaintiff and defendant will then exercise their legal right of peremptory challenge. Each side in a civil action have four of these challenges; the law allowing fewer in a civil action than in a criminal action.

Those who have been passed up to the time we go press are: F. N. DE JARLIN, F. J. RYAN, SYLVESTER MAPES, C. M. SEHORN, ISAAC MILLER, JOHN J. HULL, HENRY DOMONOSKI, C. A. F. FESTNER, I. M. NEIDEFFER, W. L. GRINSTEAD.

and the Note Which Is Now the Bone of Contention Is Positively Identified.

Special Dispatch to The Call.

WILLOWS, April 13. The Murdock case opened this morning at 9:30 o'clock and the matter of the objection of the defense to the plaintiff, Mary Hel[en] Murdock, testifying was argued. The contention of the defense was that the plaintiff was incompetent under section 1880 of the Code of Civil Procedure of this State.

The point was argued fully by both sides and submitted. The court r[uled] that the objection was good and sustained it.

After the ruling, however, a [illegible] consultation was held and the defense withdrew all objections to the p[lain]tiff testifying and she was immediately placed upon the stand, and told [illegible] about the note and its making. [She] said that she was called home from [illegible] Springs by some [illegible], and arrived home at about midnight on April 4, 1877. On September 5, 1877, William and Samuel Murdock met her at her home, and after completing a settlement of their affairs, extending over a period of some fifteen years, and [the] note in question given as evidence [of] that settlement, Samuel gave William two notes, one of $[illegible] and one of smaller sum and $20,000 in gold coin. Witness knew of other sums of money passing from Samuel to William prior to the making of the $100,000 note.

Witness said that the agreement was mutual between the two men, and that it was the wish of Samuel that the note be made payable to plaintiff in order that his two grandchildren should get the money. The time of [illegible] years was also made for that purpose as Samuel said that at that time the boys would be wise enough to know the value of money.

Witness made a good appearance and General Barnes was unable to [shake] her in the least, after a severe cross-examination.

The next witness was [illegible] who in 1890 was present at an interview between the plaintiff and William Murdock, in which the plaintiff asked William for a payment of interest on the note, which request was refused, William remarking that the plaintiff ought to be satisfied, as she held a note for $100,000, and it would all be paid when due.

An effort will be made to impeach the witness by attempting to show contradictory statements made in [illegible] lives in the State of Washington.

[illegible] H. Ashurst testified to having called at G. W. Murdock's place on the [illegible] of September, 1877, and paid Samuel $10,000 that he owed him, which [illegible] was turned over to William on the following day when the $100,000 note was made. Ashurst is a brother of [the] plaintiff and was formerly a [illegible] and was handling a [illegible] and money and business at the time of the transaction.

[illegible], an attorney, [illegible] San Francisco but formerly of [illegible] months, testified to having seen the note in question at the State fair at Sacramento in September, 1890. He [says] that the note having had it in his [hand] at that time, making an [examination] of it for a client of [illegible].

Plaintiff's attorneys [illegible] that [illegible] the close of the [illegible] would in all probability [illegible]

PLAINTIFF'S CASE

Mary Helen Murdock Tells About the Big Note.

There Will Be But Two More Witnesses for the Plaintiff and Then for the Other Side.

Evidently the matter of why or why not the plaintiff, Mrs. Mary Helen Murdock, should testify in the matter of her suit against the executors of William Murdock's estate, did not greatly interest people generally, for there were but few spectators present when court convened at 9:30 this morning to hear arguments as to her being a competent witness.

General Barnes yesterday afternoon objected to the plaintiff testifying, quoting Subdivision 3 of Section 1880, which says that a party to a suit against the executors of the estate of a deceased person cannot testify as to facts occurring before the death of such person.

Grove L. Johnson argued the matter this morning, claiming that the taking of plaintiff's deposition constituted a waiving of this statute.

Judge Pirkey decided that plaintiff could not testify as to facts occurring prior to William Murdock's death. Mr. Johnson filed his exception to the ruling.

After a short recess and when the jurymen had answered to their names, Attorney Lusk arose and, to the surprise of everyone, withdrew all objections to Mrs. Murdock testifying. Mr. Johnson said that the only conversion he knew of to compare with that of defense was that of Saul of Tarsus.

Mrs. Murdock took the stand. She testified that in 1877 she resided near Orland; that she went to Allen's Springs in that year with her husband, three children and a Miss Wooten and a Mr. Bates. While at Allen's received word from Samuel Murdock to return home immediately. Left a Mr. and Mrs. Lewis in charge of the children at the Springs and returned home, arrived home on night of the 4th of September.

As to the making of the note, witness said that the two men, Samuel and William, met at the home of witness. They talked over their financial transactions and agreed to a settlement. Sam, her father-in-law, asked witness in presence of William to write the note; both men were present when it was written, and witness and Samuel saw William sign it. Couldn't give the exact language of conversation between the two men at the time. William read the note after it was written, both having agreed that the amount of $100,000 was the sum of the balance due. There was money in the room to the amount of $20,000; both men counted it. Sam wanted the note to be for benefit of the sons of witness, and asked that the note be made payable 20 years after date with interest at 12 per cent. William made no objection. William left the next morning, taking with him the $20,000.

Testified that her husband was not at home on the 4th when she arrived, nor on the 5th. She remained home a few days and then returned to the Springs. Two notes were produced by Samuel at the time the note was made, William received them from Sam and then tore them up. One of these notes was for $26,000, but the other, witness could not remember.

"Take the witness" said attorney Johnson, and there was a great straining of ears with the spectators, for a searching cross-examination by General Barnes was looked for.

Answering Barnes' questions: Maiden name was Mary Helen Ashurst, married in 1869 and lived near Orland ever since. Was 16 or 17 years old when married, had three children, two sons and a daughter, the daughter is dead. Was about 24 years of age when this note was made in 1877. Didn't know where the blank note came from; thought it was on the table when she entered the room. There was a table in the room, on which was pens and ink, etc. Sam called her in, and was standing up when she entered, William was sitting by the table. Besides pens and ink, there were papers and money on the table. The money was piled upon the table. Never had written a note before; had seen notes of Samuel Murdock's which had been given by William. Sam told her to make the note like the $26,000 note, only with different interest. Heard the men agree as to the time of the note. Witness said she wrote all of the note except the signature. Must have put the dollar mark on the note; said "all that's written, I wrote."

Didn't particularly remember putting in the $100,000 in figures, but must have done it. She read the note to Sam, then William read it. He signed it, she then took it.

At about this juncture General Barnes and Grove L. Johnson engaged in a wordy war and both grew exceedingly warm. "I have no bullets in this Court room" said Johnson, referring to words of the General. The judge called time.

Witness was closely questioned as to the kinds of pen and ink used. Said it was a "twin" ink-stand; it had two wells; didn't know if the ink in the wells was the same or different; there were always several pens in the house; she always used a fine pen.

Thought the number "93" was put in the lower left-hand corner because it was on the old note she copied from. Thought the money was in $100 piles, five twenties in a pile; not all of it was on the table, part of it was in a powder can in which Sam had brought it from the cellar. After counting the money the $20,000 was put in two canvas sacks; then William took charge of it and removed it to his bedroom.

William was figuring when she entered the room; didn't know how they arrived at the balance as being $100,000.

Testified that William left the next morning, she helped to carry the sacks of gold to the buggy; the bags were placed in the bed of the buggy in front of the driver. Her husband returned three or four days after this.

William came to the house on the 5th of September; Sam was expecting him, thought an appointment had been made at Chico. Thought the note was written just about "lamp-lighting time."

She arrived at her home about 11 o'clock on the night of the 4th, was there all day 5th, 6th and 7th, but didn't know exact day she left.

E. I. Robinson was called. Testified that he was a lawyer residing in San Francisco, formerly resided in Sacramento. Lived in latter place a number of years, practicing law. Knew Dr. Hicks of Sacramento quite intimately, was a client of witness. In 1887, was in partnership with an attorney named Alexander. Met Mrs. Murdock on the Sunday morning preceding the State Fair in 1887. Witness was handed the note. Said he saw it during the first week of State Fair in 1887. Had it in his possession for two nights and one day, he thought. No endorsements were then on the note. Met Wm Murdock during that State Fair, standing near a carriage in which was Dr. Hicks and Mrs. Murdock. Had a conversation there in which a remark was made as to "the $100,000 note."

Said his partner, Mr. Alexander, saw the note; Alexander lives in San Francisco.

General Barnes cross-examined witness. Mrs. Murdock gave the witness note at Dr. Hick's house in Sacramento; was introduced by Dr. Hicks. On one occasion witness met Mrs. Murdock on the first Monday morning of the fair at Dr. Hick's house. Was a chance meeting. First saw the note during the early part of the first week of the fair. The note was handed witness by Mrs. Murdock, was given him to inspect. The note was produced by her in the course of a business talk. Had the paper in his hand a moment or two. Identified it now by the general appearance of it. Is very certain that was the note, because it was an unusual one, etc.

Didn't know Mrs. Murdock's husband then; knows him now. The note was left in his possession several days after he saw it first. Thought the note was put in his pocketbook, took it to his residence, then to his office. Showed the note to Mr. Alexander for inspection. Witness returned the note to Dr. Hicks. Saw William Murdock at the fair ground during races; he was standing beside the vehicle in which was seated Dr. Hicks and Mrs. Murdock. Thought Wm. Murdock was about his height; about 5 feet 9.

Witness could not remember what William Murdock looked like, or whether he looked like an old man or no. Thought that Gawn Murdock and wife were not stopping at a hotel. When the remark as to the $100,000 note was made in presence of Hicks, Mrs. Murdock, Wm. Murdock and witness, did not know that Murdock made any remark. The conversation did not go into details as to the note.

Next time this matter came up, was about five years ago in office of attorney J. C. Campbell at San Francisco. Said that Dr. Hicks was now dead; Hicks was a horseman, a breeder of horses. Could not recall the date of Hicks' death.

General Barnes excused the witness. Before leaving the stand witness in response to a question from attorney Johnson, referred to a memorandum and said that Hicks died in 1893.

H. A. Skiff was called. Has been a conductor for the S. P. Co. the last three years. Knows Mr. and Mrs. Gawn Murdock and knew Samuel and William; was employed by Gawn in 1887, 1888, 1890 and 1891, not all the time during these years. Saw William at Gawn's house. Think he staid over night there in May, 1890. Heard a conversation there between William and Mary in the sitting room, was writing at the time. Mr. Murdock and William entered the room not noticing witness. At that time answering Mrs. Murdock William said to her: "You ought to be satisfied; you hold my note for $100,000 at 1 per cent interest, jist." Mrs. Murdock and William left together in a rig, going toward Orland.

Attorney Lusk took the witness for cross-examination.

First met William in the fall of 1878; met him after that, several times in Willows. Next saw him at Gawn Murdock's, a little while after Samuel died.

Lived in State of Washington when William Murdock died. On February 5th, 1895 at San Luis Obispo, met A. Merrill at a hotel. Never told Merrill he did not know anything about the Murdock note until after Uncle Billy died. Never told Merrill that he heard Mrs. Murdock ask William for money on the note, nor that Mrs. Murdock ought to make him a handsome present when she got the money.

Mr. Lusk asked witness as to telling a Mr. F. T. Grafford, in the State of Washington, certain things as to this Murdock matter.

Witness was asked about reading to Grafford from a letter said to have been received by witness from Mrs. Murdock which referred to a promise of what witness would do for her, also as to saying he would make a "good strike out of the Murdock will." Never told Grafford that his "price" to be a witness would be $10,000 and that Mrs. Murdock wanted him to testify. Might have told Merrill at San Luis Obispo that he had heard Mrs. Murdock asking Uncle Billy to pay her some of the interest on the note. Never told a traveling companion, Mr. Bryan, that Mrs. Murdock had written him, asking his price to be a witness and taking an envelope from his pocket, saying that he had answered that his price was $10,000. Mr. Skiff was excused and will be further cross-examined tomorrow.

C. B. Ashurst was called to the stand and examined as to business transactions with Samuel Murdock. He testified that he paid over $8,000 to Samuel Murdock on September 4, 1877. General Barnes cross-examined him but not at great length.

T. J. Kirkpatrick and Gawn Murdock were recalled simply to testify that Stanley Murdock, son of plaintiff, was always called "Samuel" and "Sammy" by his grandfather, Samuel Murdock.

Plaintiff's case will be closed tomorrow, so said attorney Johnson. Two more witnesses will testify.

Adjourned until ten o'clock tomorrow.

A deposition of Mrs. Murdock was referred to; the question was objected to and the defense did not continue as to that.

Witness did not know as to where the $20,000 paid William came from. Never saw the blank note before. She put the note in a book in the parlor. When her husband returned home he asked about the note, spoke of it as soon as he came home. It was her idea of burying it; thought it safer.

When General Barnes asked witness as to taking the note to Sacramento, the question was objected to by Attorney Johnson, the point being that no questions could be asked of witness on cross-examination which did not bear on those of direct examination.

General Barnes argued for ten minutes saying he had a right to follow the note in all its "devious wanderings from the day it was born until the day it shall die."

Mr. Johnson argued until the noon adjournment, saying that if they wished to ask such questions the defense should make her their witness.

When court convened this afternoon there was a large crowd of spectators present, the majority of them being women.

Judge Pirkey did not care to hear further argument as to the matter of questioning Mrs. Murdock; he sustained Johnson's objection.

Mrs. Murdock's cross-examination was then resumed by General Barnes. Witness testified as to taking the note, placing it in a book to the parlor and afterward showing the paper to her husband.

She told of wrapping the note around a pencil, covering it with tin-foil, enclosing that in a vial and then putting the vial in a bottle, etc. Then of placing the bottle in a can and burying the can in the barn. She said that she placed the can in the hole and her husband covered it up with earth. The spot where can was buried, was marked by her.

General Barnes endeavored to get in some questions as to the endorsements on the note and as to who wrote them, but the court sustained attorney Johnson's exceptions to the questions. The rulings were excepted to.

General Barnes then announced that he was through with the witness.

Answering attorney Johnson's question, Mrs. Murdock said that the interest on the "old note" was a higher rate than 12 per cent.

[Continued on page 3.]

MRS. MURDOCK WROTE FAMOUS $100,000 NOTE

After Showing It to Her Husband They Buried It.

She Saw the Division of Money Between Sam and William.

TESTIMONY OF A CONDUCTOR

H. A. Skiff Denies That He Asked Money to Be a Witness.

[Special Dispatch to "The Examiner."]

WILLOWS, April 1?—Mrs. Mary Helen Murdock was permitted to be a witness in her own behalf to-day in her suit for $340,000, the defense withdrawing all objections to her so testifying. Mrs. Murdock made a good witness. The crowded court-room was oppressively silent while she was testifying, so eager were the spectators to hear the now famous plaintiff tell of the valuable paper which is the subject of the litigation. Mrs. Murdock was quite at ease, and, although faint of voice, she never hesitated for an answer and told her story in a straightforward way. Her direct testimony commenced with the telling of a visit to Allen's Springs in 1877. While there, in September of that year, she received word from her husband's father, Samuel, to return home immediately. She arrived at her home on the night of September 4th; her husband was not there. The next day William Murdock came to the house and he and Samuel talked over their business transactions and indebtedness with a view to settlement, an appointment having been made by the two men.

After the two men had discussed the matter Samuel called her into the room. On a table were pens, ink, some papers, a blank note and many piles of twenty-dollar pieces. A powder can containing gold coin was near the table. The money had been brought to the house by Samuel from the cellar. Samuel asked her to write the note, telling her to make it like another one he showed her, which was for $26,000, only to make the amount $100,000, the interest one per cent per month, the time twenty years after date, payable to herself. William read the note after she had written it and he then signed it. Samuel then stated that the note was to be for the benefit of her sons, his grandsons, when they became of age. The men counted the money to the amount of $20,000, which was taken by William after being put into two canvas sacks, and two notes were handed over to William, who tore them up. One of these notes was the one copied from and was for $26,000; the other was for a smaller amount.

General Barnes cross-examined Mrs. Murdock very closely, and at length she said that William remained there all night, taking the money to his room. He left the next morning, the sacks being placed in the buggy in front of him.

She placed the note in a book and when her husband returned home a few days later he asked her if William had given her such a note, saying that William had so told him at Chico. She showed the note to her husband, and at her suggestion they buried it, as before related in her husband's testimony. She was about twenty-four years of age at the time the note was made, she did not know where the blank note came from; she wrote everything except the signature. As to the number "93" on the corner of the note, thought she copied that from the other note. She did not remember of putting the $100,000 in figures before writing the amount in words, but she must have done so. She read the note to Sam after it was written, as he could only read print a little.

General Barnes questioned her as to the pens and ink used. Witness said she had more than one pen there and that the ink-stand had two wells, but she did not know whether the ink was the same in both wells or not. Mrs. Murdock did not know how they arrived at the $100,000 balance, but they mutually agreed as to that sum.

When General Barnes asked witness as to the indorsements on the note the questions were not allowed. He argued that he had a right to follow the paper in all its "devious wanderings" and said that if Mrs. Murdock had been trying to swap it for "trotting horses or real estate, the jury should know it."

Plaintiff's attorney insisted that if the defense wished to question witness as to matters not touched in the direct examination, they should make her their witness. His objection was sustained. Mrs. Murdock's direct testimony was not shaken in the cross-examination.

E. L. Robinson, an attorney who had an office at Sacramento in 1887, testified as to seeing the note at Sacramento during State Fair time in 1887. He said he was introduced to Mrs. Murdock by a Dr. Hicks, and as she wished to make a business deal the note was given into his hands to inspect. The witness identified the note. He said he met William Murdock at the fair grounds and in Murdock's presence the witness spoke to Hicks about the $100,000 note.

H. A. Skiff, a Southern Pacific conductor, testified that he worked at Gawn Murdock's place in 1890 and one evening heard William Murdock say to Mrs. Murdock: "You ought to be satisfied, you hold my note for $100,000 at 1 per cent interest."

Attorney Lusk cross-examined the witness and asked him about telling different people in the State of Washington that he would "make a good strike out of the Murdock will."

Witness denied this; he also denied saying that Mrs. Murdock had written him about being a witness and that he said his price was $10,000.

It is believed that the defense will go on after Skiff hard and endeavor to impeach his testimony.

Only two more witnesses, it is said, will be called for the plaintiff, and it is expected that the opening statement of the defense will be made to-morrow. This is eagerly awaited, for they say "look out for squalls."

FIRST BLOWS AT THE NOTE.

Defense in the Murdock Contest Opens Its Case.

EVIDENCE FOR THE PLAINTIFF ALL IN.

ATTORNEY BAYNE OPENS FIRE ON THE DOCUMENT AND SAYS IT IS A FORGERY.

To-Day Will Be Consumed in a Tedious Process of Transcription, and the Writing Experts Later.

Special Dispatch to the "Chronicle."

WILLOWS, April 14.—Forgery was the charge hurled at the plaintiff in the Murdock case to-day, when the defense made its opening statement. The plaintiff's side closed its evidence at 3 o'clock this afternoon, and without ado Richard Bayne outlined what the defense will strive to prove. With Bayne is associated for the defense General W. H. L. Barnes of San Francisco, Ben F. Geis of Willows and F. C. Lusk of Chico. Bayne made a striking presentment of the aspect of the case from the defense's point of view, and in a few well-chosen words scored the testimony of the other side. Though the courtroom was like a bake-oven, it was crowded with both sexes.

Mrs. Gavin Murdock, the plaintiff, was again on the stand, and other witnesses before the plaintiff closed the case were H. A. Skiff, W. A. Schorn, Mrs. Glover, Cam Ashurst and D. E. Alexander.

The plaintiff's attorneys have built a strong bulwark of evidence about the famous $100,000 note. They have had many witnesses to prove that William Murdock at least tacitly had knowledge of it. Many have sworn to seeing it before 1890, when the defense claims it was forged. The reputation for veracity of Gavin Murdock, the plaintiff's husband, who avers he helped to bury the note shortly after its making, is good. Circumstantial details of the most minute kind connected with the career of the note from its date, September 5th, 1877, were produced. Lawyers for the plaintiff, she and her kith and kin interested in the jury attesting its validity, all express confidence in the jury's verdict.

A tremendous stake is at issue. Whether some $264,000, most of the estate of Farmer William Murdock, shall go as he willed it or be awarded to Mrs. Gavin Murdock, his grandson's wife, is to be decided. It is said that Lawyers Grove Johnson, W. P. Thompson, Frank Freeman, C. L. Donohoe and W. M. Cannon are to get half of the award if they win the suit. A dozen others are more or less financially interested and every one for fifty miles about is on tiptoe for the verdict. Other litigation may grow out of this. Family too bitter to express has ranged hundreds of persons against one another.

H. A. Skiff, a Southern Pacific conductor, was recalled by the defense as the first witness of the day. The lawyers again catechised him as to his conversations when in Washington on the subject of the coming trial of the Murdock case. He was asked if he did not say to several persons that he would never work any more if Mary Helen Murdock won her case, that he was good for $10,000 and would live in luxury. F. C. Lusk, attorney for the executors of William Murdock, read pages of depositions from persons now in Washington swearing to Skiff's loony statements as to his future testimony in the Murdock case. The defense tried in every way to impeach Skiff as a witness and grilled him for some time.

Mrs. Matilda Glover of 25 Hyde street, San Francisco, formerly Mrs. L. R. Lewis, was put on by the defense to prove a trip from Allen's Springs to her home taken by the plaintiff in the first days of September, 1877, when the plaintiff claims the note was made in a house on the plaintiff's farm. The witness remembered Mrs. Gavin Murdock was gone from the springs four or five days. She fixed the date because her husband had returned at day that if he were Gavin Murdock he would blow the head off a man making mischief between him and his father. The witness saw much of the plaintiff about 1882, when Mrs. Murdock lived in San Francisco.

Mrs. Murdock had a number of visitors, among them L. S. Megginson, whom the defense characterizes as the arch conspirator in a forgery scheme. General Barnes tried to show intimacy between Megginson and the plaintiff. It is claimed Megginson originated the idea of forging the note and persuaded the plaintiff to act with him. The witness acknowledged Megginson had called on her in the past year, when she lived on Polk street. He and Mrs. Murdock [illegible] at 3 Sutter street. Megginson visited the plaintiff at 76½ Kearny street almost every day during the time William Murdock was there. More was insinuated by the defense than was said in words. Megginson, who has put up considerable money to perfect the case of the plaintiff, is not in court. He has been in Willows off and on since the opening of the trial, but keeps discreetly secluded. He arrived on the train to-day, but disappeared at once.

Grove Johnson [illegible] the assignment of the $100,000 note from [illegible]

KYTKA INTRODUCING AN EXHIBIT IN COURT.

This is one of the exhibits, twelve feet high, of the alleged forged signature on the $100,000 note to which Expert Kytka is pointing, and eleven admitted signatures of William Murdock.

William Megginson to the plaintiff. It was admitted after argument, the defense withdrawing objections. With it was a deposition sustaining the assignment and showing that L. S. Megginson, a brother of William, had conveyed the note to the latter, who had reconveyed it to the plaintiff in 1893.

W. A. Schorn, a Willows dentist, said he knew all the parties to the suit. He had a conversation with H. H. Burton, an executor of William Murdock's estate, about March 5, 1894. John Boggs of Colusa first told the witness of the existence of the note. Burton admitted it and said that if William Murdock had lived two weeks longer the note would have been settled. Schorn had talked with Burton an hour and a half about the note. Attorney Lusk told the witness the same evening he had never heard of the note. Lusk, who represents the executors now in the defense of Mrs. Murdock's suit, was then looking after the affairs of William Murdock, then recently deceased.

In cross-examination Lusk to-day asked Schorn if he had not understood "settlement," as spoken of by Burton, to mean that the suit would have been begun to annul the note as a forgery if William Murdock had survived a fortnight longer.

Cam Ashurst, who has been on the stand several times, described a conversation with William Murdock shortly before he died. Murdock was in a sanitarium at San Francisco, and the witness accompanied Mrs. Elinor Murdock to see him. William was solicited to assist Mrs. Elinor Murdock financially, but said that while he had $50,000 or $60,000 in the Colusa Bank, he would have to pay a very large sum to Mrs. Helen Murdock in a short time, and would have to refuse.

D. E. Alexander, a lawyer of San Francisco, identified plaintiff's exhibit No. 1, the big note, as one shown him by his partner, Edward Robinson, in September, 1887, at Sacramento. Then he had examined it for a quarter of an hour, recognized certain earmarks, especially a picture of a farmer and a peculiarity of the "u" in "Murdock."

The plaintiff, recalled for further cross-examination, answered General Barnes' questions concerning her movements about the date of the note. She told how she and her husband buried the note after its making. The defense rested here, and a lengthy conference between the lawyers for the defense ensued.

Bayne, in the opening statement for the defense, occupied but a quarter of an hour. He impressed his hearers with the defense's confidence in its strength. He said the defense would prove the note was a forgery, that no consideration was ever given for its making, that the plaintiff was not even the rightful holder of the piece of paper on which it was written, and that it was of more recent date of making than its face showed. He expected the jury to receive the testimony of experts the defense would put on the stand the same as of any other witnesses under oath. The defense would not only make forgery the basis of its case, but would show the physical impossibility of the note having been executed by William Murdock at the time alleged.

Following the opening statement of Attorney Bayne the case for the defense was begun with the offering in evidence of about a thousand checks signed by William Murdock and whose genuineness was admitted by the plaintiff. Each was handled singly, read, its superscription recorded by the stenographer and then marked and numbered by the clerk of the court. This was a slow process and the crowd melted. It will take all to-morrow to finish this and Judge Pirkey excused the jury till Monday at 10 A. M., when the defense will put on its writing experts, Ames, Kytka and Eisenschimel. These will consume several days and there are fifty witnesses subpoenaed.

Most of the student stenographers of Glenn county are in court daily and half a dozen sit inside the railing and practice on the testimony of the witnesses. Three with bright red tresses are especially conspicuous. Besides, amateur artists pose as they put on paper amusing sketches of the figures of the trial. All the country side has forsaken its work and seeks the courthouse half an hour before the opening. Newspapers were never so much read hereabouts as now. Two local afternoon sheets publish nearly full accounts of the evidence of the day. The hotels are full, rooms at a premium and Willows is growing rich out of the fight over old Murdock's gold.

MRS. MURDOCK'S CASE IS CLOSED

Opening Statement by the Defense.

Special Dispatch to The Call.

WILLOWS, April 14.—When the Murdock note case was resumed this morning H. A. Skiff was called to the stand for redirect examination. He testified that he had not made the statement to any one that he was to get $10,000 for his testimony.

Mrs. M. J. Glover followed Skiff and told how she had met the plaintiff at Allen Springs in 1877. During the first days of September of that year her husband, who had been down at their home near Kirkland, came up to the springs and reported to Mrs. Murdock that there was trouble between the latter's husband on the one side and Samuel Murdock and William Murdock on the other. Mrs. Murdock was summoned home about the first of September and left immediately, remaining four or five days. The witness cared for the plaintiff's children while she was absent. General Barnes failed to shake her testimony.

C. B. Ashurst was recalled. He said he had called on William Murdock just a few months before the latter's death. Murdock told him of a large debt he had to pay soon.

D. W. A. Schorn said that in 1894 he was told by H. H. Burton, one of the executors of the estate, that had William Murdock lived a few weeks longer the note would have been settled.

After the introduction of an assignment of the note from William Megginson to the plaintiff and the reading of the deposition of William Megginson the plaintiff rested.

In its opening statement the defense claimed it would prove the note was forged. Handwriting experts will begin their testimony on Monday.

CLOSE OF THE PLAINTIFF'S SIDE IN THE MURDOCK CASE

HANDWRITING EXPERT THEODORE KYTKA.

In the great suit for the payment of the note for $100,000 said to have been signed by William Murdock twenty years ago in favor of Mrs. Mary Murdock, with interest, that expert on chirography, Theodore Kytka, will be a prominent witness. With other handwriting experts Mr. Kytka has examined thousands of checks and drafts signed by William Murdock. During the week Mr. Kytka will demonstrate to the jury how he arrives at the conclusion that William Murdock did not sign the $100,000 note.

[Special Dispatch to "The Examiner."]

WILLOWS, April 14.—The plaintiff's case in the suit of Mary Helen Murdock against the executors of the estate of William Murdock to recover $240,000 on a promissory note has been submitted to the twelve men who are to decide it, so far as testimony is concerned, the plaintiff herself being the last witness called to the stand. Richard Bayne made the opening statement for the defense this afternoon.

Witness H. A. Skiff, who was accused yesterday of having a $10,000 "price," was called for further cross-examination this morning and more questions about being "bought" were fired at him. He denied all the statements attributed to him. The only admission Skiff would make was that a friend told him he ought to receive $10,000, to which witness answered that if he got that much he would have quite a stake.

Mrs. Matilda Glover of San Francisco, who formerly lived near the Murdocks, testified that Mrs. Murdock was at Allen Springs during the summer of 1877 with her children. Witness was at the springs at the time. During the first days of September Mrs. Murdock received a message from her husband's father, Samuel Murdock, summoning her home. Mrs. Murdock left her children in charge of witness and remained away about a week. (The $100,000 note is dated September 5, 1877.) Witness was cross-examined very searchingly. She said she was a close friend of Mrs. Murdock and that after moving to San Francisco Mrs. Murdock always came to see her. She met Mr. Megginson and William Murdock together at Mrs. Murdock's rooms in San Francisco. William Murdock called to see Mrs. Murdock almost every day when witness and Mrs. Murdock once roomed together, and Mrs. Murdock's sons came there frequently.

Dr. W. A. Schorn, a prominent dentist here, testified that the late Senator Boggs, soon after William Murdock's will was filed, told him of the big note and advised him to see B. H. Burton, one of the executors, if he desired information. Dr. Schorn was at that time correspondent for a San Francisco paper and wished to report the matter. Witness talked with Mr. Burton, and in course of conversation the latter said that he knew of the note and that if William Murdock had lived another week the claim would have been settled. In the cross-examination the witness was asked if Mr. Burton did not say that if Murdock had lived another week a suit would have been brought to annul the note, claiming it a forgery and thus settle it. Witness said he did not so understand it.

C. B. Ashurst was recalled and testified that a few weeks before William Murdock died the old man told him that he had a "big debt to pay before long."

A long deposition of William H. Megginson of Ohio was read. He testified that he had held the $100,000 note as collateral security for moneys advanced. It contained cross interrogatories as to statements said to have been made by him concerning the relations between William Murdock and Mrs. Mary Murdock, and to all the questions Megginson answered in the negative.

D. E. Alexander, a San Francisco attorney, testified that he saw the $100,000 note at Sacramento in 1887. He identified the note.

Mrs. Murdock was then recalled and asked as to her trip from Allen's Springs and return in September, 1877.

"Plaintiff rests," said Grove L. Johnson.

Attorney Bayne then made the opening statement for the defense. He said that the defense claimed that the note had never been seen or signed by William Murdock, that no consideration had been shown, and that title to the note was in another. He said that they would not only prove the signature a forgery, but that it would have been a physical impossibility for the note to have been drawn at the time and place alleged. He asked the jury to weigh carefully the testimony of the experts who had made chirography a life study. Attorney Bayne occupied but a few moments in his statements. Nearly a thousand drafts and checks signed by William Murdock were then offered in evidence, and the reading of them will consume all day to-morrow. The jury was excused until Monday morning.

DAILY PROMOTER.

SPECIALLY ISSUED BY THE TRI-WEEKLY PROMOTER DURING THE HEARING OF THE MURDOCK NOTE SUIT.

WILLOWS, CALIFORNIA, FRIDAY, APRIL 14, 1899. No 38

PLAINTIFF SCORES.

Sehorn Swears That Burton Told Him That Murdock Acknowledged The Note.

Plaintiff Closes Her Case. Defendants Open Their's.

In the closing hours of the plaintiff's side of the case sensations follow each other in quick succession.

Witness H. A. Skiff enters repeated denials to conversations of the most incriminating kind which are repeated to him.

Witness Mrs Matilda Glover tells of plaintiff's going home from Allen Springs at the time the note is said to have been signed. On her cross-examination an apparent effort is made to establish an intimacy existing between the plaintiff and the man Megensen. This indicates that part of the defendants' case may be a personal attack upon Mary Helen Murdock.

Dr. W. A. Sehorn testifies that Ben H. Burton, one of the defendants, shortly after the death of Wm. Murdock, told him that he knew of the note and that had William Murdock lived a week longer it would have been compromised.

Cam B. Ashurst tells of a reference to the note made to him by Wm Murdock.

D. E. Alexander swears he saw the note in 1877.

And the plaintiff rests her case.

At the press hour yesterday afternoon witness H. A Skiff was facing a hot volley of questions by Mr. Lusk. Witness denied that he stated that he would not become a witness in the Murdock case for less than $10,000, as that was his price. Witness said he might have told A. Merrill at San Luis Obispo that he only heard plaintiff ask William for interest money and had heard nothing else.

Witness had talked about the Murdock matter with Peter Bryan in Washington in February, 1894. Witness did not exhibit a letter to Bryan saying it was from Mrs. Murdock asking his price, and that he had replied to her that his price was $10,000. Witness denied exhibiting such a letter to others and making the same remark about it. Witness denied talking to H. J. Rizeor in Washington about the Murdock note, or asking him to go to the post office for him as he expected a letter about the note. Witness did not tell Rizeor that he might take a trip to California where he expected to make a stake out of the Murdock case. He denied making a number of similiar statements which were read to him.

Cam B. Ashurst on The Stand.

Cam. B. Ashurst was called. Witness is a brother to plaintiff. On September 4, 1877, witness paid Sam Murdock $10,000, about $8,000 being in coin, the balance in checks.

Cross-Examination By Gen. Barnes.

Witness stated that he married Gawn's sister and Gawn married his.

The $10,000 that witness paid Sam was in return of one of many loans made by Sam, and was in settlement of three notes. Part of the $8,000 was cash of Tehama county secretly loaned witness by Assessor Jack Ebry. The money was in twenties.

Witness told the details of his trip to pay Sam Murdock. Sam never charged witness interest on sums loaned him.

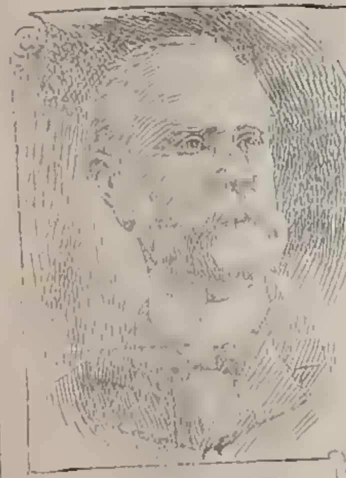
T. J. Kirkpatrick, who testified on Wednesday, was recalled. He stated in reply to Mr. Johnson that Sam always called his grandsons "Sammy" and "Grandpa." Gawn Murdock was again called and gave the same testimony.

Court then adjourned.

FRIDAY'S SESSION.

When Court convened this morning counsel for the defense called H. A. Skiff for further cross-examination. Mr Lusk repeated a number of purported conversations between witness and different parties in Washington in which witness said he was coming to California to testify in the Murdock case; that he was to receive $10,000 for his testimony, and that if Mrs. Murdock won her case he would not have to work any more. Witness denied every one of the conversations quoted to him.

Mr. Johnson attempted by questions to show how the witness happened to return to California, but objections to the questions were sustained.



WITNESS E. I. ROBINSON,

Who swears he saw the note in 1887

Mrs. Matilda Glover on The Stand.

Mr. Johnson called Mrs. Matilda Glover. Witness was formerly Mrs. S. R. Lewis. Witness lives in San Francisco, but resided in Glenn county for eighteen years. Witness spent summer of 1877 at Allen Springs. Plaintiff went home alone by stage in the first days of September and returned after four or five days. While plaintiff was away witness stayed at plaintiff's cottage and took care of children.

Cross-Examination By Gen. Barnes.

Witness' first husband, Lewis, died in Oxford in 1878.

The family in plaintiff's cottage consisted of Gawn, plaintiff, three children and Jim Bates. Plaintiff went home on September 1st. Plaintiff had received a letter from Sam on the previous day summoning her home. Witness fixed the date because on that day her husband, a very quiet man, had said if he was Gawn Murdock he would blow off the head of the man who was trying to make trouble between him (Gawn) and his father (Sam).

In answer to question, witness went into the details of her history.

Witness told of stopping with plaintiff at several lodging houses in San Francisco about 1892. Witness had met a number of the friends of plaintiff who visited her there. At the Arlington she met L. S. Megenson who had come to visit plaintiff or Mrs. Tease. Witness had met Megenson on several occasions, first at the Owl drug store. Megenson visited witness at her home on Polk street a year ago. Megenson visited witness at other places.

Re-examined by Mr. Johnson, witness said Megenson visited plaintiff at the Arlington almost every day during the time William Murdock was there.

Dr. W. A. Sehorn On The Stand.

Mr. Johnson called Dr. W. A. Sehorn. Witness was the local correspondent for the San Francisco Chronicle in 1894. In his newspaper capacity witness held a conversation with B. H. Burton, one of the executors and defendants in this suit. General Barnes objected to the conversation being repeated, but the objection was overruled. Burton had told witness that it was known that the $100,000 note existed and had Wm. Murdock lived a week or two longer the note would have been compromised. Burton objected to witness sending the report to the Chronicle until he (witness) had seen Mr. Lusk the attorney for the estate.

Cross-Examination By Mr. Lusk.

Witness did not remember that Mr. Burton had said that William had denied to him that he ever gave such a note; that the note held by Mrs. Murdock was a forgery, and that had William lived a week longer he would have instituted Attorney Lusk to bring a suit for its cancellation on the ground of fraud.

WITNESS T J. KIRKPATRICK,

Who swears he made the affidavit that confirms the note.

Cam. B. Ashurst Recalled.

Mr. Johnson recalled Cam. B. Ashurst. Witness, in company with Mrs. Eleanor Murdock, to see William at a sanitarium in San Francisco shortly before his death in 1891. They had asked William to give financial assistance to Mrs. Eleanor Murdock. Witness had declined, saying that he had $50,000 or $60,000 in the Colusa bank, but that he would have to pay a large sum to Mary Helen Murdock in a short time.

Mr. Johnson offered in evidence an assignment of Wm. H. Megenson (to whom the note was last endorsed) conveying his interest in the note back to the plaintiff. General Barnes objected to the paper being placed in evidence and it was decided to argue the matter after the noon recess.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

When court convened after the noon recess Judge Parker overruled defendants' objection and allowed plaintiff to place W. H. Megenson's assignment to the plaintiff in evidence. Megenson's deposition was then read to the Court.

D. E. Alexander On The Stand.

Mr. Johnson called D. E. Alexander. Witness is a lawyer residing in San Francisco, but lived in Sacramento in 1887, where he was a partner of E. I. Robinson. Witness was handed the note. He testified that the same note was shown him by Robinson in 1887.

Cross-Examination By Gen. Barnes.

Witness could identify the note because its large amount, long time, high interest and a peculiar "o" in the signature had made a strong impression upon his mind. After 1887 witness did not see the note again until three weeks ago when it was shown him by Attorney Cannon. Witness was questioned closely and expressed himself as absolutely certain that the note now in his hand was the one he saw in 1887.

Plaintiff Rests The Case.

Mr. Johnson arose and addressed the Court. "We rest our case," he said.

The plaintiff was recalled by General Barnes. Witness had been driven home from Allen Springs by a man named John. Gawn came after witness had been at home several days.

The Defendants Open.

Attorney Richard Bayne made the defendants' opening statement to the jury. Its delivery occupied only ten minutes. It was pointed and forcible, but gave little intimation of the testimony to be introduced.

The salient points of the statement were a denial that Wm. Murdock made the alleged note, that there was absolutely no consideration for the note, and that the title to the note is not now vested in the plaintiff, but in Wm H Megenson.

It will be shown that plaintiff's utterances have been contradictory to any existing consideration, that she has in the past claimed love and affection as the motive of giving, and that she tried to transfer it to another party where the consideration would play no part.

Defense will prove that William never saw the note. His physical inability to have given it on its date will be shown. It will be shown that the note was manufactured since William's death.

Mr. Barnes pleaded for a proper consideration of the testimony of experts who are men noted for their capability, experience and close study.

"Our defense is that this note is forgery."

Court then took a recess.

The remaining hour of the afternoon session was consumed by defendants' counsel in reading and offering in evidence checks bearing the acknowledged signature of Wm. Murdock. There is about a thousand of these.

It became evident that all of tomorrow will be required to get in the exhibits and the Court excused the jury until Monday morning.

THE DAILY PROMOTER.

SPECIALLY ISSUED BY THE TRI-WEEKLY PROMOTER DURING THE HEARING OF THE MURDOCK NOTE SUIT.

VOL. 3 | WILLOWS, CALIFORNIA, MONDAY, APRIL 17, 1899. | No. 45

THE DEFENSE HAS ITS AMMUNITION READY; THE TESTIMONY BEGINS TOMORROW.

Gen. Barnes States That The Defendants Will Prove The $100,000 Note Written Subsequent To March 12, 1890.

The lawyers managing the big case make haste slowly. The exhibits bearing the acknowledged pen marks of dead William Murdock are being read, copied on the court record, and added to the big pile on the Clerk's desk which has already assumed astonishing proportions. The documents comprise checks and deeds signed by William Murdock and they are part of the paraphernalia used by the experts to demonstrate that another hand wrote the name to the note for a hundred thousand dollars. The process of getting all these papers in evidence is a tedious one. It began Friday afternoon. At the expiration of half an hour General Barnes had read fifty of the checks into evidence. There are near a thousand signed documents and at this rate it was estimated that the General's sonorous tones would charm the empty benches for ten straight hours.

Early Friday afternoon the jury was excused until Monday, and the monotonous business went on all day Saturday. When Court adjourned only five hundred checks had been marked as exhibits.

The jury and the crowd appeared in Court again this morning, both ready and anxious for the sensational trial to proceed. But disappointment awaited them in the shape of unread exhibits. The jury was excused until ten o'clock tomorrow morning and the spectators were not long in drifting away from a performance which failed to interest them.

The forenoon dragged along as did Saturday. At three o'clock this afternoon seven hundred and nineteen checks and deeds had been taken into judicial cognizance and counsel for the defense announced that they were all of that lot.

General Barnes then produced about fifty letters and similar instruments. He proposed to have them identified by executor Adam Compton, and to place them in evidence.

Mr. Johnson voiced an objection for his side on the ground that while the letters were introduced merely as proofs of signature, their contents might have some bearing on the case. The point was warmly argued by both sides.

While speaking in this connection General Barnes declared that the defendants would prove that the $100,000 note was written subsequent to March 12th, 1890, and that the signature of the note was a forged copy of that of a deed bearing that date, wherein William Murdock conveyed to Mary Helen Murdock certain property which he had already deeded to her in 1872, but which was re-conveyed because the validity of the original instrument was questioned.

Mr. Johnson asked that the statement be spread upon the Court record, and this was done.

The plaintiff's objection to the introduction of the letters was sustained by the Court.

Mr. Johnson then announced that his side had no objection to the date and signature of each letter being clipped off, pasted together on a sheet and offered in evidence. The defendants' counsel availed themselves of the privilege.

The remainder of the afternoon session was taken up in this work and in offering expert's photographs, etc., in evidence.

It is announced that taking of testimony will commence tomorrow morning upon the convening of Court. It is said that the three experts on chirography, Eisenschimel, Kytka and Ames will be first upon the stand. Their exhibits and their testimony will be unique, and such as is seldom witnessed outside of Court rooms in the large cities. According to one of the experts they will be able to demonstrate their statements on the stand by the enlarged photos they have prepared. Carl Eisenschimel says that experts testimony is not abstruse, and that anybody can discover the findings of the experts when they are pointed out.

A laboratory has been fitted up at the residence of B. F. Giels by the experts. Among other things it contains the $10,000 photographic apparatus owned by Theodore Kytka, and the $1,800 microscope which was manufactured under the supervision of Mr. Kytka for use in the celebrated Fair will case.

The affidavit of Samuel Murdock, which T. J. Kirkpatrick swears was made before him, was photographed by the experts this morning in the presence of Attorney Freeman.

The duration of the case is variously estimated. Some people who know little about the case say that a verdict will be rendered in a fortnight. Others think the great show will be open to the public for at least three weeks longer.

In a case of this kind it is astonishing how many conflicting statements are heard concerning it. One thing which has given rumor a fair field is the secrecy which both sides of this great case have maintained.

A man who stands close to the defendants states that there will be half a hundred witnesses, in which case the end will not be visible for some days. When the defense has in all its evidence, the plaintiff will open again to do a little rebutting, and probably the defense will take time to say a word about that, all of which takes time and a great deal of it.

QUIET DAY IN MURDOCK CASE.

PREPARING TO PROVE THE NOTE A FORGERY.

OVER FIVE HUNDRED SPECIMENS OF WILLIAM'S SIGNATURE INTRODUCED.

From These the Defense Experts to Prove That the Document Calling for a Fortune Is Spurious.

Special Dispatch to the "Chronicle."

WILLOWS, April 16.—Interest in the Murdock case lagged to-day. The courtroom was deserted, save by Judge, lawyers and experts. The entire time was taken up in the introduction of checks and notes signed by William Murdock from 1872 to the time of his death in 1891. These, to the number of 500, were offered in evidence by the defense, and, after being read and entered in the court record, were allowed, without dispute on the part of the plaintiff, who acknowledged their genuineness. They are to show William Murdock's handwriting during the last twenty-two years of his life, and on these the defense hopes to prove the forgery of the big note. As there are still some hundred, besides various deeds and other papers, to be entered, it is anticipated that Monday will be consumed in the same work. Upon its completion the experts will take the stand. Kytka, Ames and Eisenschimel have exhaustive exhibits, and will probably be given two days each before the jury.

Detectives are active to-day among witnesses, and the defense will seek to impeach a number. L. S. Megginson, charged by the defense with being the arch conspirator in the alleged forgery scheme, is here and will appear in rebuttal for the plaintiff. The wildest rumors of the plans of the defense are circulating. It is said that a former employe of Dan Murdock, Joe Thurston, will swear that he saw the note some years ago, and then it was for but $10,000. The idea would be to show that the plaintiff had conceived various [illegible] before the one of the $100,000 note. The lawyers for both sides are in close conference to head off any possible coup by the other side.

DECLARES IT A FORGERY.

An Expert's Opinion of the Murdock Note.

FLAWS PICKED IN THE SIGNATURE.

MURDOCK SAID TO SHOW THAT IT WAS MADE PIECEMEAL AND LABORIOUSLY.

"Wm. Murdock" Alleged to Have Been Placed Over and Traced From the Name on Two Deeds.

Special Dispatch to the "Chronicle."

WILLOWS, April 16.—The hunting of experts in the Murdock note case will begin probably to-morrow, when the defense finishes its introduction in evidence of a thousand and odd notes and checks signed by William Murdock. Then the men who have spent months past in studying the famous note to prove it a forgery will take the stand. First a great number of photographs of genuine signatures of the deceased taken from checks dated from 1872 to 1893 will be produced, all enlarged from fifteen to twenty times and all designed to show the jury the real characteristics of William Murdock's writing for the last twenty years of his life.

With them will be compared the signature to the $100,000 note claimed by the plaintiff to have been made by the deceased in 1877. It will be alleged by the defense that the note in the contest was not signed by Murdock, but was forged by some one from two deeds to which the forger had access, conveying property to the plaintiff by William Murdock.

Carl Eisenschimel, the San Francisco expert who was prominent in the Berker and Botkin cases, will be called to show how the note was made, and two deeds will play a leading part in his testimony. His evidence will be to the following effect: He finds that William Murdock wrote a fluent hand, as of a business man used to the frequent signing of his name, and had marked characteristics in his chirography. Contrary to this, the signature on the $100,000 note was done by "tracing, drawing, piecing, patching and retouching." The "Wm" in a thousand exemplars adduced is never written twice alike in full, but placing the "Wm" of the forged note over the "Wm" of the 1890 deed, the two exactly match in form and alignment.

The "Wm" on the note, it is claimed, shows strokes made in a number of artificial movements, instead of one bold dash, as was the alleged signer's writing habit. A magnifying glass exhibits plainly this fact. The forger made it by putting the note over the deed against a window pane and tracing the "Wm." The vertical position of the note caused the pen to be held so that the ink flowed back upon it, forcing the signer to frequently dip it in ink and thus make "Wm." in several strokes.

The "M" in Murdock has its smallest flourish begin on the outside of the rest of the letter, while in all the exemplars where the flourish appears the flourish is started on the inside. The whole Murdock was made by copying from the Murdocks in both the deeds. A small size "O" was chosen from one deed and will be a revelation when placed before the jury's eyes under microscope. It will be seen to be made in four pieces, parts usually made in upstrokes being made contrariwise.

A singular feature is the terminal stroke of the "k" ending the signature. In the $100,000 note it is a simple lower forward curve, which is found in the deed of 1880. The exemplars of 1872 to 1875 show that no such hook was used, but that the terminal stroke of Murdock's signature was a decided flourish. The lower forward curve as the terminal of "k" first appears in 1879, and then once only in forty-five signatures, and was gradually adopted by him.

All the small letters in "Murdock" represent all the features of forgery, the experts say. They were made in labored efforts, with different slants from the genuine. "Murdock" was first done in pencil and then covered with ink, the forger seeking to combine the features of the two "Murdocks" on the deeds in his possession. Under the microscope the use of a pencil eraser is evident, in some places the ink on the shaded lines being nearly rubbed off when the pencil marks were sought to be removed.

These are but a few of the characteristics of the celebrated note claimed by the experts. Ames and Kytka will corroborate all this and each has prepared a separate, exhaustive study of the note and genuine signatures.

COURT LESSONS IN CHIROGRAPHY

Handwriting Experts Testify in the Murdock Note Case.

Photographic Transparencies Are Not Admitted in Evidence by Judge Pirkey.

CANNON'S THEATRICAL PERFORMANCE

Kytka Testifies That He Believes the Signature in Controversy Was Traced.

(Special Dispatch to "The Examiner.")

WILLOWS, April 19.—This has been the first lively day of the defence in the Murdock case. Only a forenoon session was held, however, an adjournment being ordered at 12 o'clock on account of a death in Attorney Freeman's family.

The morning opened with a debate on the admission of enlarged copies of the Murdock signature, which copies had been filed and were intended for use as transparencies. General Barnes and Attorney Richard Bayne argued the point for the defense. General Barnes alluded to the use of the stereopticon in the Sharon case and of the use of the enlarged photographs in many of the recent celebrated trials at San Francisco.

Mr. Bayne, replying to Grove L. Johnson's remarks about experts, who "swear at so much per swear," sarcastically alluded to "lawyers who work for contingent fees—whose only hope of pay is in the success of their case," and lawyers "like wolves, who cannot eat unless they break into the fold and feed on the flock."

When the debate was ended Judge Pirkey sustained the plaintiff's objection, preventing Expert Kytka from putting the enlarged photographic transparencies together for the purpose of a comparison which would tend to prove that the note signature had been partially made by a tracing from the genuine signature that was on a deed.

The transparencies were admitted in evidence despite the plaintiff's objection, however, and the jurors will be permitted to make for themselves the comparisons that Mr. Kytka was not allowed to make. When he was prevented from comparing the enlarged transparencies, Expert Kytka made the comparison of the original deed signature and the signature on the $100,000 note. He fastened the deed to a window-pane on which the sun was shining and placed the note over the other document, and a very practical transparent view of the two signatures was thus obtained. Writing Expert Daniel T. Ames provided a large magnifying glass and the jurors saw for themselves how the signatures fitted. Attorney W. M. Cannon of San Francisco, who is one of the leading lawyers for the plaintiff, strongly objected to what he called "this theatrical performance," but his objection was overruled.

Mr. Kytka next showed, as a revelation of the microscope, that in signing the deed from which the note signature is alleged to have been traced, William Murdock began the first downward stroke of the letter "W" considerably above the point seen in the signature. The ink did not flow, but the marks of the pen point were left. To remedy the defect caused by the failure of his pen, Murdock made an unusual and somewhat flourished cross stroke in the signature of the note, Kytka testified, the effect of the pen failure and the cross-stroke amendment were faithfully reproduced by the tracing. In other words, the exact defects of the deed signature are in the note.

General Barnes questioned Kytka about the latter's experience as a handwriting expert, all the previous testimony having been given as that of an expert photographer. The witness told of his testimony in eighty California trials, including the famous will cases at San Francisco.

"Were you a handwriting expert in the Fair will case?" asked General Barnes.

"No; I made 16,000 photographs in that case and it kept me very busy," was the reply.

"Have you formed an opinion as to how the abbreviation 'Wm.' in the Murdock note was made?" inquired General Barnes, while the plaintiff's objections were shouted in vain.

"I have."

"What is your opinion?"

"That part of the signature was traced."

Expert Ames is to give his testimony to-morrow.

SEHORN'S STORY DOESN'T STAND

Superior Judge Pirkey Rules That It Was Not Admissible.

The Defense to the Murdock Note Scores Its First Point.

BUSHELS OF EXHIBITS ARE OFFERED

The Battle of the Experts Against the Signature to the Obligation Begun.

(Special Dispatch to "The Examiner.")

WILLOWS, April 18.—General Barnes and his associates in the Murdock case scored a big victory over Grove L. Johnson to-day when Judge Pirkey ordered the testimony of Dr. A. W. Sehorn to be stricken from the record.

Dr. Sehorn is a prominent local dentist. Last week he testified that the late Senator Boggs, soon after the William Murdock will was filed, told him of the $100,000 note and advised him to see H. H. Burton, one of the executors, if he desired information. Dr. Sehorn was at that time correspondent for a San Francisco paper and wished to report the matter. Sehorn said he talked with Burton and that the latter said he knew of the note, and that if William Murdock had lived another week the claim would have been settled.

The attorneys for the defense claimed that this testimony was inadmissible and Judge Pirkey took the matter under advisement, deciding against the plaintiff this morning.

To-day has been occupied with the introduction of Expert Theodore Kytka's enlarged photographs of the William Murdock signatures. The lawyers who are trying to have the note declared genuine are using every effort to shut off the Kytka evidence, but one by one the exhibits are being piled up in tremendous array. The floor about the witness box is covered with piles of photographs and negatives, big and little, a series of highly magnified signatures extending nearly to the ceiling; a blackboard is covered with diagrams and illustrations, the clerk's desk is filled and heaped up with Murdock documents of all kinds, and on the desk before Judge Pirkey stands the $1,800 microscope that was used in the Fair case.

To-night an armed man is guarding the courtroom to prevent mutilation of the exhibits or any interference with them.

The day closed with arguments on the admissibility of the transparencies prepared by Kytka, showing how the signature on the note fits another signature on a deed. The defense claims that these transparencies show conclusively that the note signature was made by tracing. The point to be made by the use of the Kytka transparencies is one of the strongest on the side of the defendant, and the plaintiff's attorneys are fighting very hard to shut them out.

General Barnes gave Glenn county a fine sample of his eloquence when he replied to the general objections. He was not content with his wish to send the alleged forgers to San Quentin, but he consigned them "to the very depths of hell."

Before the expert testimony was begun General Barnes called Morrison Bryan of Winthrop, Wash., to break down some testimony given for the plaintiff last week by H. A. Skiff, the witness who was accused of having a $10,000 price on his evidence. Bryan quoted Skiff as saying to him on several occasions that he was to get $10,000 for his testimony in the Murdock case.

TELLS OF FLAWS IN SIGNATURE.

EXPERT KYTKA AGAIN ON THE STAND.

FEATURES OF MURDOCK'S HANDWRITING POINTED OUT TO THE JURY.

Remainder of the Week Will Be Consumed in the Introduction of Similar Testimony.

Special Dispatch to the "Chronicle."

WILLOWS, April 19. The main incident of the Murdock note trial to-day was the testimony of Handwriting Expert Theodore Kytka, who was on the stand yesterday. He explained to the Court and jury why he believed the signature to the $100,000 note purporting to have been made in 1877 was in part an exact tracing of William Murdock's signature to a deed dated May 17, 1890.

The first hour of the session was spent by General Barnes and Grove L. Johnson in arguing the objection raised yesterday by Johnson against introducing signatures of the note and of the deed of 1890, photographed on translucent paper and superimposed so that the similar formation of the letters might be noted. Judge Pirkey ruled that the introduction of the superimposed photographs was not within the limitations of the statute, though the jury might make such comparisons as they chose.

From his screen on the wall, on which are tacked immense photographic enlargements of Murdock's signature, Expert Kytka showed the unusual manner in which the "Wm" abbreviation on the deed of 1890 was written. In every instance but one Murdock signed his given name with the abbreviation, but the "Wm." of the deed and that of the note appear to differ in characteristics from the writing on any of the other several hundred exhibits. Kytka showed that in the deed signature the initial stroke of the pen on the "W" failed to mark, leaving two furrows of the pen nibs plainly discernible under the microscope. The stroke is continued from the point where the ink flowed, and with a second stroke the letter is finished in a manner strange to Murdock's signature. The "W" of the note is a facsimile. Kytka stated that he found the "Wm." on the note to be a tracing. He superimposed the note above the deed against a window pane in the courtroom and the Judge and jury viewed them with a magnifying glass. Counsel presented the jury with copies of each photographic signature in evidence.

The court adjourned at noon out of respect to Attorney Freeman's mother, who died Thursday morning. The exhibitions kept in the courtroom at night by the defendant's exhibition. Expert Ames takes the stand to-morrow. He will be followed by Eisenschimel and the latter by Hickok. The remainder of the week will probably be taken up in hearing expert testimony.

Many rumors are afloat concerning the discoveries made by the Pinkerton men and the amateur detectives who swarm the town. The jurymen return to their homes at night, but they are closely watched.

THE DEFENSE

The Other Side of the Note Story Due.

Circumstances as to the Big Note Which the Defense Will Make the Most Of.

Proceedings in the case of Mary Helen Murdock vs. the executors of the estate of Wm. Murdock went on today, but the monotonous reading of checks and drafts bearing the signature of William Murdock was all that was done.

These papers were read by the attorneys for defense, recorded by the court reporter and marked as exhibits by the clerk.

At 10 o'clock Monday morning the defense will begin to introduce their testimony.

Much speculation is being indulged in as to just what sort of testimony the defense will introduce. Attorney Bayne's opening statement did not throw much light on what they really would attempt to prove. He stated that "forgery" and "physical impossibility" to make the note of the time and place alleged were to be proven, and that was about the sum and substance of it.

It is rumored—and the rumor comes from the camp of defense—that a full three weeks will be taken up in the introduction of their testimony. What will it be? They maintain an easy confidence in their ability to tear down the structure reared by plaintiff and the testimony of witnesses is eagerly awaited.

It will be claimed that William Murdock never signed and never saw this $100,000 paper, and the attorneys say openly that they will prove the signature to be a rank forgery.

If the charge is proven such a gathering together of perjured testimony was never before heard in a court room as that of plaintiff's witnesses.

Much time will be taken up in the testimony of the famous experts, and wonderful exhibits will be shown by these men. It will be claimed that the "Wm" in the note's signature was traced from the signature to a deed made by Murdock in 1890, which deed has been in the possession of Mary Helen Murdock. It is said that the two "Wms" are exactly the same in tracing and shade. The plaintiff's attorneys simply say that this fact is a "coincidence"—and that's all.

The defense claim that Wm. Murdock, at the time this note is dated, always put a down flourish at the end of the "k"; but did not in the late years of his life. There is no such flourish to the "k" in the note's signature. Plaintiff's attorneys say that this amounts to nothing, that no person writes his or her name always the same.

The defense will treat this whole story of plaintiff as a concocted scheme, aided and abetted by forgery and perjury—and there you are.

One thing is sure: The defense will make a fierce onslaught on the plaintiff's forces and will give no quarter.

EXPERT KYTKA'S THEORY.

Says the Murdock Note Signature Was Traced From a Deed.

WILLOWS, April 19.—In the Murdock note case Expert Kytka consumed the morning session in demonstrating to the jury his theory as to how the signature on the $100,000 note was traced from William Murdock's signature on a deed. Kytka had not finished his direct testimony at noon, when court adjourned to attend the funeral of Attorney Frank Freeman's mother. Kytka will resume his testimony to-morrow morning.

SOME SIGNS OF FORGERY

Kytka and His Camera in the Murdock Note Case.

General Barnes Introduces a Great Number of Signatures by William.

WHAT THE DEFENSE EXPECTS TO PROVE

Signer's Signature at the Date of the Note Not a Likeness of the Alleged Signature.

[Special Dispatch to "The Examiner."]

WILLOWS, April 17.—All this section of California is absorbed in the contest over the Murdock note. People drive in from a distance of twenty miles to attend the court sessions. Five lawyers are trying to convince a jury that the note is valid, and four lawyers, headed by General Barnes of San Francisco, will to-morrow set out to prove that the note is a forgery.

General Barnes is eloquent and fearless in his declarations of forgery, and four celebrated experts are here to show just how and when the document was forged.

To-day's session of the hearing was held without a jury, the defendants offering exhibits in great array. General Barnes and Attorney Lusk of Chico placed on file 768 specimens of the William Murdock signature.

"We say that this forgery was committed since March 12, 1890," said General Barnes during an incidental argument, "and we want to show the signatures through the various years from 1873 to 1893. If this is a genuine paper, the more examples we have of the signature the better it will be for the gentlemen on the other side. We want to show the development of William Murdock's handwriting, the formation of the habit. We want to show that the imitation of the signature in this note was from a signature made in 1890 and not from a signature made in 1877. We will show that the signature on the note could not have been the signature of William Murdock in 1877."

Theodore Kytka will begin his testimony to-morrow. He has been at work here for weeks. In the western part of the town he has a small barn fitted up as a photographic studio, and there he works away on handwriting enlargements and reproductions. The giant camera that figured in the Fair case stands on wheels in the open air, and the barn is becoming a place of wonder to the boys and girls of Willows. Mr. Kytka has the note signature and two admittedly genuine signatures enlarged to exactly the same sizes. By placing one over the other he will show that "Wm.," the abbreviation of William, corresponds almost exactly in the note with the same portion of the signature in one of the deeds, which circumstance he claims to be proof of tracing.

"Two genuine signatures of a man," says Kytka, "will never exactly fit in that way, and in this particular case the pen was taken from the paper four times."

The word Murdock, so Kytka and the other experts agree, was copied from a second deed.

Experts Eisenschimmel, Ames and Hickok will also testify that the note was forged.

The attorneys for the defense have openly charged the plaintiff's witnesses with perjury, and the trouble has hardly yet begun.

Some time this week the defense will produce a memorandum book in which William Murdock made an entry of a $15 business transaction on September 6, 1877, but in which there is no reference to the $100,000 note, bearing interest at 1 per cent a month for twenty years, which he is alleged to have signed on that date.

Five Pinkerton men are here in connection with the case, and it is said that since the very beginning of the trial they have kept close watch of the jurors. All sorts of corruption stories are afloat, and if any of these are founded on fact, the detectives ought to establish a big sensation before the case is ended. The rumors of bribery and attempted bribery are limited only by the number of persons involved, and most of them must be absolute fabrications, even if there is truth in any of the stories that make up the local gossip.

The Pinkerton agents are in the employ of the defendants, and it is apparent that General Barnes and his associates think it wise to take unusual means to prevent fraud. The detectives are expected to become witnesses for the defense before the trial is ended.

DAILY PROMO[TER]

SPECIALLY ISSUED BY THE TRI-WEEKLY PROMOTER DURING THE HEARING OF THE MURDOCK NOTE SUIT.

WILLOWS, CALIFORNIA, TUESDAY, APRIL 18, 1899.

THE DEFENSE BEGINS.

Dr. Sehorn's Testimony For The Plaintiff Is Ordered Stricken Out By The Court.

The business end of the Court room presented the appearance of an overgrown art gallery this morning. The light was softened by drapings on the windows. A long table stood in front of the jury-box and this was stacked with piles of great photographs, all enlargements of the acknowledged signature of William Murdock. On the floor were other piles of photos, some of them of acknowledged signatures and others of the alleged signature of the dead man as it appears on the note. On a screen eleven feet high were tacked ten photos of signatures, each photo being 4 feet long and 1½ feet wide. A large blackboard stood in the corner by the jury-box. On a little table stood the $1,800 microscope used in the Fair will case.

The hearing of the Murdock case began this morning with a gentle surprise, which was sprung from the bench. Judge Pirkey announced that the testimony of Dr. A. W. Sehorn, given for the plaintiff, would be stricken from the record, and he instructed the jury to give it no consideration. The Judge held that after deliberation he had decided that the testimony was improper.

The defense placed Mott Bryan of Washington on the stand. Witness was called to testify regarding the alleged statements made to him by H. A. Skiff, who testified for the plaintiff last week. Witness stated that Skiff has said to him on several occasions that if the Murdock case went the right way he would have "no further use for the Methow." Skiff had told him he was to get $10,000 for his testimony in the Murdock case. Skiff first made such a statement to him in February 1894.

Mr. Johnson asked but few questions of the witness.

Expert Kytka On The Stand.

Theodore Kytka was called. In answer to General Barnes' questions witness stated that he is a documental photographic expert. Witness had been employed professionally in the Fair will case, Botkin case, Figel case, Hecker and Creegan case, Bell case, Davis will case, and many other California cases of much importance. Witness described the photographic enlargements, etc., made by him in each of these cases. Witness told of the Goerz lens used in his photographic work. It is a rectilinear copying lens made in Berlin.

Witness had been employed in the Murdock case for six months. The photographs he made of the note are enlarged to three and one-half diameters. Witness illustrated the properties of the Goerz lens and the meaning of the terms used on a blackboard. The plates were developed by the finest process known.

Witness exhibited his enlarged photos of William Murdock's signature, the plates employed and the original checks from which the photographs were made. Witness testified that the reproductions were exact. Each photograph was identified by witness with the check from which it was made and the photographs placed in evidence over the plaintiff's continued objection. General Barnes stated that a copy of each one of these photos had been prepared for each juryman and also a copy for plaintiff's counsel.

There were seventy-nine enlarged photos of the signatures to checks.

Another lot of photos were produced. These were reproductions, exact size, of the entire checks from which the enlarged photos of signatures had been made. The work of getting these properly labeled and placed in evidence consumed the remainder of the morning session.

MARY HELEN MURDOCK

Who Is The Plaintiff In One Of The Most Remarkable Suits For A Dead Man's Money Ever Tried In California. The Picture Is Supplied Through The Courtesy Of The Evening Post Of San Francisco.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

When Court was called to order after the noon recess the placing in evidence of the photos of William Murdock's signature, together with the plates from which they were made, was continued.

A larger crowd was in attendance than that of this morning. A large number of ladies sat in the section which has been reserved for them. It is a matter of surprise that in the trial of a cause celebre such as this the number of spectators should so seldom be large enough to fill the court room. Willows people have heard so much about the mysterious Murdock note during the past few years that it had grown stale as a subject of persistent gossip and the matter having to some extent grown trite the sensations succeeding each other at the trial are taken largely as a matter of course and only on days of special note has the local interest been keen enough to make people leave their affairs to attend the session of Court.

Expert Kytka explained to the Court and jury the process which the checks and signatures are enlarged. The plate bearing the photographed check, exact size, is placed in a camera and projected upon a large screen on which impression paper is arranged. The rays are magnified at tenfold and an enlarged picture is the result.

The large screen on the wall contains twelve enlarged signatures. One of these signatures is that of the note, another is from the deed of 1890, from which the defense claims that the signature to the note was in part copied. Others of these immense signatures are taken from instruments signed about the time the note is alleged to have been made. These last will be used to show that while the signature of the note is similar to writing of 1890 and the note doubts it differs in several respects from the handwriting of William Murdock in 1877.

At the hour of going to press the work of putting the photographic exhibits in evidence continues.

MURDOCK NOTE SUIT.

EVIDENCE FOR DEFENSE BEING HEARD.

Judge Pirkey Charges the Jury to Discard the Testimony Given by Dr. W. A. Sehorn.

WILLOWS, April 18.—The jury were promptly in the box at 10 o'clock for the Murdock note case this morning. Judge Pirkey announced that he had erred in allowing evidence of Dr. W. A. Sehorn. After careful examination he had found that the objections of counsel were well taken and should have been sustained. He therefore charged the jury to discard the testimony of the witness and not to consider it at all.

After this Morrison Bryan was called for the defense. He stated that he lived in the State of Washington in 1894 and was acquainted with William Murdock during his lifetime. Then he resided in this State. He was acquainted with Witness Skiff when he resided in the State of Washington in 1894, and also knew him in this State, when he resided in the town of Orland. This question was asked by Mr. Lusk.

"Mr. Bryan, at your ranch in the State of Washington, in the month of February, 1894, did Mr. Skiff tell you that he had to go to California to testify in a $100,000 suit, and that he was to get $10,000 for his testimony?"

Objected to and objection overruled. The answer was, "Yes, sir, he did."

"Did he tell you that if he were successful in winning the suit he would not have to work any more?"

Objected to and objection sustained.

Cross-examination.

"Did you make any writings or keep any written account of anything said to you by Skiff in regard to this matter?"

"I did not."

"Did you come to California solely for the purpose of being a witness in this case?"

"I did."

Redirect:

"Mr. Bryan, Skiff stated on the stand that you said to him that if he came to California as a witness in the Murdock case he ought to have $10,000 for his testimony."

Objected to, objection sustained and witness excused.

The next witness was Expert Kytka. He stated that he was a native of Australia and had been in California [illegible] years. He said that his occupation was that of a microscopist and that he was prepared with instruments and magnifying lenses to enlarge and examine handwritings. He explained to the jury his method of work, after which a number of notes that had been signed by William Murdock and enlarged by the expert were offered in evidence, and, after a spirited controversy by the attorneys were allowed by the court.

At the afternoon session Expert Kytka was again on the stand, and photographs of checks and drafts signed by William Murdock, additional negatives from which photographs were printed were introduced, and he was asked to identify each.

Quite a wordy war ensued when Barnes offered in evidence photographic transparencies of the "Wm." in the deed of 1890, which is held by Gann Murdock, husband of the plaintiff, and the "Wm." in the famous $100,000 note. These were first shown separately, then placed together, one over the other, so that the exactness of the two might be seen by the jury. This is the defendant's principal point that the name of William Murdock on the deed was traced on the note.

Plaintiffs objected to this being shown to the jury, and arguments as to whether or not it should be admitted will be continued at to-morrow's session.

Hickok, another noted handwriting expert, arrived to-day, and will testify for the defense. The exhibits of the defense are stacked all over the courtroom, and an armed man will guard these to-night.

THE DEFENSE

Expert Kytka Identifies Many Negatives.

Apr 17

Morrison Bryan Testifies to Things Said by Witness Skiff in Washington.

After a short delay the great Murdock note case, in which a fortune is at stake, has again been set in motion. This morning promptly at 10 o'clock Judge Pirkey called court to order. All the jurymen were present and seemed somewhat rested by their short vacation.

The court room was not as crowded as usual, but still there were quite a number of spectators present. Mrs. Murdock did not appear in the forenoon at all. The notes and checks which were being read yesterday had all been finished and everything was cleared ready for evidence.

Expert Kytka had all his apparatus arranged on a long table before the jury. Before the examination of witnesses was begun Judge Pirkey created quite a little excitement by announcing that he had come to the conclusion that the testimony of Dr. W. A. Sehorn should be ruled out, as it was irrelevant and immaterial, and that he would do so on his own motion without any further comment.

Dr. Sehorn's evidence, given last week, for plaintiff, was in regard to a conversation held with B. H. Burton in 1894 in which Burton said that "if William Murdock had lived another week the note would have been settled."

He told the jury that they should not consider said testimony at all and that they should treat it as if it had not been given. Plaintiff excepted.

Morrison Bryan, of Winthrop, Wash., was the first witness called by defense. Testified that he was living in the State of Washington in 1894; was acquainted with Mrs. Mary Helen Murdock and also with H. A. Skiff; knew him in 1894; also knew him before he went to Washington while he was living in Orland; stated that in winter of 1894 Mr. Skiff told him he had to go to California as he had to Kytka to identify this deed and signature as an exact reproduction, for the defense will make this one of their main points—that the signature on the note was traced from the signature on the deed.

The next negative introduced was the signature of the $100,000 note and the deed of 1890 a little different from the rest inasmuch as it showed the amount of ink used in both and was for the purpose of showing how, if one signature was traced from another, more ink should be used upon the forged signature than upon the original. He said that this could be produced through a system designated as the microphotography process. Barnes interpreted this explanation for the jury and opposing counsel. Barnes instructed the clerk to mark this very carefully and far up in the corner.

Last exhibit shown was another photographic reproduction of the signature on the $100,000 note and the deed of 1890. Kytka said these were made the same size and transparent so they could be compared and contrasted easily by placing one upon the other, and by the aid of light, see the way in which the signature to the deed was traced upon the note.

Recess was then declared.

Expert Kytka was then asked to place defendants exhibit 868-89 being the "Wm." in the deed of March 12th 1890, and the "Wm." to the $100,000 note, one over the other, and fasten them together. This done, it was then shown that these two signatures were taken at the same time under exactly the same conditions and were in every respect correct. Mr. Kytka then in the presence of the jury prepared two more of "Wm's," one of the deed of March 12th, 1890, and one of the notes dated Sept. 5th, 1877—the $100,000 note.

It was then on behalf of the defendant offered to present these two "Wms" thus, one placed over the other, to the jury that they might see the exactness of the two, the defendants claiming that the "Wm" of the deed of 1890 was used in making the "Wm" of the note; in other words the "Wm" in the note was traced from the "Wm" in the deed of 1890.

The plaintiffs objected to this being shown to the jury. The defendants intend to testify in a $100,000 note case and that if his side won the suit he would not have to work any more.

Objections here were numerous by Johnson, but were promptly overruled by Judge Pirkey, to which plaintiff excepted.

Mr. Bryan testified that Skiff said he would get $10,000 for testifying. Said Skiff talked frequently about this matter; never made any written memorandum of the conversations, but remembered almost all that was said. Worked together on a public hall in Winthrop.

After a short cross-examination by Johnson, Bryan was excused.

Theodore Kytka was next called by defense. Said: "I am a native of Austria, but am a naturalized citizen of the United States; have lived in California six years. I am an examiner of documentary deeds and an expert in handwriting; have had experience in this line in a great many cases; was on Botkin case, Fair case, etc. Was employed in this Murdock case about six months ago; have enlarged checks and deeds of Wm. Murdock; and also note in question."

Witness then showed the jury by illustration on blackboard what he meant by enlarging. Said that in the Botkin case Mrs. Botkin was charged with sending a box of poisoned chocolates through the mail and it was his duty in that case to determine whether the address on that box was written by Mrs. Botkin. Said that he had been employed in various other cases and told what he did in each case. Stated that he did this enlarging with his "Goerz."

This instrument was very competent so witness said. Said his lens was used for reproducing and that it was perfect. He was asked to show the jury how lens was tested. Did this on blackboard. "I tested my lens and it was all right, to developing pictures I use such a process that a correct negative is reproduced. This method of reproducing is the best method now known to scientists." Witness produced first negative of signature of checks which he said was exactly like original. Kytka then selected the checks from the rest and showed these to jury. They looked exactly alike. He then produced the next negative that he took and showed this to jury. Said this also was an exact reproduction of original check. Negatives were offered in evidence by Barnes.

Objection by Johnson.

Objection was overruled.

Barnes showed a cardboard upon which were some photographs of signatures on notes. Kytka said these were correct reproductions of negative. Each was offered in evidence and were allowed notwithstanding objections by Johnson. Clerk was instructed to mark each exhibit as handed in, so they could be identified.

Barnes read dates which notes and checks were drawn but Johnson kindly informed him that it was unnecessary. Barnes said he had several copies of these and would like to give the jury six of them, so that two jurymen could examine them together and so that they could examine them very carefully.

Barnes consumed a greater part of the forenoon in presenting defendant's exhibits of photographs in evidence. Johnson stated that it would be understood that they objected to each of these photographs being admitted as evidence, and furthermore that as court overruled these objections, it would be understood that they would make an exception to each case.

As attorneys proceeded in this uninteresting work the audience was seen to slowly diminish in size.

Kytka has a foreign accent which is extremely hard to understand unless very close to him and the court reporter caused great deal of amusement by asking him to repeat several answers.

Once while reading a number of checks, General Barnes was informed by Johnson (he Johnson) believed that Barnes had made a mistake. Upon examination it was found by Barnes that this was so.

When court adjourned at twelve o'clock they were still introducing these exhibits in evidence.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

This afternoon at two o'clock Mr. Kytka was again put on the witness stand and the photographs and negatives of checks, etc., were again taken up and offered in evidence just as they were in the forenoon.

Mrs. Murdock was in Court accompanied by her son, Edmund.

Many people were in attendance and continued to come in slowly as the case proceeded. The young ladies were well represented.

Going over these signatures and photographs was very monotonous and uninteresting. Each negative and plate was identified by witness Kytka and each was said to be correct. The intent and expectant onlookers were considerably disappointed when they found that the afternoon proceedings would simply be a repetition of the morning's work, and one could notice the restless stir and the longing desire for a change that never came. After about one hour and a half there was a change but the change was but slight.

Kytka said: "I have some signatures which I have enlarged still more. These are the photographic reproductions that you see against the wall."

Witness proceeded to show how he enlarged these signatures by illustrating on a blackboard.

Prof. Kytka no doubt understands his business for he never hesitated in his explanation. He said that these large photographs were just as correct as the smaller ones and were not exaggerated or changed in the least but were an exact reproduction.

As each exhibit was handed in it was accompanied with the original check from which the negative was taken.

The crowd was held, not by the interesting work that was being done, but from sheer curiosity and an expectancy that something would turn up which would amuse them.

Kytka must have spent tireless labor in the production of these exhibits.

At last he offered the negative of the $100,000 note. Barnes showed him the original note, marked as plaintiff's exhibit "A," and asked him if his negative was an exact reproduction of this. Witness answered that it was the same in every particular, with the exception of the color. Attorney Cannon remarked that it made no difference anyway as they were all color blind.

After this the photograph of the signature of the deed which William Murdock made in 1890, from which the signature to the $100,000 note is alleged to have been made, was entered as an exhibit. Barnes was very particular in getting sisted that this was very proper, as they are reproductions or enlargements of the originals. Further argument will be heard tomorrow morning at 9:30.

(Continued on page 4)

Court will adjourn at noon tomorrow to allow some of the attorneys to attend the funeral of the late Mrs. Freeman.

H. A. Skiff, Accused by the Defense in the Murdock Note Case.

SEHORN'S STORY DOESN'T STAND

Superior Judge Pirkey Rules That It Was Not Admissible.

The Defense to the Murdock Note Scores Its First Point.

BUSHELS OF EXHIBITS ARE OFFERED

The Battle of the Experts Against the Signature to the Obligation Begun.

[Special Dispatch to "The Examiner."]

WILLOWS, April 18.—General Barnes and his associates in the Murdock case scored a big victory over Grove L. Johnson to-day when Judge Pirkey ordered the testimony of Dr. A. W. Sehorn to be stricken from the record.

Dr. Sehorn is a prominent local dentist. Last week he testified that the late Senator Boggs, soon after the William Murdock will was filed, told him of the $100,000 note and advised him to see B. H. Burton, one of the executors, if he desired information. Dr. Sehorn was at that time correspondent for a San Francisco paper and wished to report the matter. Sehorn said he talked with Burton and that the latter said he knew of the note, and that if William Murdock had lived another week the claim would have been settled.

The attorneys for the defense claimed that this testimony was inadmissible and Judge Pirkey took the matter under advisement, deciding against the plaintiff this morning.

To-day has been occupied with the introduction of Expert Theodore Kytka's enlarged photographs of the William Murdock signatures. The lawyers who are trying to have the note declared genuine are using every effort to shut off the Kytka evidence, but one by one the exhibits are being piled up in tremendous array. The floor about the witness box is covered with piles of photographs and negatives, big and little, a series of highly magnified signatures extending nearly to the ceiling; a blackboard is covered with diagrams and illustrations, the clerk's desk is filled and heaped up with Murdock documents of all kinds, and on the desk before Judge Pirkey stands the $1,500 microscope that was used in the Fair case.

To-night an armed man is guarding the courtroom to prevent mutilation of the exhibits or any interference with them.

The day closed with arguments on the admissibility of the transparencies prepared by Kytka, showing how the signature on the note fits another signature on a deed. The defense claims that these transparencies show conclusively that the note signature was made by tracing. The point to be made by the use of the Kytka transparencies is one of the strongest on the side of the defendant, and the plaintiff's attorneys are fighting very hard to shut them out.

General Barnes gave Glenn county a fine sample of his eloquence when he replied to the general objections. He was not content with his wish to send the alleged forgers to San Quentin, but he consigned them "in the very depths of hell."

Before the expert testimony was begun General Barnes called Morrison Bryan of Winthrop, Wash., to break down some testimony given for the plaintiff last week by H. A. Skiff, the witness who was accused of having a $10,000 price on his evidence. Bryan quoted Skiff as saying to him on several occasions that he was to get $10,000 for his testimony in the Murdock case.

MRS. MURDOCK LOSES A POINT

Dr. Sehorn's Testimony Stricken Out.

Special Dispatch to The Call

WILLOWS, April 18.—When the Murdock note case was called this morning Judge Pirkey announced that, after having looked up authorities, he had decided the evidence of Dr. Sehorn, which he admitted last week, was irrelevant. He ordered that it be stricken from the records. Sehorn testified that he had a conversation in March, 1894, with Executor Burton of the Murdock estate and that Burton had told him that had William Murdock lived a week longer the note would have been settled.

After Judge Pirkey had instructed the jury to pay no attention to the evidence of Dr. Sehorn the defense called Morrison Bryan to impeach the evidence of H. A. Skiff, who testified that he heard a conversation between Mary Helen Murdock and William Murdock wherein William Murdock admitted the genuineness of the note. Bryan testified that Skiff told him in 1895 that he had to go to California to testify in the Murdock case, and that if his side won he (Skiff) would not have to work any more.

General Barnes, in his cross-examination, asked Skiff if he had made such a statement and Skiff denied ever having talked with Bryan about the case.

Expert Kytka was on the stand all day exhibiting photographs of the signatures of William Murdock and demonstrating to the jury his idea of how and why the note is a forgery. After Kytka will come experts Ames, Eisenschimmel and Hickok. Then the defense will attempt to prove that William Murdock was at his home all day on the day that the note was alleged to have been signed at Mrs. Murdock's residence, twenty miles distant.

The defense has five Pinkerton detectives here watching the jurors, who are greatly disgusted at being "spotted." One of the attorneys for the defense created a sensation to-day by going to one of the most prominent citizens in the county and telling him if he did not quit talking to a certain juror he would be called up before the court.

Mrs. G. W. Freeman, mother of Attorney Freeman, one of the counsel in the Murdock case, died this morning. Court will adjourn at noon to-morrow to attend the funeral.

DAILY PROMOT

SPECIALLY ISSUED BY THE TRI-WEEKLY PROMOTER DURING THE HEARING OF THE MURDOCK NOTE SUIT.

WILLOWS, CALIFORNIA, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 19, 1899.

KYTKA ON THE STAND

Expert Points Out The Similarity Of The Note's Signature To That Of The Deed Of 1890.

Just before the Court adjourned yesterday afternoon an incident occurred which led to the raising of an important point at law and the opening of the vials of oratory.

Expert Kytka was on the stand. From among his exhibits the expert produced a sheet of glass having pasted on it an enlarged copy of the "Wm" of the signature of the deed of March 12, 1890, made on translucent paper. On another sheet of this semi-transparent paper was the enlarged "Wm" of the signature of the hundred thousand dollar note. At General Barnes' request expert Kytka fastened the sheet containing the signature of the note directly above the signature of the deed, the object being to show that the letters were of exactly the same size and formation. General Barnes desired to hand this to the jury for examination. Mr. Johnson objected, talked of the progress of modern science; of the camera, and of the microscope by means of which the defense proposes to show where the paper has been scraped and rubbed to remove the pencil drawings of forgery.

Mr. Johnson again addressed the Court in a speech as warm as that of General Barnes.

The Court reserved a ruling on the objection until this morning.

WEDNESDAY'S SESSION.

Court convened half an hour earlier than usual this morning in order to allow counsel to argue the point raised Tuesday afternoon.

General Barnes talked against the objection, citing many records of cases which contain favorable opinions on photographic exhibits. Counsel spoke of the absolute accuracy of the camera and its invaluable services in many cases at law.

KYTKA AND HIS EXHIBITS.

Though Taken Some Days Ago, The Above Picture Shows Expert Theodore Kytka Exactly As He Appeared This Morning When Explaining To The Court And Jury The Similarity Between The Abbreviation "Wm" As It Occurs On The Deed Of May 12, 1890, And On The $100,000 Note. Each Of The Photographed Signatures Is About Four Feet Long By One And One Half Feet Wide. This Picture Is Supplied The Promoter By The San Francisco Chronicle, Which Great Newspaper Has Contained Full And Accurate Accounts Of The Murdock Suit.

Counsel Barnes then had witness Kytka produce two sheets of paper bearing the same signatures as the superimposed photographs. In the presence of the Court, the expert treated the paper with lucca oil to render them translucent. One of these was placed above the other and Barnes wished to show it to the jury.

Mr. Johnson again objected, claiming that the evidence was third hand—that it consisted of enlarged photos of other photos of the signatures, all prepared by an expert in the employ of the defendants. Mr. Johnson stated that several States prohibited expert testimony altogether. He read a statute which permits exhibits of handwriting, but does not mention photos. The writing offered, he said, was not Wm Murdock's, but Kytka's.

In reply, General Barnes referred to Mr. Johnson as antediluvian. He at law.

Mr Bayne followed in a speech prefaced with a complaint against the warm invective used in arguing this point yesterday afternoon. The attorney cited other decisions favoring his view of the objection.

Mr. Johnson replied to Bayne's reference to invective, declaring that brick throwing had in no instance been begun by himself. He argued the objection at some length.

The Court sustained the objection, ruling that one translucent sheet containing "Wm" of the note might not be superimposed above the translucent sheet containing the "Wm" of the deed. His Honor stated that the ruling would not effect the status of the large number of photos admitted in evidence.

Expert Kytka was again called to the stand by General Barnes. Over the plaintiff's objection he was allowed to show by means of the enlarged photographic signatures on the screen against the wall the successive strokes by which the "Wm" of the deed was made. Wm of the deed, the expert claimed, was begun with a downward stroke in which for a little distance the ink failed to flow and in which the nibs of the pen made dry furrows discernible under the microscope. The incompleted initial line had been retraced, the pen moving in an opposite direction and at the curve making a double line. In answer to General Barnes' question, witness said that the "Wm" of the deed and the "Wm" of the note were just alike in size and general formation.

Witness stated that he had placed one above the other and found that they fitted almost exactly.

The witness stated that he had made a study of handwriting for ten years, and that he had given expert testimony in more than eighty cases.

Asked what his conclusions were after examining the two, witness said he would pronounce the signature of the note a tracing of the signature of the deed of 1890.

In order to demonstrate this, witness took the deed and note and superimposed one above the other against a window pane. The Judge and jury moved to the window and examined the two.

The witness arranged in order the copies of photographic exhibits prepared for the jurymen.

The hour for the noon recess had arrived and Judge Pirkey announced, the attorneys concurring, that there would be no session of the Court this afternoon out of respect to the memory of attorney Freeman's mother.

Court will convene at half past nine o'clock Thursday morning.

THE DEFENSE SCORES ONE.

Sehorn's Evidence in the Murdock Case Stricken Out.

SAID WILLIAM MIGHT HAVE COMPROMISED.

WITNESS SKIFF, FOR PLAINTIFF, GIVEN THE LIE FROM THE STAND.

Sworn Evidence That the Southern Pacific Conductor Stated He Expected Big Pay — Experts Introduced.

Special Dispatch to the "Chronicle."

WILLOWS, April 18.—After two days spent in tedious reading and placing in evidence checks and other documents bearing the acknowledged signature of the dead William Murdock, the $100,000 note suit again took on the semblance of progress this morning. The crowd which had gone back to farm during the uninteresting proceedings of Monday, was on hand. It was the same crowd which early and late for the past fortnight has listened open-mouthed to the evidence for the plaintiff. It was a good day for the gallery. Up to this time the sensations have emanated from the lawyers and from the witness stand, but this morning one came from the bench. As soon as Judge Pirkey took his seat he announced that the testimony given for plaintiff by Dr. W. A. Sehorn would be stricken from the record and he ordered the jury to give it no consideration. His honor stated that after deliberation he considered Sehorn's testimony improper.

Dr. Sehorn is a dentist who swore that B. H. Burton, an executor of William Murdock's will and who is one of the defendants, told him just after the old man's death that the existence of the note was not a secret and that had William Murdock lived a week or two longer the note would have been compromised. A high value had been set upon this testimony and its sudden striking out astonished the plaintiff's attorneys. It had been expected that the defense would open the ball with its experts, when Hiram Johnson [illegible]

[ORNIA: WEDNESDAY EVENING, APRIL 19, 1899.

THE DEFENSE GETTING DOWN TO BUSINESS.

HANDWRITING EXPERT KYTKA AND HIS BIG EXHIBIT.

Expert Kytka has an impressive array of photographs of the signatures of Wm. Murdock and also notes and checks which passed through Murdock's hands and which he signed. These exhibits are arranged tastefully on a long table in front of the jury. He has one very large board, 3x10 feet, placed against the wall near the Judge's chair and which can be plainly seen by the jurors. Upon this board are other large photographic pictures of Murdock's signature. They were all enlarged from the originals and differences and likenesses can be easily detected. Above is a photographic copy of this exhibit, with Mr. Kytka pointing to the signature of the $100,000 note, which he says is a very clumsy forgery.

Another curiosity for inspection is the lens which Kytka uses in magnifying these notes, etc. This lens is a very powerful magnifier and cost the owner $1,800. Two men are kept constantly to guard all these exhibits and this instrument. At every recess of court crowds of people rush up to these exhibits and spend all the time possible in examining them.

THIS morning court convened at 9:30, a little earlier than usual, and consequently there were not many in the court room. General Barnes arose and continued his argument in favor of admitting fac-simile copies of signatures in evidence. Read from Abbott's Trial Evidence, page 398, par 17, which said that a photographer could be put on the stand as expert, and his photographic productions could be admitted as evidence.

Barnes read various other citations and then gave way to attorney Bayne, who after protesting against the opposing counsel using invectives in their arguments, which he said were entirely out of place here, proceeded to say that no matter if this kind of evidence is only admitted by a statute, still this would be enough to guide the court in its decision in regard to this point, for to the statutes passed by the Legislature we owe a great many of our privileges of today. Also cited many references which bore upon the point in question. His argument consumed about thirty minutes.

(Continued on page 3.)

Johnson then, on behalf of plaintiff, said that this is not a question of admissibility of photographic reproductions, as counsel for defense said, but was a question whether or not comparisons of these reproductions are admissible. Referred to many decisions of other courts and opinions of well known authorities.

Judge Pirkey said: "This is a close question. There is no question about these photographic reproductions being admitted as evidence, but I seriously doubt if these comparisons should be allowed, and therefore sustain the objection of plaintiff, and these comparisons cannot be admitted as evidence, but the jury can, if it so desires, examine these."

Expert Kytka then took the stand and testified that he had had the $100,000 note in his possession and also the deed of Wm. Murdock made in 1890, and had examined them carefully.

Court here declared a recess of five minutes.

After recess Kytka was again put on the stand. Testified that when signature to deed was made in making the "W" the ink did not flow freely and therefore the "W" was not made as the writer intended. Had placed the "Wm" of note over the "Wm" of deed and the lines, etc., fit over each other with but few exceptions. "Wm" of note seems to have been traced from "Wm" of deed, but seems to have been done clumsily. The differences are so small that they are hardly noticeable. Had been an expert on handwriting for about ten years. For the last five years have devoted whole time to this expert work. Had been in about eighty cases. In Fair case made about 16,000 photographs of various signatures, etc. Witness took "Wm" of deed and "Wm" of note and placed them one over the other and showed them to the jury.

Six sets of photographic reproductions of seventy-nine signatures of Wm. Murdock and which also contained the signature of the note, were given to the jury for examination.

Court then adjourned to 9:30 tomorrow morning, to allow some of the attorneys to attend the funeral of the late Mrs. Freeman, who is the mother of Fred Freeman, one of the attorneys for the plaintiff.

ture of the deed of March 12, 1890, made on translucent paper. On another sheet of this semi-transparent paper was the enlarged "Wm" of the signature of the hundred thousand dollar note. At General Barnes' request expert Kytka fastened the sheet containing the signature of the note directly above the signature of the deed, the object being to show that the letters were of exactly the same size and formation. General Barnes desired to hand this to the jury for examination. Mr. Johnson objected.

The Court reserved a ruling on the objection until this morning.

WEDNESDAY'S SESSION.

Court convened half an hour earlier than usual this morning in order to allow counsel to argue the point raised Tuesday afternoon.

General Barnes talked against the objection, citing many records of cases which contain favorable opinions on photographic exhibits. Further spoke of the absolute accuracy of the camera and its invaluable services in many cases

KYTKA AND HIS EXHIBITS.

Though Taken Some Days Ago, The Above Picture Shows Expert Theodore Kytka Exactly As He Appeared This Morning When Explaining To The Court And Jury The Similarity Between The Abbreviation "Wm" As It Occurs On The Deed Of May 12, 1890, And On The $100,000 Note. Each Of The Photographed Signatures Is About Four Feet Long By One And One Half Feet Wide. This Picture Is Supplied The Promoter By The San Francisco Chronicle, Which Great Newspaper Has Contained Full And Accurate Accounts Of The Murdock Suit.

Counsel Barnes then had witness Kytka produce two sheets of paper bearing the same signatures as the superimposed photographs. In the presence of the Court, the expert treated the papers with lucca oil to render them translucent. One of these was placed above the other and Barnes wished to show it to the jury.

Mr. Johnson again objected, claiming that the evidence was third hand—that it consisted of enlarged photos of other photos of the signatures, all prepared by an expert in the employ of the defendants. Mr. Johnson stated that several States prohibited expert testimony altogether. He read a statute which permits exhibits of handwriting, but does not mention photos. The writing offered, he said, was not Wm Murdock's, but Kytka's.

In reply, General Barnes referred to Mr. Johnson as ante-deluvian. He at law.

Mr Bayne followed in a speech prefaced with a complaint against the warm invective used in arguing this point yesterday afternoon. The attorney cited other decisions favoring his view of the objection.

Mr. Johnson replied to Bayne's reference to invective, declaring that brick throwing had in no instance been begun by himself. He argued the objection at some length.

The Court sustained the objection, ruling that one translucent sheet containing "Wm" of the note might not be superimposed above the translucent sheet containing the "Wm" of the deed. His Honor stated that the ruling would not effect the status of the large number of photos admitted in evidence.

Expert Kytka was again called to the stand by General Barnes. Over the plaintiff's objection he was allowed to examining the two, witness said he would pronounce the signature of the note a tracing of the signature of the deed of 1890.

In order to demonstrate this, witness took the deed and note and superimposed one above the other against a window pane. The Judge and jury moved to the window and examined the two.

The witness arranged in order the copies of photographic exhibits prepared for the purpose.

The hour for the noon recess had arrived and Judge Pirkey announced, the attorneys concurring, that there would be no session of the Court this afternoon out of respect to the memory of attorney Freeman's mother.

Court will convene at half past nine o'clock Thursday morning.

THE DEFENSE SCORES ONE.

Sehorn's Evidence in the Murdock Case Stricken Out.

SAID WILLIAM MIGHT HAVE COMPROMISED.

WITNESS SKIFF, FOR PLAINTIFF, GIVEN THE LIE FROM THE STAND.

Sworn Evidence That the Southern Pacific Conductor Stated He Expected Big Pay — Experts Introduced.

Special Dispatch to the Chronicle.

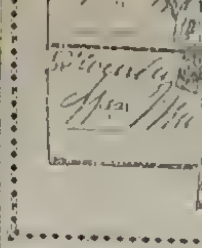
WILLOWS, April 18.—After two days spent in tedious reading and placing in evidence checks and other documents bearing the acknowledged signature of the dead William Murdock the $100,000 note suit again took on the excitement of progress this morning. The crowd which had gone back to [illegible] during the uninteresting proceedings of Monday was on hand. It was the same crowd which early and late for the past fortnight has listened open mouthed to the evidence for the plaintiff. It was a good day for the gallery. Up to this time the sensations have emanated from the lawyers and from the witness stand, but this morning one came from the bench. As soon as Judge Pirkey took his seat he announced that the testimony given for plaintiff by Dr. W. A. Sehorn would be stricken from the record and he ordered the jury to give it no consideration. His honor stated that after deliberation he considered Sehorn's testimony improper.

Dr. Sehorn is a dentist who swore that H. H. Burton, an executor of William Murdock's will and who is one of the defendants, told him just after the old man's death that the existence of the note was not a secret and that had William Murdock lived a week or two longer the note would have been compromised. A high value had been set upon this testimony and its sudden striking out astonished the plaintiff's attorneys. It had been expected that the defense would open the ball with its experts, who Grove Johnson says are here "to swear this note is a forgery at so much per diem," but some other testimony was first offered. Mott Bryan of the State of Washington took the stand and said that witness H. A. Skiff, who testified for the plaintiff last week, had said to him on several occasions that he was to receive $10,000 for his testimony, and that he would be "fixed" if the case went right. Skiff swore last week that he heard "Old Bill" Murdock talking to the plaintiff, Mary Helen Murdock, about a note. When on the stand Skiff was asked if he had made these statements to Bryan and denied all of them.

Theodore Kytka, who announced himself as a documental photographic expert, had the courtroom transformed into the semblance of an art gallery. The light was softened by window drapings. In front of the jury box a table was piled high with enlarged photographs of checks, deeds, etc., bearing the acknowledged signature of William Murdock, while on a screen against the wall were twelve enlarged signatures, the photos measuring 4x1½ feet. One of them is the signature of the note. Just above it is a signature to the deed of May 12, 1890, from which the defense claims the note signature was copied. Others are signatures made in 1876 and 1877, by which it will be shown how different was Murdock's penmanship at the time it is alleged the note was made. Expert Kytka explained his process of enlargement to the jury and more than 100 photographed signatures and plates from which they were made were offered in evidence over Attorney Johnson's objection. Kytka produced a photograph of the "William" of the note and that of the deed of 1890, taken on translucent paper. When one was superimposed on the other and held to the light it was seen that they were of exactly the same size and formation.

Attorney Johnson made an appeal on legal grounds to have these photographs refused as evidence.

General Barnes, in reply, called Johnson an antediluvian and talked vehemently of "damnable forgeries," "Indian cunning" and "the rights of litigants." The point raised covers a large part of the photographic exhibits. The Court will decide the point tomorrow morning.



HANDWRITIN[G]

Expert Kytka has m[...]
Murdock and also notes [...]
which he signed. Thes[e ...]
the jury. He has one [...]
Judge's chair and which [...] other large photograph[s ...]
from the originals and [...] a photographic copy of [...] the $100,000 note, which [...]

Another curiosity fo[r ...]
these notes, etc. This [...]
Two men are kept const[antly ...]
every recess of court cro[wds ...]
time possible in examini[ng ...]

THIS morning co[urt ...]
9.30, a little earli[er ...]
consequently ther[e ...]
in the court room. Ge[neral ...]
and continued his argu[ment ...]
admitting fac-simile cop[ies ...]
in evidence. Read from [...]
Evidence, page 398, par[...]
that a photographer cou[ld ...]
stand as expert, and [...]
ted by a statute, sti[ll ...]
enough to guide the co[urt ...]
In regard to this point, [...]
passed by the Legislatu[re ...]
many of our privileges [...]
cited many references [...]
the point in question, [...]
consumed about thirty [...]

Johnson then, on hi[s ...]
said that this is not a qu[estion ...]
bility of photographic [...] counsel for defense said [...]
tion whether or not rom[...]
reproductions are admis[sible ...]
In many decisions of [...] opinions of well known [...]

Judge Pirkey said "[...]
question. There is no [...]
these photographic repr[oductions ...]
admitted as evidence, [...]
doubt if the comparison [...]
toward, and therefore sust[ained ...]
of plaintiff, and these c[...]
not be admitted as evide[nce ...] can if it so desires, exam[ine ...]

Expert Kytka then to[ok ...]
testified that he had [...]
note in his possession an[d ...]
of Wm Murdock made [...] examined them carefully [...]

Court here declared [...]
minutes.

After recess Kytka w[...]

COURT LESSONS IN CHIROGRAPHY

Handwriting Experts Testify in the Murdock Note Case.

Photographic Transparencies Are Not Admitted in Evidence by Judge Pirkey.

CANNON'S THEATRICAL PERFORMANCE

Kytka Testifies That He Believes the Signature in Controversy Was Traced.

[Special Dispatch to "The Examiner."]

WILLOWS, April 19.—This has been the first lively day of the defense in the Murdock case. Only a forenoon session was held, however, an adjournment being ordered at 12 o'clock on account of a death in Attorney Freeman's family.

The morning opened with a debate on the admission of enlarged copies of the Murdock signature, which copies had been filed and were intended for use as transparencies. General Barnes and Attorney Richard Bayne argued the point for the defense. General Barnes alluded to the use of the stereopticon in the Sharon case and of the use of the enlarged photographs in many of the recent celebrated trials at San Francisco.

Mr. Bayne, replying to Grove L. Johnson's remarks about experts, who "swear at so much per swear," sarcastically alluded to "lawyers who work for contingent fees—whose only hope of pay is in the success of their case," and lawyers "like wolves, who cannot eat unless they break into the fold and feed on the flock."

When the debate was ended Judge Pirkey sustained the plaintiff's objection, preventing Expert Kytka from putting the enlarged photographic transparencies together for the purpose of a comparison which would tend to prove that the note signature had been partially made by a tracing from the genuine signature that was on a deed.

The transparencies were admitted in evidence despite the plaintiff's objection, however, and the jurors will be permitted to make for themselves the comparisons that Mr. Kytka was not allowed to make. When he was prevented from comparing the enlarged transparencies, Expert Kytka made the comparison of the original deed signature and the signature on the $100,000 note. He fastened the deed to a window-pane on which the sun was shining and placed the note over the other document, and a very practical transparent view of the two signatures was thus obtained. Writing Expert Daniel T. Ames provided a large magnifying glass and the jurors saw for themselves how the signatures fitted. Attorney W. M. Cannon of San Francisco, who is one of the leading lawyers for the plaintiff, strongly objected to what he called "this theatrical performance," but his objection was overruled.

Mr. Kytka next showed, as a revelation of the microscope, that in signing the deed from which the note signature is alleged to have been traced, William Murdock began the first downward stroke of the letter "W" considerably above the point seen in the signature. The ink did not flow, but the marks of the pen point were left. To remedy the defect caused by the failure of his pen, Murdock made an unusual and somewhat flourished cross-stroke in the signature of the note, Kytka testified, the effect of the pen failure and the cross-stroke amendment were faithfully reproduced by the tracing. In other words, the exact defects of the deed signature are in the note.

General Barnes questioned Kytka about the latter's experience as a handwriting expert, all the previous testimony having been given as that of an expert photographer. The witness told of his testimony in eighty California trials, including the famous will cases at San Francisco.

"Were you a handwriting expert in the Fair will case?" asked General Barnes.

"No, I made 16,000 photographs in that case and it kept me very busy," was the reply.

"Have you formed an opinion as to how the abbreviation 'Wm.' in the Murdock note was made?" inquired General Barnes, while the plaintiff's objections were shouted in vain.

"I have."

"What is your opinion?"

"That part of the signature was traced."

Expert Ames is to give his testimony to-morrow.

"FORGERY," SAYS EXPERT AMES IN MURDOCK CASE

Declares That the Name on the Big Note Is Not Genuine.

It Is Crude Work, Says the Expert, and Two Kinds of Ink Were Used.

SOME EMPHATIC TESTIMONY

All Day Long There Is a Procession of Jurors and Lawyers to the Microscope.

[Special Dispatch to "The Examiner."]

WILLOWS, April 20.—Writing Expert Ames to-day testified emphatically that the name of "William Murdock" which is signed to the big note that is the basis of a suit against the Murdock estate is a crude forgery.

This has been a day of procession in the Murdock case.

Early in the forenoon writing expert Daniel T. Ames adjusted a [illegible] to the window [illegible] in the [illegible] which [illegible] Murdock [illegible] trying to collect [illegible]. Judge Pirkey looked through the glass until the twelve jurors followed in single and solemn order. Next in procession were the lawyers for the defense, and then the attorneys for the plaintiff.

Another exhibit was placed in focus, and then another, and all day long the processions were continued. During recess the Glenn county residents sought the privilege of gazing through the instrument, and in that procession the ladies were a majority.

Mr. Johnson of Sacramento seemed to see funny things in the microscope. He laughed every time he looked. He urged his associates, lawyers Cannon of San Francisco, Thompson of Fresno and Donohue of Willows to look through the microscope, and each one smiled as he turned away. Nobody laughed but the lawyers who are fighting against the scientific testimony to the effect that the note is a forgery, and each of these lawyers declared that he could see none of the alterations and erasures described by the expert.

"I haven't seen a thing that I couldn't see with the naked eye," remarked Mr. Johnson.

"Perhaps you have very keen eyes," replied General Barnes.

"I have," said Mr. Johnson. "I will match them against any microscope ever made."

The exhibits under the microscope were of the alleged lead-pencil outlining of the note signature, the patched-up ink markings and careful drawings of the signature as it stands, the erasure of the pencil marks and consequent abrasion of the note's surface, and many defects in the signature.

"Can you as an expert tell whether there has been any interference with the fiber of the paper in this note?" asked General Barnes of Ames.

"I can."

"Has there been any interference?"

"There has."

"Of what kind."

"Erasure with a rubber. The fiber in the signature space has been worn off and swung out of place, parts of it lying across parts of the signature."

When the microscope work was ended General Barnes inquired:

"Mr. Ames, in your opinion is the note signature the genuine signature of William Murdock?"

"It is not," replied the expert.

"Was it written by Mr. Murdock?"

"It was not."

"Have you any doubt on the subject?"

"None whatever."

When Mr. Ames qualified as an expert he stated that he had testified about handwriting in more than 1,200 cases throughout the United States and in London and Paris. He said that when he first saw the note it was submitted to him in San Francisco by Lawrence S. Meggison, who is said to be interested in the plaintiff's side of the case and to whom the note was indorsed.

The declaration by Mr. Ames that the note signature was forged is very sweeping and emphatic. The expert even says that the forgery was a very crude one, and that inks of two slightly different colors were used.

On cross-examination the plaintiff's attorneys intend to occupy only about ten minutes to-morrow morning, and then Expert Eisenschimmel of San Francisco will testify about the signature and the methods employed in making it. Some sensational direct evidence is expected to be given as soon as the experts' testimony is all heard.

CLEARLY FORGED, SAY THE PENMEN

Strong Swearing by Experts Against the Murdock Note.

Carl Eisenschimmel Says He Refused a Retainer by the Plaintiffs.

[Special Dispatch to "The Examiner."]

WILLOWS, April 21.—Carl Eisenschimmel, the San Francisco expert in handwriting, to-day gave the main part of his testimony in the Murdock case. He declared the signature to the note on which an attempt is being made to collect $361,000 from the William Murdock estate to be a very poor forgery. Further, he testified the note was originally submitted to him by the holders of it, and that he then pronounced the signature a forgery and declined to testify in support of it. The following month he was consulted and engaged by the defense.

When the court convened at 3 o'clock, additional notes and checks were identified by Banker Harrington of Colusa and were offered in evidence. Then Expert Ames was recalled and the microscopic examinations of the alleged forgery were resumed, with countermand [illegible] on Thursday. All this was against Mr. Johnson's strenuous objections.

On cross-examination, Mr. Ames admitted that mistakes could be made by handwriting experts.

"You say that the document was signed subsequent to 1890," continued Mr. Johnson, referring to the note that is dated 1881, "[illegible] if one thousand men should come here and testify that they had seen the note prior to 1890, what would you think?"

"I would think that they were mistaken or lying," replied Mr. Ames, positively.

Mr. Johnson questioned the expert about contingent fees.

"I never worked for a contingent fee in my life," said the witness.

"What pay are you to get for your testimony in this case?"

"Fifty dollars per day and $100 per day, according to the nature of my work."

Mr. Eisenschimmel, the next witness, said that he first saw the Murdock note at [illegible] & [illegible]'s law office, San Francisco, in January, 1898. He was at that time requested to examine the note by persons connected with the plaintiff, and the note signature and several admitted copies of the signature were examined by the witness for [illegible].

"Did you not [illegible] report to Mr. Cannon?" asked Attorney Johnson.

"I did."

"What did you say in that report?"

"I said to him that I could not testify [illegible] the matter of the note [illegible] that the [illegible] had been formed [illegible] by [illegible] patching and tracing."

[illegible]"Did the note signature bear any of the Murdock handwriting characteristics?"

"None at all. William Murdock had very firm and set habits of handwriting. He wrote fluently, with a semi-angular style. He made his flourishes very rapidly, as people usually make flourishes and all letter strokes. None of these characteristics are found in the note signature, which was slowly and carefully drawn, patched and retouched."

"Did Mr. Murdock ever retouch his signatures?"

"No, even when there was a pen failure, he wrote right along and let it go."

"And do you consider the note signature to be that of William Murdock?"

"No, the note signature is an absolute fabrication."

The defense is preparing to impeach witnesses who have testified that they saw the big note prior to 1890, and sensational developments are expected to follow the expert testimony. There are about sixty witnesses yet to be called.

AMES' DAY

Expert Ames Aims Shots at the Note Signature.

A Whole Day of Comparisons on the Admitted and Disputed Signatures of Wm. Murdock.

Famous expert Daniel T. Ames was the central figure in the proceedings of the Murdock note case in the Superior Court today.

As a drawing card expert testimony does not go well in Willows; there were but few people in court this morning, yet the testimony of Mr. Ames was very interesting.

Promptly at 9:30 this morning the jurymen answered to their names, and Mr. Ames was called to the stand. The fame of this gentleman as a handwriting expert, pen artist, editor and publisher of pen literature is world-wide and Mr. Ames' long experience in court makes him a good witness.

He was interrupted by the opposing attorneys but few times; but when these few times came objections came out in such large volleys that it sounded as though Daniel was in the lion's den.

Answering General Barnes, Mr. Ames stated that he was 64 years of age; resides in New York City; has made a specialty of the study of questioned handwriting for thirty years and has testified in 1,200 cases before various courts of justice. For twenty-two years has been the publisher of the "Penman's Art Journal" of New York.

General Barnes handed Ames the $100,000 note and asked him where he first saw the paper. Answered that he first saw it during the year 1897, was shown to him by L. S. Megginson in a law office in the Chronicle building at San Francisco. Didn't remember where the paper was produced from; witness had it a minute or two. Next time he saw it was in the Superior Judge's chambers in Willows. A year ago January or February witness was spoken to by executors in this case, then made an examination and report on a photographic copy of note. Since 4th of this month has seen the original here and has examined 793 checks bearing Wm. Murdock's signature which have been offered in evidence as exemplars.

The jury was here handed six exhibits which were to be examined in connection with Mr. Ames' testimony—two jurymen to a copy.

Mr. Ames then stated that he had found from his examination that Wm. Murdock's admitted signature showed his handwriting to be positive, well-defined and strong, while the signature to the note was the reverse—hesitating and nervous. Also that in signing his name ink flowed regular, giving the lines a uniform color and making the lines at once strong, solid and smooth. Lines in the signature to the note, said witness, were gray, uneven and shaky.

Mr. Ames told the jury that in measuring with a protractor he found a general slant in the admitted signatures to be 45 degrees from the perpendicular, while the questioned signature showed a slant of 60 degrees.

Witness then took other signatures shown in the exhibit and contrasted them with the signature to the note, saying that all the admitted signatures show a rounding of curves in the capital "M" while the "M" in note is not so, but made in angles.

The signature of Murdock to the 18[…] note was taken up. Mr. Ames said th[…] in signing this deed the ink did not flo[…] when the initial to the "W" was mad[…] Witness showed on the blackboard ho[…] the accident was corrected by the write[…] and stated that this correcting strok[…] while in no other signature of the 7[…] seen by him, appears in the note sign[…]ture.

This deed of 1890 was put under t[…] microscope so as to show the "Wm" [...] the signature, and judge and jury exa[…]ined the lines carefully.

The corresponding part to the note w[…] then placed under the glass and look[…] at by judge and jury.

Continuing, Mr. Ames said that a [mi]croscopic examination showed that [the] fibre of the paper where note is sig[ned] was torn off and a "grinding off" of i[t] was also shown. With a pair of divid[ers] witness then showed similarities in t[he] "Wm" on deed and on note, demonstr[at]ing that distances between differe[nt] points in this word "Wm" were iden[ti]cal, although they varied in other adm[it]ted signatures.

Witness said the microscope shows t[wo] kinds of ink—a gray, and a perfect bla[ck]. That the grayish ink appears in the d[…] under "m" in Wm, and is seen in the [...]

d, o and e of Murdock. That the bla[ck] ink appears on the gray as of "patchin[g]" or reinforcing the flow. One of t[he] checks was placed in the microscope [to] show the uniform strokes in Murdoc[k's] admitted signature and the jury insp[ec]ted the paper so magnified.

Afternoon Session.

Comparisons of the Wm Murdock signatures were taken up by expert Ames at two o'clock this afternoon. The small "o" in Murdock received the full share of Mr. Ames' attention during the larger part of the first half hour, and there was a larger crowd of spectators present to hear the expert's testimony.

Mr. Ames pointed out that the "o" in the Murdock signature to the note is more like a small "a", and that were it not for the context it would be taken for an "a". Witness then pointed out a number of o's made by Wm Murdock at different times all of which were called "well-defined" letters and not made like the one in question.

The signature to the $100,000 note was again placed under the microscope and the jury looked at the letters to note certain peculiarities as to a disconnection in the writing of this small "o"—what the expert calls "patching".

A check signed by Wm. Murdock, dated eleven days before the note in question is said to have been signed, was put under the microscope and viewed by judge and jury. Another check, dated Sept. 20, 1877, fifteen days after the note is alleged to have been signed, was put through the same course.

Peculiarities of the "c" and "k" in Murdock's admitted signatures compared with the disputed signatures, was gone into. When Mr. Ames started to tell how the pen was held when any of the signatures were made he was stopped by objections from attorney Johnson, which objections the court sustained.

Mr. Ames read from his notes as to the Murdock signatures examined by him, in the matter of the ending of "k's" and the dash under the small "m" in "Wm". Witness said that signatures on all checks examined by him, dated from 1872 to December 1879, showed the final ending of the "k" to be a curve brought under the line and to the left. Two hundred and seventy-three signatures were examined before the "k" like that in the note's signature was found.

Witness said that after 1879 Murdock gradually changed the ending of his signature and frequently made it with an up curve to the final stroke of the "k." Both the 1890 deed signature and that of the note in question ends that way.

Answering General Barnes, witness said that the "c" in the note signature was made by several strokes of the pen, and the jury examined this letter under the microscope. An admitted "c" was then looked at under the glass, the letter being one made by Murdock in August, 1877.

After more microscopic examinations as to the surface of the paper of note were made, General Barnes asked Ames:

"Do you believe the signature to this note is the genuine handwriting of Wm. Murdock?"

"It is not," answered the expert.

"Have you any doubt about it?" asked the attorney.

"None whatever," was the reply.

Further questioning was simply a rehash of former testimony.

"Take the witness," said General Barnes.

Grove L. Johnson's first question to Ames was:

"Do you call your business a science, art or trade?"

"All three," was the answer.

Witness said that it was not an exact science like mathematics. Johnson asked Ames if mistakes could occur. The answer was "yes," and with that answer court adjourned.

APRIL 21, 1899.

DAILY PROMOTER

SPECIALLY ISSUED BY THE TRI-WEEKLY PROMOTER DURING THE HEARING OF THE MURDOCK NOTE SUIT.

WILLOWS, CALIFORNIA, THURSDAY, APRIL 20, 1899.

D. F. AMES IS HEARD.

The New York Handwriting Expert Begins His Testimony This Morning.

Judge Parker took the bench this morning and announced, by way of the vision on a point raised yesterday, that the defense might continue expert Kytka on the stand as a witness on handwriting or might call him as such at a later date. The plaintiff waived right of cross-examination of the expert at this time.

Expert Ames On The Stand

General Barnes called Daniel T. Ames. Witness stated his occupation as teacher, pen artist, editor and expert examiner of questioned handwriting. Witness had testified on handwriting in over 1200 cases and in over 32 States, Canada, London and Paris. Witness enumerated the most important cases in which he had appeared, among them being the famous Morey-Garfield forgery, many celebrated cases in New York and recent ones in San Francisco. Witness

LAWRENCE S. MEGGINSON.

The Man To Whom The $100,000 Note Was First Endorsed, And Who Is An Interested Spectator At The Trial Of The Suit had been the recognized expert of United States court for southern New York district for twenty years.

Witness first saw the $100,000 note in 1897 in a law office in the Chronicle building, San Francisco. Note was shown witness by L. S. Megginson. He next saw the note in the Judges' Chambers at the Court House. Witness examined photographic signatures in January 1898 for the defendants and submitted a report. He had examined the note under a microscope.

General Barnes asked the witness as to any relations he saw between the signature of the note and that of the deed of 1890. Enlarged photos of the signatures of the note were handed to the jury, while the expert illustrated from the large photos on the screen. Witness stated that the acknowledged signatures of William were written in a strong positive hand, with smooth and even lines.

Witness said the lines of the note were shaky and uneven.

Witness stated that the signatures of two exhibited checks written in 1877 were strong and regular. Witness stated that the "n's," "u's" and "m's" of the acknowledged signatures are made with broad, square cut-off tops while the tops of those letters on the note are pointed.

Witness used two slender rods to show the difference in the slant of the letters in the word "Murdock" in acknowledged signatures and the letters appearing on the note. Witness pointed out that the slant on the note is much less than the other.

Witness placed the rods on similar lines in the "W" of the deed of 1890 and of the "W" of the note. He said these were perfect parallels. Witness termed the "W" of the deed "accidental," and stated that two furrows visible under the microscope show that the initial stroke of the pen failed to mark, that the letter was continued from the point where the ink flowed and finished in an unusual manner. Witness stated that of all the 795 acknowledged signatures in evidence there is but the one "accidental" "W"—that of the deed. Witness stated that curves of the first stroke in "W" of the deed and that of the note are similar.

The Court took a short recess while the witness arranged the $100,000 note under his microscope.

The paper was shifted several times, bringing different parts of the instrument. The Judge, jury and attorneys filed by the microscope as it was turned on different points, and each was inspected.

Witness Ames stated that upon examination of the surface about the signature on the note he found the fiber turned up and loose, many particles the lines gray and ragged and in places almost imperceptible. Witness said this condition was due to "grinding off"

A photograph on porcelain, showing the condition of the paper about the signature, was passed to the jury.

Witness used the dividers to demonstrate that the "Wm" of the note and that of the deed are similar in size. He used a ruler to show that the "Wm" of the note and that of the deed do not approximate in width with other exhibited signatures.

Witness said the signature of the note had been retouched; that the retouching had been with a different ink; that one ink used was black and the other purplish black. With this Statement the note was again placed under the microscope and subjected to inspection.

A new photograph of the note's signature, enlarged 150 times was introduced in evidence over Mr. Johnson's objection, and holding this before the jury, the witness pointed out the strokes and lines and explained why he believed the writing to be other than that of Wm. Murdock.

AFTERNOON SESSION

Expert Ames continued his testimony. Witness stated that there was a difference of 16 degrees in the slants of the word "Murdock" as it appears on the note and on the deed of 1884; the "Wm" on each has the same slant. Witness stated that he believed the "Wm" on the note a tracing of that on the deed.

Asked if he found any similarity to the writing of the word "Murdock" on any of the signatures in evidence, witness pointed to the "r" and the "d" on the note, traced their formation, and called attention to the same letters in the signature of the deed of 1872, which he said were similarly made: and he further stated that the two letters were not similarly made in any of the other signatures. Witness stated that the "u" as originally made on the note bore a close resemblance to that on the deed of 1890, but that the letter on the note had been retouched with another ink and the lines made heavier. Witness showed in photos how the formation of the "r's" and other letters changed in the course of twenty years.

A check of August 2?, 1871 and another of September 20th, being the last signature before and the first after the note is alleged to have been made, were placed under the microscope and inspected in order to bring the characteristics of William's writing in the year of the note.

Witness stated that the "O" on various checks was always made with a free and even movement. He said that of the note was not.

Witness stated that the staff of the "D" on the note had been lengthened and curved after it was first made. The "O" was declared to be made with too much nicety. The staff of the "K," the witness said, as it appears in admitted signatures ends with a downward curl, while that on the note is shaded most at the top and tapers downward.

Witness stated that in all the 273 acknowledged signatures from 1872 to 1878 the terminal of the "K" swing back to the left. After 1878, the witness said, some of terminals of the "K" turn up as on the note.

Witness detailed the changes in Murdock's signature during the last twenty years of his life.

Ruby Sarsaparilla purifies the blood, tones the system and regulates the bowels. Price $1 per bottle, 3 for $2.50, at Putnam & Walker's.

SAYS NOTE IS FORGED.

Expert Ames on the Stand in the Murdock Case.

TELLS THE RESULT OF HIS EXAMINATION.

COMPARED THE SIGNATURE WITH HUNDREDS OF ADMITTEDLY GENUINE ONES.

He Dwells at Great Length on the Alleged Peculiar Features of the All-Important Document.

Special Dispatch to the "Chronicle."

WILLOWS, April 20.—This has been a strong day for the defense in the Murdock note suit so far as expert testimony is concerned. Daniel T. Ames, the celebrated handwriting expert of New York, who proved the famous Morey-Garfield campaign letter a forgery and who has been connected with nearly every noted case of questioned penmanship since that time, was on the witness stand all day. With all the care and detail of one who is a master of his profession, Ames moved tediously through the similarities of the signature of the $100,000 note and declared that the hand of dead William Murdock did not sign the name.

There are 795 enlarged photographs of acknowledged signatures of William Murdock in evidence, and nearly every one of them was referred to by the expert in giving his testimony. Ames stood by the great screen on the wall, on which are tacked twelve photographs of signatures enlarged to 150 diameters, and pointed out the flaws which he claims to have found.

In 1877 William Murdock gave to the plaintiff, Mary Helen Murdock a deed to a piece of land. In 1890 the validity of this deed was questioned, and William Murdock executed a new one. These instruments have remained in the custody of the plaintiff, and counsel for the defense claims that the signature to the big note was copied from the signatures of these [illegible] ... William Murdock [illegible] name with the abbreviation "Wm." Expert Ames declared the abbreviation appearing on the deed of 1890 to be unlike that of [illegible] of the 800 acknowledged signatures of Murdock.

Ames showed under the microscope how the initial stroke of the pen in making the "W" had failed to mark. Two dry furrows are visible beneath the glass. The expert claims that Murdock continued the letter from the point where the ink flowed and finished it with a stroke which renders the "W" unlike that contained in other of the admitted signatures.

Ames held that the "Wm" of the note is an exact copy of that of the deed of 1890. The peculiar double curve in the first stroke of the "W" is exactly the same in both signatures and other points also tally. Measured with a pair of dividers Ames said the two abbreviations proved to be of exactly the same size and the lines have the same slant. "The Wm of the note," said Ames, "is a tracing of the 'Wm' of the deed of 1890."

The expert held that the "Murdock" of the note was a poor but attempted copy of the "Murdock" of the deed of 1877. The letters of the name he claimed are of a similar formation, but of a shading not found in any of Murdock's acknowledged signatures. All of Murdock's admitted "n's" and "m's" are made with broad, square, cut-off tops while the tops of the same letters on the note are pointed.

A point dwelt on at length is the turned up terminal of the "k" on the note. Ames claimed that in 2?3 signatures written between 1872 and 1878 the terminal of the "K" turned back to the left, and not until after 1878 do any terminals occur which turn up. Ames made the bold statement that the signature on the note was first drawn in pencil, copied in ink, and that later the letters were retouched with another kind of ink. One ink used, he said, was black and the other purplish black.

Asked about the surface of the paper surrounding the signature, Ames said that the fiber is broken, turned up and that many particles are loose. He held that this was due to the rubbing of a rubber pencil mark eraser, which was used to remove traces of the original drawing. The note was placed under a powerful microscope and the Judge and jury inspected it. Ames said that he had not the slightest hesitation in pronouncing the note a forgery.

The witness was turned over to Grove L. Johnson for cross-examination three minutes before the hour of adjournment. In answer to a question Ames stated that, mathematically speaking, he should not call his science an exact one.

"FORGERY," SAYS EXPERT AMES IN MURDOCK CASE

Declares That the Name on the Big Note Is Not Genuine.

It Is Crude Work, Says the Expert, and Two Kinds of Ink Were Used.

SOME EMPHATIC TESTIMONY

All Day Long There Is a Procession of Jurors and Lawyers to the Microscope.

[Special Dispatch to "The Examiner."]

WILLOWS, April 20.—Writing Expert Ames to-day testified emphatically that the name of "William Murdock" which is signed to the big note that is the basis of a suit against the Murdock estate is a crude forgery.

This has been a day of procession in the Murdock case.

Early in the forenoon writing expert Daniel T. Ames adjusted his microscope to show defects in the note on which Mary Helen Murdock is trying to collect $164,000. Then Judge Parkey looked through the glass and the twelve jurors followed in slow and solemn order. Next in procession were the lawyers for the defense and then the attorneys for the plaintiff.

Another exhibit was placed in focus, and then another, and all day long the processions were continued. During recess the Glenn county residents sought the privilege of gazing through the instrument, and in that procession the ladies were a majority.

Mr. Johnson of Sacramento seemed to see funny things in the microscope. He laughed every time he looked. He urged his associates, Lawyers Cannon of San Francisco, Thompson of Fresno and Donohoe of Willows to look through the microscope, and each one smiled as he turned away. Nobody laughed but the lawyers who are fighting against the scientific testimony to the effect that the note is a forgery, and each of these lawyers declared that he could see none of the alterations and erasures described by the expert.

"I haven't seen a thing that I couldn't see with the naked eye," remarked Mr. Johnson.

"Perhaps you have very keen eyes," replied General Barnes.

"I have," said Mr. Johnson. "I will match them against any microscope ever made."

The exhibits under the microscope were of the alleged lead-pencil outlining of the note signature, the patched-up ink markings and careful drawings of the letters as it stands, the erasure of the pencil marks and consequent abrasion of the note's surface, and many defects in the signature.

"Can you as an expert tell whether there has been any interference with the fiber of the paper in this note?" asked General Barnes of Ames.

"I can."

"Has there been any interference?"

"There has."

"Of what kind?"

"Erasure with a rubber. The fiber in the signature space has been worn off and swung out of place, parts of it lying across parts of the signature."

When the microscope work was ended General Barnes inquired:

"Mr. Ames, in your opinion is the [illegible] signature the genuine signature of William Murdock?"

"It is not," replied the expert.

"Was it written by Mr. Murdock?"

"It was not."

"Have you any doubt on the subject?"

"None whatever."

When Mr. Ames qualified as an expert he stated that he had testified about handwriting in more than 1200 cases throughout the United States and in London and Paris. He said that when he first saw the note it was submitted to him in San Francisco by Lawrence S. Megginson, who is said to be interested in the plaintiff's side of the case and to whom the note was indorsed.

The declaration by Mr. Ames that the note signature was forged is very sweeping and emphatic. The expert also says that the forgery was a very crude one, and that inks of two slightly different colors were used.

The cross-examination the plaintiff's attorneys intend to occupy only about [illegible] minutes to-morrow morning, and then Expert [illegible] of San Francisco will testify about the signature and the methods employed in making it. Some rebuttal direct evidence is expected to be given as soon as the experts' testimony is all heard.

SAYS
ES IN K CASE

he Name ote Is ne.

Says the,
Kinds
sed.

ESTIMONY

Procession
yers to e.

MORE TECHNICALITIES ARE SPRUNG IN BEHALF OF BOOKKEEPER PETER W. M'GLADE.

THE CASE of Peter W. McGlade, the bookkeeper of the Street Department under Ambrose's administration who stole several sums from the city on forged demands, has been shuttling around Department 12 of the Superior Court on technicalities for the past three or four weeks. The main point raised in the mass of legal technicalities is that McGlade did not "steal legally," and for this slight informality in the manner of his wrongdoing he should be acquitted. McGlade forged and cashed some of the demands last September. He then took a trip south to await developments. The Grand Jury found two indictments against him for forgery and he has since been awaiting trial.

The case was again called before Judge Cook yesterday morning. The defendant was present with Patrick Reddy, his attorney, and ready to proceed to trial. But Assistant District Attorney Black asked for further delay and presented his own affidavit in support of the request. In this document he declared that the presence of Theodore Kytka, the handwriting witness, was much needed. The people could not safely go to trial without him. Kytka was now engaged in the trial of a case in Willows, and he asked a continuance for a week. Kytka would swear that McGlade not only wrote the body of the demands but also forged the name of Swords, the laborer, of Thomas B. Clark, the Deputy Superintendent of Streets, and of T. B. McGlonis, the assistant clerk of the Board of Supervisors.

Lawyer Reddy did not think the showing made by the Assistant District Attorney was sufficient to warrant a continuance. There was no showing of diligence or that even an attempt had been made to serve a subpoena on Kytka. The expert was regularly in the employ of the city in such matters and was allowed in a private case involving many thousands of dollars, but that was nothing to defendant's liberty. But outside of these technical objections, the evidence it was proposed to present through Kytka was immaterial. The document was sworn to before an assistant clerk of the Board of Supervisors, who had no right to administer oaths, and, consequently, as the demand itself was illegal, no forgery could have been committed.

Assistant District Attorney Black said that he expected to present sufficient evidence of fraud and that the preparation of the demands was calculated to deceive, and, in fact, did deceive the Finance Committee that passed them and the Treasurer who paid them. Under the statutes that would constitute a crime.

Judge Cook remarked that the whole case seemed to be involved in the point raised. As the prosecution was not ready he did not wish to force the trial. A continuance was granted to Friday, April 29th, at 10 A. M.

NEVER YET HAS MADE AN ERROR

Expert Ames Claims He Is Infallible.

Special Dispatch to The Call.

WILLOWS, April 21.—Grove L. Johnson's cross-examination of Expert Ames supplied the interesting feature of the Murdock note case to-day. Ames testified that he first made a report as to the questioned signature to F. C. Lusk. He had no doubt that the signature to the note was written subsequent to the 1890 deed, and that if 100 men testified that they saw the note written prior to that date he would believe they were mistaken or that they were prevaricating. He had given testimony in cases which did not agree with that of other experts. He had testified in matters in the Davis will case at San Francisco and his testimony at that time did not agree with that of Mr. Eisenschimel, an expert in attendance at the present trial. The witness said he was satisfied that his conclusions in all of the 1200 cases in which he had been a witness were correct. Ames said he would render a bill for services in the present case at the rate of $50 a day for part of the time and $100 per diem for the remainder.

Carl Eisenschimel was called. He testified that he lived in San Francisco and for about twenty years had been making a study of handwriting. He mentioned many important cases in which he had given testimony as an expert. He first saw the $364,000 note, the subject of the present trial, in January, 1898, at the office of Cannon & Freeman in San Francisco. He looked at the note a moment then. He had examined photograph copies of the note, the deed of 1890, a fragment of a deed made in 1873 and a letter written by William Murdock to Mary H. Murdock. Then he examined for a week or ten days, at the request of Cannon & Freeman, and he told Attorney Cannon that he believed the signature to the note was a forgery, produced by tracing, drawing and patching. He had examined over 300 admitted signatures of William Murdock since coming to Willows and had compared these signatures with that of the note. The note signature incorporated no characteristics of the regular handwriting of William Murdock. The witness said Murdock was a man of habit in his writing, and the spacing in his admitted signatures showed this. After Eisenschimel had said that Murdock's signatures showed a flowing hand and that the note signature was halting, patched and retouched, a piece of gelatine on which the witness had traced the signature on the deed of March, 1890, for the purpose of showing that the "Wm." in the note signature was identical with that of the deed was produced. The court would not admit the gelatine tracing and General Barnes excepted. The witness then went on to show the similarities in the two "Wms" by means of Kytka's enlarged photos. He explained to the jury how he arrived at the "accident" in the forming of the capital "W" in the 1890 deed, and pointed out how the "accident" was reproduced in the note signature. The witness was asked to point out to the jurors how the "patchwork" was done, and Eisenschimel held a "patching bee," pointing out the alleged pen patches, which the witness said meant a halting with the pen at each point. The jury was then told about "compound strokes," etc., showing how the admitted signatures differed from that on the note.

The quotation marks which form a part of the "Wm." in Murdock's signature, came in for a deal of attention from this expert.

After the afternoon recess Eisenschimel demonstrated to the jury certain conclusions which he had arrived at after examining the signatures, as to the slant of letters, a spattering of ink claimed to be on the note signature, the furrows made by the pen nibs and the marks which point to a drawing instead of a fluent writing of the note signature.

Admitted signatures innumerable were pointed out by the witness to show the "furrowing" and strokes of the pen nibs.

NIGHT OF PANTOMIME

The Evening of The Festival Is Assuredly The Best.

Music And Tableaux And Figures Which Move But Which Speak Not.

The third evening of the Music Festival will be classed by many as the most enjoyable of the series of entertainments thus far given.

Counter attractions diminished the attendance somewhat from that of the preceding night, but Star Hall was nearly filled when Rev. E. L. Burch read off the first number of the program.

Miss Mabel Duncan sang in a sweet childish voice the story of the sailor who met death with the Maine.

Theodore Kytka, the handwriting expert, delighted the audience with his high tenor. His song was "Asthore" and he responded to an encore.

The pretty and pathetic story of Ginevra, the fairy bride, was given in pantomime. The poem was read by Miss Logan Tooley and presented in five scenes. The first represented the marriage and a pretty picture it was. A dozen young people sustained the parts. The other scenes showed the game of hide-and-seek, the slipping of the bride into the parrot chest, the aged bridegroom still mourning for his lost one, and the final discovery of the skeleton by two little girls. The piece was very prettily staged.

Mrs. Theodore Kytka gave Gottschalk's Pasquinade on the piano and responded to an enthusiastic encore.

Several beautiful tableaux were presented.

The hit of "The Reunion," Billy Big Eye and Tommy Long Wing, responded and sang their duett.

Miss Maud McIntyre played a violin solo and the Misses Wetzold a duett with mandolin and guitar.

An amusing pantomime was that of the young man who could not be touched by love, music, knowledge or industry, but who sprang up and followed the girl with the bag of shekels.

To-night a concert, including several very strong numbers, will be given.

CLEARLY FORGED, SAY THE PENMEN

Strong Swearing by Experts Against the Murdock Note.

Carl Eisenschimmel Says He Refused a Retainer by the Plaintiffs.

[Special Dispatch to "The Examiner."]

WILLOWS, April 21.—Carl Eisenschimmel, the San Francisco expert in handwriting, to-day gave the main part of his testimony in the Murdock case. He declared the signature to the note on which an attempt is being made to collect $364,000 from the William Murdock estate to be a very poor forgery. Further, he testified the note was originally submitted to him by the holders of it, and that he then pronounced the signature a forgery and declined to testify in support of it. The following month he was consulted and engaged by the defense.

When the court convened at 9:30 o'clock, additional notes and checks were identified by Banker Harrington of Colusa and were offered in evidence. Then Expert Ames was recalled and the microscopic examinations of the alleged forgery were resumed, with courtroom processions as on Thursday. All this was against Mr. Johnson's strenuous objections.

On cross-examination, Mr. Ames admitted that mistakes could be made by handwriting experts.

"You say that the document was signed subsequent to 1890," continued Mr. Johnson, referring to the note that is dated 1877. "If one thousand men should come here and testify that they had seen the note prior to 1890, what would you think?"

"I would think that they were mistaken or lying," replied Mr. Ames, positively.

Mr. Johnson questioned the expert about contingent fees.

"I never worked for a contingent fee in my life," said the witness.

"What pay are you to get for your testimony in this case?"

"Fifty dollars per day and $100 per day, according to the nature of my work."

Mr. Eisenschimmel, the next witness, said that he first saw the Murdock note at Freeman & Cannon's law office, San Francisco. That was in January, 1898. He was at that time requested to examine the note by persons connected with the plaintiff, and the note signature and several admitted copies of the signature were studied by the witness for several days.

"Did you make any report to Mr. Cannon?" asked General Barnes.

"I did."

"What did you say in that report?"

"I said to him that I could not be of any service to him, as I considered the note a forgery, that the signature had been formed by drawing, piecing, patching and tearing."

"Did the note signature have any of the Murdock handwriting characteristics?"

"None at all. William Murdock had very firm and set habits of handwriting. He wrote fluently, with a semi-angular style. He made his flourishes very rapidly, as people usually make flourishes and all extra pen strokes. None of these characteristics are found in the note signature, which was slowly and carefully drawn, patched and retouched."

"Did Mr. Murdock ever retouch his signature?"

"No; even when there was a pen failure, he wrote right along and let it go."

"And do you consider the note signature to be that of William Murdock?"

"No; the note signature is an absolute fabrication."

The defense is preparing to impeach witnesses who have testified that they saw the big note prior to 1890, and sensational developments are expected to follow the expert testimony. There are about sixty witnesses yet to be called.

CHRONICLE, FRIDAY

MRS. CRAVEN OPENS FIRE.

Famous Fair Litigation Is to Commence Again.

THE LADY ASKS FOR A WIDOW'S ALLOWANCE.

FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS MONTHLY FROM THE FAIR ESTATE DESIRED.

She Also Asks for Permission of the Court to Intervene in the Matter of the Trust Will.

The Craven litigation, so long in the background, has come into the open again and from present indications the courts will soon be bubbling over with it. Yesterday two petitions were filed in the Superior Court—both important and far-reaching. One was the application for a widow's allowance, which made its appearance some months ago, but which was never assigned to any department. This petition, signed "Nettie R. Fair," under which name Mrs. Craven is now known in private life, as well as in the courts, asks for a widow's allowance of $5000 a month out of the estate of James G. Fair. The petition was set for hearing before Judge Troutt May 4th. The petitioner states that she is the surviving wife of Fair, that his estate is worth $12,228,988, that the annual revenue of it is $500,000, and that $5000 a month would be a reasonable sum for her maintenance. She asks that this allowance be made to date from Fair's death December 28, 1894, which foots up into a neat little sum of back pay amounting to about $260,000.

An application was also filed yesterday to give leave to Mrs. Craven-Fair to intervene in the contest over the trust will. This will was opposed by Charles Fair. Superior Judge Charles W. Slack decided that the trust was void as to the real property and Mrs. Fair's attorneys suspect that if the Supreme Court affirms this decision Charles Fair will no longer be interested in opposing the trust will. There will then be no one of record to object to the probate of this will and Mrs. Craven-Fair's counselors desire that she shall be in a position to oppose the will if the Fair children drop their opposition. Her application is to be heard next Tuesday before Judge Troutt.

As for the lady, she says that she will have to fight some one, and she does not care at all whether she fights the executors or the children in the matter of the trust will. Being ready to fight, it does not matter especially to her who is her opponent. She is as confident that she will win as she was during her former litigation.

In support of her widow's allowance, Mrs. Craven-Fair will, of course, bring forward the famous marriage contract, which was not adjudicated at all during the former trial when Mrs. Craven was defendant in the suit to quiet title. She has a batch of new witnesses also, many of whom were held back during the former trial or taken off the stand. It is said that Mrs. Craven-Fair has much better evidence than the contract itself, buttressed as it is with the very strong testimony of Notary Lee Craig, who swore in his deposition that Senator Fair and Mrs. Craven acknowledged the marriage contract before him, and that Fair paid him $50. It is said that subsequent to this contract a marriage ceremony was performed, and that Mrs. Craven-Fair has testimony to this effect. Some surprises are promised during the trial. All this is somewhat in the air as yet, as the attorneys for the Fair children will undoubtedly seek to have the matter put over until after the summer holidays, since the case, when it comes on, will drag through several weeks, as Mrs. Craven-Fair has a shoal of witnesses. The whole interesting litigation will be reopened, and Mrs. Fair's attorneys profess themselves ready for trial.

MORE EXPERT

Ames Concludes and Carl Eisenschimel Begins.

Mr. Eisenschimel Takes Up the Afternoon on the Stand and Tells of His Study.

Attorney Grove L. Johnson was not allowed to continue his cross-examination of the celebrated chirography expert, Daniel T. Ames, this morning, where he left off yesterday afternoon at the court's adjournment.

Before he was permitted to do so, the defense was allowed to ask Mr. Ames more questions.

In order to introduce other examplars as to the handwriting of Wm. Murdock, W. P. Harrington, one of the executor defendants, was called to the stand and identified certain signatures of Murdock shown him by Mr. Lusk. The proposed examplars were then handed to plaintiff's attorneys for examination.

Attorney Johnson objected to the introduction of these papers bearing Murdock's signature, claiming that the offer comes too late, that the experts have already been examined as to the handwriting of Murdock, that pen marks had been made over these signatures, and that the introduction of these papers would be unfair to plaintiff, many examplars being now in evidence.

Mr. Lusk then asked expert Ames as to whether certain pen marks over the signatures which the defense desired to now introduce would interfere with the examination of the signatures—the presence of these pen marks being an objection to the offering of the examplars.

Judge Pirkey sustained the objection of attorney Johnson as to the offering of any of these papers on which the signatures had been marked over in any way. The defense excepted to the ruling of the court.

Those papers on which the signatures of Murdock had not been marked over, were then read, marked by the clerk, and offered in evidence. These exhibits consisted of notes and mortgages.

General Barnes then handed these exhibits to expert Ames and asked witness if the same general characteristics of Wm. Murdock's signatures heretofore examined by witness were shown in these signatures of Murdock. The answer was "yes" to each question.

General Barnes had not put another question before an argument was on as to an objection made by attorney Johnson, who claimed that the answer would go beyond the province of witness in that it would be an opinion and an inference.

The court sustained Johnson's objection and exceptions of defense were noted to the sustained objections to a number of other questions in the same strain.

Witness Ames was asked to measure the word "Murdock" in the signatures to the note and to the two checks dated August 25th and September 20th, 1877. This word in the note was found to be one inch and eight-twentieths in length, while it was longer in each of the two checks. The same word in the 1890 deed was found to be the same length as the note signature—one inch and eight-twentieths.

General Barnes then sent Mr. Ames to the blackboard to show the jury how the word "Wm." in the 1890 deed would have looked had the ink flowed regularly and not caused the "blind furrow" described by witness.

More microscopic examinations were then called for, and this slow-going work gave the court room again that funeral friends-can-now step-forward-and-view-the-remains air, so naturally depressing.

The check of September 20th, 1877 was placed under the glass, and answering General Barnes, Mr. Ames said that he found the lines "homogeneous." When the General had been revived with restorative, he gaspingly requested the expert to speak English and Mr. Ames obligingly said that the lines in the signature were uniform—and this answer created no panic.

The $100,000 note was then looked at through the microscope to show again the "broken fibre" and the final ending of the small "k". The final ending of the same letter in the September 20th, 1877 check was then shown to the jury, as magnified.

The merry-go-round continued until the noon adjournment.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

A "baker's dozen" was the exact number of the spectators who sat through this morning's proceedings in the court room, and when court convened this afternoon it looked as though the actors were to play to empty chairs. But there is always a crowd of those who take part in this battle for a fortune, and the participants never feel lonesome.

Attorney Johnson took up the cross-examination of expert Ames when proceedings commenced this afternoon. Witness Ames testified that he first made a report as to the questioned signature to F. C. Lusk, it was a written report he thought and was from a photograph of the paper. Witness said that he had no doubt but that the signature to the note in question was written subsequent to the 1890 deed, and that if an hundred men testified that they saw the note written prior to such date, witness would believe they were mistaken or lied. Had given testimony in cases which did not agree with that of other experts, had testified to matters in the Davis will case at San Francisco, and witness' testimony at that time did not agree with that of Mr. Eisenschimel, an expert in attendance at the present case.

Witness said he was satisfied that his conclusions in all of the 1,200 cases in which he had been a witness, were correct. Mr. Ames said he would render a bill for his services in the present case at the rate of $50 a day for part of the time and $100 per diem for the other portion.

Carl Eisenschimel was called. Testified, answering General Barnes, that he lives in San Francisco and for about twenty years has been making a study of handwriting. Witness mentioned many important cases in which he had given testimony as an expert.

First saw the $100,000 note, subject of the present case, in January, 1895, at the office of Cannon & Freeman at San Francisco. Looked at the note a moment there. Had examined photographic copies of note, deed of 1890, a fragment of a deed made in 1872 and a letter written by Wm. Murdock to Mary Helen Murdock.

Examined these examplars for a week or ten days at the request of Cannon and Freeman, and told attorney Cannon that he believed the signature to the note a forgery and produced by tracing, drawing and patching.

On the 24th of January, 1898, witness so informed Mr. Cannon at the office of witness.

Had examined over 70 admitted signatures of Wm. Murdock since coming to Willows, and compared these signatures with that of note. The note signature incorporated no characteristics of the regular handwriting of Wm. Murdock.

While Murdock wrote fluently and as a man of business affairs, the note signature was not such. Witness said that Murdock was a man of habit in his writing, and the spacing in his admitted signatures showed this.

After Mr. Eisenschimel had said that Murdock's signatures showed a flowing hand and that the note signature was halting, patched and retraced, a piece of gelatine on which witness had traced the signature on the deed of March, 1890, for the purpose of showing that the "Wm" in the note signature was identical with that of deed. The court would not admit the gelatine tracing and General Barnes excepted.

Witness then went on to show the similarities in the two "Wms" by means of Reike's enlarged photos. Witness showed the jury how he arrived at the "accident" in the forming of the cap "W" in the 1890 deed and pointed out how the "accident" was reproduced in the note signature. (The public school arrived at this point and the house was declared a good one by the manager.)

Witness was asked to point out to the jurymen how the "patchwork" was done, and Mr. Eisenschimel held a "patching bee" with the jurors, pointing out the alleged pen patches, which witness said meant a halting with the pen at each point.

The jury was then told about "compound strokes", etc., showing how the admitted signatures differed from that on the note.

Mr. Eisenschimel was a very earnest witness, but he was interrupted only a few times by opposing counsel.

The quotation marks which form a part of the "Wm" in Murdock's signature, came in for a deal of attention from this expert. Witness said that these marks were different in the note than in any of the admitted signatures seen by him.

(Continued on page 41)

After the afternoon recess Mr. Eisenschimel demonstrated to the jury certain conclusions to which he had arrived after examining the signatures; as to the slant of letters, a spattering of ink claimed to be on the note signature, the furrows made by the pen nibs, and the marks which point to a drawing instead of a fluent writing of the note signature.

When the witness spoke of the pen carrying a fibre attorney Johnson expressed wonder at the pen being able to so carry a fibre. Witness said that this often happened.

Admitted signatures galore were pointed out by witness to show the "furrowing" and strokes of the pen nibs. This continued until adjournment time.

inches in length. Ames called attention to the broad, firm lines of acknowledged signatures and to the thin, nervous lines on the note. Ames declared that the signature of the note is a clumsy and very artificial imitation. He was positive that it was written after the execution by William Murdock of the deed of 1890 to the plaintiff. If a thousand men swore that they saw William Murdock sign the note he should believe that they were mistaken or that they lied.

Carl Eisenschimel took the stand. He is the noted expert who figured in the Martin will case, Haskins case, Vigel case, Becker-Crellin case, Botkin case and others. Eisenschimel stated that the note was first submitted to him in January, 1895, by the plaintiff's attorneys, and that after a comparison he declared it a forgery. He believed the abbreviation "Wm." on the note to be a tracing of that of the deed of 1890. He made a gelatine tracing of the note signature when the paper was first submitted to him, and found that the abbreviation on the deed fitted the tracing exactly. The gelatine tracing was placed in evidence. The expert said that Murdock wrote a natural, business hand with great fluency and rapidity, and that he was firm and set in his writing habits. Eisenschimel found the signature of the note to contain none of these characteristics. It lacked the spacing which occurs in the acknowledged writing. The capital "M" of the note is in pieces and patched, while on the checks it is made without a lifting of the pen. The initial stroke of the "W" on the deed of 1890 was accidental as shown by dry furrows, and not duplicated in any of the acknowledged signatures, though its exact counterpart appears on the note.

The expert pointed out under the microscope the places where he claims the letters on the note are patched. He declared that the letters do not slant as do those of acknowledged signatures. Eisenschimel continues on the stand tomorrow.

Counsel for the defense express their ability to completely batter down the wall which the plaintiff built about the note. Considerable attention will be given to Sam B. Ashurst, the plaintiff's brother, who testified that he paid Samuel Murdock the $20,000 which it is alleged Samuel paid to William Murdock on the day the note was given. Ashurst said that he paid this in coin and notes to Sam on September 4, 1877. He said about $10,000 was cash which belonged to Tehama county and which County Treasurer John Eler had secretly loaned him. The defense will attempt to prove that Eler had turned over all the county money in his possession in July, 1877, and that when he next settled, on January 1, 1878, he turned over only $1[illegible], which was all that he had received since his previous settlement. The defense proposes to show that Eler had no private funds and that it was utterly impossible for him to have loaned Ashurst $10,000. Ashurst lived in Tehama county and depositions touching his character are being taken in that county today. Another point which the defendants claim they can maintain is that William Murdock was [illegible] miles from Glenn Murdock's house on September 5, 1877. They [illegible] to prove that Sam could not have paid William $20,000; that all the property he had acquired stood in his son Glenn's name and that he had no money.

. APRIL 22, 1899.

RANK FORGERY SAY EXPERTS

More Evidence Against the Murdock Note.

TESTIMONY OF AMES AND EISENSCHIMEL.

DECLARE THE SIGNATURE A CLUMSY AND ARTIFICIAL IMITATION.

The Defense Express Confidence in Their Ability to Impeach Witnesses for the Plaintiff.

Special Dispatch to the "Chronicle."

WILLOWS, April 21.—The Court and jury before which Mary Helen Murdock is pleading for $300,000 of a dead man's gold are rapidly acquiring their scientific education. Another day has been given over to the hearing of handwriting experts, and lawyers and spectators are prattling "standards" and "staffs" and "examplars" with all the glibness of the chirography sharps. The noted experts on the witness stand today declared the signature to the $100,000 note to be a rank forgery made thirteen years, at least, after the date of the paper, and they have rung in all the fine art of their craft to prove their bold assertion. There is much speculation as to the weight this purely scientific testimony will have with a jury of men little versed in science. It was expected that Grove L. Johnson would proceed with the cross-examination of Expert Ames this morning, but the defense continued his direct examination until noon.

Expert Ames measured the word "Murdock" on the note longitudinally with a pair of dividers and found it to be one and eight-twentieths inches in length. The same word on two checks made in the year the note is alleged to have been given measured one and one-twentieth and two and eight-twentieths

THE MAN WHO MADE THE $100,000 NOTE

THE LATE WILLIAM MURDOCK OF GLENN COUNTY.

[illegible]

KYTKA ON THE STAND.

LATE WILLIAM MURDOCK ALLEGED SIGNER OF THE NOTE.

The above picture is taken from the only photograph of the lat William Murdock in existence. It was taken years ago and looks very little like the old rancher in later years.

At the opening of court at 10:30 today, expert Carl Eisenschimel was again called to the stand by defendants and was handed a number of the old checks for further analysis of the formation of the letters in the last name, they being old checks signed by Wm. Murdock in the year 1877—the date upon which the note purports to have been signed.

After stating again the difference in the various checks and the note, he was turned over to the tender mercies of Grove L. Johnson for cross-examination.

He was asked if he had examined the writing on the various checks other than the signatures, and replied that he had not. Johnson handed him some of the old checks and he picked certain ones which he said were written by Murdock and others not. Asked if he remembered when T. J. Kirkpatrick was on the stand when the affidavit was introduced, if, sitting by the side of Kytka, in this court room, he whispered to Mr Kytka and said:

"Get hold of that and make a photograph of it and we will knock it out."

Said there was not a word of truth in it. Asked if there was any doubt in his mind that the note was copied from the deed of 1890; said there was none whatever.

Matters began to grow somewhat heated between counsel and witness, the court finding it necessary several times to put a stop to the hot bandying of words.

Witness continuing, said his profession was a science, art and trade. As a science, he said that by three rules it ought to be "exact," as follows: alignment, slant and pressure.

Asked if experts on handwriting ever disagreed, said sometimes they did.

Asked if he ever testified in any case where Daniel T. Ames also testified, replied that he had. Said they both were witnesses in the Davis will case and that they disagreed, Ames testifying that the will was genuine, and witness here, said it was a forgery.

Witness was asked if he had peddled his opinion around the streets of San Francisco that the note was a forgery. Positively denied that he had done so. Said that he had mentioned the matter to his family at the dinner table.

Q. Did you not peddle around the streets of San Francisco the opinion you had given Mr. Cannon that the note is a forgery?

A. No, sir.

Witness was asked by Johnson if 2,000 reputable people should swear that the signature to the note was in the genuine handwriting of Wm. Murdock if he would believe it. Witness said it would not change his opinion one particle.

Witness was turned back to the defense for re-direct examination by General Barnes just when the noon recess arrived and court was adjourned until 2 o'clock.

Afternoon session commenced by calling Theodore Kytka back to the stand on behalf of the defense and asking him to place the "Wm" of the deed of March 12th, 1890, and the "Wm." in the note, one above the other, under the barrel of the microscope, from which had been removed the lens of the instrument, and the jury called to examine the instrument. While the jury was beginning to make the examination, accompanied by the court, lawyers and expert Kytka, Grove Johnson thought he heard the expert invite someone to "take hold here" or something to that effect, which called out a loud protest on the part of the ever-watchful leader of the plaintiff's side.

In tones that indicated that his Honor is becoming weary with the jangling, he remarked that the "episode is now over gentlemen", when calm reigned again.

If the law permitted the jury to draw pay for travelling to look at exhibits under the microscope, under direction of court and counsel, their mileage would eat up the note, being called so frequently to take a "peep" at this and that.

Witness went to the board and made a large "Wm" with white chalk and then at certain places marked it up with red chalk, to show wherein there is a difference in the deed signature and the signature to the note.

Witness then stated as a fact that in all of Murdock's signatures examined by him, in no case was there any attempt at patching to correct any failures, whereas in the note patching is everywhere apparent.

Witness then went back to the "k" with a tail turned up like a stinging scorpion, which he said never occurred until December 19, 1879, in the genuine writing, but that it always terminated with a backward flourish under the name. The defense of course are laying stress on the fact that the note made in 1877 is the one single departure from the universal rule, before December 19, 1879. The defense have arranged all of the old checks into years, carefully keeping each year by itself in the bunches. In this manner they are passed around among the jurymen to have the statement of the witness verified as to the fact that the note furnishes the first example of which the "k" terminates with an upward hook. Answering as to when he first began the study of the Murdock signatures, said that on February 21, 1899, when Mr. Lusk and Mr. Bayne gave him 79 checks for examination He made enlargements of them and made an exhaustive study of them. At that time he had not seen the disputed document. He then came to Willows and saw the note for the first time, on April 6, 1899 Said he began making a study of its general characteristics under the microscope when "all of a sudden I was struck with the sameness in the two "Wm's." It convinced me so that I stopped right there."

He said the marked effect of the tremor in the writing of the note that is not found in anything else, but that in all of Murdock's writing there is an "emphasis" on the down strokes, causing them to be heavier as they proceed downward.

It is rumored that the object of the plaintiff's attorneys in having witness Eisenschimel identify the handwriting in the body of checks this morning, is to show that Murdock didn't write his own checks, but merely signed his name after they had been drawn up.

The formidable looking microscopes sitting around on tables and leveled upon various objects are like the pictures in our minds of the big cannon at Fort Point, Presidio, Cal.

Witness was asked what he considered the most conspicuous piece of patching in the signature to the note and replied that it is found in the letter "o." He went to the board again to make the letter to show how it was done by the copyist, as he styles the writer of the note, if it is a forgery, which he insists that it is, to the extent that the lawyers have to hold him down to keep him from arguing the matter to the jury as he explains the manner of the writing of it.

Expert Eisenschimel testified today that, like Ames, he had no contract with the defendants as to what he was to receive as compensation for his testimony, but expected to receive $100 per day.

The curiosity of the public with reference to expert testimony has been so far gratified that the crowd has fallen away, and are resting up for the time when the experts shall have concluded and witnesses whom they know are called to the stand.

The public have the understanding that each side has something up its sleeve that will stun the other side. For illustration: Attorney Bayne in his opening statement for the defense, promised that they would prove that it was a "physical impossibility for Wm Murdock to have signed the disputed note." The generality of people take that to mean all that it could, to wit

That he was somewhere else on that date than at Mrs Murdock's house, or that he was physically unable to have signed it at all, etc. On the other hand, friends of the note side intimate that the unusually hard work of the defendants by their experts and otherwise will be smashed in a jiffy when the rebuttal comes to be heard.

The whole of the afternoon has been consumed by Kytka in demonstrating on the board and setting the microscope on documents, how the note was written, and pointing out to the jury where filling in has been done. Witness was asked by General Barnes if he could produce a work, with the same kind of patching and piecing, as the note is, and answered in the affirmative. When asked by Gen. Barnes to do so, replied that he was not prepared just at this moment as he would have to go and get his pens, glass plate, etc.

He was asked to bring them in the morning. Plaintiffs gave notice of an objection to such a proceeding. The witness volunteered the statement that he had done the same thing in the Becker and Creegan forgery case, when court adjourned.

PRICE PAID TO GET WITNESSES

Interesting Point Inquired Into in the Murdock Case.

Depositions Offered Stating That Skiff Expected Ten Thousand.

WILL HAS NOT YET BEEN ADMITTED

Court Will Decide This Morning Whether the Document Is Proper Evidence.

[Special Dispatch to "The Examiner."]

WILLOWS, April 26.—The sixth on the suit in the Murdock case to-day give about ences of an interesting fight. The defense called a number of witnesses in an attempt to impeach H. A. Skiff, who testified that he had been an employee on the G. W. Murdock farm and heard Mrs. Mary Helen Murdock ask William Murdock for some interest money one evening when he was unobserved by them, and heard Mr Murdock admit that she had his note for $100,000 and that it "ought to be satisfied."

The first witness called was W. H. Bonright who had worked on the ranch of Samuel and Gawn W. Murdock at a time when Samuel left the place. He herded their sheep but never knew them to have more than three thousand at one time. When asked by Mr Lusk what Samuel stated to be the cause of his coming at a time when he left home and stayed all night with the witness in June or July, 1877, the year the note is dated, Mr Johnson objected. Attorney Lusk then made this statement in support of his question

"We will offer to prove by the witness that in either the month of June or July, 1877, Samuel Murdock, father of Gawn W. Murdock, husband of the plaintiff in this case, came to the house of the witness and stayed all night. That he told the witness that he had been obliged to leave his home, that he and the plaintiff in this case, Mary Helen Murdock, had had a difficulty and that he had to leave, that Gawn Murdock, her husband, told him that he would never have anybody around the place that talked to the way he had to his wife, and he wanted him to leave and never come back."

The plaintiffs had attempted to show that Samuel Murdock left the house at that time because of a difficulty with his son, Gawn Murdock, in reference to Gawn's loaning money to William; that it was a business difficulty between Samuel and Gawn, his son, and this evidence is offered to contradict that and show that he left the house not because of a business difficulty between Gawn and himself but on account of a difficulty with Mrs. Murdock.

The court refused to admit the testimony and Mr. Lusk took an exception.

Mr. Johnson began his cross-examination. He asked the witness if, in front of a drug store in Willows yesterday he stated to Alex Lake that he was a witness and had just got $100, and that $700 more was to come, and that Mr. Lusk told him to stay here, that he could make more money this way than by shearing sheep. He replied that he "did not."

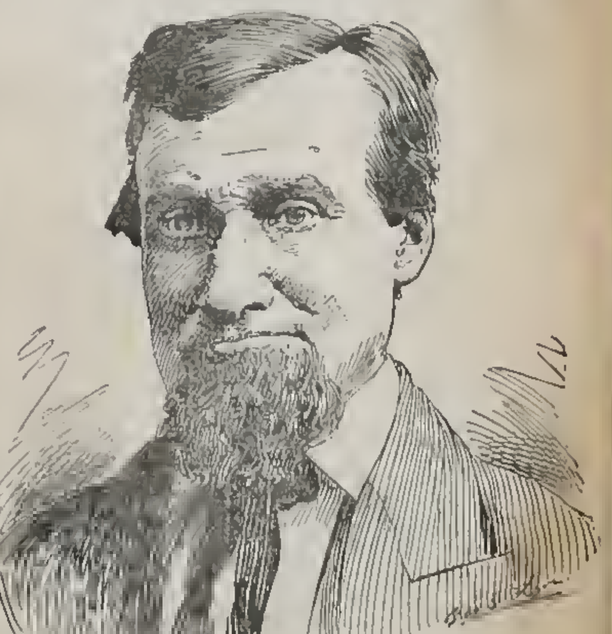
In re-direct examination by Mr. Lusk he said that he received a few dollars from Merrill for expenses and had received $20 from Mr Lusk in Chico last Saturday. He was to have his expenses and as much as he could make shearing sheep for coming. Abe Merrill testified that H. A. Skiff, the man who swore he heard William Murdock acknowledge to Mrs. Murdock that he owed her $100,000, was at San Luis Obispo and heard him say that he never heard of the note until about two weeks after the death of Samuel Murdock. He said if Mrs. Murdock got the property she ought to give him a nice present.

The deposition of S. Q. Grafford of Washington was read by Lusk. Grafford was employed on the G. W. Murdock ranch. He stated that he met Skiff in Washington, heard him read the letter from Mrs Murdock in which she asked him if he remembered what he promised to do for her a long time ago and said Mrs Murdock would need him as a witness and he would make a stake out of it. It was in the spring of 1897 and Skiff said he would not go for less than $10,000. The deposition of Peter Bryan of Washington was read and was in line with that of Grafford.

Mr Bryan resides in Washington, and his deposition was the same excepting the amount was not stated.

The will of William Murdock was offered in evidence, but Johnson objected. Lusk argued that it had been recorded and probated in this court and that he had a right to use it for all purposes. He also stated that there is no mention in the will of the existence of this $100,000 note. The matter will be ruled upon at the opening hour to-morrow morning.

THE LATE WILLIAM MURDOCK, WHO IS SAID TO HAVE MADE THE BIG NOTE.



WILLIAM MURDOCK, whose estate is being sued for $200,000, principal and interest on a $100,000 note held by Mary Helen Murdock, died near Willows in January, 1894. The will made shortly before Murdock's death, contains no mention of the note. The executors W. P. Harrington and H. H. Burton, bankers, and Adam Compton, a relative of the deceased, were served with the claim of Mary Helen Murdock. Believing the note a forgery, they took no notice of the claim and the present suit was instituted. The defendants are fighting the note at a tremendous expense. Besides the fat fees paid eminent counsel, four handwriting experts have been retained in Willows for several weeks at a per diem of $100, and a small army of detectives is engaged on the case. The defendant executors have $100,000 cash in bank, and it is estimated that the entire sum will be used in the effort to prove the note a forgery.

The above picture is copied by Expert Theodore Kytka from the only picture ever taken of William Murdock. The original is a tintype made several years before Murdock's death. It was found among the dead man's effects by his sister, Mrs. Compton, and preserved by her. It is said that the plaintiff does not know the picture exists. A life-size enlargement is being made by Expert Kytka to be used at the trial. One of the plaintiff's witnesses failed utterly when asked to describe Murdock's personal appearance. It is said that another witness, in a deposition to be used at the trial, describes Murdock as a small man, smoothly shaven.

PAGES 25 TO 32

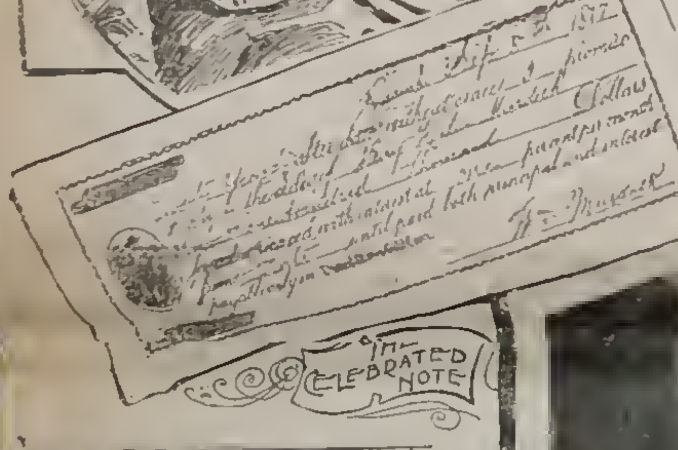
THE Sunday Edition CALL

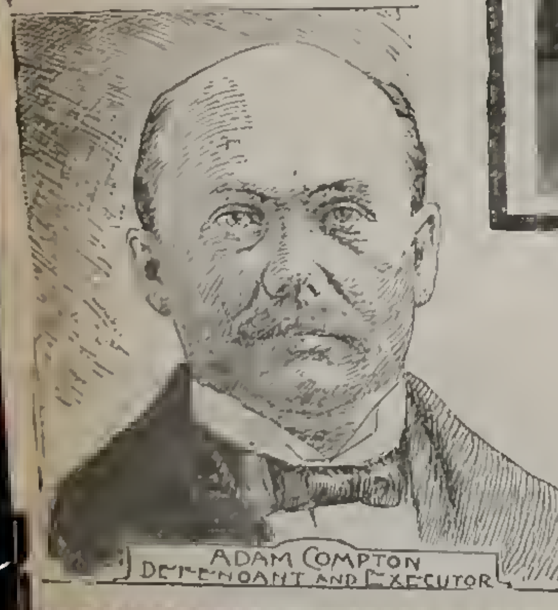
PAGES 25 TO 32

SAN FRANCISCO, SUNDAY, APRIL 23, 1899.

$364,000 Hanging on a Penstroke—

Did William Murdock Sign the Promissory Note Over Which a Score of People Are Battling in Court?





DID William Murdock sign and deliver the promissory note for $100,000 dated September 5, 1877, and made payable twenty years after date to Mary Helen Murdock, with interest at 1 per cent per month, or is the signature to that scrap of paper a forgery?

Three persons are said to have been present when the note was signed. Two of these, William Murdock and his cousin Samuel are dead, the other is the holder and payee of the note—Mrs. Mary Helen Murdock.

Mrs. Murdock's suit against the executors of the estate of William Murdock for $364,000, principal and interest, is now before the Superior Court of Glenn County, and twelve good men and true are listening to testimony bearing on the validity of the [illegible] note.

But the history of this paper, which calls for over a quarter of a million dollars, is an interesting one and the [illegible] not yet been [illegible] story of the transaction.

[illegible] Bill Murdock, as William Murdock was called, was one of the very earliest settlers in Northern California. At the time he decided to make his home in the [illegible] Valley [illegible] as wheat growing was [illegible] in the section where he took up his abode, but the raising of sheep brought large profits to the owners of such stock.

"Bill" was a bachelor and as close-fisted an old character as ever owned a band of sheep. It is not an exaggeration to call him a miser. He was an honest man, however, and paid his debts promptly.

"Old Bill" was a sort of character in his stinginess. He would drive to town in his old rattle trap of a spring wagon, tie his skinny horses to a hitching post, pull out a sack of hay for the sorry looking animals, and, instead of dining at a hotel, would carry his own meal in his pocket.

On a rainy day old Bill's overcoat was a gunny sack, and his habits were all in line with this sort of thing. All of this time Bill Murdock was acquiring land, while he attended to his flocks and sold their wool.

A cousin of William, Samuel Murdock, came to California with his three children in 1861.

Samuel's son, Gawn W. Murdock, is the husband of the woman who holds the $100,000 note.

Samuel Murdock was an illiterate man and could neither read nor write. He had inherited some money and with this small capital he and his son Gawn went into the sheep business on Stony Creek, near Orland, forming a partnership. They made money rapidly, and it is claimed from 1861 until 1877 Samuel loaned his cousin "Bill" large sums of money, the profits from the business, with which [illegible] Bill purchased land. [illegible] to these [illegible] and bad feeling was engendered between father and son on [illegible] the books were kept in the matter of the partnership [illegible] until the partnership [illegible] $10,000 [illegible] was then paid in cash.

It was then that Samuel left the house of his son Gawn and went to live with his cousin "Bill." In the early seventies Gawn had married Mary Ellen Ashurst, daughter of a farmer who lived in Tehama County. Samuel was on good terms with Gawn's wife.

While staying at Bill's house, Bill told Samuel that Gawn had not made a just settlement with him (Samuel), and, after threats to sue, Gawn agreed to pay his father $20,000. This was done, the payment being in cash and notes—$8000 in cash. This was a short time before this $100,000 note was said to have been made.

Samuel returned to his son's house to live, and it is told that all of the old man's affections seemed centered on his two grandsons, Edmond and Stanley, Gawn's two children.

The story goes that finally a settlement between the two men, Samuel and William, came up. They met at Gawn's house on the 5th day of September, 1877. Gawn was not at home. The men talked over their business transactions and it was agreed that Sam would turn over to Bill the $20,000 paid him by his son and that William would give a note for a balance of $100,000. Samuel then asked to have the note drawn up for that amount payable to Mary Helen Murdock to fall due in twenty years so as to mature about the time his two grandsons became of age, the money to be for their benefit.

Mrs. Murdock wrote the note, Bill signed it and that's how and why the note was made, according to the story.

The evidence already given in court [illegible] of the note from that time to this and circumstances [illegible] in relation to it.

Gawn Murdock, the husband of the [illegible] and his testimony [illegible] unshaken. He told of meeting [illegible] day [illegible] Bill said to him: "Gawn, you needn't be mad [illegible] I have settled with [illegible] and [illegible] given my note for [illegible] payable [illegible] twenty years after date."

Gawn [illegible] and his wife showed him the note. They wrapped it up carefully, put it in a vial, which they then sealed and after bottling the vial, placed the bottle in a powder can and buried it in the barn.

After ten or eleven years the note was dug up and was seen by several persons in Sacramento and in San Francisco.

Gawn testified that his wife wished to borrow money on the note from one L. R. Megginson. He and his wife met Megginson in the pavilion at Sacramento in 1890 and the matter was talked of. Bill Murdock was in the pavilion and they found him, introduced Megginson and brought up the subject. Megginson told Bill that Mrs. Murdock wished to borrow some money on his $100,000 note and he [illegible] wanted to know if the note was good. The reply was that the note was good and would be paid [illegible].

The strongest testimony was that of T. J. Kirkpatrick, a man who has lived near the Murdock place for forty-three years and who bears a splendid reputation. He was intimately acquainted with both Sam and Bill Murdock and was a Justice of the Peace in early days and at the time the business deals between Sam and Bill were made. Kirkpatrick testified that he heard a conversation between the two men when Bill was trying to get a reduction from 12 to 10 per cent of the interest rate on a note held by Mary. He also stated that at Sam's request he drew up an affidavit in the form of a statement, by Sam, of the indebtedness of William to him, giving as his reason that he wanted to protect his grandchildren. The affidavit was produced, identified by Kirkpatrick, and read in court. It reads as follows:

> OLIMPO, Colusa County, Cal., October 31, 1879.—I, Samuel Murdock, will make a true statement of the business transactions that has existed between myself and William Murdock, both of Colusa County, State of California, Postoffice Kinnawa. I began loaning money to the said William Murdock in the years of 1861 or '62, I will not say which, and did continue to loan to the said William Murdock my money until 1877. The first he borrowed from me was money that was left to me by my father's estate and my brother William Murdock, who had previously died in Oristey Bend, Butte County. I let him have $1000 the first loan. I then loaned him the money that I sold my wool and sheep for from year to year and trusted to William Murdock to keep the accounts, as I had no education. I think he kept the books as correct as he could until the last transaction—the settlement with Gawn Murdock. I loaned him $2000 in April, 1876, and when I made my final settlement with Gawn Murdock I loaned William Murdock $20,000 Sept. 5, 1877. [illegible] from him for the amount [illegible] me, dated September 5, 1877, and made payable to Mary H. Murdock, for the benefit of my two grandsons, Edmond and Samuel Murdock, and due twenty years from date.
>
> His
> SAMUEL (X) MURDOCK.
> Mark.

The affidavit bears the acknowledgment seal of Justice of the Peace T. J. Kirkpatrick, and is dated October 31, 1879.

Trial of the big case is now going on before a jury at Willows. Interest and principal now amount to nearly $350,000 and each side is represented by high-priced and clever lawyers.

Kirkpatrick testified that Bill Murdock read the affidavit and said it was all right.

Mrs. Helen Murdock testified that she was at Allen Springs in 1877. In September of that year she received word from Samuel, her husband's father, to return to her home at once. She did so, arriving on the night of September 4. The next day William Murdock came to the house. The two men discussed business matters alone and then Samuel called her into the room.

On a table were pens, ink, some papers, a blank note and many piles of twenty-dollar pieces. A powder can containing gold coin was near the table. The money had been brought in to the house by Samuel from the cellar. Samuel asked her to write the note, telling her to make it like another one he showed her, which was for $26,000, only to make the amount $100,000, the interest one per cent per month, the time twenty years after date, payable to herself. William read the note after she had written it and he then signed it. Samuel then stated that the note was to be for the benefit of her sons, his grandsons, when they became of age.

The men counted the money to the amount of [illegible] which was taken by William after being put into two canvas sacks, and two notes were handed over to William, who tore them up. One of these notes was the one copied from and was for $26,000, the other one was for a smaller amount.

Under cross-examination by General Barnes Mrs. Murdock said she was 24 years of age when the note was signed. The number [illegible] on the corner of the note she thought she copied from another note. She was questioned very closely as to the kind of pens and ink used. The defense evidently puts great stress on these points, as they will have considerable bearing when the expert testimony is all in.

E. L. Robinson, an attorney, testified that he saw the $100,000 note in Sacramento in 1877. He was introduced to Mrs. Murdock by a Dr. Hicks and he heard the latter talking to William Murdock about the note.

H. A. Sziff, at one time in the employ of Gawn Murdock, but now a conductor for the Southern Pacific, heard William Murdock say to Mrs. Mary Helen Murdock in 1890: "You ought to be satisfied. You hold my note for $100,000 at 1 per cent interest."

Mrs. Matilda Glover of San Francisco was at Allen Springs in September, 1877. Mrs. Murdock was there also and was called home suddenly. She left her children at the springs in care of Mrs. Glover.

Dr. W. A. Schorn, a dentist of Woodland, heard the late Senator Boggs speak of a big bill that William Murdock owed, soon after the latter died, and C. H. Ashurst testified that William Murdock told him he had a big bill to meet before he died.

William Megginson of Ohio, in an affidavit, testified that William Murdock said the bill for $100,000 was all right and in consequence he loaned money to Mrs. Murdock on it. This closed the case for the plaintiff.

In his opening address for the defense General Barnes said he would prove that the note was a forgery and that the crime was committed since March 12, 1890. He placed in evidence signatures of William Murdock admitted to be genuine written at various times between 1877 and 1892.

This is the full story and the outline of the evidence as given up to this time. [illegible] experts [illegible] say the signature is a bungling and barefaced forgery, and it will be claimed, and probably testified, that old Bill on his deathbed denied that he ever gave such a note.

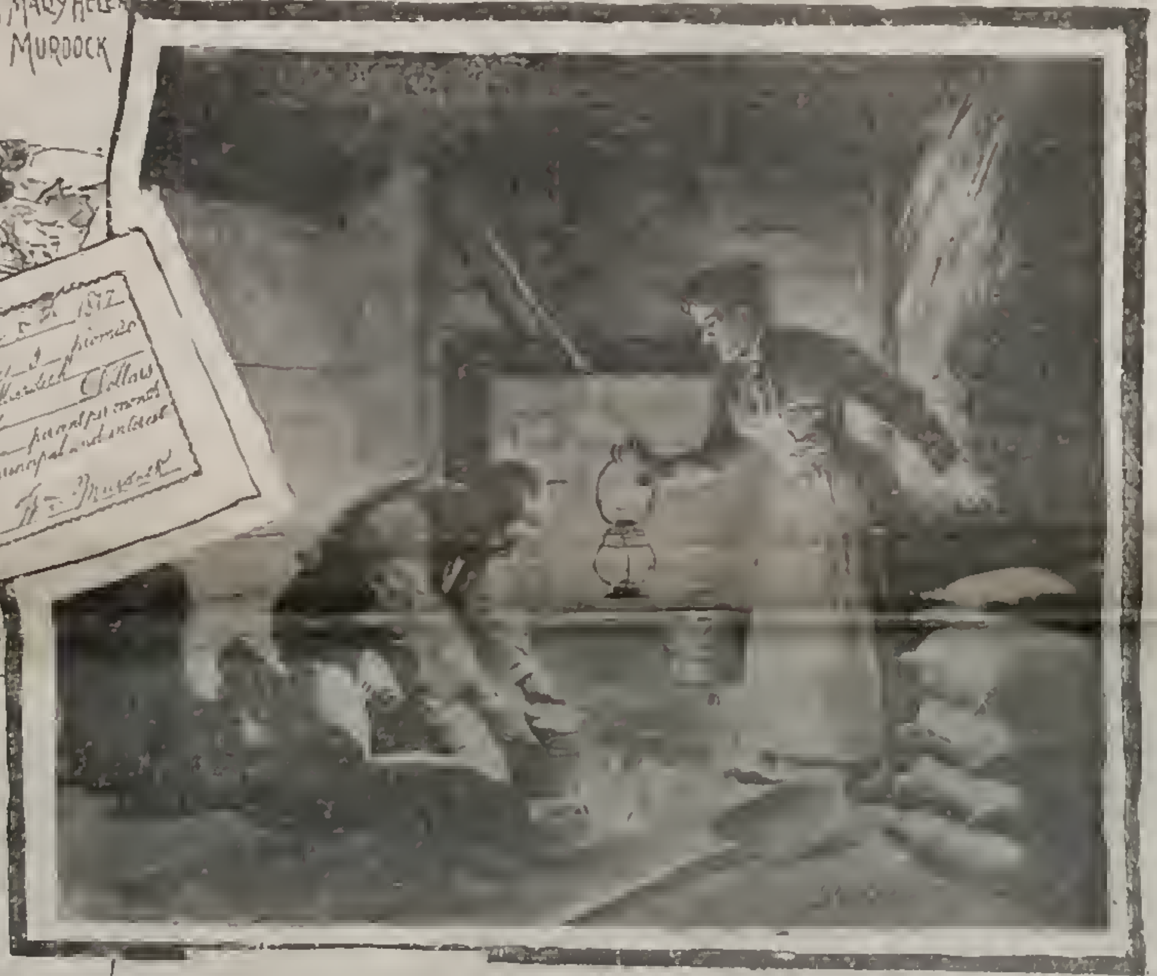
Affidavits published shortly after Bill Murdock's death stated that he did positively deny the making of any such paper.

The claim will be called absurd by the defense and the idea of this miserly bachelor giving such a note to a woman not of his kin will be ridiculed.

It is a strange case. The matter of the digging up of large sums from under woodpiles and in out-of-the-way places is sneered at by the attorneys. Yet such was the practice in those days and a hired man of old Bill Murdock used to tell of his once digging up while plowing $10,000 in gold which had been buried in an old iron pot.

What will the twelve men decide?

If Mary Helen Murdock's claim is held good the estate of old Bill Murdock will be insolvent, and his last will and testament will be just so much waste paper.



Mrs. Gawn Murdock Testified That the Precious Note Was Buried in the Barn for Ten Years.

"Gawn returned home," testified the wife, "and I showed him the note. We wrapped it up carefully, put it in a vial, which we sealed, and after bottling the vial, placed the bottle in a powder can and buried it in the barn. After ten or eleven years the note was dug up and was shown to several persons in Sacramento and in San Francisco.

No matter what the writing experts find on the face of that celebrated Murdock note, now the subject of litigation at Willows, it is certain that a shave would improve it.

THIS WAS REAL LIVE JOURNALISM

An "Examiner Social" Is Given by the People of Willows.

Entertainment That Consisted of Unique Newspaper Work.

MINERVA AND SHIRLEY DARE ON DUTY

Popular Departments Were Made to Embody Some Novel and Ingenious Programmes, Directed by Editors.

WILLOWS, April 22.—The witnesses, litigants and jurors in the Murdock case were entertained by the people of Willows last night at an "Examiner Social," an event arranged principally for the benefit of the large number of visitors attending the famous trial.

An editor-in-chief, the Rev. E. L. Burch of the Christian Church, was in charge, and there were five editors of departments under his direction. The Sunday edition of "The Examiner" was the model of the entertainment. The audience represented the readers, and each branch of the newspaper work was performed on the stage.

Miss Ceotcola Barto, a San Francisco girl and Berkeley graduate, who is assistant principal of the Willows High School, assumed the role of "Minerva." She received questions of the "heart-to-heart" variety, and kept the audience in an uproar with the wit and wisdom of her answers.

Mrs. J. M. Silvey was the Shirley Dare of the evening, and her advice on matters of personal beauty was full of local hits and ready humor. Mrs. Ben F. Geis, wife of one of the defending lawyers in the Murdock trial, was the puzzle editor, and hers was a very popular department. Questions and answers were received from the audience.

There was a music department, of course, as permitted by "The Examiner" Sunday model, and Mrs. H. S. Ellerman was the music editor. The publications included two brilliant piano solos by Mrs. Theodore Kytka, wife of the handwriting and photography expert, and songs by Mrs. Lulu Ward Valerga, Miss Logan Tooley and little Miss Mabel Duncan.

The literary department was edited by Mrs. Burch, wife of the managing editor, and the features included stories by Expert Daniel T. Ames and many others, and an original poem by Charles Ellerman.

Every department of the paper was brilliantly conducted, and the entertainment was in every respect highly successful.

This was the only lively event of the week in any way connected with the Murdock case. At the court hearing before Judge Pirkey, Expert Eisenschimmel was placed on the stand again this morning by the defense. When asked to state when he had seen the note before he saw it in Willows, he stated that he had seen it twice before, once in his office in San Francisco, when it was handed to him by Lawyer Cannon, and once in the latter's office. The audience eyed the noted expert critically, and craned their necks for every word that fell from his lips to hear whether he would corroborate himself and stick to the story begun by him on the day previous.

He went to the big chart on the back wall of the courtroom, and began an elaborate examination and explanation of what he called a labored, clumsy effort of the forger to imitate the handwriting of the deceased Murdock. After drawing the quadrant of a circle on the blackboard and explaining it to the jury, he took two long rods, or rulers, and placed one on the up and down strokes of the admittedly genuine handwriting of Mr. Murdock and the other on the disputed signature. One of them (the one on the genuine) showed that Mr. Murdock invariably wrote on a slant of forty-five degrees, while the note was a sixty-degree slant throughout. He then made letters with chalk on the board, and showed the portions of certain letters which he said the microscope clearly revealed had been patched or filled in.

Placing the note under the glass and allowing the jurymen to examine it for themselves, one at a time, he then took the small letters of the signature to the note and pointed out the differences in the formation of the letters. He pointed out on the enlarged exemplars that the small "r" in the genuine signature was but a little more than half as tall as the oval portion of the succeeding letter "d" in the "Murdock"; whereas, in the note the "r" was plainly very much larger than the oval portion of the letter "d." He next explained how the little letter "o" in the note signature was patched and filled in the labored effort of the forger, and had the jury examine it under the glass.

The last letter in the name came in for rather more notice than any of the rest in several particulars. He explained and showed on the enlarged exhibits how the first down stroke, or main staff, as he termed it, of that letter began in a light line and increased in size, as Murdock wrote it, as it reached the base line, where he always emphasized it by increased pressure, as the witness explained, until it frequently resembled a dot at the termination, while in the note the opposite was the fact, the line decreasing to a hair line at the base. He took next the top portion of the right-hand portion of the same letter, and pointed out that Murdock always began above the first staff and made a swing to the right, making a kind of small circle as he returned to the main staff, from where the lower portion of the letter is started, the letter when completed resembling a capital writing "R." In the signature to the note the top portion of the letter is noticeably different. He next showed that out of nearly two exhibits of the genuine handwriting Murdock never made more than five sections, as he termed them, at the most in signing his name, and as often only three.

In the signature to the note he counted for the jury six sections, or breaks, in the name. The terminal hook on the "k" in "Murdock" on the note furnishes one example of form that requires not only an expert eye to see. The last letter in the name finishes with an upward turn at hook to the eye of the note, while Expert Eisenschimmel testified this afternoon that from 1872 to the month of December, 1879, he had examined 719 checks and 60 other papers, receipts, etc., signed by Mr. Murdock between those dates, and that every single instance the letter "k" was finished with a backward flourish under the name, while in the note, which purports to have been signed in 1877, the "k" finishes with an upward hook or flourish. He said that in 1877 there were thirty-one checks issued, and that every one of the "ks" at the end of the name finished with no upward stroke.

DISSECTING THE MURDOCK NOTE

Expert Eisenschimel Yet on the Stand.

Special Dispatch to The Call.

WILLOWS, April 22.—Expert Eisenschimel continued his testimony in the Murdock note case this morning. He took up the capital letter "M" in "Murdock," and with the aid of two rulers, and by drawing a quadrant on the blackboard, showed that the three long strokes of the "M," if extended upward, would meet at a given point above, while in the genuine signature such would not be the case, the strokes of the "M" being always parallel.

As the witness proceeds from one branch of his work to another, he hands to the jurors cards of enlarged photographs which have been prepared for their information and convenience, so as to enable them to follow him.

Eisenschimel next took up what he called "sections" in the writing of the name "Murdock," showing that William Murdock made from three to five sections, while the writer of the signature to the note made it in six sections.

Attorney Freeman at one time insinuated that witness was intentionally passing one of the photographic cards, for the reason that the measurement was not in accordance with the point the expert was endeavoring to make. The witness resented the insinuation. General Barnes came to the rescue by asking the court to put a stop to any discussion between the counsel and witness. His Honor stamped out the little blaze with very small effort and all was well again.

The defense has two more experts to examine and then, it claims, it will prove that William Murdock was at his home all of the day on which the note was alleged to have been signed at Mrs. Murdock's house, twenty miles distant.

EXPERT GOES INTO DETAIL.

Eisenschimel Explains Forgery of Murdock's Name.

DENOUNCES THE WORK AS BLUNT AND CLUMSY.

EACH LETTER TREATED SEPARATELY FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE JURY.

How the Signature to the Famous Note Differs From Those That Are Admitted to Be Genuine.

Special Dispatch to the "Chronicle."

WILLOWS, April 22.—"From the examination you have given to the note in suit, which is plaintiff's exhibit here, and these hundreds of exemplars of the genuine handwriting admitted and proved to be that of William Murdock, is it your opinion that the signature to this note is that of William Murdock?"

"My opinion is that William Murdock did not sign this note, that the signature is a forgery, and a very blunt and clumsy forgery at that, which was made by tracing, drawing, piecing, patching and retouching."

Thus did Handwriting Expert Carl Eisenschimel reply to General Barnes at the close of to-day's session of the court which is trying the suit on the $100,000 note held by Mary Helen Murdock. The statement of Eisenschimel corresponds exactly with that made by Expert Daniel T. Ames yesterday. Expert Eisenschimel was on the stand when the court adjourned last night and he consumed all of to-day in leading the court and jury through the tedious process by which he arrived at his conclusion. The jurors, with great photographs held before them, resembled a church choir, and every [illegible] filed by the during the session they [illegible] to inspect the powerful microscope from which the original documents [illegible]. The enlarged photographs were made. The abbreviation "Wm." on the note the witness held to be an accurate tracing of that on the deed given by Murdock in 1890.

The expert claimed that the word "Murdock" on the note is an imitation, made by someone, letter by letter in and [illegible] through the [illegible].

In the making. With the straight edge Eisenschimel showed that the down strokes of the capital "M" are not parallel, as he claimed they are in all acknowledged signatures. The letter "u" shows a slant of sixty degrees where it should have but forty. The letter "r," he said, shows a visible splicing. In 719 admitted signatures the oval of the "d" is larger than the "r," while on the note it is not. The expert said the letter "o" was made with four distinct strokes, and that the retouching was very bold. The "c" of the note had no facsimile in admitted signatures. The staff of the "k" was finished at the wrong end, while there is no irregularity in the second part of the letter. The flourish which ends the signature, witness said, occurs only in acknowledged signatures made after 1879. Eisenschimel will be cross-examined by Grove Johnson on Monday.

EISENSCHIMEL CATECHIZED.

Sharply Cross-Examined in the Murdock Note Case.

Efforts to Break Down His Strong Testimony for the Defense.

WILLOWS, April 24.—This morning in the Murdock case Carl Eisenschimel again took the stand and General Barnes continued the direct examination.

"Mr. Eisenschimel, you stated that the slant to the letter 't' of 'Murdock,' in the signature did not correspond in length to that to the letter 't' in the other signatures?" he said.

"I did."

"I now hand you several exhibits which have not as yet been photographed and ask you if you based your opinion partly upon the handwriting in these checks of Murdock?"

"Yes, sir."

The witness was then handed several other notes and checks and was asked the same question, to which he gave the same reply. These exhibits were all passed around to the jury for inspection.

Continuing, Barnes said:

"I would like to have you state now if you know from what signature the signature of the note was traced?"

"I find that it was traced from the signature of the deed of 1890."

"Have you any doubt about this?"

"I have not."

After a few minor questions, Barnes said:

"Take the witness."

On cross-examination Johnson said:

"You are sure this signature of the note was copied from the signature of the deed of March 12, 1890?"

"I am."

"If 200 men were to come into this courtroom and swear that they saw this note prior to 1890 would you agree with Mr. Ames that they were either mistaken or liars?"

"I would."

"You have been in cases before this?"

"I have."

"Is this matter of being an expert science, trade or art?"

"It is science, art and trade."

"Since this is so, ought not all experts agree?"

"They should."

"Do they?"

"They sometimes differ on some points."

"Did you ever disagree with Mr. Ames?"

"I disagreed with him in the Davis will case."

"You swore that that will was a forgery, did you not?"

"I did."

"Mr. Ames swore it was genuine, didn't he?"

"He did."

"You said you told Mr. Cannon the signature of this note was a forgery?"

"I did."

"Did you not before going to Mr. Cannon's office to tell him this go to Mr. Haynes's office?"

"I went there to get some exemplars for Mr. Cannon."

"Did you not tell people that the signature of the note was a forgery before this?"

"I most certainly did not."

"Did you not peddle your opinion around the streets of San Francisco and tell several people that you thought that note a forgery?"

"No, sir."

"How much do you get for testifying in this case?"

"I get $100 per day."

"Did you not in this courtroom the other day, while you were sitting by the side of Mr. Kytka, tell him to make photographs of certain papers in evidence and that you and he would throw it out?"

"No, sir, never."

"Is Mr. Kytka an expert in handwriting?"

"I cannot say whether he is or not. I cannot judge as to the qualifications of any one beside myself."

The witness was handed several checks and asked if they were in the handwriting of Murdock. After due deliberation he replied that some were and some were not.

"When Mr. Kirkpatrick was testifying in this case, and when that affidavit of Samuel Murdock was introduced in evidence, did you tell Mr. Kytka to get a photograph of that and 'let's knock it out'?"

"No, sir."

"Have you stated since adjournment last Saturday that you had fooled the lawyers for plaintiff, for you had answered the questions too quick for them?"

"I did not—there is not a word of truth in that."

"How long were you employed by the defense?"

"I was first employed about March 5."

"When did you have a first consultation with the defense?"

"About September of 1897."

"That is all."

After a short recess Barnes took witness for redirect examination. He asked:

"At whose request did you go to Mr. Haynes' office for exemplars?"

"At my own request."

"How did you know that exemplars were in possession of Haynes?"

"Mr. Cannon told me he had them."

"Did you get the exemplars?"

"I did not."

"Did you ever talk about your opinion concerning this note previous to the time you gave your opinion after you had given it to Mr. Cannon?"

"I spoke something about it to my family."

"Do you know whether or not Mr. Kytka was in the courtroom on the afternoon Mr. Kirkpatrick testified?"

"I do not remember seeing him. Am positive he was not."

"Did Mr. Kytka come into the room after Kirkpatrick got through?"

"I think he did."

"Mr. Johnson asked you if 1,000 or 2,000 men should tell you this note was written before 1890, if you would believe him. I now ask you if 2,000 men would swear that a child was parent of its father would you believe them?"

"I would certainly not." [Laughter.]

"How came you to be employed by the defense in this case?"

"Shortly after I was employed by Mr. Cannon, and after I had gotten through with his work a message came to me to come to Mr. Pillsbury's office and I went. I saw there present Mr. Pillsbury, Mr. Luck and Mr. Bayne and was employed by them a few months after that."

ANOTHER DAY OF EISENSCHIMEL.

MORE EVIDENCE AS TO MURDOCK'S SIGNATURE.

WITNESS WOULD NOT BELIEVE IT GENUINE IF A THOUSAND SO SWORE.

Sharp Passages Between General Barnes and Grove L. Johnson—Hickox to Testify To-Day.

WILLOWS, April 24.—The jury which is trying Mary Helen Murdock's suit on the famous $100,000 note bids fair to surfeit on expert testimony. Since the defendants opened their side of the case a week ago, experts have been on the stand every day, and the end is not yet. Public curiosity has been satisfied as to the nature of the evidence of handwriting crackjacks, and the crowd in the courtroom is anxiously awaiting the development of the sensations which have been promised by both sides.

Expert Eisenschimel was again called to the stand this morning. The expert had previously testified that in the note signature the letter "R" is larger than the oval of the letter "D," while in acknowledged signatures the reverse is true. To corroborate his statement Eisenschimel called the attention of the jury to several hundred of the admitted signatures. He again declared that the abbreviation "Wm" on the big note is an exact tracing of that on the deed of May 12, 1890.

The expert underwent a rigid cross-examination at the hands of Grove L. Johnson. He declared that he could not be mistaken about the "Wm" being a tracing, though he admitted that experts might sometimes be mistaken. His business, he said, was an exact science so far as the three great principles of alignment, slant and pen-pressure were concerned. Asked if he would believe the note to be genuine if a thousand men swore they saw Murdock sign it, the expert said that he should not.

General Barnes asked if he would believe a child the father of its parent if a thousand men swore it was so, and the witness again answered in the negative. Eisenschimel stated that he was to receive $100 per day for his services in this case. He denied telling Expert Kytka to photograph the Kirkpatrick affidavit so they could "knock it out." The expert presented the "Wm" of the deed and that of the note for inspection by the jury under the microscope. He made many drawings to prove their similarity. The day was marked by sharp repartee between General Barnes and Grove Johnson. Expert Hickox will probably take the stand to-morrow.

EXPERTS TESTIFY ON INK SCRATCHES

Witnesses Called in Behalf of Foster Tell of Howard's Agreement.

In the examination of Herseman Fred Foster which was continued before Judge Conlan [illegible] to-day, the attorneys for Foster called three ink and writing experts to testify on the writing and scratches in the body of the agreement between Foster and Howard for the purchase of the racehorses Yellow Tail and Sour Mash Keever. They all agreed that different inks had been used in the body of the instrument, but could not tell what time had elapsed between the original writing of the instrument and the making of the scratch marks. The defense then made a motion for dismissal, but did not insist upon a ruling.

Howard was recalled by the defense for cross-examination, and testified that in his transactions with Foster he had lost more money than he won, and when Yellow Tail was run under Foster's direction his losses were heavier.

Dentist Hiram Holmes of [illegible] Sutter street testified to having a dentist bill of $25 against Howard. He said that Howard paid part of the bill and disclaimed responsibility for a portion contracted by a Miss [illegible]. On being threatened with suit he declared Howard told him he could not get anything, as his horses were fixed so that they could not be touched.

J. Haskell also testified for Foster, saying that Howard had told him that he (Howard) owned a half interest in the disputed horses.

The case will be continued to-morrow.

PENMEN SHOW THEIR HANDIWORK

Reasons for Their Belief That the Murdock Signature Was Forged.

One of Them Called Upon to Imitate the Signature of the Deceased.

[Special Dispatch to "The Examiner."]

WILLOWS, April 24.—At the calling of the Murdock case this morning, the lawyers remained endeavoring to out another for ten or fifteen minutes until some question was asked by General Barnes that Grove Johnson thought was an infringement of the rights of his side of the case.

Carl Eisenschimel was recalled by the defendants to prove a few more signatures of the lamented William Murdock, when he was excused and Theodore Kytka was recalled by General Barnes. He was first asked to place the "Wm." on the note in juxtaposition with the "Wm." on the deed of 1890, or, in other words, one right over the other under the barrel of the microscope from which the lens had been removed. A small table had been placed just outside of the lawyers' railing where this examination was to be made by the jury. A few jurors had arrived at the appointed place, accompanied by the court, when Grove Johnson heard, or thought that he did, Mr. Kytka tell some one of the jury to "take hold here," or something to that effect. Whatever was said brought forth a vigorous protest from the ever-watchful Johnson, who objected to any handling of suggestion from anybody in tones that clearly indicated that his temper was tired of too many objections. He remarked, "The episode is over, gentlemen," and proceeded with the case. The lawyers subsided and peace reigned once again. If jurors received mileage for travel done in the courtroom this jury could have earned a good-sized stake already in marching under direction of court and counsel to take a "peep" through the many-tangled telescopes in use in the examination of the nearly one thousand documents under examination.

Witness went to the blackboard and made a pretty "Wm" with white chalk, and then made red lines here and there on it to show places where the imitator, or forger, as he pleased to call the maker of the note, touched it up and filled in to make the patching was done. Witness stated as a fact that in all the writing he had examined of the deceased Murdock in no case had Murdock ever attempted to patch up or fix any letter which the pen had failed to do its work well, but invariably left it alone. The note, he claims, is all patchwork and filling in.

Witness Kytka then took up the "k" in the Murdock, which has a tail turned up like a fishing worm, [illegible] in the handwriting of Mr. Murdock [illegible] 1879. [illegible]

It is said that the purpose of the plaintiffs is to show that Mr. Murdock was not in the habit of filling out his own checks, but that the filling was generally done by others and that he merely signed his name and therefore that it was not at all strange that the note the [illegible] was written out by Mrs. Mary Helen Murdock.

Expert Eisenschimel testified to-day that the his friend Mr. Ames, he had no contract with the defendants or to what he was to receive in compensation. When he [illegible] the [illegible] he expected to get $100 a day, or the [illegible] a statement that almost paralyzed the country audience, most of whom work [illegible] days for $1.

Enough has leaked out to let the public understand that each side has better testimony yet to come.

Just before the court adjourned for the day Mr. Barnes asked the witness if he could produce such a piece of patchwork as he claimed is done on the note here in evidence. He [illegible] to do so. He said that he [illegible] he would bring them in the morning. He said that he had done the same thing in the Becker and Cramer case in San Francisco.

Plaintiffs gave notice that they would make an objection to that. General Barnes asked the witness to come prepared in the morning to do the work.

Court then adjourned to 9:30 to-morrow morning.

MURDOCK TRIAL DRAGS.

Entire Day Consumed in Arguments by the Opposing Attorneys as to Admission of Certain Questions.

WILLOWS, April 27.—In the Murdock trial the entire day was consumed in legal arguments as to admitting certain offers and questions, not half a dozen questions being answered by witnesses. Every point is being bitterly fought, and it looks as though the case will run several weeks longer.

FRIDAY, - - - APRIL 21, 1899

MURDOCK CASE.

The Defense Now Takes An Inning.

At the time of going to press last week, Mrs Mary Helen Murdock was on the stand and gave further testimony which, in no material way, differed from what she had already said. Plaintiffs next witness was an attorney now of San Francisco, but formerly of Sacramento, and who testified, that in 1887, he met Mrs. Murdock at a Doctor Hicks', in that city. He identified the note as the one shown to him at that time. He said it was given to him merely for inspection, as the holder was negotiating for the purchase of some property there. The next witness was a former employee on the Gawn Murdock farm. He testified that in the month of May, 1890, he was in a room there, after supper, making out a list of extras for a harvester. Wm. Murdock and Mrs. Mary Murdock came into the room but did not notice him. Mrs. Murdock said "Uncle Billy, can you give me some interest money?" William replied, "No! you have my note for $100,000 with 12 per cent interest and that ought to satisfy you." Witness said Mrs. Murdock made no reply. In the cross-examination of the witness, he was asked if on certain dates in the State of Washington, he had not stated to certain men that he would make $10,000 out of the Murdock case? He denied ever having made such statements. The next witness was of Tehama county, and a brother of Mrs. Murdock, the plaintiff. He testified to having paid Samuel Murdock $10,000 on the 4th of September, 1877.

EDWARD I. ROBINSON

H. A. SKIFF,

C. B. ASHERST,

This evidence was merely corroborative of testimony given by other witnesses of the plaintiffs.

One or two other witnesses followed, whose testimony was mainly corroborative in its character, and then came who testified that he was local correspondent of the San Francisco Chronicle at the time of the death of Wm. Murdock. He had on a certain occasion, gotten wind of the big note and was preparing to send a message concerning it to the paper he represented. Before doing so, he saw B. H. Burton and told him of his intention. That Burton said they knew there was such a note out, and that if Mr. Murdock had lived a week longer, the matter would have been settled; and asked witness not to send any message until he had seen Mr. Lusk. In the cross-examination of the witness Mr. Lusk asked him if this was not the fact. That Mr. Lusk had heard of the note, and that Mr. Murdock had denied its validity; and that Burton said further, that the papers were all made out, and that if Murdock had lived a week longer the suit would have been filed, to have the note cancelled, as forgery? Witness denied that such was the conversation. After introducing the assignment of the note from Mrs. Murdock to W. H. Megginson, and from him to his brother, and from the brother back to Mrs Mary Murdock, plaintiff announced that that was their case.

DR. W. A. SEHORN,

RICHARD BAYNE

then arose for the defendants and made their opening statement, and said in part: May it please the Court and gentlemen of the jury, we have now reached the point when we are permitted to make the formal opening statement of what all consider the defense, and I presume that it will be a proper course for me to pursue to say first, that we deny that William Murdock ever made or executed the paper known at all. We deny further that William Murdock ever received any consideration for any such paper; endeavor to carry out the idea of a valuable consideration, she had placed it in the hands of third parties, for the purpose of showing a valuable consideration in their hands, so that the defense of a want of consideration would not be good. Our main defense however, is that the decedent, William Murdock, never saw this instrument and had absolutely nothing to do with its creation and manufacture.

Some reference has been made to expert testimony. Men who are skilled in any calling are far more capable of giving opinions than those who are not—they are qualified by vast experience and close attention, and are capable of directing the minds of men on matters under investigation. When we come to produce such witnesses before you, we ask you to accept and receive their testimony as well as any other witness who comes upon the stand. We expect to place before you under the sanction of a solemn oath, gentlemen peculiarly qualified in the matters about which they will testify, and you gentlemen are to be the judges of their credibility, and of the truth of their statements, as straight-forward honest, intelligent men; and we ask you in all candor to weigh and sift their testimony, and if it be such as commends itself to your judgment and consciences, accept it, and if you find that it is not of that character which you can accept, we ask you to do precisely as you would with any other testimony —discard it under the same rules that other witnesses must come. * * * This is not all upon which we propose to rest our defense. We expect to show to you, and demonstrate in a manner which will convince your minds, and judgment, without reference to expert testimony, that it was a physical impossibility for this instrument to have been executed by this man, at the time that it is alleged to have been made, and we expect to submit to your own eyes, and to your own personal inspection, the proofs which will convince you of these things. At the conclusion of the opening statement by Mr Bayne on Friday, everybody wondered what would be the first move on the part of the defendant. Gen. Barnes announced that the first thing in order, would be the placing in evidence, as exhibits something over a thousand paid checks and other documents of the deceased Murdock, having his signature thereon. The process of reading them one by one and numbering each one was altogether too tedious for the audience, which soon scattered. The jury was also excused by the Court until Monday at 10 o'clock, when they were again excused until Tuesday at 10 o'clock. When the Court convened at 10 o'clock Tuesday the first witness called by the defense was for impeachment purposes, to contradict H. A. Skiff, who was a witness for plaintiff and had denied making statements in the State of Washington, in 1894, to certain persons at specified times and places, that he would get $10,000 out of the Murdock case. The witness said that he had worked with Skiff in the month of February 1894, in that State, and that Skiff stated that he was going to California and would get $10,000 out of the big note case, and would not have to work any more.

MORRISON BRYAN, Jr.

The next move was what everybody had been waiting for, which was the expert testimony.

THEODORE KYTKA

was called by Gen. Barnes, when he quickly stepped to the witness chair. All around, and about and everywhere within the railing were piles of enlarged photographs of the hundreds of old checks drawn by the deceased Murdock in his lifetime.

Against the back wall of the Court room and near the Judge's stand was a tall standing ten feet high or more, by perhaps eight wide, upon which was twelve signatures of William Murdock, being enlargements of his genuine handwriting. Among the number is the signature on the $100,000 note. The enlargements of the signatures are about three feet in length, rendering it very [illegible] was still on the stand at the hour of adjournment.

PLAINTIFF MARY HELEN MURDOCK.

On Wednesday morning Mr. Kytka was recalled by the defense. He was asked by Gen Barnes as to what resemblance if any, there was in the "Wm." on the deed of 1890, from William Murdock to Mary Helen Murdock, and the "Wm." on the $100,000 note. He replied that the resemblance was so exact that no difference could be detected with the naked eye. Gen Barnes then asked the witness to take the note and deed and place one signature over the other. This he did, by placing one instrument against the window and the other over it, while the jury left their seats and watched the operation by direction of the Judge. The jurymen were furnished a magnifying glass to examine the signatures as they were thus placed, one over the other. In answer to a question by Gen. Barnes, as to what he found to be a fact, by placing one signature over the other, the witness replied that he found one to be a tracing of the other. The defendants had prepared by the expert photographer a large number of the enlarged specimens of handwriting of the dead man for the use of the jury, to be held in their own hands, for examination, as expert testimony is being given on each branch of the defense.

Court adjourned at the usual hour, until 9:30 a. m., Thursday.

On Thursday morning Mr. Kytka was temporarily excused and the great New York handwriting expert was called to the stand. He was in his 64th year, and a resident of New York City for the past 30 years, during which time he had been engaged in the business of expertising handwriting. He testified that he had given expert testimony in [illegible] the [illegible] and London.

DANIEL T. AMES,

Asked how many cases he had appeared in, replied that he had testified as an expert in over 1200 cases, including the noted Adams murder case of New York during the month of March, and others of National note. He had first seen this note during the last trial in San Francisco, in the hands of Mr. Megginson. He had examined 700 of the hand writing exhibits of Mr. Murdock, now in use in this trial.

Witness was then asked what difference he had discovered in the general hand writing of William Murdock and the signature to the note. He said that Mr. Murdock always wrote a bold, uniform and strong hand, while the signature to the note [illegible] inspection, as the holder was negotiating for the purchase of some property there. The next witness was a former employee on the Dawn Murdock farm. He testified that in the month of May, 1890, he was in a room there, after supper, making out a list of extras for a harvester. Wm. Murdock and Mrs. Mary Murdock came into the room but did not notice him. Mrs. Murdock said "Uncle Billy, can you give me some interest money?" William replied, "No! you have my note for $100,000 with 12 per cent interest and that ought to satisfy you." Witness said Mrs. Murdock made no reply. In the cross-examination of the witness, he was asked if on certain dates in the State of Washington, he had not stated to certain men that he would make $10,000 out of the Murdock case? He denied ever having made such statements. The next witness was of Tehama county, and a brother of Mrs. Murdock, the plaintiff. He testified to having paid annual Murdock $10,000 on the 4th of September, 1877.

[illegible]

H. A. SKIFF,

C. B. ASHURST,

This evidence was merely corroborative of testimony given by other witnesses of the plaintiffs.

One or two other witnesses followed, whose testimony was mainly corroborative in its character, and then came

DR. W. A. SEHORN,

who testified that he was local correspondent of the San Francisco Chronicle at the time of the death of Wm. Murdock. He had on a certain occasion, gotten wind of the big note and was preparing to send a message concerning it to the paper he represented. Before doing so, he saw B. H. Burton and told him of his intention. That Burton said they knew there was such a note out, and that if Mr. Murdock had lived a week longer, the matter would have been settled; and asked witness not to send any message until he had seen Mr. Lusk. In the cross examination of the witness Mr. Lusk asked him if this was not the fact. That Mr. Lusk had heard of the note, and that Mr. Murdock had denied its validity; and that Burton said further, that the papers were all made out, and that if Murdock had lived a week longer the suit would have been filed, to have the note cancelled, as forgery? Witness denied that such was the conversation. After introducing the assignment of the note from Mrs. Murdock to W. H. Megginson, and from him to his brother, and from the brother back to Mrs Mary Murdock, plaintiff announced that that was their case.

RICHARD BAYNE

then arose for the defendants and made their opening statement, and said in part: May it please the Court and gentlemen of the jury, we have now reached the point when we are permitted to make the formal opening statement of what all consider the defense, and I presume that it will be a proper course for me to pursue to say first, that we deny that William Murdock ever made or executed the paper here at all. We deny further that William Murdock ever received any consideration for any such paper. We allege further, that plaintiff here is not the real party in interest, and further that this paper was by indorsement made over first to L. S. Megginson, and subsequently by him to Wm. H. Megginson, and upon our information and belief the title still remains in this latter party. We expect to produce before you a great many facts which will satisfy your minds that no consideration ever passed to William Murdock for this note; and that if the alleged instrument ever had any existence at all we expect to satisfy you that Wm. Murdock never made it. We expect further to prove to you that while the plaintiff here was the possessor and holder of the note, that her actions behavior and declarations with respect to it were inconsistent with the idea of any valuable consideration attaching to it. We will show you that instead of there being any valuable consideration, that her only claim was that this note was given to her and after that, and that she had been diligently engaged in our ity, and of the truth of their statements, as straight-forward honest, intelligent men; and we ask you in all candor to weigh and sift their testimony, and if it be such as commends itself to your judgment and conscience, accept it, and if you find that it is not of that character which you can accept, we ask you to do precisely as you would with any other testimony —discard it under the same rules that other witnesses must come. * * * This is not all upon which we propose to rest our defense. We expect to show to you, and demonstrate in a manner which will convince your minds, and judgment, without reference to expert testimony, that it was a physical impossibility for this instrument to have been executed by this man, at the time that it is alleged to have been made, and we expect to submit it to your own eyes, and to your own personal inspection, the proofs which will convince you of these things. At the conclusion of the opening statement by Mr. Bayne on Friday, everybody wondered what would be the first move on the part of the defendant. Gen. Barnes announced that the first thing in order, would be the placing in evidence, as exhibits something over a thousand paid checks and other documents of the deceased Murdock, having his signature thereon. The process of reading them one by one and numbering each one was altogether too tedious for the audience, which soon scattered. The jury was also excused by the Court until Monday at 10 o'clock, when they were again excused until Tuesday at 10 o'clock. When the Court convened at 10 o'clock Tuesday the first witness called by the defense was for impeachment purposes, to contradict H. A. Skiff, who was a witness for plaintiff and had denied making statements in the State of Washington, in 1894, to certain persons at specified times and places, that he would get $10,000 out of the Murdock case. The witness said that he had worked with Skiff in the month of February 1894, in that State, and that Skiff stated that he was going to California and would get $10,000 out of the big note case, and would not have to work any more.

MORRISON BRYAN, Jr.

The next move was what everybody had been waiting for, which was the expert testimony.

THEODORE KYTKA

was called by Gen. Barnes, who quickly stepped to the witness chair. All around, and about and everywhere within the railing were piles of enlarged photographs of the hundreds of old checks drawn by the deceased Murdock in his lifetime.

Against the back wall of the Court room and near the Judge's stand was a tall stretcher ten feet high or more, by perhaps eight wide, upon which was twelve signatures of William Murdock, being enlargements of his genuine handwriting. Among the number is the signature on the $100,000 note. The enlargements of the signatures are about three feet in length, rendering it easy for almost anyone to detect any differences, however slight, in any two signatures.

On the same stretcher and right beside the signature on the $100,000 note is the signature to a deed from Wm. Murdock to Mary Helen Murdock made on March 12, 1890, from which, it now develops, defendants claim the signature on the note is a tracing. Mr. Kytka stated that he was a native of Austria, and a documental photographic expert, having been in the business of reproducing photographic copies of handwriting about 18 years. He had been employed in celebrated cases as follows: Fair Will case, Botkin case, Figel case, Becker and Creegan forgery case, Bell case, Davis Will case and others of great note, and had also been employed by the United States secret service. He proved to be a most extraordinarily bright, as well as highly educated in his profession. His testimony is highly interesting, save that the technical phraseology employed in his art is many times unintelligible to ordinary laymen. He was still on the stand at the hour of adjournment.

PLAINTIFF MARY HELEN MURDOCK.

On Wednesday morning Mr. Kytka was recalled by the defense. He was asked by Gen. Barnes as to what resemblance if any, there was in the "Wm." on the deed of 1890, from William Murdock to Mary Helen Murdock, and the "Wm." on the $100,000 note. He replied that the resemblance was so exact that no difference could be detected with the naked eye. Gen. Barnes then asked the witness to take the note and deed and place one signature over the other. This he did, by placing one instrument against the window and the other over it, while the jury left their seats and watched the operation, by direction of the Judge. The jurymen were furnished a magnifying glass to examine the signatures as they were thus placed, one over the other. In answer to a question by Gen. Barnes, as to what he found to be a fact, by placing one signature over the other, the witness replied that he found one to be a tracing of the other. The defense has had prepared by the expert photographer a large number of the enlarged specimens of handwriting of the dead man for the use of the jury, to be held in their own hands, for examination, as expert testimony is being given on each branch of the defense.

Court adjourned at the noon hour, until 9.30 a. m., Thursday

On Thursday morning Mr. Kytka was temporarily excused and

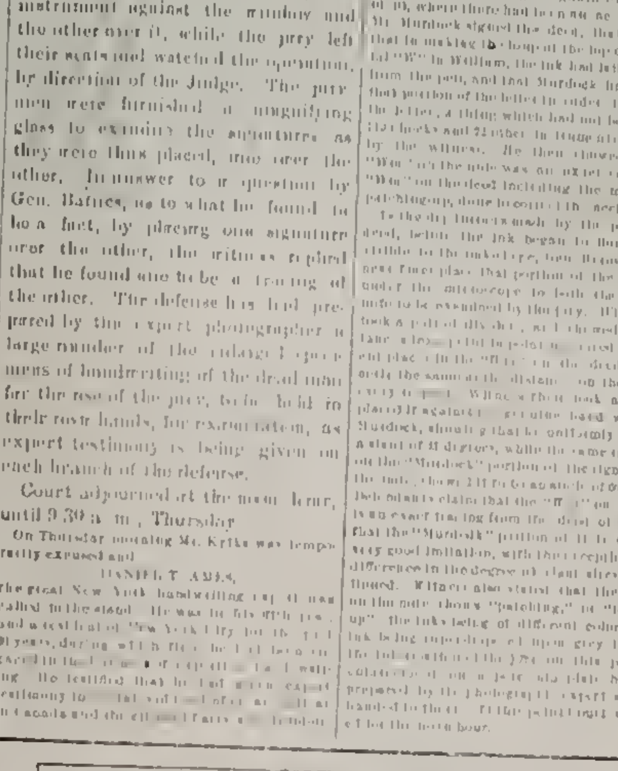
DANIEL T. AMES,

the great New York handwriting expert was called to the stand. He was in his 67th year, and a resident of New York City for the past 31 years, during which time he had been engaged in the [illegible] of expert [illegible] handwriting. He testified that he had given expert testimony to [illegible] as well as [illegible]

Asked how many cases he had appeared in, replied that he had testified as an expert in over 1,000 cases, including the noted Adams murder case of New York during the month of March, and others of National note. He had first seen this note during the Fair trial in San Francisco, in the hands of Mr. Megginson. He had examined 793 of the hand writing exhibits of Mr. Murdock, now in use in this trial.

Witness was then asked what difference he had discovered in the general hand writing of William Murdock and the signature to the note. He said that Mr. Murdock always wrote a bold, uniform and strong hand, while the signature to the note shows a nervous, halting and hesitating manner. He then testified that out of 819 signatures to checks examined by him, that not one of them was made in exactly the same manner, as the signature to the deed of 1890. He took a picture and showed the jury on the enlarged signature on the deed of 90, where there had been an accident when Mr. Murdock signed the deed, that is to say that in making the loop of the top of the capital "W" in William, the ink had failed to flow from the pen, and that Murdock had retraced that portion of the letter in order to complete the letter, a thing which had not been done in [illegible] checks and [illegible] other documents examined by the witness. He then showed that the "Wm." on the note was an exact copy of the "Wm." on the deed including the mistake, or patching-up, done to correct the accident.

To the dry lines made by the pen, in the deed, before the ink began to flow, are not visible to the naked eye, but witness had witness [illegible] place that portion of the signature under the microscope in both the deed and note to be examined by the jury. Witness then took a pair of dividers, and showed that distance along [illegible] from point to point in [illegible] to different places in the "Wm." on the deed, are exactly the same as the distance on the note in every respect. Witness then took a bevel and placed it against [illegible] genuine hand writing of Murdock, showing that he uniformly wrote on a slant of 41 degrees, while the same bevel placed on the "Murdock" portion of the signature on the note, shows it to be on a slant of 60 degrees. Defendants claim that the "Wm." on the note is an exact tracing from the deed of 1890, but that the "Murdock" portion of it is simply a very good imitation, with the exception of the difference in the degree of slant already mentioned. Witness also stated that the writing on the note shows "patching," or "touching-up" the inks being of different colors—black ink being superimposed upon grey ink. For the information of the jury on this point an enlargement of the note has been prepared by the photographic expert and was handed to them. At this point court adjourned for the noon hour.



T. KYTKA EXPLAINING SIGNATURES TO THE JURY.

The dispatches tell us that Ex-Congressman S. G. Hilborn died at Garfield Hospital, Washington D. C., Wednesday, April 19th, 1899. Hon. S. G. Hilborn has faithfully represented the Third District in Congress for several terms and was very popular with the masses.

Miss Grace Gilbert and Mrs. C. D. Davidson of Butte City, were in Willows, Thursday.

WE'RE HAPPY THE ANTI-CARTOON BILL IS IN EFFECT.

MURDOCK NOTE CASE.

Writing Expert Eisenschimel Under Cross-Examination.

WILLOWS, April 24.—On the opening of court in the Murdock case to-day, writing expert Carl Eisenschimel was called to the stand by the defendants, and was handed old checks for further analysis of the formation of the letters in the last name, being old checks signed by William Murdock in 1877, the date upon which the note is purported to have been signed.

After stating the difference in the various checks, the witness was turned over to Grove L. Johnson for cross-examination.

Asked if he had examined the writing in the various checks other than the signature, Eisenschimel replied that he had not.

Johnson handed him some old checks, and he picked out certain ones which he said were written by Mr. Murdock and others that were not.

Asked if he remembered when T. J. Kirkpatrick's affidavit was introduced, if when sitting by the side of Mr. Kytka, another writing expert, he had not whispered to Kytka: "Get hold of that and make a photograph of it, and we will knock it out," he denied saying so.

Asked if there was any doubt in his mind that the note was copied from the deed of 1890, witness replied that there was none whatever.

Matters began to grow heated between counsel and the witness, the court finding it necessary several times to stop it. He said his profession was a science, an art, and a trade. As a science, he said that by three rules it ought to be "exact," as follows: In alignment, in slant and in pressure.

When asked if experts on handwriting ever disagreed, witness said: "Sometimes they did."

Asked if he had ever testified in any case where Daniel T. Ames had testified, he replied that he had. He said both were witnesses in the Davis will case, and that they disagreed.

When asked if he had peddled his opinion around the streets of San Francisco that the Murdock note was a forgery, the expert positively denied that he had done so. He said he had mentioned the matter to his family at his dinner table.

"Did you not peddle around the streets of San Francisco the opinion you had given Mr. Cannon that the note was a forgery?"

"No, sir."

Witness was asked by Johnson if [illegible] reputable people should swear the signature on the note was the genuine handwriting of William Murdock, if he would believe it.

Witness said it would not change his opinion one particle.

The witness was turned over to the defense for redirect examination by General Barnes, when the noon recess was declared.

At the afternoon session Theodore Kytka was recalled by the defense. General Barnes had him superimpose the "Wm" on the note on the "Wm" on the deed of 1890. The entire afternoon was occupied with his evidence.

Mrs. Murdock was not present in court to-day, but her husband was an attentive listener.

The questions this afternoon indicate that the plaintiffs will undertake the impeachment of one or two of the experts as to what they have testified to. Expert Kytka will be asked to-morrow morning to execute in court a "patched" document like the note. He testified that he had done this in the Becker and Creegan case in San Francisco.

In answer to Grove Johnson, Expert Eisenschimel stated that he expected to receive as compensation $[illegible] per day, although he had no contract.

Expert Ames testified several days ago that he was to receive this amount, and at this rate the expert testimony will cost the defendants $[illegible] a day.

MURDOCK'S SIGNATURES.

WILLOWS, April 25.—Theodore Kytka was called to the stand in behalf of the defense in the Murdock note case and occupied yesterday's entire afternoon session. He was asked to place "Wm" of the deed of March 12, 1890, and the "Wm" of the note one above the other under the lens of a microscope, and the court and jury were invited to examine them. He said that he first began to study on Murdock's signature in February, 1899. Mr. Lusk and Mr. Payne then gave him seventy-nine checks for examination and he enlarged and carefully examined them. At this time he had not seen the documents in dispute. He came to Willows and first saw the note on April 1, 1899. He made an examination under the microscope and was so struck with the similarity of the two "Wms" in the deed and note that he stopped further examination.

The witness was asked if he could demonstrate to the jury how piecing and patching was done. He said he could, but that he would have to go and get his instruments. He was asked to bring them in the morning. The plaintiff's attorneys gave notice that they would offer an objection.

This morning Expert Kytka continued his testimony. Several exemplars of Murdock's handwriting were viewed by the court, jury and counsel. Barnes then asked:

"Mr. Kytka, is there any part of the lines in the tracing of the signature of the note that is not ragged, rough and jagged?"

"There is not. It is all written by finger movements."

General Barnes then handed the witness two checks with "Wm. Murdock" written on them.

"How came those two checks to have the name of Wm. Murdock written on the back?"

"I traced them over glass from one of the signatures of Murdock."

"I wish to introduce them in evidence," said Barnes.

"If the court please, we object," said Johnson.

The point was argued at some length by both sides, but the objection was finally sustained.

Barnes also wanted to have Professor Kytka take any genuine signature of Murdock and from this signature trace another, but the plaintiff's attorneys objected, as they said they would yesterday, and the objections were sustained. After this two dots under "Wm." of the deed and the "Wm." of the note were discussed fully by the witness, and were shown to the jury through the microscope. The witness continued all the time up to the adjournment for the luncheon in showing the similarity and dissimilarity between three different sets of dots.

KYTKA GIVES HIS REASONS

Why He Is So Certain the Murdock Note Was Forged.

The Expert Wouldn't Believe Old William Himself to the Contrary.

[Special Dispatch to "The Examiner."]

WILLOWS, April 25.—According to the understanding last night Theodore Kytka was recalled to-day. He brought his pieces of glass, paper, etc., with which to demonstrate, in presence of the jury, that he could make a "tracing" having all of the characteristics of the signature claimed to be signed to the famous note. Mr. Kytka was so much imbued with the value of his profession that he frequently overstepped the rules of evidence. He is, in fact, what might be called an enthusiast in his line, and therefore, scarcely able to brook a contradiction of what to him seems so palpable.

The first work of the morning session was a repetition of the routine "peeking" through the microscope and blackboard work. When asked if there was any portion of the signature on the note which is not "ragged" and "patched," Kytka said that there was none of it that was "free-hand" writing, and was a tracing done with the "finger" movement, showing a tremor.

These little preliminaries finished, the "joker" made its appearance when General Barnes handed witness a small piece of paper in the usual form of a check and asked what it was. Witness replied that it was a tracing made by himself for the purpose of showing how the note was manufactured.

Mr. Johnson had an objection that required more than half an hour to argue, principally on the ground that it was not a "comparison" of the handwriting of Murdock with anything else, but was simply an example of the ability of the witness to imitate.

General Barnes read at length from textbooks in support of his right to have the witness demonstrate how the work was done in the presence of Court and Jury. He showed that in many important cases courts had permitted every conceivable sort of demonstration, even to singing. He cited the case of Becker and Creegan in San Francisco, charged with forgery, in which he said Judge Wallace had permitted the witness to do the thing he was asking to have done here.

Grove Johnson in reply sent hot shot at General Barnes and closed the argument on this point. He said he cared nothing for what Judge Wallace had done, for it was a well-known fact that Judge Wallace had never given a defendant a fair trial in his life, and that he was always found on the side of the prosecution. Moreover, he had been reversed more times than any other Judge in the State of California. He spoke of the Figel case and said that a murderer had gone unpunished in that case.

General Barnes called upon the Court to have the attorney stopped, affirming that it was out of place for his opponent to criticise the judgment of a Superior Judge—just the thing he did himself when he took occasion to remark in the course of his argument that "there was never a more just judgment on earth than when this young man Figel was acquitted."

Judge Pirkey was visibly displeased with Attorney Johnson's remarks, and said that the remarks of counsel were very improper, to say the least, especially the reflections cast on Judge Wallace.

Mr. Johnson apologized to the Court for remarks that might have been unbecoming, and said that he was led into it by the remarks of General Barnes.

Judge Pirkey said he had given the matter careful consideration and did not believe the witness should be allowed to make such a demonstration before the jury, and he so ruled, General Barnes noting an exception.

The liveliest time in three long weeks of trial was when Mr. Kytka was turned over to Mr. Johnson for cross-examination.

Kytka stated that he had no contract as to what his compensation for work in connection with this case would be, but said he expected to receive something. This was as near as he would tell what his services were worth.

Johnson asked witness if William Murdock was to come here himself and say that he signed the note would he believe him or still say it was a forgery. Witness replied that he would say: "Mr. Murdock, you are either mistaken or a liar."

The witness was then excused.

George C. Hickox, an expert on handwriting, was next called for the defense. He stated that he was at the present time cashier for a railroad. For eighteen years he had been one of the firm of Hickox & Spear in San Francisco. He could not tell how many cases he had been a witness in as a handwriting expert, but was sure that it was more than five hundred. He had made many a comparison of the disputed note and compared the same with the genuine, and found similitudes and discrepancies which arrested his attention at once. He said the signature on the note was a "fabrication" from the signature on the deed of 1890 and very evidently had been "doctored." In his opinion William Murdock never signed the note or any portion of it.

Asked on cross-examination what he would think if a thousand men should tell him that they knew that William Murdock signed the note, he said that under such circumstances he would say that he might be mistaken.

Mr. Hickox was then excused.

General Barnes asked the court to adjourn until to-morrow, as it was within half an hour of adjournment time. He had finished, he said, with expert witnesses and would take up another branch of the case to-morrow.

This was much to the relief of the public, which has grown weary of the prolonged expert testimony and expects something on the race order when the fight really begins. Enough is known to warrant the prediction that there will be a hot time in court within the next few days.

PENMEN SHOW THEIR HANDIWORK

Reasons for Their Belief That the Murdock Signature Was Forged.

One of Them Called Upon to Imitate the Signature of the Deceased.

[Special Dispatch to "The Examiner."]

WILLOWS, April [illegible].—At the calling of the Murdock case this morning, the lawyers resumed [illegible] to one another for ten or [illegible] until some question [illegible] by General Barnes that Grove Johnson thought was an infringement on the rights of his side of the case.

Carl Eisenschimel was recalled by the defendants to [illegible] a few minutes later at the [illegible] William Murdock, when he was excused and Theodore Kytka was recalled by General Barnes. He was first asked to place the "Wm." on the note in juxtaposition with the "Wm." on the deed of 1890, in other words, one right over the other under the barrel of the microscope, from which the lens had been removed. A small table had been placed just outside of the lawyers' railing where this examination was to be made by the jury. A few jurors had arrived at the appointed place accompanied by the court, when Grove Johnson heard, or thought that he did, Mr. Kytka tell some one of the jury to "take hold here," or something to that effect. Whatever was said brought forth a vigorous protest from the ever-watchful Johnson, who objected to any handling or suggesting from anybody, in tones that clearly indicated that his temper was tired of too many objections, he remarked.

The episode is over, gentlemen, and proceeded with the [illegible]. The lawyers subsided and peace reigned once again. If jurors received mileage for traveling to the microscope this jury would have earned a good-sized stake already, in traveling under directions of counsel and [illegible] to take a "peep" through the many [illegible] microscopes in use in the examination of the nearly one thousand documents under examination.

Witness went to the blackboard and made a pretty "Wm." with white chalk, and then made red lines here and there on it to show places where the imitator, or forger, as he planned to call the maker of the note, touched it up and filled it in where the patching was done. Witness stated as a fact that, in all the writing he had examined of the deceased Murdock, in no case had Murdock ever attempted to patch up or fix any letter where the pen had failed to do its work well, but invariably left it alone. The note, he claims, is all patchwork and filling in.

Witness Kytka then took up the "k" in Murdock, which has a tail turned up like a rising [illegible], which never occurred until the year 1879 in the handwriting of Mr. Murdock. Of course the defense has hung to this fact "like grim death to a dead nigger." Every single document that William Murdock ever signed up to December 19, 1879, was finished so far as the final "k" is concerned, with a flourish backward under the name, while the unhappy note purporting to have been signed by him in 1877 was finished with an upward hook. The defense thinks it would be a curious circumstance that Mr. Murdock would so far depart from a well-established practice but once in all of his known life up to that time, and that should be in the case of the big note.

In answering a question as to when he first began the study of the signature on the exhibits, Mr. Kytka said it was when Mr. Lusk and Mr. Payne asked him to do so on February [illegible], 1899. He made an examination of seventy-nine checks. He had not previous to that time seen the note. The first time was on April [illegible]. He began by supposing that he would have a hard task to find where the difference was, if a forgery had been committed.

"All of a sudden," he said, "I was struck with the sameness of the 'Wm.' on the note and the 'Wm.' on the checks in [illegible]. I stopped right there when I saw that, for I was convinced that it was a forgery."

It is said that the purpose of the plaintiffs is to show that Mr. Murdock was not in the habit of filling out his own checks, but that the filling was generally done by others, and that he merely signed his name, and therefore that it was not at all strange that the note for $[illegible] was written out by Mrs. Mary Helen Murdock.

Expert Eisenschimel testified to-day that, like his friend Mr. Ames, he had no contract with the defendants as to what he was to receive as compensation. When pressed by Mr. Johnson as to what he expected to receive, he said he expected to get $[illegible] a day, as that was his usual price, a statement that almost paralyzed the [illegible] audience, most of whom work hard for[illegible] for $[illegible].

Enough has leaked out to let the public understand that each side has better testimony yet to come.

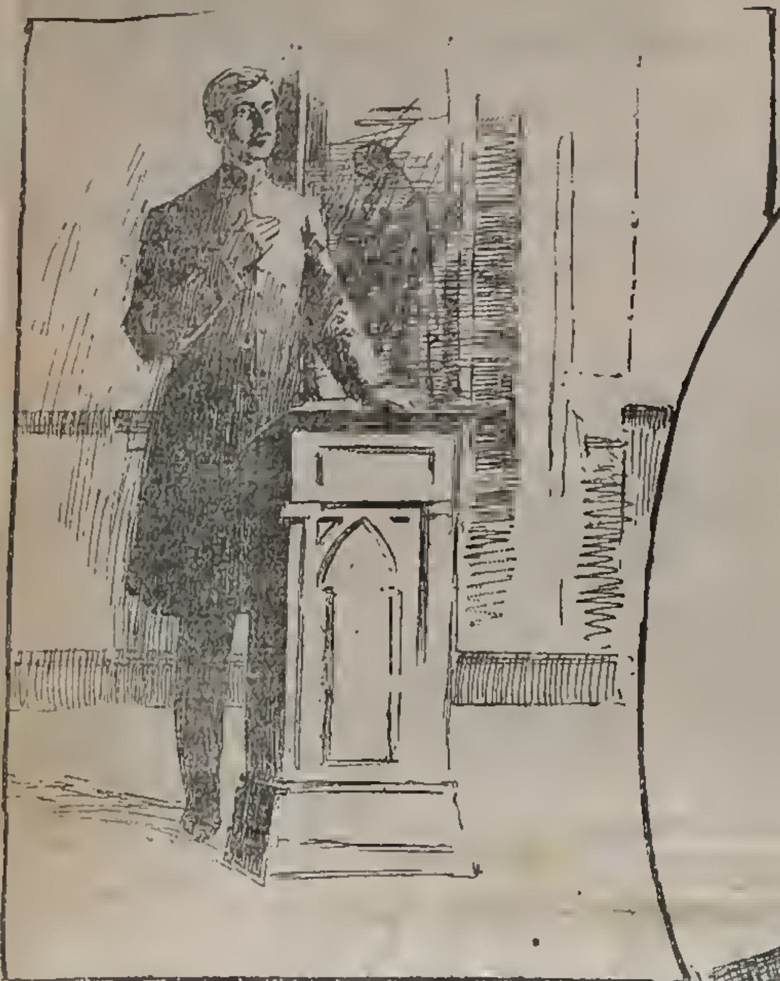
Just before the court adjourned for the day Mr. Barnes asked the witness if he could produce such a piece of patchwork as he claimed is done on the note here in evidence. He, replying an answer that he could, he was asked to do so. He said that he did not have the appliances here, but he would bring them in the morning. He said that he had done the exhibiting in the Becker and Creegan case in San Francisco.

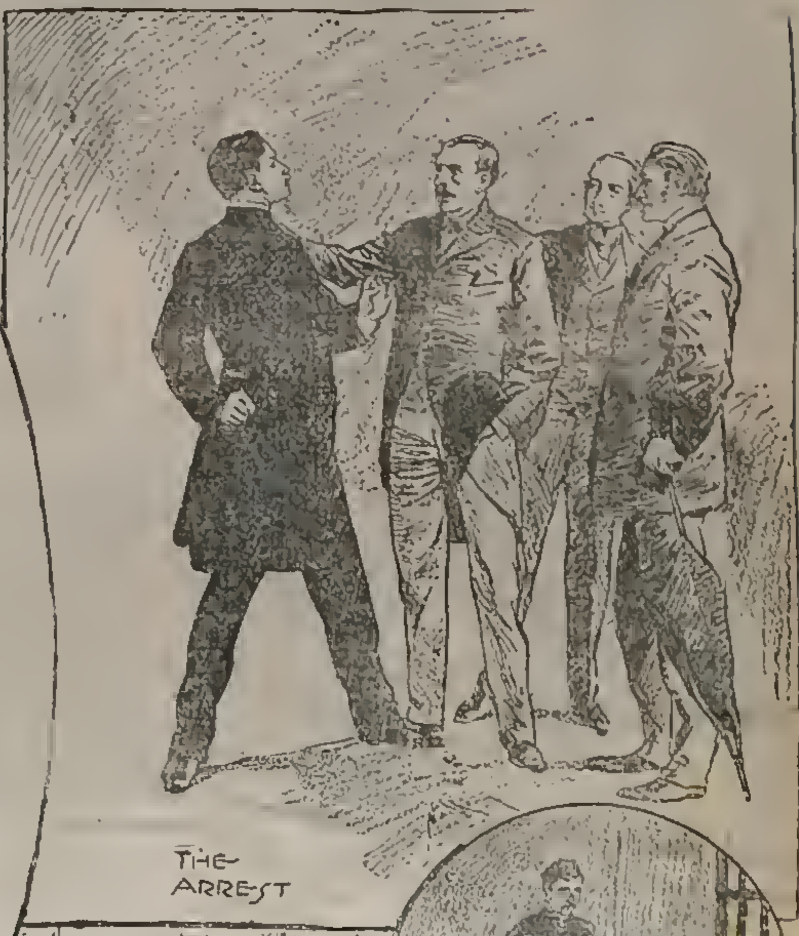
Plaintiffs gave notice that they would interpose an objection to that. General Barnes asked the witness to come prepared in the morning to do the work.

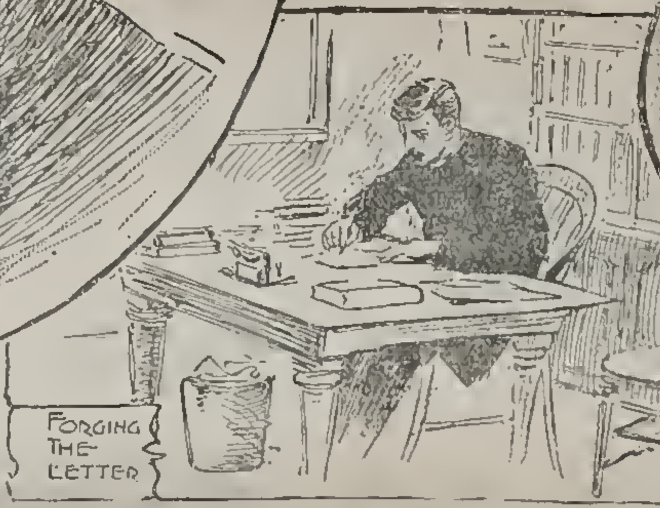
Court then adjourned to [illegible] to-morrow morning.

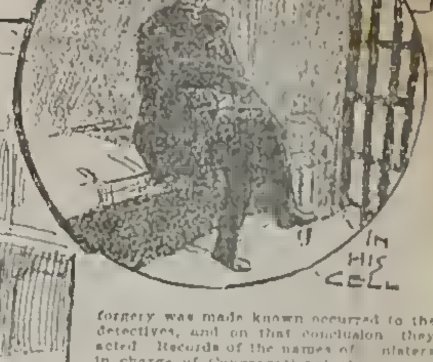
"JIM THE PENMAN" OF FICTION OUTDONE BY A CLERGYMAN IN REAL LIFE

Preached the Gospel, Bunkoed Banks and Cleverly Covered His Trail for Years, but the Detectives Kept Working to Find Him and at Last Ran Him Down While He Was in Church Preaching a Sermon.









"JIM THE PENMAN" of fiction has been outdone by the Rev. George R. Parrish of real life. It is indeed a strange and thrilling story of a wolf in sheep's clothing, of crime masquerading in garb of respectability, of casting hypocrisy in vestments of the church, as told by the Pinkerton detectives. The novelist and dramatist have time and again given us pictures of these conditions that have attracted our attention, yet often brought a doubt of their truthfulness in nature, success in crime baffling of justice for a long time, the criminal respected and apparently living the life of an honest man, while patient detectives for years fail to follow a slender clew to success, which, though thrilling and entertaining, have often appeared overdrawn and too highly colored.

But now comes a real detective story—a chapter from the records of crime that has combined all the dramatic situations so cunningly and effectively used by the novelist and play writer. "Truth is stranger than fiction," and fiction is only worthy when it approaches truth.

True Detective Story.

Last week came the story of the arrest for forgery of the Rev. George R. Parrish, pastor of the First Congregational Church of Marshalltown, Iowa, as told by the Pinkerton detectives. Now, there is nothing particularly strange in the arrest of a man for forgery. It is a daily item of news and so common an occurrence in a great detective agency as to hardly call for the most ordinary attention, but here was a case that even stirred the cold professional analytical mind of a detective, whose waking hours are passed in studying the study of crime and who is as familiar with criminals, their life and methods, as is the trained entomologist with the insects he captures and so neatly pins. It is the strange "bug" that requires more thought than is necessary to formally enter him under the proper heads in the register. So with the entomologist in the realm of human "bugs." The Pinkertons after a long chase have "netted" and "pinned" a particularly poisonous and elusive human insect, and tell of their experience in the chase.

Reporter, lawyer, clergyman, preacher of the Christian religion to the people and teacher of good morals to the children, a forger for position, a forger for money, followed by detectives for years, posing as an honest man, honored and respected, shadowed to his very pulpit, there arrested and now in custody of officers of the law as a criminal. This is a synopsis of the drama in real life.

Different Aliases.

"Parrish," "Thompson" and "Aiken" are some of the names under which the arrested man has been known, with likely more to appear when he shall tell the entire truth of the strange story of his life. "Parrish," "Rev. Dr. George R. Parrish," is the title which appears in the record of his arrest for forgery. And this record, as given out by the detectives, tells of the three years' chase necessary to capture him.

"All criminals come to the detectives who wait," said the elder Pinkerton years ago. "Criminals will talk, and they will continue their methods until some day they make a slip and reveal themselves. The slightest clue is sufficient for their detection if you only have time and patience enough to abide it."

This has been true in the case of Parrish, for the clew that has been followed to his arrest was a slender one, and the arrest did not come until three and a quarter years after the commission of the particular crime with which he is charged.

It was on July 17, 1895, the Pinkertons say, that the Sandwich Bank of Sandwich, Ill., received a letter purporting to come from the cashier of the Lucas County Savings Bank of Toledo, Ohio, enclosing a draft, apparently issued by the Illinois [illegible] Society of Chicago in favor of the Rev. Mark Thompson. With the draft was a pretended letter from the cashier of the Lucas County Bank stating that Mr. Thompson was the pastor of the Central Church in Toledo, and that he was on a vacation. Further information was given that Mr. Thompson was undoubtedly visiting with the Rev. J. M. Lewis, who was the esteemed Congregational minister at Sandwich. The letter closed by requesting that the Sandwich Bank pay to Mr. Thompson the $300 called for by the draft.

Mr. Parrish had prepared the draft, written and mailed the letter and followed it in person to Sandwich. He called on the Rev. Mr. Lewis and introduced himself as the Rev. Mark Thompson, pastor of the Central Church of Toledo. Mr. Lewis saw before him an intelligent, clerical appearing young man, not quite 40 years old, who by plausible talk and a correct knowledge of current religious affairs at once gained his confidence and received an invitation to spend the night with him.

After an evening of religious conversation and a night of rest the kind-hearted, unsuspecting Mr. Lewis went with his guest to the bank and introduced him as the Rev. Mark Thompson of Toledo. That was the last needed link in the chain forged by Parrish, and he got the wanted $300.

He thanked the bank officers, thanked Mr. Lewis for his "brotherly act for a fellow minister" and went on his way secretly rejoicing.

After the Forger.

In a few days the draft was returned from Toledo dishonored. The bank that it was purported to be drawn by was a myth. The Sandwich Bank had lost $300 and the Rev. Mr. Lewis suffered the deep mortification of having innocently been dragged into a fraudulent transaction. From that day until Parrish was arrested Lewis did not cease in doing his utmost for his detection.

The Sandwich Bank, being a member of the American Bankers' Association, placed the matter in its hands and it in turn placed it in the professional care of the detectives.

Then began a long and not a hopeful chase. The Rev. Mark Thompson had disappeared and the name vanished from ministerial circles. But the detectives were sure he would remain in the ministry, and in that channel they looked for him. Thorough inquiry was put on foot, with the result of learning that the hunted man was born in Kewanee, Ill., and had been admitted to the bar in Iowa; that he had been a newspaper reporter, had practiced law, had been Prosecuting Attorney at Wichita, Kan., and a little more than ten years ago had become a minister of the Congregational church. He had been a "rolling stone," and was possessed by an uneasiness that kept him moving from place to place.

From church to church and from one religious society to another the detectives went without encouraging results. Several times they received a "tip" that the Rev. Mark Thompson was at such a place going under such a name. Off would go a detective, shadow the innocent object of suspicion, inquire into his past and learn that he was not Mark Thompson. Then would come a report from some other place, or from two or more other places, and the detectives would hurry to investigate them, without the desired result.

There are many perfectly honest and upright ministers in half a dozen States who unknowingly have been under the searching eye of a detective during the last three years.

Piling Up Forgeries.

Mark Thompson could not be found. Days became weeks, weeks became months and the months piled into years. But the patience of the successful detective is without limit and he never rests. Clews were sought and the search continued. Other cases were being attended to, but as the several detectives went back and forth from one end of the land to the other, were at scores of hotels in as many towns, met criminals, brother detectives, old and casual acquaintances, they never ceased making inquiries after Mark Thompson or rather the man who had been known by that name.

Finally, in October, 1897, the detectives, through the remarkable instincts of their profession, were satisfied that they had at least touched the trail of the man they were after. A forged draft for $50 came into their hands.

"That draft was written by the Rev. Mark Thompson," said the keen-eyed detective expert into whose hands it came. It was compared with the Sandwich forgery, and the comparison showed that the two had apparently been made by the same hand.

The $50 forged draft had been offered to a Watertown (Wis.) bank by a young, well appearing, nervous, clerical looking man, who had stated that he was the Rev. Edward E. Aiken. The draft was refused and shortly afterward a similar instrument was offered by the same man to a bank at Elkhorn, Wis., and was not cashed.

Trailing His Forgeries.

"Where is the Rev. Edward E. Aiken?" asked the detectives, but he had as completely disappeared as had the Rev. Mark Thompson. Yet the search was continued, but the combined Revs. Thompson and Aiken moved about as rapidly as did the detectives, and though clew after clew was exhausted the hunted forger was [illegible] found.

Then came only a few weeks ago—the reward of patience and knowledge of the fact that criminals as a rule continue their tricks. Thompson-Aiken continued in [illegible] and forgery, and unwittingly made a clew that has led to his imprisonment for the Sandwich forgery.

Another forgery came into the hands of the detectives. It was a letter purporting to be written by James Lee Barton, treasurer of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Affairs, recommending the Rev. Dr. George R. Parrish in the desire of a Congregational church at Wauwatosa, Wis.

The letter was dated at Chicago and the writer said while he was "loitering" in that city he had heard of the Wauwatosa vacancy and hastened to recommend his friend.

"Mr. Parrish, whom I have known from his boyhood," the letter stated, "was educated for the bar, is a broad-minded scholar and a natural orator—in fact, one of the ablest speakers to whom I have ever listened; while in social and executive qualities he excels, being, in short, just such an 'all around man' as to fit him for service in such a field as yours."

Mr. Parrish was not called to Wauwatosa, but, unfortunately for him, the deacon to whom the letter had been sent met James Lee Barton shortly after its receipt and expressed his regret at not having been able to comply with his request.

Mr. Barton was more than surprised. He said he had never written such a letter and had not been in Chicago for a year. Then the forged letter went into the hands of the detectives.

"This was written by the forger of the Sandwich and Watertown drafts," said the detective who had passed his judgment on the second instrument the moment he looked at it. For years the handwriting of these drafts had been retained in his memory.

Run to Earth.

That "Parrish" would likely keep that name until the discovery of his recent forgery was made known occurred to the detectives, and on that conclusion they acted. Records of the names of ministers in charge of Congregational churches in every State were examined, when, lo! and behold, credited to the pastorate of the First Congregational Church of Marshalltown, Iowa, was the name "Rev. George R. Parrish."

To Marshalltown the detectives went, where they made quiet, searching inquiries as to Mr. Parrish, holding him under the strictest surveillance during their progress. For days he was "shadowed." Detectives' eyes were on him all day and every night he slept under their guardianship.

It was learned that the pastor had [illegible] through a letter of [illegible] and that that letter was a forgery. The detectives were sure they had the right man at last, but to make assurance doubly sure they sent to Sandwich for the Rev. Mr. Lewis, who gladly hurried to Marshalltown to identify the man who had so cruelly imposed on him.

Then came a dramatic finish. Accompanied by the detective Mr. Lewis entered the First Congregational Church with the congregation, took a seat and waited for the beginning of the usual Sunday morning service. Presently the Rev. Dr. George R. Parrish entered his pulpit.

"That is the man," whispered Mr. Lewis to the detective.

Mr. Parrish was not disturbed then. He conducted the service as usual, preached a strong sermon, calling upon his congregation to live honest, truthful, upright lives, to never fear to do the right, and to never stoop to wrong, no matter what the circumstances or temptations.

When he closed a hush of approval came over the congregation, which was followed by words of commendation from one to another while many went to the pulpit to shake their pastor by the hand and congratulate him on his sermon.

The detectives patiently waited, and when the pastor left the church he was shown a warrant for his arrest charging him with forgery, and was taken into custody. He was [illegible] and consented to go to Sandwich for trial without the issuance of extradition papers. He is now there waiting for the action of the Grand Jury.

WILLOWS DAILY JOURNAL.

WILLOWS, CALIFORNIA: TUESDAY EVENING, APRIL 25, 1899.

EXPERT HICKOK

Another Noted Authority on Forged Handwriting on the Stand.

At the opening of court this morning Theodore Kytka was called to the stand. Agreeable to the understanding when court adjourned last night, he brought with him inkstands galore, pieces of glass and what not, preparatory to the work of executing a note in exact imitation of the one in question, which he claims is patched, retouched, filled in, etc.

Mr. Kytka has so much confidence in his work that he frequently becomes very earnest, so much so that he frequently says things which are objectionable, but in reality unintentional on his part.

Like nearly everyone who takes a proper interest in his or her profession or trade he is an enthusiast, being scarcely able to brook a contradiction of his own work.

This morning's work began with the tedious examination under the microscope of old instruments signed by Mr. Murdock.

Asked if there was any portion of the note signature which is not ragged, said there is none of it that is "free-hand" writing, but is "finger" movement, showing "tremor."

Witness was shown a check and asked what it was by General Barnes, to which he replied that it was a tracing made by himself for the purpose of showing how the disputed document was made.

Gen. Barnes offered it in evidence, but was met by a vigorous objection by Mr. Johnson on the ground that it is not a comparison of the handwriting of Murdock, but merely showing the ability of the witness to do something. General Barnes let himself out somewhat in his argument in support of his offer, arguing with much force for more than a half an hour. He read at large from the text books and reports that witnesses in very important cases all over the country had been permitted to do every conceivable kind of experiment, such as drawing, shooting, writing, and in one case was allowed to sing, in a case where the defendant had a discordant voice and had been accused of disturbing a religious meeting by this singing, which he had insisted on doing in church, although requested to desist. He argued that it was the greatest good fortune that the microscope had been invented, for if it had not we would be poorly equipped to detect forgery where the forger was at all skillful. Said he had here in court simply an old box, a bit of glass, a candle and piece of paper, with which he proposed to show in the presence of the jury that it is simply impossible to make a tracing which cannot be detected as such with a microscope. He said Judge Wallace had permitted the same thing to be done in the great Becker and Creegan forgery case in San Francisco and eulogized the learning of Judge Wallace.

When he had closed Mr. Johnson arose and warmed things up. He said: "We do not care what Judge Wallace has done." He said that it is a well known fact that Judge Wallace never in the world gave a defendant a fair trial; that he was always part of counsel for the prosecution, and furthermore, had been reversed more times than any other judge in California. He illustrated by referring to the Figel murder case, and said that a murderer had not been convicted.

Judge Barnes rose up with a bound in an objection to having counsel make such remarks in this court and said "There never was a more just acquittal on earth than the acquittal of that young man."

Judge Pirkey attempted to have order which took some little while. When he obtained the attention of the counsel he told the attorneys that when he asked to have order he wanted it. He told attorney Johnson that he certainly had no thing to decide with reference to the Figel case and that the attorney's remarks were very improper to say the least, and especially the reflections on Judge Wallace.

Attorney Johnson apologized to the court and said that he was lead into by the remarks of Gen. Barnes; that it was his nature to strike back just as hard as he could whenever he thought some one was striking at him.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

At the convening of court this afternoon Judge Pirkey prefaced the beginning of the afternoon's work by stating to General Barnes that he would like it if more haste could be made in the examination of witnesses and stating that it seemed as if considerable time was being consumed. Gen. Barnes replying said: "If better time is to be made, someone else will have to do it your honor, for I am getting along just as fast as I possibly can and have no desire to consume the time of the court."

Mr. Kytka was then asked by Barnes to measure the "Wm" for the benefit of the jury. He measured from the extreme outer end of the wing of the capital "W" to the extreme lower end of the second down stroke of the same letter, finding them to be precisely alike in both the note and deed of March 12, 1890.

Witness was then turned over for cross-examination. Asked by Johnson if he was an expert, said he guessed he was. Was thirty-five years old. Never gave an opinion as to this note before coming here to Willows. Had no contract as to what he should receive for his services here. Said he was depending on the men who brought him here to pay him for what work he has done in the way of photographic work.

Johnson then asked the witness if he made the "W" now on the black board, said he did. He was asked if he had made it just as it ought to be, said it was complete. Johnson then asked that the letter remain there just as it is. Had never given an opinion before coming here as to the note, said he had not.

If Wm. Murdock should come here himself, and tell you that he wrote this note, would you believe him. No sir! I would say: Mr. Murdock, either you are mistaken or you are lying. He considered handwriting and experting, an "exact science." Has a studio 410 Kearney street, and had a number of other places. The witness was rather too much for Grove L. Johnson, and he turned him loose like a hot potato, without being able to do much with him.

[illegible] C. H[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] compared [illegible] with [illegible] Fargo & Co's Bank [illegible] [illegible] known [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] for [illegible] years, being at different times [illegible] as an expert in a number. Every [illegible] case [illegible] not [illegible] number [illegible] it was [illegible] more than five hundred. Had [illegible] seen the note [illegible] December, 1895, and at the same time saw the deed of 1890. Had at that time [illegible] and the photographing of [illegible] at [illegible]'s gallery in San Francisco.

He had made a comparison of the disputed note with the genuine handwriting of William Murdock and found [illegible] ties and divergencies which had arrested his attention. One was a counterpart of the other. He said the signature to the note was a fabrication made from the "Wm" on the deed, and in form the identical.

He went to the enlarged exhibits on the board and with a pointer showed where there are differences in the two signatures, notwithstanding the [illegible] in form. Said there was a fluency and vigor in the signature to the deed while in the note there appears a "disc[illegible]" —shows hesitation and tremor.

In his opinion William Murdock did not sign the name on the note, but that it was a tracing. He stated that the note signature was compounded from the two deeds, one of 1873 and the other 1890, and not made up entirely from either.

"After an examination of the exemplars, admitted to be the genuine handwriting of William Murdock, coupled with my many years experience, I am of the opinion that William Murdock did not sign the note in question or any part of it."

CROSS EXAMINATION.

"I have no doubt in my mind that the note is "fabricated" from the deed of 1890. If a thousand men should come in and swear that Mr. Murdock made the note, in view of so large a number, I would say that I might be mistaken. I did give the attorneys a qualified opinion founded upon what I had seen, as to the validity of the note, and I am now thoroughly convinced that it is a tracing from the deed."

Witness said he was expecting to get $50 per day and his traveling expenses.

RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION.

"I do not believe my mind could be changed if any number of witnesses should come here and swear that Mr. Murdock did make the note. I do not wish to be understood as being dogmatic."

General Barnes here asked the court to take an adjournment as it was within a half an hour of the time and he was through with expert testimony and not quite ready to go into another branch of his case. Court adjourned until 9:30 a.m. tomorrow.

THE BULLETIN: SA[illegible]

CRAVEN CASE IN COURT AGAIN.

W. W. Foote and Judge Denson Before Judge Troutt.

Ask Permission to Intervene in the Trust Will Contest.

Petition Will Be Heard on Friday Week, May 5.

Counselor Billy Foote Is of Opinion That There Were "Greeks" on Both Sides of the Last Action.

The struggle of Mrs. Nettie R. Craven for a portion of the millions left by the late Senator Fair was renewed in earnest this morning before Judge Troutt, who has inherited the case as a legacy from Judge Slack, resigned.

Two petitions were filed on Mrs. Craven's behalf the other day. One asked the Court to grant the petitioner an allowance of $5,000 a month as the widow of the late Senator, the allowance to date from Fair's death in December, 1894. The other requested permission to intervene in the contest now pending by which Charles L. Fair hopes to set aside the final or trust will in the event of the Supreme Court not affirming the decision of Judge Slack eliminating the obnoxious trust clause by which the heirs are prevented from touching aught but the interest from their shares during the terms of their natural lives. Both petitions were signed "Nettie R. Fair."

It was the last named petition that came up before Judge Troutt this morning. Mrs. Craven was not present, but she was represented by Attorneys W. W. Foote and S. C. Denson. R. H. Mitchell appeared for two of the executors of the trust will, Thomas G. Crothers and James S. Angus. The remaining executor, W. S. Goodfellow, was represented by Garret W. McEnerney. Charles J. Heggerty appeared for Charles L. Fair.

W. W. Foote opened the ball with a formal request that Mrs. Craven's petition to intervene be granted. He said that Mrs. Craven claimed to be the widow of Senator Fair and as such she had a right to take a hand in the contest of a will which omitted to provide for her. Mr. Foote said his client was ready to proceed at once and he suggested that the other side had had time enough and more to prepare their case.

Mr. Mitchell, on behalf of his two executors, said he was ready to proceed at once.

Mr. McEnerney asked for a continuance. He said that he was busily engaged in the trial of a case in another department and had no time to give to other business.

Mr. Heggerty, too, thought a continuance might be granted. Mr. Fair was not ready to proceed just now.

Mr. Foote affected to be surprised that Charles L. Fair did not jump at his offer of assistance. "If your Honor please," he said, "we cannot understand why Mr. Fair and his attorneys should spurn our aid in this matter. Here we are, ready and willing to help them out and they ask for a continuance."

Mr. Heggerty said something about being afraid of the proffered assistance of Mrs. Craven and her legal advisers. As he put it, he was afraid of the Greeks."

"But the Greeks weren't all on one side as I remember," retorted Foote. "I think there were Greeks on both sides."

Judge Troutt agreed to defer the hearing of the petition until Friday week, May 5.

PRICE PAID TO GET WITNESSES

Interesting Point Inquired Into in the Murdock Case.

Depositions Offered Stating That Sum Expected Ten Thousand.

WILL HAS NOT YET BEEN ADMITTED

KYTKA DENOUNCES THE MURDOCK NOTE.

Last of the Expert Testimony Taken and Sensational Developments Are Expected To-Day.

WILLOWS, [illegible]

LOWS DAILY JOURNAL

WILLOWS, CALIFORNIA: WEDNESDAY EVENING, APRIL 26, 1899.

SKIFF TALKED

Depositions as to What He Said Offered in Evidence.

When court convened at 9:30 this morning the auditorium of the court room was better occupied than for several days past, to see what new features in the big case would be presented by the defendants.

The first witness was

WILLIAM H. [illegible],

who resides at Anderson, in Shasta county, but who for many years lived at Orland. He had, along about the time the note purports to have been given, been in the employment of Samuel and Gawn Murdock as farm hand and sheepherder. He didn't remember definitely the largest number of sheep possessed by them at any one time, but was sure it never exceeded 3,000. He remembered that Mrs. Murdock made a trip to Allen Springs in June or July. When asked as to who seemed to be running the sheep, replied that Samuel did. He remembered an occasion when Samuel came to his house in June or July of the year 1887.

When asked what Sam Murdock told him at that time, it brought forth a storm of objection on the part of plaintiffs, which was sustained by the court, after spirited argument.

Mr. Lusk then asked if he would be permitted to make an offer, to which Mr. Johnson had serious objections also; to any offer in the presence of the jury. He said it was an old trick of lawyers to make "offers" to prove things, which they knew they would not be allowed to do, but in that way get the things heard by the jury. Mr. Johnson said the proper way was to make the offer in writing and submit it to the court.

After considerable wrangling Judge Purkey ordered the Sheriff to conduct the jury to his chambers, while Mr. Lusk made his offer, as follows:

"We offer to prove by the witness on the stand, that either in the month of June or July, 1877, Samuel Murdock, father of Gawn W. Murdock, the husband of the plaintiff in this action, came to the house of the witness and stayed all night; that he told witness that he had been obliged to leave his home; that he and the plaintiff in this case, Mary Helen Murdock, had had a difficulty and that she had thrown his trunk and clothes out of the window, and that he had to leave; and that Gawn Murdock, her husband, told him that he would never have anybody around that place that would talk the way he had to his wife, and that he wanted him to leave and never come back any more. At that time Samuel Murdock wept bitterly and said that he felt very bad about it; that he owned half of that property and it seemed very hard to him to throw him out, and that he didn't know where he would have a home now.

"Defendants offer to show this for the purpose of contradicting the statement made by the other side that Samuel Murdock left the house at that time because of a difficulty with his son, Gawn Murdock, because of loaning of money by Samuel to William Murdock—purely a business difficulty. We want to show that he did not leave the house at that time by reason of the business difficulty at all, but because of a difficulty between Mrs. Murdock and himself, and also of the improbability of his summoning her back home to write that note, as they have said he did."

Mr. Johnson called the attention of the court to the fact that newspaper reporters were in the room, taking down this offer, and that it would appear in the papers, so that the jury would have nothing to do but to read it; and therefore he still thought that it should be submitted in writing. The court overruled the offer, Mr. Lusk reserving an exception.

Mr. Lusk then asked the witness if he had ever heard Samuel Murdock express himself with reference to his likes and dislikes toward T. J. Kirkpatrick.

Mr. Johnson succeeded in having an objection sustained.

Mr. Lusk then included in his former offer the the following:

"Defendant offers to prove by the witness on the stand that he worked off and on, on the ranch of Gawn Murdock for several years; he had frequent conversations with Samuel Murdock until the fall of 1877, in reference to T. J. Kirkpatrick. Whenever T. J. Kirkpatrick's name was mentioned he always expressed a dislike for him and said that he had had a difficulty with him over a piece of land and that Kirkpatrick had beat him out of it. He had met him right on the disputed line and called him a s— of a b—, "and I would do it again." Whenever he spoke of Kirkpatrick he referred to him as a s— of a b—. He never used any such names with reference to any other of his neighbors. He always, in speaking of him, expressed a strong dislike for him and always applied opprobrious epithets to him."

Mr. Lusk in his argument said he offered this testimony to contradict T. J. Kirkpatrick, wherein he swore on the stand that he and Samuel Murdock were always good friends and never had any trouble in all their lives.

The court ruled out the offered testimony, and Mr. Lusk saved an objection.

The witness was turned over to attorney Johnson for cross examination. Several questions were asked which were clearly for impeachment purposes. Asked where he had been stopping, replied he had been in Chico. He met Abb Merrill and Mr. Lusk and talked.

Q. Did you tell James Skillman on the train yesterday that you had been kept in Chico for twenty days, and that you were not allowed to show up on the streets except at night, and that Lusk said he would not lose what you knew for $500, and that you were to meet Abb Merrill on the arrival of the down train, and that you were to get $100, and that you were in the case for money, and would be on the side that paid you the most?

Witness said he could not remember making any such statement.

He was pressed, over and over, by attorney Johnson for an answer as to whether he made the statement but to the best of his knowledge did not think he made any such a statement. He was asked if he made such a statement to Mr. Skiff and he said he did not remember speaking to Mr. Skiff at all, and to the best of his knowledge, he had not made the statement, and that was as strong as he was willing to make it.

Did you on April 25th—last evening, on the street of Willows, in front of Putman & Walker's drug store, say that you were a witness in this case, and that you had just got $100, and $200 more was coming, that Lusk had told you to stay here, that you were going to shear sheep in Montana, but that you could make more money being a witness in this case? A. No sir.

In the re-direct examination the witness stated to Mr. Lusk, that he had received a few dollars from Abb Merrill for expenses here, and had received $20 from him (Lusk) in Chico last Saturday, and that he had been promised as compensation, just what he could earn shearing sheep, and expenses going and coming.

Abb Merrill was called and related a conversation he had had with H. A. Skiff at San Luis Obispo. Asked if at that time Skiff told him (Merrill) that he did not know anything about the note until about two weeks after the death of "Uncle" Sammy, replied that he did, in words and substance, to that effect. Skiff further said that Mrs. Murdock ought to give him a nice present if she got the property, and this was on February 5, 1895.

The deposition of S. Q. Grufford was then read by Mr. Lusk. He is a resident of the State of Washington, having been an employe on the ranch of G. W. Murdock in former years, for a great number of years off and on, ever since he was a small boy, but never knew of Wm. Murdock being on the ranch of G. W. Murdock nor ever heard of his being there. Was sure that if he had ever visited the place, he would have known it. Skiff read him a letter which he had received from Mrs. Murdock and had a conversation with him in reference to being a witness in the Murdock case. He said she wanted him to be a witness and he would make a good thing out of it, and said he would not go for less than $10,000. He said that in the spring of 1894 he remembered quite a number of visitors who had visited the Murdock ranch, but never of Wm. Murdock visiting the place. He was sure he would have known it if he had been there, unless he came and departed in the night. "I received a letter from Mrs. Murdock at one time enquiring Mr. Skiff's address, but after that Skiff received letters from her. She asked him in the letters if he remembered what he had promised her once that he would do for her. He told me not to say anything about that when he read the letter to me. He said he would not go for less than $10,000."

The next on the programme was a deposition of Peter Bryan, also of Washington. H. A. Skiff had told him that he expected he would be a witness in the Murdock note case and would get $10,000 out of it.

Mr. Lusk then read a deposition made by H. J. Rizeor also of Washington. Skiff had lived with him during the winter of 1893. Said he had heard him speak of the Murdock note case very often. He said that Mr. Skiff always spoke of "this woman" and was expecting a letter from her as he had written to her.

He afterward stated to deponent that he had received the letter he was expecting from "this woman." Said he would make a big stake out of it. Deponent did not remember the amount mentioned, other than it was a large sum; and if he did not get as much out of one party as he wanted, would go to the other; that he might get what he could out of both sides and "skip out". Said that Skiff was a man who became intimate on short acquaintance and told him all about his business from time to time, but that he paid little attention as it did not in any wise interest him. After the reading of depositions, the next witness called was a brother of deceased William Murdock. Very few questions had been asked when Mr. Johnson raised an objection to some question of relationship.

HANS MURDOCK

Mr. Lusk then asked for the will of William Murdock and offered it in evidence. He said that the will had been received and probated in this court, and he had a right to put it in evidence, and to use it for every purpose. Mr. Johnson warmed up to the subject and went after his opponent red-eyed. He said there was never a court on the face of the earth, that allowed self-serving declarations to be given in evidence, will or no will.

Court adjourned to 9:30 tomorrow, when the matter will be decided.

HOT SHOT FOR WITNESSES.

Impeachment Proceedings in the Murdock Trial.

ATTACKS ON TESTIMONY GIVEN FOR BOTH SIDES.

PERJURY ALLEGED BY COUNSEL FOR PLAINTIFF AND DEFENDANTS.

Attempt to Show That Much Bitterness Existed Between Samuel Murdock and Mary H. Murdock.

Special Dispatch to the "Chronicle."

WILLOWS, April 25.—Impeachment proceedings have characterized the hearing of the big Murdock note suit to-day. Attorneys on both sides have repeatedly declared that the conflicting statements of witnesses would lead to sensational developments, and the eager crowd in attendance has seen the prediction fulfilled. Grove Johnson fired hot shot into the defendant's first witness to-day and Attorney Lusk returned the compliment by bringing four men in an effort to prove that one of the plaintiff's strongest witnesses had sworn to a lie.

The positive but tedious testimony of the experts ended yesterday, and W. H. Burnight was called by the defense this morning. Burnight is now a resident of Winthrop, Wash., but he lived in this county for many years and handled sheep for Sam and Gawn Murdock about the time it is claimed the note was given. Burnight said that Sam Murdock came to his house in July, 1877, after leaving Gawn's home, and told his grievance. The Court sustained an objection to the witness repeating Sam's statement.

Lusk wished to get his offer of proof on the record and the jury was excluded from the courtroom. The defense then offered to prove that Sam left his son Gawn's house because he had had trouble with his daughter-in-law, Mary Helen, who threw his trunk through the window, and that Sam had left weeping and broken-hearted and declaring he should never speak to the plaintiff again. The defense wanted to show the improbability of Sam's summoning the plaintiff to draw up the note, as she claims he did. The defense also offered to prove that Sam and T. J. Kirkpatrick, the old Justice of the Peace who testified that Sam made an affidavit of the note before him, were enemies; that Sam claimed Kirkpatrick had cheated him out of land and that Sam never spoke of him without a curse.

Grove Johnson wanted the reporters excluded so Lusk's statements should not reach the jury through the newspapers, but the newspaper men were allowed to remain. On cross-examination Johnson asked Burnight if he knew James Skillman. The witness replied in the negative, but recognized Skillman when he stood up in the courtroom. The attorney asked the witness if he told Skillman on the train yesterday in the presence of John Clark that he had been kept in Chico twenty days, that he was only allowed to "show up" at night, that Lusk said he would not lose his testimony for $500, that Lusk would not have him tell what he knew for the plaintiff's side for $500, that he had been paid $100 and was to receive $100 more for testifying that he was in the case for money and would be on the side which paid him most.

[illegible] that he [illegible] another [illegible]

At [illegible] Lake [illegible] W [illegible]

The defense [illegible] H. A. Skiff [illegible] the plaintiff's [illegible]

[illegible]

Lusk [illegible] after [illegible] the three depositions [illegible] in the State of Washington [illegible] S. Q. Grufford [illegible] Witness H. A. Skiff told him in Washington State in 18[illegible] that [illegible] had summoned him [illegible] he was to receive [illegible] Skiff declared that he would return to California for a smaller sum.

By deposition Peter Bryan [illegible] that Skiff told him he [illegible] that it was a dangerous [illegible] that he would [illegible] $10,000 which [illegible] had [illegible] the plaintiff.

The deposition of H. J. Rizor was that Skiff told him that if he [illegible] not get what he [illegible] from one [illegible] he would try the other, or he [illegible] take money from both sides and skip out.

DAILY PROMOT[illegible]

[illegible]

WILLOWS, CALIFORNIA, TUESDAY, APRIL 25, 1899.

KYTKA GIVES DETAILS

The Expert Goes Into The Minutae of The Pen Strokes Which Attach William Murdock's Name To The Note.

Expert George C. Hickok Called To The Stand.

The cold, weather materially affected the attendance at the Murdock trial this morning. When Judge Pirkey took the bench hardly a dozen spectators were in the courtroom.

Expert Kytka continued on the witness stand. He began by stating that the line under the "m" of the "Wm" on the deed of 1890 did not begin with a sweeping downward curve, while in all other acknowledged signatures, and the note, it does. This feature was inspected under the microscope, as were a [illegible] of 1892.

Mr. Johnson objected to expert Ames being allowed to inspect the exhibits as being a needless consumption of time.

Witness stated the line under the abbreviation on the note begins with a heavy pressure of the pen, which on the deed the beginning of the line is very fine. Another trip to the microscope followed.

In reply to General Barnes, witness stated that there is no part of the note signature which does not show a ragged edge, hesitation and stops. He said there was no free hand writing in the signature.

General Barnes handed witness a check for identification. Witness said that it bore a fictitious signature made by himself by tracing from another signature over glass. Mr. Johnson objected to its being introduced in evidence, citing cases bearing on the point and addressing the Court at length on the proposition. General Barnes soared into the ethereal in a lengthy reply, and cited other cases. The Court sustained the objection and the tracing was not admitted in evidence.

Expert Kytka had brought into Court an apparatus consisting of a frame, glass, cords, etc., and General Barnes offered to have him make a tracing of the "Wm" of the deed of [illegible] that any [illegible] the same and [illegible] used in the note signature. Mr. Johnson objected to the proceeding and the Court sustained the objection.

Witness stated that the line under the abbreviation on the note had been traced after the second stroke of the capital "W" was [illegible] claimed that this was evident [illegible] the heavy line of the pen [illegible] second stroke of the "W" [illegible] those of the line drawn under [illegible] viation. The glass was called [illegible] for the Court and jury.

Witness stated that the two dots under the abbreviation were each made in two pieces, each dot exhibiting two marks of the pen.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

When Court convened this afternoon Judge Pirkey requested General Barnes to move along a little faster with the expert testimony. The attorney replied that he was doing his best and if greater haste must be made someone else would have to take charge of his case.

Expert Kytka measured the first down stroke of the capital "W" on the note and the same stroke of the deed of 1890 with a pair of dividers and stated that on the photographs enlarged 150 times there was a difference of only one-sixteenth of an inch in the length of the two. Witness measured the "Wm" of the note and that of the deed diagonally and stated that the difference in length was infinitesimal. Measured across the top, witness stated the two abbreviations [illegible] the "Wm" to be exact [illegible].

Witness stated that the note signature [illegible] the [illegible] together. [illegible] thousand and [illegible] were [illegible] which [illegible] had been [illegible]. [illegible] were [illegible].

In answer to General Barnes, the witness [illegible] the "Wm" and the "Murdock" [illegible] were written by William Murdock. The "Wm" he [illegible] is a tracing of that of the [illegible].

"William Murdock [illegible] write a one [illegible] signature," said the witness.

Cross-Examination by Mr. Johnson.

Witness stated that he was 3[illegible] years of age, [illegible] California since 18[illegible]. He [illegible] as artist on the Chronicle. Witness believed himself a composite photographer.

Witness stated that a clever photographer might photograph part of a signature and paste it with part of another signature so that it would appear to an inexperienced person to be a picture of only one signature. Witness stated an expert would quickly discover the deception. Witness explained all about composite photographs, but declared that shading and patching of signatures could not be done by a photographic process.

Witness stated that he had been in a case with expert Ames before and that they had disagreed on a signature.

Witness stated that he had no [illegible] contract with defendants, but that he expected to be remunerated.

Mr. Johnson and the witness had a long colloquy over the [illegible] question which kept the spectators holding their sides with laughter.

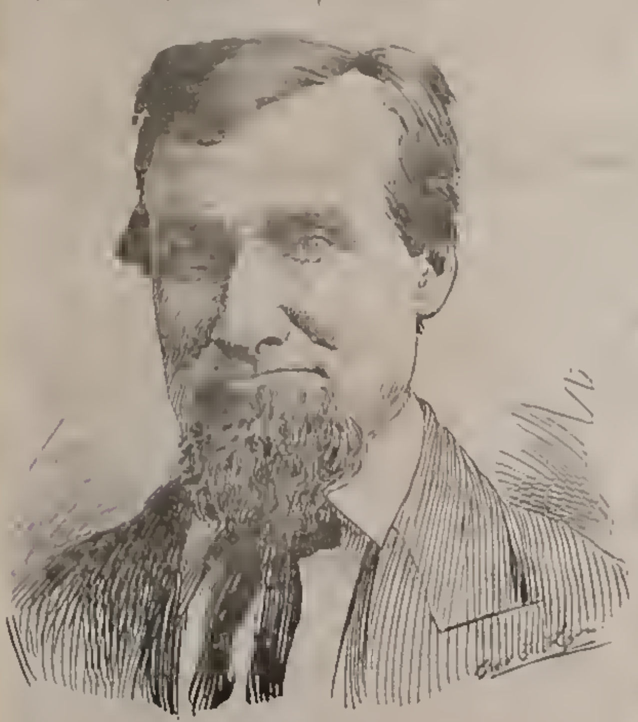
Witness said his large blackboard drawing of the "Wm" of the note was correct, and Mr. Johnson offered it in evidence.

[illegible] 70 closer photographs were handed witness by Mr. Lock.

Witness would prefer to believe that he was not [illegible] rather than to believe that the signature of the note was written before the deed of 1890.

If [illegible] men said they saw Wm Murdock sign the note he would not believe it. If Wm. Murdock himself came into the Courtroom and said he signed the note, witness would say to him, "Mr. Murdock, you are either mistaken or a liar. You have not the ability to make that signature."

Witness believed experts should not disagree on forgeries where the work is clumsy or very artificial.



WILLIAM MURDOCK,

Whom Mare Helen Murdock Claims Gave Her The $100,000 Note. The Tintype From Which This Picture Was Made Was Found Among Murdock's Things After His Death Five Years Ago And Preserved By His Sister, Mrs. Compton. It Is Said That The Picture Will Figure At The Trial. This Cut Is Furnished Through The Courtesy Of The Chronicle.

THE CARTOON AS A MORAL WEAPON.

[illegible]

[illegible] cartoon is a moral weapon. The pencil [illegible] where all words fail. It [illegible] not only to the public but to the [illegible] itself. It is the [illegible] to express [illegible] and [illegible] that even [illegible] them in [illegible].

A free press charged with the [illegible] from [illegible] all who practice [illegible] of [illegible]. The only reason [illegible] right and [illegible]. It is a violation of the [illegible] rights of the press. The Call will [illegible] the pen to cartoon [illegible] all kinds and [illegible] by [illegible] and [illegible] power or position in the State. It [illegible] the potent [illegible] of the cartoon as a moral weapon and will not lay it down [illegible] there is a battle to be fought for virtue and honesty in California.

[illegible]

The San Francisco Chronicle [illegible] The brilliant stand taken yesterday by the Chronicle against the [illegible]. The Chronicle [illegible] a meed of praise [illegible].

THE Sunday Edition CALL

SAN FRANCISCO, SUNDAY, MAY 7, 1899.

MAMMY PLEASANT: ANGEL OR ARCH FIEND IN THE HOUSE OF MYSTERY?

Auctioning Off Mammy Pleasant's Services as Cook.

get a million, half or all of which she herself would finally obtain. Her friends say it was friendship untainted by [illegible] motives that prompted her.

Until Mr. Bell's sudden and mysterious death about seven years ago Mammy's position in the Bell house [illegible] never questioned.

Fred Bell, the eldest son, first took the [illegible] between his teeth and chafed under the high hand with which "Mammy" held the household reins. The other children and Mrs. Bell sided with Mammy.

The Bells became financially embarrassed. Where was the money going? People said that "Mammy" was giving it with lavish hand to her innumerable proteges and retainers. It was even whispered that she could tell something of a hand that [illegible] Thomas Bell in his fall over the banisters which resulted in his death.

When several years later Fred Bell was found with a crushed head at the foot of the stairs in a house of one of Mrs. Pleasant's retainers, the accusing finger was again uplifted. Fred Bell himself was too much under the influence of liquor to remember how the accident happened.

After the trial last year the court ordered that the four younger children be sent to boarding school. Marie, the eldest daughter, returned to the "house of mystery" with her mother and Mammy Pleasant. What happened [illegible] known, but one day Marie packed her things and went to live with friends. Since that day she has never seen or spoken to her mother. But she remained as completely under Mammy's control as though they were under the same roof. Mammy saw her constantly and is thought to have used her influence with both Mrs. Bell and Marie to widen the breach between them.

To-day the inmates of the "house of mystery" are scattered to the four corners. Mammy Pleasant is living in one part of the city, in still another lives Marie Bell.

In a flat out near Golden Gate Park Fred Bell is keeping house with his young wife. The other children are at school. Only Mrs. Bell, with a blind old man to wait upon her, remains in the "house of mystery."

If Mrs. Pleasant has property or money she has [illegible] it under other people's names. Hers is not the greed of accumulation, it is the greed for the power of distribution and expenditure. If she has ducats hidden away they are down so deep that not even the Auctioning Off Mammy Pleasant's Services as Cook.

In 1850, when the ship arrived in port which brought Mammy Pleasant and other passengers around Cape Horn, the wealthy merchants and miners rushed to the water front to engage her services, as she was heralded as one of the great Southern cooks. So many gentlemen wanted her she thought it only fair that they should bid for her services and she would work for the highest bidder.

So the bidding began, while Mammy stood on the deck with folded arms and placidly looked on while the figures ran up into the hundreds. Finally the sum reached $500, and everybody seemed to think that was about fair pay per month for a cook, even if she was the best one that ever came out of the South.

But Mammy had her own ideas of the value of her services, just as she had on so many occasions afterward.

"There's to be no washing," she stipulated. The delighted purchaser of her services nodded.

"Not even dish washing," she added. Another nod of acquiescence.

But when the lucky bidder offered at once to escort her with becoming pomp to his bachelor's quarters and install her as goddess of the cook stove Mammy suddenly folded her arms and calmly announced that she had changed her mind. She declared all bids off and said she'd take time, think the matter over and would let them know later what she proposed doing.

THE "house of mystery" has lost its most mysterious character. "Mammy" Pleasant and Mrs. Bell have separated.

For the first time in twenty years greedy ears and prying eyes have been rewarded. Curious neighbors have at last had a peep behind the shroud of mystery that has settled like a pall over the Bell home, on the corner of Pine and Octavia streets.

Mammy Pleasant's exit was in keeping with her role of the most mysterious mystery in the house of mysteries. She did not leave in gaudy daylight, nor yet under the shadow of black night, but in the dusk, which, according to any and every yellow-back novel, is the hour of hours for weird scenic effect.

She did not announce her departure to the neighbors in the approved "blue-book" manner. Instead, they heard a voice that rang harsh on the night air despite the soft southern accent, "Let me out! Let me out! Mrs. Bell has locked me in her room! Let me out!"

Silhouetted against the topmost window of the "house of mystery" was the figure of Mammy Pleasant.

A few moments and the big doors swung open and Mammy Pleasant walked down the stairs, escorted on either side by a policeman. In the selfsame bonnet and plaid shawl which she wears in fair weather and in foul, to millionaire's palace and to pauper's hovel, with head erect and gliding step she left the house where for twenty years she has been the dictator.

The officers of the law, having performed their duty in removing her from the house, allowed Mammy to take her way unescorted.

Long before she reached the home of her friend, Mrs. Ferry, on Webster street, the lights had been put out, the shutters drawn, and the "house of mystery" had relapsed into its usual impenetrable aspect.

"Mrs. Bell and Mrs. Pleasant have quarreled," say the uninitiated.

"Mrs. Bell and Mrs. Pleasant have simply separated," say the initiated.

"Mammy Pleasant has lost her influence over Mrs. Bell," affirm the disinterested.

"Mammy Pleasant is using her influence over Mrs. Bell," assert the interested ones.

"Mammy Pleasant has played her last card," say the wise ones.

"Mammy Pleasant is playing her trump card," protest the wiser ones.

Only time can decide which is right. Perhaps Mrs. Bell and "Mammy" have really quarreled. But more likely they have seemingly separated at Mammy's instigation and for a purpose. As one of the wiser ones explained it: "You see creditors are anxiously and eagerly eying the estate with a view to the payment of their bills. Mammy Pleasant denies that she ever ordered the goods charged. Mrs. Bell declares that she never received any of them. As purchaser and receiver of the goods they are equally responsible for the debts. But they refuse to assume either of these titles, nor does Mrs. Bell accuse Mammy of being both purchaser and receiver. They disclaim any responsibility in the matter. And their denial smacks more of being genuine when they are supposed to be strangers and enemies and no longer warm allies."

So there are those who thus interpret Mammy's last move. They will not believe that her influence over Mrs. Bell has waned. They ascribe her forcible ejection as a clever guise to give the affair a realistic air and to satisfy Mammy's love for the spectacular.

On the other hand there are those who believe that Mrs. Bell has finally awakened to the fact that she has been as putty in Mammy's hands, that the evidence offered at the trial last year took root in her mind and that Mammy's dismissal is the result.

At that trial Fred Bell endeavored to prove that Mrs. Bell was incompetent to manage the estate or to have charge of the Bell children. The family skeleton was dragged into full light for the public eye.

Charges and counter charges were made. Mammy Pleasant was accused of being a black leech who had fastened herself on the Bell money sack until it was as dry as a sucked orange. Mrs. Pleasant was held up as the faithful black "mammy," who was constant to the end, whose hand went deep into her private pocket that her mistress might have luxuries. She was pictured as a black crook, a heartless wretch. She was painted whiter than the lilies of the field, as kind as the angels of mercy.

The Bell family, save Fred Bell, saw naught but shining virtues in Mammy despite evidence calculated to make them think to the contrary. The door of the "house of mystery" was barred to the oldest son of the house of Bell. The latchkey was re-entrusted to Mammy. In fact she had not even during the trial relinquished any of her rights as dictator.

Until her departure last week it was thought that Mrs. Pleasant would reign as absolute monarch until the end. Those who know her best still think her power is supreme. Even Fred Bell, who has been readmitted to his mother's presence since Mammy's departure, is doubtful as to the genuineness of the quarrel.

Mammy Pleasant's last experience, real or studied, is a fitting climax to a life that would seem impossible even between the covers of a book. She came to California in '50. There was a price on her head in the South and she wanted to get as far away from home as possible. Her connection with the "underground railway" was an established fact and planters whose slaves she had helped cross the border to the free North demanded her life as a recompense.

In the early fifties "a ship coming in through the Golden Gate" was a far rarer and more welcome sight in San Francisco than a gold nugget. So when the vessel on which Mrs. Pleasant was a passenger rounded Cape Horn put into the harbor all of tent-covered San Francisco was there to welcome it.

When the rich merchants, richer miners and good livers in town heard that there was a colored girl on the vessel and that she was "one of the greatest cooks that ever came out of the South" there was an excited and tumultuous scramble to engage her services. Tom Bell, Bill Sharon and a lot of other wealthy men held out well-filled wallets as a bonus. But shrewd Mammy Pleasant held back, so many gentlemen wanted her she thought it only fair that they should bid for her services and she would work for the highest bidder.

So the bidding began while Mammy stood on the deck with folded arms and placidly looked on while the figures ran up into the hundreds. Finally the sum reached $500 and everybody seemed to think that was about fair pay for a cook, even if she was the best one that ever came out of the South.

But Mammy had her own ideas of the value of her services, just as she had on so many occasions afterward.

"There's to be no washing," she stipulated.

The delighted purchaser of her services nodded.

"Not even dish washing," she added.

Another nod of acquiescence.

But when the lucky bidder offered at once to escort her with becoming pomp to his bachelor's quarters and install her as goddess of the cook stove Mammy suddenly folded her arms and calmly announced that she had changed her mind. She declared all bids off and said she'd take time, think the matter over and would let them know what she proposed doing.

As she was the only cook that had come to town on that vessel the crestfallen millionaires, nabobs of provision houses and land-burdened philosophers were obliged to wend their ways sadly homeward or across bits and wait for the autocrat of the cook stove to make up her mind.

Mammy took a room in town. Next day the plutocracy of the town were informed by note that the new cook had determined to open up a boarding-house so that not any one particular man could monopolize her table dishes, but all good men could enjoy them.

Twice in the years that followed Mammy Pleasant moved her house. Some of her clientele had lost their money, others had doubled and trebled their fortunes. They had become prominent in business or in the affairs of state. Whether they had married or remained single they came to Mammy Pleasant for advice. [illegible] no other woman in this state has ever had the confidence of so many of its prominent men, and no other woman has ever helped in the expanding and concealing of so many family skeletons.

People marveled at her intelligence and at the total lack of the usual characteristics of her race. Her skin was as black as ebony, but her features were not those of a negress. Many said that she was half Indian and she never denied it. There was none of the cringing, whining slave about her. She dictated to every one who came in contact with her.

In those days Mammy's chief delight was matchmaking. Thomas Bell was interested in a protege of Mrs. Pleasant's. That that protege was already provided with a husband did not discomfort Mammy. The first incumbent was given his walking papers and Mr. Bell, with

The Last Scene in the House of Mystery.

Mammy Pleasant ordered out of the house where she had controlled affairs for over twenty years. During that period so many remarkable and mysterious events occurred there that the place acquired the title of the "House of Mystery."

a marriage license, undertook his duties. Half a dozen others were likewise [illegible] by Mammy.

Then Cupid growing shy Mammy gave up her place and moved her household goods to another quarter. All sorts of [illegible] rumors [illegible] It was [illegible] that Mrs. Pleasant [illegible]

After a year or two Mrs. Pleasant went [illegible] as housekeeper in the home of Thomas Bell. She took [illegible] charge of the domestic affairs [illegible] Mr. and Mrs. Bell [illegible]

[illegible]

to [illegible]

lawyers can find them. The general belief is that she has dissipated into thin air not only all her own money, but almost all the money entrusted to her by other people.

"Mammy Pleasant has the evil eye," said a man who has known her long and well. "Every one who has ever [illegible] has met with [illegible] and misfortune. [illegible] [illegible] of mystery."

[illegible]

EVICTION OF "MAMMY" PLEASANT FROM THE "HOUSE OF MYSTERY" MAY UNCOVER SOME SECRETS.

"MAMMY" IS HOMELESS.

Mrs. Pleasant Thrown Out of the Bell Mansion.

POLICE ASSIST IN THE EVICTING PROCESS.

STRANGE POWER OVER MRS. BELL HAS BEEN BROKEN AT LAST.

Some Stirring Sensations Promised as a Result of the Quarrel Between the Two Women.

At last the strange alliance that has existed for many years between Mrs. Bell, the widow of Thomas Bell, and "Mammy" Pleasant, has been broken. The rupture may lead soon to the uncovering of some of the secrets of the "House of Mystery" at the corner of Bush and Octavia streets.

The story of Mammy Pleasant's power over Mrs. Bell and the manner in which she has held her in subjection ever since the mysterious death of the old millionaire, Thomas Bell, has been told many times. A year ago in Judge Coffey's court many reliable witnesses testified that "Mammy" not only transacted all the business of the household, but that she had to be consulted before any member of the family was allowed to stir out of doors. Mrs. Bell's visit to the courtroom was her first appearance in public for over two years, and she gave such visible evidence of being completely under the control of the old negress that Judge Coffey took steps to minimize "Mammy's" influence and to convince Mrs. Bell that she ought to act as a free agent. Notwithstanding this and the great mass of testimony that was presented at the time to prove that the Bell estate was gradually slipping away into the hands of half a dozen of "Mammy's" retainers, her hold remained apparently as great as ever at the close of the case, and she continued to remain in charge of the affairs of the family and kept a tight hold on the purse strings till a few weeks ago.

Mrs. Rebecca Boone, wife of a colored barber, and one of "Mammy's" particular proteges called at the house one afternoon at the end of last month and asked for Mrs. Pleasant. "Mammy," forgetting the time of her appointment, was not in, but when Mrs. Bell found who was at the door she sent down word for the visitor to wait a while for the housekeeper's arrival. In the meantime she dressed herself hurriedly and went down stairs confronting the astonished Mrs. Boone telling her that she had at last decided to probe "Mammy's" doings to the bottom, and warning her that she would better answer truthfully all questions put to her on that score.

It has been Mrs. Boone who, according to "Mammy," has been lending the Bell estate money at various rates for the last three years.

"How much do I owe you, Mrs. Boone?" asked Mrs. Bell. "I want to know the truth."

"Why, you have never owed me a cent," she replied.

The astonished Mrs. Bell at once told her visitor all the tales that "Mammy" had regaled her with.

"They are all lies," said Mrs. Boone, calmly, "every one of them."

Mrs. Bell is not quick in her judgments. Though it was thought that the testimony in court had had no effect on her she had been slowly revolving it in her mind for nearly a year. Mrs. Boone's confession confirmed her suspicions, and when "Mammy" returned to the house she found the woman who had always been her pliant tool enraged and up in arms against her. From that time to last Saturday scenes of recrimination were of daily recurrence. Then things got to the boiling point.

Despite "Mammy's" pleadings and threats, Mrs. Bell not only refused to listen, but ordered her out of the house of which she had for so many years been the real head. Mrs. Pleasant indignantly refused to go, and then her mistress telephoned to the North End Police Station for officers to eject her. Sergeant Anderson and Patrolman McNamara responded to the call, and "Mammy" was promptly shown to the door. She took away with her a telescope basket containing a few clothes. Mrs. Bell would not allow her to take the rest of her wardrobe, claiming that none of it really belonged to her.

"Mammy" took refuge with Mrs. Ellen Ferry, who lives in the upper flat at 2107½ Webster street. She has been there ever since, thinking out a plan by which she may triumph over her enemies. In all the years that have rounded out her remarkable career in this city "Mammy" has never before met with a defeat, though in that time courts, attorneys and police have all measured their strength with hers dozens of times.

When she was seen yesterday "Mammy" refused point blank to say a word about what she intended to do.

"Notwithstanding the way this woman has treated me lately," she said, "I will not say a word against her till she starts active operations on me. Then something will happen. I believe the poor creature is out of her head, and feel pity for her on that account. I feel for her condition as if she were my own daughter."

When it was pointed out to "Mammy" that Mrs. Bell's firm stand in defense of her rights during the past few weeks savored of anything but insanity she folded her arms, assumed a determined look and announced that she was well armed against all attacks and that her enemies could do their worst. Then she told the reporters that if she had any statement to make she would send for them. She has been telling reporters that for twenty years.

Mrs. Bell has kept close to the house since the affair of Saturday. She says her nerves are so upset from pondering on the wickedness of "the dreadful old ogress" that she wants to say as little as possible about her. She is convinced, [illegible] that [illegible] has been [illegible] and on the return [illegible] Potter Ashe from the East next week she will begin a [illegible] through [illegible] thing [illegible] the wreck.

If she [illegible] are likely [illegible] It has [illegible] for a long time that [illegible] the house has [illegible] that has not yet been [illegible] of Thomas Bell and [illegible] Fred [illegible] life. Freed from the [illegible] influence of "Mammy," Mrs. Bell and the children will now [illegible] signatures have been [illegible] heavy notes [illegible] the taking away of grand pianos, valuable [illegible] statues and rugs to satisfy the alleged [illegible] of Mrs. [illegible] of the amount of money that has been supposed to have been [illegible] by "Mammy" to attorneys in the last five years.

In September of 1897 the Chronicle made public the relationship existing between "Mammy" and Mrs. Bell. The latter declared at that time that she had been brought up by Mrs. Pleasant, that she was the orphan child of fabulously wealthy people in Louisiana and that "Mammy" was the guardian of all her estates. It was the old woman's habit from [illegible] to bring her notes for sums ranging from $1000 to $25,000 signed by Mrs. Bell, telling her that this money had been [illegible] out of the Louisiana estates. Mrs. Bell confessed that all she knew about the Louisiana property had been told her by "Mammy." She did not know where she was born nor who her relatives were. It developed afterward that most of this money had come out of Mrs. Bell's own funds, which were deposited in the Donohoe-Kelly Bank in "Mammy's" name, though Mrs. Bell all the time believed herself to be bankrupt.

The Contest Over Fair's Estate.

The application of Mrs. Nellie R. Craven-Fair for leave to intervene in the contest of the trust will of James G. Fair was before Judge Troutt yesterday. Daniel McEnerney, one of the attorneys representing the trustees appointed by this will, and Attorney Charles Heggerty, representing Charles Fair, who instituted the contest, asked for a continuance. Attorney W. W. Foote, who appeared for Mrs. Craven-Fair, opposed a postponement, but after an argument he said that he would not oppose a continuance for two weeks if Heggerty would promise that in the meantime the opposition of Charles Fair to the will would not be dismissed. The promise was given and the matter was set for hearing on May 8th. The attorneys for Mrs. Craven-Fair desire that she have permission to become a party to the contest, so that she can prevent its dismissal and thus avert the distribution of James G. Fair's estate under that will.

THE MURDOCK CASE DRAGS.

Judge Asks That All Evidence Be In Next Week.

WILLOWS, May 6.—Testimony bearing directly on the circumstances as to the plaintiff's possession of the $10,000 note was the order in the Murdock case today. Expert Kytka was recalled for the defense and a negative of a photographic copy of the back of the note was admitted and marked, as was a print from the negative. Attorney Lusk then resumed the reading of the deposition of the San Francisco real estate agent C. S. Young, where it was interrupted by yesterday's adjournment. The questions and answers read bore on the acquaintance of Mary Helen Murdock and deponent.

Deponent also stated that Senator Stewart of Nevada, Colonel A. G. Ellis of Salt Lake City and ex-Senator C. W. Cross of San Francisco had told him as attorneys that the note was not worth anything and could not be collected. An objection was sustained as to the depositions of Senator Stewart, Colonel A. G. Ellis and ex-Senator C. W. Cross. These depositions referred to matters mentioned above in connection with the deposition of C. S. Young. Judge Ficket requested the attorneys to have all the evidence in by the end of next week if possible. The court adjourned until Monday morning.

WARM CORNER FOR "MAMMY"

Insolvency Proceedings Are Taken Against Her.

CHARGE OF PERJURY IS ALSO PENDING.

A LAPSE OF MEMORY THAT MAY COST HER HER LIBERTY.

Swore in an Affidavit That She Owned Belliane Ranch After She Had Sold the Property.

"Mammy" Pleasant is getting ready for the biggest and hardest fight in her stormy career. Her creditors have been so numerous [illegible] and they have [illegible] opportunity to attack her in the open. Concealed in one of the numerous corners of the Bell mansion guarded by half a dozen butlers and safe in the confidence of the members of the family, officers of the law found themselves blocked and powerless whenever they had any legal papers to serve on her. But now that "Mammy" has been forced to take up her abode in a modest flat, her connection with the Bell family entirely disrupted and Mrs. Bell, for many years her willing and pliant assistant, breathing vengeance against her, she has become both vulnerable and accessible.

The attorneys for those who have been ridden over roughshod by "Mammy" for a long while, have not let any grass grow under their feet. Yesterday they appeared in Judge Troutt's court, and on behalf of a long list of creditors asked that she be placed in insolvency, naming three statutory grounds for such proceedings. These grounds are, first, that she has for a long while concealed herself for the purpose of evading legal service; second, that in several transactions she has shown every intent to defraud her creditors, notably in the case of the transfer of the property known as the Belliane ranch, and third, that she has willfully suffered judgment to be taken against her by default.

In addition to the $[illegible] worth of claims represented by these creditors bills against Mrs. Pleasant aggregating $21,000 are held by various tradesmen in the city. All these will be joined in the petition for insolvency. Other accounts aggregating about an equal sum are known to be outstanding.

Neither "Mammy" nor her attorney, H. M. Soto, appeared in court yesterday when the case was called. Judge Troutt immediately placed it on the calendar for the first thing this morning and instructed the attorneys for the petitioners that both parties would again be notified to be present. If they are not the case will proceed anyway.

Attorneys S. J. Lazarus, Naphtaly, Freidenrich & Ackerman, Vogelsang & Brown and O. I. Wise represent the creditors. They are determined to bring "Mammy" into court no matter what steps they have to take to do it, and claim that when she gets into the witness box she will have a hard time in clearing herself from several grave charges that will be laid against her.

The principal one of these is the accusation in the petition that the old negress, having a lapse of memory at an inopportune moment, signed an affidavit which proves her to be guilty either of perjury or fraud. This was one of the few occasions on which she ever overreached herself. The story is an interesting one.

In the beginning of last year creditors began to crowd thick around "Mammy" and were taking steps to seize the famous Belliane ranch in Sonoma county, which stood in her name, when she produced and placed on record a deed dated September 25, 1895, making the property over to Mrs. Bell for an alleged consideration of $20,000. The creditors were greatly chagrined and threw out all sorts of charges about the whole thing being a fraud to defeat their claims, but they could prove nothing.

Later on, however, it was discovered that one day in June, 1897, the Sheriff had attached Mrs. Bell's [illegible] property in the case of [illegible] against Bell, and that "Mammy" had appeared at the Sheriff's office on the following day anxious to secure a bond for the release of the attachment. She then made an affidavit, a certified copy of which is now in the hands of the attorneys for the creditors, swearing that the Belliane property belonged to her.

"Mammy" will have an interesting time in her attempt to prove her innocence. One of the attorneys in the case said yesterday that it was hard to tell what she might do to try to get out of the mess. "In all probability she will come into court and swear that she believed the paper she signed was a subscription list for the relief of the Armenians."

It is estimated that the Bell estate has lost fully $[illegible] worth of property in the last six months. A Santa Barbara ranch of [illegible] acres appraised at $[illegible], mortgaged for $[illegible] has been [illegible], and a number of [illegible] in Mexico purchased by Thomas Bell for $[illegible] have gone for a mortgage. R. Porter [illegible] holds [illegible] of the Belliane ranch, one of the most valuable farms in the state at [illegible] $150 per month, which he takes [illegible] legal services according to [illegible] at the rate of $5 a day [illegible] come summer, come rain, come [illegible] and he earns it."

DAILY PROMO[illegible]

[illegible] THE [illegible]

WILLOWS, CALIFORNIA, FRIDAY MAY [illegible], 1899.

ASHURST ATTACKED.

Depositions Of Red Bluff People Introduced To Prove His Reputation Bad. Plaintiff Contradicted.

When Court convened this morning Mr. Johnson stated that at Court Attorney's request he withdrew the objection [illegible] position of [illegible] con[illegible] [illegible]

The reading of the deposition [illegible] continued. Witness believed Ashurst's reputation for truth, honesty and integrity to be bad, had heard others express themselves in the same manner. Witness believed Ashurst had tried to defraud a widow, Mrs. Jefferson, and that he had been the defendant in a rape case.

Deposition Of L. Champlin.

In his deposition L. Champlin of Red Bluff stated that he has known Ashurst since 1870. Witness believed his reputation to be not good. Witness had heard others say that Ashurst was a pretty good single-handed liar, and that he was not honest.

Deposition Of C. E. Fish.

In his deposition C. E. Fish stated that he had known Ashurst for twenty-eight years. Witness testified that Ashurst's moral reputation was bad. Witness had never heard his reputation for honesty dealing[illegible]

Mr. Johnson objected to the reading of the deposition of C. B. Marlen on the ground that Marlen was in the courtroom yesterday and that his oral testimony should have been taken then. The objection was sustained. Mr. Lark excepted.

Deposition Of R. H. Bierce

In his deposition R. H. Bierce stated that he had known Ashurst since 186[illegible]. Witness considered his reputation for truth, honesty and integrity to be bad. Witness questioned Ashurst's honesty in the Jefferson transaction referred to by Sam[illegible]

Deposition Of W. H. Cox.

In his deposition W. H. Cox had known Ashurst for twenty-five years. Witness did not know what a majority of the people thought of Ashurst's reputation, but those he had heard speak of it thought it bad.

Deposition Of F. M. Ward.

In his deposition F. M. Ward stated that he had known Ashurst for a long time. Witness knew of a transaction in which he thought Ashurst had not acted honorably. Witness did not appear to know Ashurst's general reputation.

Deposition Of Andrew Jeffrey

In his deposition Andrew Jeffrey stated that he knew Ashurst well, and that he believed his reputation to be bad. Witness had heard it said that Ashurst robbed Mrs. Jefferson.

Expert Kirke was call to the stand. He identified the writing on two pages of a memorandum book as that of William Murdock.

[illegible] memorandum identified [illegible] that William [illegible] to hold sheep [illegible] place on the east side of the [illegible] in September [illegible], but [illegible] no intention of giving a [illegible] on the [illegible]

[illegible] objected to [illegible] the evidence on the ground that it was a [illegible] of William [illegible] shows him [illegible]. The objection was [illegible] Court.

Deposition Of M. W. Connor.

The deposition of M. W. Connor of Los Angeles was read by [illegible]. Witness resided in San Francisco from Dec 1st, 1890 to May 1st, [illegible] office in the [illegible]. During that time witness met [illegible] Megginson, [illegible], F. S. Young and [illegible].

[illegible] for the purpose of showing [illegible] ments and [illegible] made to the plaintiff Mr. [illegible] that [illegible] could [illegible] proven [illegible] till was made [illegible] to say, "[illegible]"

The [illegible] Barnes. The hearing of the contentions of counsel [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] was spent in arguing the [illegible] by Mr. Johnson [illegible]

Judge [illegible] stated [illegible]

[illegible] morning.

[illegible] Barr [illegible] in the Court's [illegible] ing Megginson [illegible] ing that Megginson [illegible] plaintiff was [illegible]

Deposition Of Chas. S. Young.

General [illegible] the [illegible] and Charles S. Young. Witness lived on the note at the Arlington Hotel on Kearney street, San Francisco, in 189[illegible]. It was shown him by [illegible] Me[illegible] in the possession of plaintiff. The [illegible] till talked of the [illegible] of [illegible] and desired Mr. [illegible] [illegible] interest [illegible] that the plaintiff [illegible] note was given [illegible] a mar[illegible] place and was [illegible] as a substitute for [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] during an [illegible] many subsequent consultations over the [illegible]

[illegible] to the [illegible]'s collection.

General [illegible] was not allowed to read witness' [illegible] steps he took to [illegible] the validity of the note.

SAYS THE LAW FAVORS M'GLADE

Attorney Reddy Making a Technical Fight for His Client.

MAY 4, 1899.

Jury Hearing Delayed by a Day of Argument and Repartee.

MAY THROW ALL CASES OUT OF COURT

A Favorable Decision on the Defendant's Objection Would Prevent Any Further Proceeding Under the Indictments.

Peter W. McGlade and [illegible] Supreme [illegible]

[illegible]

IN LIFE'S PRIME,

James Stocchini Is Laid Low By Swift Relentless Death.

A Sudden Strain On A Weakened Part Is Succeeded By An Agonized End

James Stocchini is dead. The [illegible] man whose [illegible] physique seemed a [illegible] but able to defy the [illegible] old [illegible] has gone the way of mortal man. A week ago yesterday afternoon James Stocchini, keeper of the warehouses, started to push a car loaded with lumber along the railroad track. A loose stone caused his foot to slip as the car moved from him. He recovered himself without falling, but he knew that the strain of saving himself had caused an internal rupture of some kind. Naturally uncomplaining, he did not mention the circumstances for several days. Saturday afternoon he lifted several sacks of wheat. On going home at supper time he was suddenly seized with great pain in the abdomen which lasted all night. The man's suffering was fearful. Dr. Tooley and several other men found it almost impossible to hold the patient on his bed.

On Sunday the sick man grew calmer, but as he himself said, his end was approaching.

At one o'clock Monday afternoon he waved the members of his family a farewell and died with a smile on his face.

Dr. Belton of Colusa, who had been summoned, arrived after death had ensued. With Dr. Tooley he held a post mortem examination last night. It was found that the walls of the stomach had bursted and large quantities of fluid had flowed out through the aperture. It is thought that the strain of last Monday parted the stomach walls, already weakened by disease of an ulcerous nature.

The funeral, conducted by the Odd Fellows, will take place from their Hall tomorrow afternoon at 4 o'clock.

James Stocchini was born in Switzerland in 1851, and was therefore 4[illegible] years old. He came to California at the age of 1[illegible] years, and after residing in Marin and Sonoma counties, he came to Willows 20 years ago. He was married to his wife, nee Josephine Fowler, at Sonoma in June 1875. The children of the union are Henry, Lulu, James and Tooley. Three children have died. Besides his immediate family, the deceased leaves a father and two sisters who live in Sonoma county, a mother, who is in Switzerland, and a cousin, Wm. Stocchini, who lives in Willows.

James Stocchini joined the Odd Fellows about 1885. To him his lodge was a large part of his life. His interest was always keen and his knowledge of its functions was unequalled, perhaps by any other member of the local lodge. He has filled all the official chairs, has represented Monroe Lodge at the Grand Lodge four times and was to go to San Francisco next Sunday as a grand delegate for the fifth time. The lodge will endeavor to make his funeral a befitting one who was looked upon as the leader.

James Stocchini was a man of broad mind and exact principles. By those who knew him best he is said to have possessed a character as splendid as his physique. He was [illegible], but determined. He never affiliated with any religious denomination but of his [illegible] principles there can be no doubt. He was a man trusted and faithful to the trust. In his death the community has lost a stalwart.

BALLOT TO BE QUESTIONED.

Mrs. Nettie Craven Voted at the Annuity Meeting.

MANY CONSIDER THE ELECTION INVALIDATED.

[illegible]

The Annual Report of the Secretary Gives the Financial Status of Fund and Outlines Future Conditions.

Mrs. [illegible]

[illegible]

THE DAILY PROMOTER.

SPECIALLY ISSUED BY THE TRI-WEEKLY PROMOTER DURING THE HEARING OF THE MURDOCK NOT[illegible] SUIT

Vol. 3 WILLOWS, CALIFORNIA, TUESDAY, MAY 2, 1899 No. 51

FORMER RULING MODIFIED

THE COURT ANNOUNCES THAT THE FINANCIAL CONDITION OF SAM MURDOCK MAY BE SHOWN SUBSEQUENT TO 1872.

[illegible]

Mr. L[illegible] I [illegible] to prove by W. S. [illegible] that he is a [illegible] of Records of twenty years standing and a qualified [illegible] Records for the County of Tehama residing at Red Bluff, and that he has made a list which I offer of all conveyances in the county of Tehama of real estate conveyed by any person to Gawn W. Murdock the husband of the plaintiff in this action, from the year 1863 to the year 1885, and that he has a list of all the property conveyed to Samuel Murdock, the father of Gawn W. Murdock in the County of Tehama during the years, or from the year 1863 up until the death of Samuel Murdock. And I offer to prove in connection with said list, or I offer in evidence certified copies of all lands conveyed in Tehama county, including a certified copy of the deed from C. H. Ashurst to Gawn W. Murdock and conveying certain lands in the year 1872 for an express consideration of $12,000.00. That the record of consideration in all of said deeds executed prior to the year 1883 exceeds $20,000.00. That the same are offered for the purpose of showing that the lands must have been purchased with money derived by Gawn Murdock from the business or partnership business, and business conducted by him and his father, Samuel, and for the purpose of negativing the allegation that Samuel Murdock could have had the amount of money alleged by him to have been loaned to William Murdock. And as to the deeds mentioned in the list as being conveyances to Samuel Murdock in Tehama.

I offer certified copies of all deeds named in the list for the purpose of showing the amount of money invested by Samuel Murdock in Tehama county, for the purpose of proving and showing that he could not after investing so much money in real estate, that he could not have had the money alleged to have been loaned by him to William Murdock; and also certified copies of the deeds conveying all of said lands by Samuel Murdock to his grandsons before his death.

And all of this branch. I also offer in that connection the list made by the witness DeJarnatt of all mortgages on record in the county of Colusa, mortgaging property, real or personal, to Samuel Murdock or Gawn W. Murdock and a similar list made in the county of Tehama by the witness Bransford, of all mortgages, mortgaging real or personal property in the county of Tehama to Samuel Murdock or Gawn Murdock, his son. And I also offer together with said list of certified copies, mortgages being mentioned in either of said lists, the said mortgages being offered for the purpose of showing the amount of money loaned from the year 1863 to the year 1880 by Samuel and Gawn W. Murdock, and that being offered for the purpose of showing that after loaning that money in addition to the purchasing of the land they could not out of the business they conducted and carried on, have realized or had the amount of money alleged to have been loaned by Samuel Murdock to William Murdock. And I propose to offer other evidence in addition to this line of evidence to corroborate and support the evidence offered in the offer now made for the purpose of showing that there could not have been—that it would not have been possible for Samuel Murdock to have had the money alleged to have been loaned by him to William Murdock as a consideration for this note after the investments shown to have been made in land and money shown to have been loaned on mortgages. I think if I understand your Honor's ruling, it is that you will not permit me to offer now any further—I do not know whether I understand your Honor's ruling or not. I now ask for instructions, whether this evidence will be excluded or whether you mean further than that, that you will not permit me to offer further witnesses on this question.

The Court: Yes sir, it includes that.

Mr. Lusk: You mean you will not permit me to offer further witnesses on the line on which I was examining yesterday.

The Court: Yes sir.

Mr. Lusk: The defendants except to the ruling of the Court. I desire then to make this offer: To prove by witnesses Henry Lohman, James Moore, W. P. Harrington, T. N. Howell, Peter Eibe, F. McIntyre, Coon Robinson and Wash Milsaps, W. W. Marshall, Milton French, Andrew Williams, T. J. Cummings, John C. Hamilton of Tehama county, and Hugh Logan of Glenn county, and by each of these witnesses that during the years 1860 to 1880, William Murdock was a man of large means, was a loaner of money, and kept money on hand—was a loaner of money and was not a borrower of money; and by the witnesses specifically that at different times between the year 1860 and the year 1880, the respective witnesses were at the house or place of William Murdock and borrowed—asked for and obtained loans, and in many instances, loans without any interest at all were made and kept for a number of months; that he was not during that time a borrower of money at any time, but was a loaner of money.

Mr. Johnson: To which we offer the same objection as to the other offers, and all the objections heretofore made.

The Court: Objection sustained.

Mr. Lusk: Exception.

I offer to prove by Mary Compton, a sister of William Murdock, a surviving sister of William Murdock (deceased), that she came to California in the year 1852, and lived with her brother William Murdock most of the time for the next six or seven years; that during that time William Murdock was a man of large wealth, had herds of five or six hundred cattle, worth from $100 to $150 a piece according to the times. That he had large sums of money stored and concealed around the house where they lived, and which he loaned from time to time; that she married in 1857 to Henry Compton and lived near William Murdock in Grizzly Bend, in Butte county on Angel Lake as it is called; that he was a man at that time of large wealth being worth at least $75,000 or $100,000 in the year 1860; that he had a great deal of property, cattle, sheep and money; that he was not a borrower of money but on the contrary was a loaner of money; and that she knew Sheep Sam as he was called, the father of Gawn Murdock; that he came to California in 1857, and 1858 and that he had no property when he got here, and that he told the witness he had no money and that his father and mother had helped him to get out here. That he told the witness that sickness and death of his wife in the east had taken everything that he had and that he could not have gotten to California without assistance from his father and mother. And that she knew John Murdock, an uncle of herself and William Murdock, deceased. That her uncle John lived on Angel Slough, at William's house, and lived there with a son and cousin of Mary Compton's, named William Murdock, called by the family "Little William," or "Little Billy." That they both died there near together in about the year 1868; that neither of them had any property when they died except a small band of cattle not exceeding 70 or 60 in number; the wife had one-half and John and Sheep Sam each a quarter; that the cattle were caught in the flood of 1861 and 1862 and were mostly destroyed.

And I further offer to prove by Witness Mary Compton that she was intimately acquainted with William Murdock in 1860 up until the time of his death and that he was, at all times, a man of large means and loaning money and was not a borrower of money.

I offer to prove by the witness Mary Compton that she met Samuel Murdock at the house of William Murdock in the summer of 1877, and while Samuel Murdock was living in the house of William Murdock and that Samuel Murdock told her about his leaving the residence of his son Gawn and Gawn's wife up on Stony Creek; that he told her the reason of leaving was a difficulty that he had with Mrs. Gawn Murdock. That he had said something about her at which she got mad and threw his trunk and clothes out of the window.

Mr. Johnson. Same objection.

The Court: That same point we ruled on the other day. That is the conversation. The objection is sustained.

Mr. Lusk: Exception.

Mr. Lusk: I would like to finish the offer—and the son Gawn said that he would not have anybody around that would talk that way about his wife, and he wanted him to go away and never come back, and that he, Samuel, never would go back, were it not that he thought a great deal of his two grand children, and on that account, if they ever let him go back, he should go.

Mr. Johnson: Same objection.

The Court: Objection sustained.

Mr. Lusk: Exception.

TUESDAY'S SESSION.

When Court convened this morning Judge Pirkey excluded the jury, stating that he had an announcement to make to the attorneys. The Judge said "Now, gentlemen, I want to revert to that matter we were talking about Saturday—about the evidence excluded, I would like for this record to show that there may be no misunderstanding, I am going to give one exception. I want this record to show that I exclude any testimony other than what is already in as to the financial standing of Wm. Murdock, also any evidence as to the financial standing of Sam Murdock, and also any evidence as to the declarations of Sam Murdock; and that will be my ruling now in this case. I do not know whether or not the ruling was sufficient ly clear on last Saturday, and I refer to it was not because Mr. Lusk on several occasions asked if the order excluded that and so, so I make it this morning. But I will say this, that while I am satisfied that that is the law, as far as I am able to see it, that this case is one of such exceptional importance that I can and will allow you to introduce evidence, competent evidence of course, as to the financial standing of Sam Murdock, who was, we might say, the author of this note; the dealings he had with the dead man to the extent mentioned in the evidence, to the extent, for instance, that it is alleged he loaned this man $20,000. I see no objection for you to prove, if you want to, that at the time this man is said to have loaned $20,000 he was in circumstances of abject poverty; in other words, that he did not have it to loan. Now, I will allow you to introduce evidence as to the financial standing of Sam Murdock subsequent to 1872; I don't think it necessary to go over the history of the man's life, or to start from the time he came here."

General Barnes received the testimony of Gawn Murdock and stated to the Court why he believed the defense should be allowed to go back to 1872.

Mr. Lusk excepted to the ruling of the Court restricting the years in which they might prove Sam's financial condition. He stated for the record that it would be impossible for the defense to prove Sam's condition subsequent to 1872 to the jury in a comprehensive manner, without being allowed to go back to Sam's coming to California in 1855 and trace his circumstances from that time.

Mr. Lusk offered to prove W[illegible] financial affairs by the books of the Colusa Bank where he kept an [illegible] from 1872 to the time of his death [illegible] by the books of the Bank at [illegible] where he kept an account from [illegible] the time of his death, and by the [illegible] of both banks, for the purpose of [illegible] ing that William did not [illegible] the $20,000 and the $3,000 which [illegible] est were paid to him. The offer [illegible] fused. An offer of similar [illegible] was submitted to the Court in writing [illegible] an offer to show the business ch[illegible] nature of William.

The remainder of the morning [illegible] was consumed in submitting other offers in writing. The jury had been out of the room all morning.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Mr. Lusk read the deposition of John S. Lewis of Oroville, taken April 21, 1899.

Witness has worked two summers for Gawn Murdock; worked for him during harvest of 1877.

The family and hired men ate together in the kitchen.

Witness and his mother went to Allen Springs in the fall of 1877. He saw plaintiff at the Springs; did not know that she made a trip home [illegible] days.

On cross examination witness did not remember ever having seen William at Gawn's.

Witness did not believe plaintiff could have been away from Allen Springs several days without his knowing it.

THE DAILY PROMOTER.

[illegible]

Vol. 3 WILLOWS, CALIFORNIA, WEDNESDAY, MAY 3 [illegible] No. [illegible]

MANY WITNESSES ARE HEARD TODAY.

A Large Amount of Testimony Going Chiefly to Show the Movements of Wm. Murdock at Various Times.

[illegible]

William S. Murdock On The Stand

William [illegible] Murdock of Modoc county was [illegible]. Witness was a nephew of William and a [illegible] Sam.

Witness [illegible] stayed at William's five times, [illegible] two weeks to a [illegible] time.

Witness [illegible] William did not have a [illegible]. William had [illegible] witness was [illegible] uncle's house.

Witness had [illegible] plaintiff said [illegible] William [illegible] man, that [illegible] sheep, cattle and land [illegible] ought to be worth half a million, [illegible] William [illegible], but not [illegible] she believed she [illegible] too well, and did not work [illegible], that William would probably [illegible] to [illegible] her letter.

[illegible] plaintiff believed William worth [illegible] because, as she said he owed nothing.

Cross-Examination By Mr. Johnson.

Witness did not always go around with William and did not always know where William went. No one had [illegible] witness' conversation with plaintiff. Witness had mentioned this conversation with plaintiff [illegible] after William's death. It was recalled to his mind on [illegible] of the note.

Albert Lothrop On The Stand.

Albert Lothrop, railroad conductor, of Ogden, Utah, was called. Witness worked for Gawn in the fall of 1878; stayed there until the spring of 1880. Witness ate with the family. During the [illegible] and a half witness lived at Gawn's he [illegible] saw William there; Sam lived there all that time. Witness was not allowed to state the relations between Sam and plaintiff.

The defense [illegible] to prove by witness Albert Lothrop, who worked for Gawn Murdock in 1878-1879-1880, that Mrs. Murdock constantly treated Sam Murdock badly, that she was cross and short with him and always acted as though he was a burden and in the way, and that she wanted to get rid of him, and the men on the ranch always talked about it and sympathized with the old man.

William Warren On The Stand.

William Warren of the Sacramento railroad shops was called. Witness began work for Gawn in the fall of 1888; worked there for four years. The family and hired men ate together. Witness never saw William at Gawn's.

Cross-Examination By Mr. Johnson.

Sometimes witness worked for weeks on another ranch of Murdock's staying there at night.

As to the witness Wm. Warren, the defendants offered to prove that while he worked for Gawn Murdock, Uncle Sam Murdock disliked Kirkpatrick very much and always referred to him as a S—— of a B—— and never talked that way about any body else. Also that Mrs. Mary Helen Murdock constantly treated Sam Murdock, her father-in-law, very [illegible] the men working around the place expressed a great deal of [illegible] and sympathy for Samuel in the way he was treated.

Gawn Murdock On The Stand.

Gawn Murdock was called by Mr. Lusk. Witness went to see William [illegible] a deed to certain land in 1872. Witness saw Henry Compton at William's. Witness [illegible] Compton [illegible] that at his witness' request William had deeded the land to plaintiff. [illegible] Compton if William [illegible] Compton that he believed William did not owe a dollar.

Henry Compton On The Stand.

Henry Compton was called. Witness stated that he had a [illegible] conversation with Gawn when the latter visited William's in 1872; that Gawn had told him William deeded the land to plaintiff at his (Gawn's) request, that he asked him if William was a good man to rent him, and that he did not suppose William owed a dollar.

James Boyd On The Stand

James Boyd was called. Witness had lived in Glenn county for forty years. Witness lived with William from 1875 to 1884, as his tenant. In refutation of F. J. Kirkpatrick's statement, witness stated that William bought no seed wheat from Kirkpatrick's ranch in 1879 or 1880. William neither owned nor drove a one-horse buggy. William never drove a four-horse wagon to the ranch with seed wheat or anything else.

Witness identified [illegible] book heretofore mentioned as containing William's writing, had seen the book in William's possession.

Sam came to William's April 1877 and stayed two months.

Witness knew William [illegible] just before Sam came to William's.

Mr. Lusk wished to prove that the characteristics of William would cause him to be remembered when once seen. Witness described William as tall and gaunt, of strong features, he wore a beard until 1878, and had few gray hairs at the time of his death.

Witness did not know of William ever going to Gawn's but [illegible] the one occasion mentioned.

William had his sheep on Butte Creek in 1877.

Witness thought he would have known if William had gone to Gawn's on election day, Sept. 5, 1877, and stayed there over night. He did not know of William's going there.

William always drove a two-horse buggy.

Witness did not know of William's bringing home $20,000 or any sum exceeding $500 in [illegible] in September, 1877.

During the time witness lived with William, he knew of no money transaction between William and Sam.

Cross-Examination by Mr. Johnson.

Witness was never away from William's for more than a day or two at a time, he could not remember being in Colusa on October 27, 1875. If that was [illegible] year [illegible] marriage, [illegible].

Witness [illegible] day 1877 [illegible] at [illegible]. Mr. Johnson [illegible] at the [illegible] was an election in [illegible] the [illegible] gift of the people, though [illegible] have [illegible] all [illegible] Butte," [illegible] real, who no longer wanted [illegible].

Defendants offered to prove by [illegible] Pond that when Samuel Murdock came to William Murdock in 1877, that he said he left Gawn Murdock's, his son's, on account of the trouble he had with Mrs. [illegible] in March [illegible], and that [illegible] pitched his trunk and things out of the window, and that [illegible] Murdock told his father Samuel to leave and never come back.

Among the offers [illegible] yesterday the defendants offered to prove a great many details [illegible] and facts showing that Wm. Murdock had a great deal of money from [illegible] to 1880, which he kept concealed [illegible], and loaned liberally and was a lender and not a borrower of money during those years, and that [illegible] in 1862 and had books [illegible] showing his financial condition from [illegible]. This was [illegible] for the [illegible] could not [illegible] Mr. Murdock [illegible] Willows [illegible]. They would to prove these [illegible] Robinson, [illegible], T. J. [illegible], John [illegible] Hamilton, H. W. C. Nelson, [illegible], James T. Mitchell, [illegible] Wilson, W. W. Marshall, [illegible] Millsaps, Hugh Logan, James Boyd, Milton French and others. The testimony was excluded by the court and the defendants excepted.

The defendants attempted to prove by James Boyd, [illegible] W. P. Harrington and others, William Murdock's business habits to show that he was prudent and economical, a first class shrewd business man, and had no bad or extravagant habits. The defendants offered this to prove that he would not have gone into this transaction which they claim to have been a very unbusinesslike one, nor [illegible] the money he borrowed under the ice on Mt. Shasta, as Mr. Johnson said he might have done. This offer was excluded by the Court and defendants excepted to the ruling of the Court.

WEDNESDAY'S SESSION.

J. [illegible] was called. Witness [illegible] searched records of Sacramento, was Assessor [illegible] Sacramento county from 1873 to 1894. Witness was shown copy of a deed of property from Mary B. Edwards [illegible].

Dr. M. W. Hicks. Witness had searched the records and found Hicks to possess no other property in September, 1877. Its outside value was placed at $3,000. The deed was placed in evidence.

W[illegible] On The Stand

[illegible]

H[illegible] Allen On The Stand

[illegible] Sacramento [illegible] Sept. 22 [illegible] Sept. 23, 1877.

W. P. Harrington On The Stand.

W. P. Harrington was recalled. Witness was William Murdock's [illegible] till his death. [illegible] between William and Sam [illegible].

Mr. Lusk [illegible] William [illegible] the time [illegible]. Plaintiff [illegible] talked to the witness about her claim.

James Moore On The Stand

James Moore [illegible] was called. Witness [illegible] merchant. He knew William intimately from 1854, and [illegible] bought and sold for William. Witness [illegible] of any business [illegible] between William and Sam.

A letter written to witness [illegible].

Witness was not allowed to state [illegible] to him in San Francisco just before his [illegible] and [illegible] William [illegible]. The [illegible] evidence.

Joseph H[illegible]man On The Stand

Joseph H[illegible]man [illegible] was called. Witness is one of Pinkerton's detectives. Witness went to Toledo, Ohio, and had a [illegible] conversation with Wm. H. Meggison [illegible] April 14, 1894. Mr. Lusk asked if Meggison had stated to the witness that he was the owner of the note. The question was objected to by Mr. Johnson and argued until the noon hour. The objection was sustained.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

P. H. [illegible] a record book and showed [illegible] several quantities of grain were received at the warehouse.

Henry Compton was recalled and stated that William [illegible] attend the State Fair [illegible] that William made a trip to Surprise Valley in 1877, with [illegible] Compton and returned [illegible] September [illegible].

[illegible] a record [illegible] that kept [illegible] and his sister. The book was [illegible] evidence.

Mr. Johnson [illegible] the witness for half an hour to test his memory.

John Hammerson on the Stand

John Hammerson [illegible]

[illegible] Jack P[illegible] [illegible] from [illegible]. [illegible] was taken [illegible] Surprise Valley [illegible] the State Fair.

Mr. J[illegible] the [illegible].

Jack Powers On The Stand

Jack Powers was called. [illegible] the State Fair that fall.

Michael Klein On The Stand

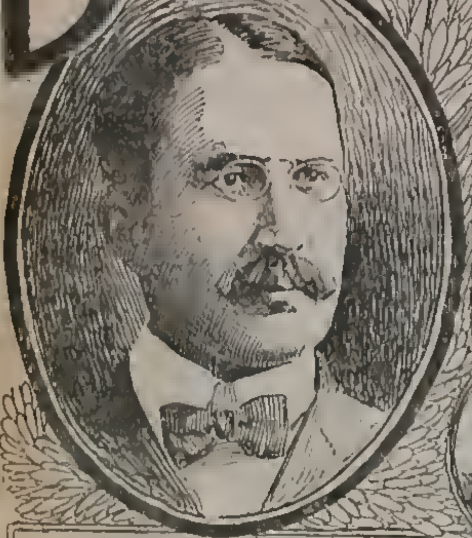
Michael Klein was called. [illegible] September 1880. [illegible] was at home all the time.

O. W. Stonebeggar On The Stand

[illegible] was called. [illegible] worked for William [illegible] 1880, had [illegible] William went [illegible]. He spent only one night away from the ranch.

Court adjourned at [illegible] of the [illegible] of James [illegible].

BIGGEST GANG OF COUNTERFEITERS IN THE COUNTRY CAUGHT.



JOHN ELBERT WILKIE CHIEF OF UNITED STATES SECRET SERVICE.

OUTFIT FOR THE COUNTERFEITING OF COIN CURRENCY.

WHERE THE PLANT WAS LOCATED

W. L. KENDIG

Secret Service Officers Making the Search for Evidence Against the Counterfeiters

THE boldest, most skillful and most extensive counterfeiters this country has ever known were landed safely in jail three weeks ago in Lancaster, Pa. They had been conducting their operations for [illegible] during which time they had defrauded the [illegible] nearly half a million dollars and were rapidly getting improved machinery in shape to defraud it out of millions annually. So difficult of detection was the product of their skill that it necessitated the recall by the Secretary of the Treasury of an issue of $26,000,000.

For more than a year the shrewdest detectives of the Secret Service Department have been at work on the case, no less than 150 men, women and children having been employed on it at one time or another. Months ago sufficient evidence was secured to warrant the arrest of some of the guilty parties. But the United States Government does not mind being slow if it is sure, and it laboriously wound its coils closer and closer about the gang until it was ready to strike. The result has been the greatest coup ever known in the annals of the secret service.

The most surprising thing in connection with this remarkable case is the attempts at bribery that are shown to have been made by the counterfeiters not only to insure their own personal safety, but to introduce their false currency even into the United States Treasury in Washington. The secret service men have discovered that even the treasury itself had been invaded by the agents of the counterfeiters. A fortune was offered a very prominent treasury official if he [illegible] take [illegible] [illegible] paper and give in return the equivalent of genuine money. He was then to give out the worthless notes as genuine and so manage that the Government itself would be circulating the bad money for the counterfeiters. Had this bold attempt at bribery been successful the Government would have lost millions of dollars and at the same time established a reputation [illegible]

Government. The worst of the case is that the plan in contemplation was to flood the country with new issues of paper before the people were fully acquainted with the genuine, and in this manner the counterfeit would put itself on a plane of equality with the real.

Attention was first called to the operations of the gang in January, 1898. George Cramer of the sub-treasury in Philadelphia then submitted to the officials of the Treasury Department in Washington five "Monroe head" silver certificates of the value of $100 each, stating that he was sure they were counterfeited, but desired the judgment of his superiors at headquarters on the question. The bills had come to him in the ordinary course of business, three having been accepted without suspicion at the Custom-house and two having been turned in by banks. The color of the seal of the suspected bills was salmon-pink instead of carmine as it should have been and the paper seemed thicker than the genuine.

Consternation reigned in the Treasury Department when the perfectness of the certificates was demonstrated. There were 26,000 of the genuine bills in circulation and how many of these marvelous imitations were out no one could surmise. The Government was in a way to lose an enormous sum which would continue to grow greater until the makers of these counterfeits should be discovered and their nefarious operations stopped. The matter fell within the scope of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Vanderlip, who has supervision of the Secret Service Bureau, and he felt that a great responsibility lay on his shoulders.

John E. Wilkie, a Chicago newspaper man, had recently been made chief of the bureau at Mr. Vanderlip's suggestion and to him fell the task of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] city editor of one of Chicago's biggest dailies he had done some remarkable detective work indeed. It was his record there that had recommended him to Mr. Vanderlip. He now set about his task with a will and the result has [illegible]

Lancaster, Pa.—William M. Kendig and William L. Jacobs. The first was a tobacco leaf warehouseman and the second was a cigar manufacturer, and they had already incurred the suspicion of the internal revenue officials.

Jacobs it seems had been selling his cigars at a rate that other cigar men declared left no margin for profit if he was conducting a legitimate business. Moreover he had bought only $25,000 worth of revenue stamps, but his business was so large that it ought to have paid twice that sum to the internal revenue. Putting these facts together, the internal revenue officers began a quiet investigation, and eventually came to the conclusion that his revenue stamps were not genuine.

They had matters all ready to swoop down on him when in the course of their investigations they were brought in contact with the secret service men. The latter were not ready for their grand coup, for they had not yet located the makers of the counterfeit stamps. Accordingly, the internal revenue officials were given the tip to lay low for a while.

[illegible] drawing [illegible] revealed the facts they felt that they had their game well [illegible]. A few [illegible] men were sent to Lancaster, and soon managed to get employment in Jacobs' factory and [illegible]

[illegible]

What Shall We Do With Cuba?

By Andrew Carnegie

What Shall We Do With Cuba?

By Andrew Carnegie.

Take Peanuts to Sober Up

THE BABY BOAT OF THE NAVY.

Charles L. Fair's Lucero May Be Wanted by Uncle Sam.

Steam Engines to Give the Craft a High Rate of Speed

IS FIT FOR TORPEDO SERVICE

She Can Be Made [illegible] for the [illegible] on This Coast

Naval [illegible] have been inspecting [illegible] yacht the Lucero and [illegible] that the craft will be [illegible] by the Government. She will be [illegible] with as powerful engines as she can carry and be taken into war service.

[illegible] would be made of the vessel has [illegible] It is a fact that the naval authorities are planning to fit up a [illegible] torpedo [illegible] for emergencies in the [illegible] and that the Lucero is regarded as one of the few available [illegible] for the service. Her speed capability is high, though her [illegible] gasoline engines are [illegible] practically useless for naval purposes.

[illegible] pleasure the Lucero is commended [illegible] beautiful lines and perfect construction [illegible] she now lies on the [illegible] waters of Oakland creek she represents in every respect the idea of her millionaire owner, but if the naval authorities take possession of her some radical and rapid changes will be made.

Fair wanted a gasoline yacht so that he would be free from Government regulation [illegible] But he did not want a yacht merely for the bay, so he built this [illegible] gasoline yacht.

In the summer of 1895 the building of the Lucero was begun by H. T. Englebrecht of Seattle on the ocean steam-yacht model. Washington fir was the material used, with finishings of the most costly woods.

The keel is of fir, cut in one piece of 10 by 15 inch stock, and on this rests a keel son of 8 by 8 inch fir. The floor timbers are of selected fir roots, having the natural crook. The planking is of two inch fir.

Adjoining the pilot-house is the captain's cabin. The fore cabin is thirteen feet long and contains four double width bunks.

The present engine-room is fourteen feet long and twelve feet wide and is bulkheaded from the rest of the yacht.

A gasoline tank with a capacity of 36,000 gallons was placed in the yacht, and the thought of explosion made her unpopular with [illegible] and experts from the very beginning.

With gasoline engines the Lucero has 360 horse-power. She has an electric dynamo for illuminating purposes. The yacht is schooner-rigged. Her foremast is 36 feet long, with a gaff of 16 feet, and the mainmast is 31 feet with a 14-foot gaff.

The length of the Lucero is 110 feet over all and 105 feet at the load water-line. Her beam measurement is 16 feet. The draught is 4 feet at the bow and 6½ feet at the stern. With powerful steam engines it is believed the yacht would attain very high speed.

No expense was spared by Mr. Fair in constructing and fitting up the craft, and the cost is said to have gone above $20,000.

The owner seemed to be dissatisfied with the result. He has used the Lucero very little, and since 1896 the yacht has been lying in Oakland creek.

George A. Knight took her out in the bay [illegible] and ran down a big tramp steamer, a collier from Australia. No damage was done to the yacht.

THE DAILY PROMO

SPECIALLY ISSUED BY THE TELA... PROMOTER ... THE ... OF THE MURDOCK NOTE SUIT

Vol. 3 WILLOWS, CALIFORNIA, THURSDAY, MAY 4, 1899.

CONTRARY TESTIMONY

Many Witnesses Give Evidence Which Conflicts With That Of Witnesses For The Plaintiff.

Jack Powers Recalled.

When court convened this morning Jack Powers was recalled by Mr. Johnson for further cross-examination. He was asked many questions as to how he fixed the dates of hauling lumber and grain for William Murdock as recited in his testimony of yesterday. Witness did not think William was away from home on Sept 13th. He knew William did not go any distance from home because he was at home at night.

Henry Compton Recalled.

Henry Compton was recalled. Witness stated that William and witness' brother Ira went to Surprise Valley in 1887 and returned about September 1st. Witness visited William at the "Adobe ranch" about September 15th. Witness fixed the dates by the diary kept by his sister. Witness testified that William attended Seaver's sale at Colusa in September 1887; that William spent the night preceding the sale and the night following it at witness' house.

Ira Compton On The Stand.

Ira Compton was called. Witness had assisted Adam Compton in collecting all William's papers and returned checks. All had been given to Mr. Lusk.

Witness accompanied William to Surprise Valley in 1887, where they remained three weeks. They saw T. J. Cummings, who was then William's partner in the stock business, at Surprise Valley.

Witness attended the last two days of the State Fair in 1890. William was not there at that time, but plaintiff was. Witness was introduced to plaintiff by Gawn Murdock at the Western Hotel. Plaintiff said nothing about William being at the Fair.

Chas. R. Mayhew On The Stand.

Chas. R. Mayhew of Red Bluff was called. Witness was treasurer of Tehama county from 1876 to 1878, and ex-officio tax collector.

Mr. Lusk offered in evidence a certified copy of the recapitulation of taxes of Tehama county in 1877. Mr. Lusk offered the copy in evidence to prove that Assessor Jackson Eby had in his possession only $300 or $400 at the time Cam Ashurst claims Eby loaned him $10,000 of the county money.

Mr. Lusk offered a certified copy of record of the Supervisors of July 2, 1877 for the purpose of showing when Jackson Eby turned over the assessment roll of Tehama county.

Mr. Lusk offered in evidence certain entries appearing in the cash book of treasurer of Tehama county for 1876 and and 1877. The assessments total $51,085. This amount was paid to witness as tax collector.

A copy of the road and hospital tax receipts for 1877 was placed in evidence. A copy of the poll assessments of 1877 was placed in evidence. A copy of the treasurer's settlement with the county was placed in evidence; also a copy of the delinquent assessment roll of 1877.

The total sum of taxes collected in 1877 and turned over to witness as treasurer was $84,168.14.

Mrs. Mary Compton On The Stand.

Mrs. Mary Compton was called. Witness is a sister of William. Witness lived at the Caden ranch in 1887; knew William and Ira Compton went to Surprise Valley, did not believe William went to the State Fair in September of that year. Witness was not allowed to state what William said to her on his death bed about the note.

Mr. Lusk read from the deposition of the plaintiff. In it plaintiff stated that she did not know how much Sam loaned William; she heard the two men say it was $100,000 when the note was made. Plaintiff said the note was given to her instead of Sam at the latter's request. She and Sam were always on good terms. Plaintiff stated Sam paid William $20,000 in $20 pieces when the note was made; that Sam got the $20,000 by selling mutton sheep and wool; he did not get it from anybody; it arose from the sale of produce. William was at plaintiff's house three times, at least, after the note was given. Plaintiff thought William suggested making the rate of interest one per cent per month.

Notes paid by William were torn up.

B. H. Burton On The Stand.

B. H. Burton was called. Witness stated that plaintiff did not present her claim in person. Gawn Murdock never talked to witness about the claim.

Mr. Lusk offered to prove what witness' conversation with Dr. Sehorn was. The offer was not allowed as the Court had ordered Dr. Sehorn's testimony stricken out.

The defense offered ten cancelled notes of William's in evidence for the purpose of showing that he preserved such papers.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Expert Kytka was recalled to the stand. He exhibited a photograph on glass which he stated was a reduction from an enlarged photograph of the note signature back to the original size. The expert placed the glass photo over the signature of the note and stated that they tallied exactly. The Court and jury viewed the transposed signatures. The object of this reduction was to prove whether the lines of the signature are distorted in the enlarged pictures.

Kytka exhibited an enlarged picture of a small chart on which were a lace, two sets of parallel lines and a protractor. The expert measured the enlarged picture to show that the parallel lines remained parallel and that other lines retained their relative positions.

Mrs. Elinor Murdock was called to the stand for the purpose of showing that a certain cancelled note for $9,000, introduced this morning was payable to "old Sam" and not to "Sheep Sam."

Mr. Johnson asked the witness if Cam Ashurst asked her on the day he first testified whether he went home on the next day after he and she visited William at the sanatarium or the second day thereafter, and that she replied on the next day. Witness denied making the statement.

L. J. Klemmer was called and stated part of Wm. Murdock's signature to a certain check in evidence was written by himself.

Mr. Lusk offered in evidence a certified copy of a mortgage recorded in Tehama county in 1876, made by W. W. Watkins to Gawn W. Murdock for $2,000; also a mortgage from Watkins to Gawn dated 1876 for $3,400; also an assignment of the two mortgages by Gawn to Sam in 1877; also a mortgage from W. W. Watkins to Sam dated 1878 for $1500; also a deed from W. W. Watkins to Sam of the land covered by the three in consideration of the sum of $9062.80; also deed from Sam to Edmund Murdock dated 1887, and another of the same date to Stanley Murdock, the two conveying all the property obtained from Watkins.

George G. Murdock On The Stand.

George G. Murdock of Upper Lake was called. Witness was a nephew of William and a son of "old Gawn" Murdock. Plaintiff and the family visited at witness' home in the fall of 1881. At that time witness had a conversation with his father and Gawn in the woods.

Witness was not allowed to state whether Gawn had said that he had got the best of his father in their settlement; that he had got nearly all the property, which was right as he had worked very hard for it.

Plaintiff and family had visited witness home again in 1887. A conversation had been held about William. Plaintiff told witness that he ought to make up with William and get part of his property when he died as he was worth about a $1,000,000; William owed nothing and that he had a large amount in the bank; that William was worth more than the Glenn estate as he owed nothing, while the Glenn estate was in debt.

Mrs. Lizzie Smith On The Stand.

Mrs. Lizzie Smith of Upper Lake was called. Witness is a sister to George Murdock. She corroborated the testimony of the previous witness about the conversation of 1887. George Murdock asked if William was not in debt and Gawn had replied as before stated.

Witness identified several letters written to her by plaintiff and they were placed in evidence.

Mr. Lusk began reading the deposition of Sam Lewis of Red Bluff as to the reputation of Cam Ashurst. An objection was argued until the Court adjourned at 4:15 p. m. in order to allow juror Carmichael to go to Chico.

FRANCISCO: FRIDAY

FORGOT THEIR OWN SIGNATURES

Ambrose and Piper Were Poor Witnesses Against McGlade.

Former Superintendent of Streets Was Shy of Official Information.

TECHNICAL OBJECTIONS SWEPT AWAY

Judge Cook Decides Against Attorney Reddy In the Latter's Plea That There Was No Statutory Forgery.

W. F. Ambrose, former Superintendent of Streets, and Harry Piper, who was Dr. Curey's Chief Deputy County Clerk, do not remember very much that is damaging to Peter W. McGlade in the forgery case now on trial before Judge Cook.

Both of these retired city officials were called as witnesses yesterday to aid Assistant District Attorney Black in fixing the responsibility for the crime by which the city was defrauded of $1,[illegible].

They swore that they could not identify their own signatures on official documents and they had forgotten, more or less, their official actions that were supposed to have a bearing on the case.

When the McGlade case was resumed in the Superior Court yesterday morning Judge Cook overruled Attorney Reddy's technical objection that the Street Department document on which the indictment is based does not constitute a forgery under the law, even though the paper be entirely fictitious. The Court ruled that if the face of the document was forged by McGlade, that would constitute a forgery within the meaning of the law, without regard to the passing of the demand.

H. J. Swords, in whose name the demand now before the court was prepared, testified that he had not signed the demand and that the signature was forged.

Ex-Superintendent W. F. Ambrose was then recalled. McGlade's written oath of office as assistant bookkeeper in the Street Department was submitted to him.

"Have you ever seen that document before?" began Mr. Black.

"I couldn't swear to it."

"Is that your signature on the document?"

"It looks like my signature, but I couldn't swear to it."

After much effort, however, Mr. Black succeeded in having the paper sufficiently identified, and Mr. Reddy agreed to have it admitted as McGlade's official oath of office.

Much questioning about the routine of the bookkeeper's work in the Street Department was done, and Mr. Reddy had an objection to every question, though the objections were usually overruled.

Mr. Ambrose disclaimed all knowledge of the forged demand upon which McGlade was indicted. He couldn't positively say very much about the routine of his office during the time that McGlade was employed, most of his knowledge being merely what others had told him.

Mr. Ambrose said that he had given McGlade and all deputies authority to use the stamp of his name.

In the afternoon Harry Piper, formerly chief deputy county clerk, testified that he was unable to identify his own signature to the verification of McGlade's oath of office.

Routine testimony was given by Thomas F. Clark, formerly a deputy superintendent of streets, and T. B. McGlade and John H. Ryan, who have been deputy clerks of the Board of Supervisors.

M. F. Berensberger, a broker, identified McGlade's signature on the forged demand and offered several examples of his signature. The hearing was then continued to Monday, when Theodore Kytka will testify, as an expert, about the forgery.

DEFENSE OPENLY ALLEGES FORGERY.

Declaration Made In Court That the Murdock Note Is the Handiwork of Some Unscrupulous ...

WILLOWS, May [illegible].—The Murdock note [illegible] ... [illegible]

KYTKA SWEARS THAT McGLADE IS A FORGER

Expert Appears for Prosecution.

TEN DOCUMENTS IN EVIDENCE

OBJECTIONS OF DEFENSE ARE WITHOUT AVAIL.

When the Cross-Examination Came However, the Witness Did Not Enjoy Himself, Nor Will He To-Day.

Theodore Kytka, the handwriting expert, has shaken the dust of Wil[illegible] from his feet after giving the ... Murdock note ... telling ... yesterday he joined the ... the occupation of trying to ... McGlade ... [illegible]

McGLADE STILL ON TRIAL.

Testimony Offered That He Was the Forger.

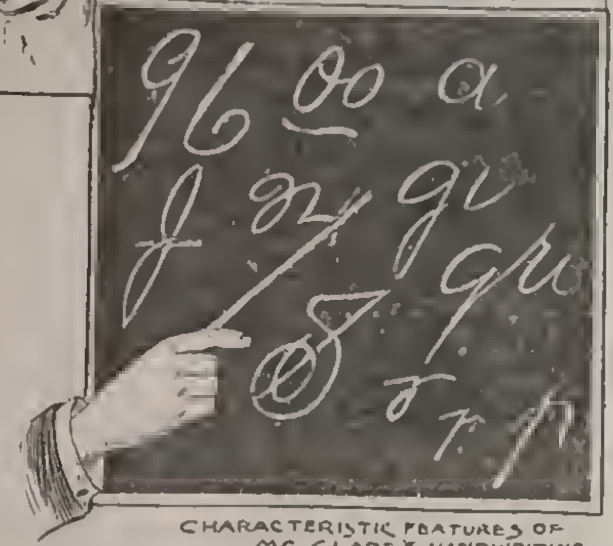
[illegible]

KYKTA APPEARS AGAINST M'GLADE

Theodore Kytka, the handwriting expert, was the principal witness this morning in the trial of Pete M[illegible] for forgery.

Kytka illustrated by means of [illegible] grams the similarity of the [illegible] of the parties to the forged demand [illegible] street work to McGlade's own [illegible]. To do this it was necessary [illegible] produce in evidence the [illegible] to which McGlade's counsel [illegible] jected. Kytka had not completed [illegible] testimony when the [illegible] came.

PETER THE PENMAN WAS CLEVER, EXPERT KYTKA SAYS, IN THE SIGNING OF NAMES



CHARACTERISTIC FEATURES OF MC GLADE'S HANDWRITING.

EXPERT THEODORE KYTKA yesterday declared that the names of Amadie Flinck and McGinnies, on the Street Department demand under which Peter W. McGlade has been indicted for forgery, were all written by the defendant. He said that the imitation of each signature was excellent, and that the work showed McGlade to be an excellent penman.

John J. Pelbrett, a deputy in the Street Superintendent's office, provided exemplars for identifying McGlade's handwriting in the official records, and then Mr. Kytka took the witness stand for the remainder of the day. Attorney Reddy for the defense kept up his technical fight on every point that presented itself. He was persistent, and Kytka was irrepressible.

The expert witness pointed out peculiar characteristics in the several signatures on the forged documents. He said that all the signatures, though seemingly very different, had been written by one person. That person was the man who had written the proved McGlade exemplars. Mr. Kytka was positive in his declaration that McGlade had done all the forging, and he stated that the work was so good as to deceive anybody but an expert who had given careful study to it.

Attorney Reddy, on cross-examination, attempted to discredit rather than break down the testimony. He began:

"Do you always testify for the prosecution in such cases as this?"

"Not always."

"Have you a contract to do this kind of work for the police?"

"I have not."

"Did you ever talk with Chief Lees about such a contract?"

"No, never. I don't like police cases. There is little money in them. Sometimes they don't pay enough for the chalk that I use."

"Do you have to buy your own chalk?"

"I have had to in this case."

PEN MARKS SCRUTINIZED BY JURORS.

Jurors manifested [illegible] interest in Expert Kytka's explanation of the peculiarities of McGlade's chirography [illegible] to decide that the disputed documents were filled out by McGlade. [illegible] the small letter [illegible] Mr. Kytka [illegible] out peculiarities in the [illegible] These he declared to be characteristic of McGlade's [illegible] illustrated by comparison with acknowledged specimens of his writing.

"How much were you to get for your work in this case?"

"I have already received $150 for my work before the Grand Jury."

"How much do you expect to get for your testimony here?"

"I think I deserve $75."

"Oh, I think you ought to have more. And I am perfectly willing that you should get it, too."

Of course the expert's fee is not to be paid by Mr. Reddy's side in the case. Mr. Reddy next asked whether the witness could be mistaken in any of his testimony, and the reply was that there could be no mistake. The defending attorney then stated about a case in which Mr. Kytka had been opposed by other distinguished experts. Mr. Kytka [illegible], in response to question [illegible] what the handwriting experts call the tremor of illiteracy in a signature, the tremor of old age and the tremor of [illegible]

"There is no tremor of delirium tremens?" inquired Mr. Reddy.

"No, sir."

"I would like to see a specimen of the tremor [illegible]."

"You will find a very fine specimen in the demand on exhibition in this case," was the reply.

The cross-examination of Expert Kytka will be resumed this morning.

SAME HAND

That Forged Vouchers Looks Like McGlade's Writing.

Expert Theodore Kytka occupied the attention of court and jury in the trial of Peter W. McGlade, the defaulting bookkeeper of the Street Department, Monday. Mr. Kytka had made comparisons of the warrant alleged to have been forged with the writing of the defendant in the books of the Street Department. He testified that he [illegible] sufficient [illegible] in the formation of the letters and the general character of the writing to warrant him in asserting that the warrant was written by McGlade. At the present rate of progress the greater part of the week will be required to put in the evidence in the case.

LAWYER LUSK GETS INFLAMED IN COURT

WILLOWS, May 8.—In the Murdock note case this morning Attorney Lusk for the defense read a question from the deposition of Helen Pratt as to his having met Mary Helen Murdock. The plaintiff's attorneys objected to the question on the ground that there was not sufficient proof of the identity of Mrs. Murdock.

Attorneys Lusk and Johnson became belligerent. Johnson said plaintiff declined to be present at the taking of new depositions of Pratt, Turner and Connor in order to assist in identification, but would agree to pay the expenses of these witnesses if they would appear and testify in court. Lusk then said that if plaintiff's counsel would admit that a photograph recently taken here of Mrs. Murdock was a faithful likeness the new depositions would be taken at once. This was declined and a remark made about these three witnesses being "under the control of the defense" caused Mr. Lusk to lose his temper. He started to make a statement to the court [illegible] but was stopped and the Judge [illegible] the jury to be taken to [illegible] chambers by the Sheriff.

Attorney Lusk then [illegible] that the defense claimed and [illegible] the note to be a forgery, forged by and with the connivance of the plaintiff and [illegible] S. Margeson [illegible] Attorney Johnson was a party to [illegible] statement as cowardly [illegible] denounced the statement as cowardly [illegible] and asked that it be stricken from the record. This was [illegible] the plaintiff.

Dawn Murdock [illegible] was called by [illegible] as to whether certain [illegible] was [illegible] to him in the years [illegible] financial property of [illegible] He answered [illegible]

Attorney Lusk [illegible] Willits the defense [illegible] the latter part of this week.

PETER M'GLADE AGAIN ARRESTED.

Peter McGlade, the defaulting deputy of the Superintendent of Streets, who had been in hiding until he could get friends to go on his bonds, was found and arrested yesterday by Detective Tom Gibson. Since his second indictment, ten days ago, McGlade has been lying in the Mansfield House on First street, near Grant avenue. Gibson reached Park [illegible], a friend of McGlade, [illegible] and then searched the rooms for McGlade. He looked over the transom of McGlade's room and discovered his man playing cards with Moses Taylor, a jockey. McGlade was surprised, but submitted cheerfully to arrest and [illegible] at the City Prison, where two charges of forgery are entered against him. Bail was set at $1,500 on each charge.

Not A Republican.

Several people were lounging around the Crawford Hotel last night talking when the conversation drifted into politics. Theodore Kytka, who was standing near, was asked if he were a Republican. "No," he replied, "I am an expert."

MURDOCK CASE NEAR ITS END.

As It Progresses Public Interest in It Seems to Increase.

Day by Day the Courtroom Is Crowded With the Curious.

[illegible]

Attorney Lusk [illegible]

[illegible] this afternoon.

OPENING FOR THE DEFENSE.

Allowed to Put In Important Evidence in Murdock Case.

JUDGE PIRKEY MAKES CHANGE IN RULING.

FINANCIAL STANDING OF SAMUEL MURDOCK IS TO BE [illegible] [illegible]

Attempt to Show That He Had No Cause to Loan William—Fitzpatrick's Statements Refuted.

WILLOWS, May [illegible] [illegible]

Mary Helen Murdock [illegible] to William Murdock [illegible]

[illegible] Judge Pirkey [illegible] from January 1, 18[illegible] to the date of the [illegible] September [illegible]

The only [illegible] by the defense [illegible] the jury [illegible] Lusk offered to prove by the books of the Colusa Bank where William kept an account from 1873 to the time of his death at [illegible] the books of the Bank of Willows [illegible] that William never [illegible] This evidence [illegible] the [illegible] of William [illegible]

By John S. [illegible] William Ware [illegible] and Albert [illegible] the defense attempted to show that William did not spend the night here on September [illegible] All these witnesses said that the family and the hired men [illegible] they would have seen William had he been there.

William S. Murdock, nephew of William [illegible] 1872 that William ought to have [illegible] told him that William did not like [illegible]

[illegible] William [illegible] James [illegible] and [illegible] Kirkpatrick [illegible] had bought [illegible] from Kirkpatrick [illegible] Willows [illegible] anything in a four-horse wagon [illegible] William [illegible] night [illegible] Dawn [illegible] William had [illegible] that William should [illegible] during all the time that [illegible] lived with William [illegible] Willows [illegible] [illegible] John [illegible] proved that [illegible] Kirkpatrick [illegible] that [illegible] year [illegible] Ed Hasper [illegible]

WILLOWS DAILY JOU[RNAL]

VOL. XXIII. WILLOWS, CALIFORNIA: TUESDAY EVENING, MAY 2, 1899.

A LIVELY DAY.

The Murdock Case Becomes Intensely Interesting.

Many Witnesses Examined Today and Some Lively Examination Gone Through With.

Court, jury and attorneys, looking much refreshed after their short vacation and showing no effects from any Dewey Day festivities, appeared promptly at 10:30 of the clock this morning—and the big battle was on again.

The jury had no sooner settled back comfortably in their seats when Judge Pirkey had them escorted out of the court room to the Sheriff and his honor then announced that after deliberation, he had decided that the case being of such exceptional importance he would permit evidence to be introduced tending to show the financial condition or financial transactions of Samuel Murdock from January 1, 1872, up to and including Sept. 5, 1877, but that no evidence as to such financial condition of William Murdock would be allowed.

Attorney Johnson made an objection and General Barnes spoke for several minutes, saying in substance, that even if the defense had not brought out certain facts in the cross-examination, yet he believed in a case like this that the defense should not be prevented from bringing out the truth; that he believed every financial transaction of these men should be gone into and that the jury should have them all before it in the interests of justice.

The reporter read the judge's order which was of some length, and at request of defense, the order was taken down in writing.

Attorney Lusk then filed a long exception to almost all there was in the order. He said that the exception was made as to that portion of the order which forbid evidence as to the financial standing of William Murdock, also to that portion excluding evidence as to the financial standing of Samuel Murdock prior to January, 1872; he said that it was impossible and impracticable to give the financial condition of Samuel Murdock within the time specified unless they could go back to the time when Samuel Murdock came to California in 1858, that they must follow the transactions, the creepings and windings of his business dealings, etc., with their history and growth, so that the jury might infer what was the standing.

Mr. Lusk then took up some typewritten pages and said he would refer to another line of testimony, when Attorney Johnson stopped him with a gesture and said that he supposed these matters were to be placed on record so that they could be given to the newspapers for publication, in order that they might "reach the jury that way." This caused a decided stir, and Attorney Bryne said he resented "such insinuations." The Judge quieted things, and then Mr. Lusk started to read the pages.

The first of these referred to offers to prove as to the bank account of William Murdock by cashiers W. P. Harrington and B. H. Burton; also as to William Murdock's financial condition by James Moore of Moore, Ferguson & Co., San Francisco; also offers to show financial condition of William Murdock by others.

There were other offers, all denied and exceptions taken.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

When court convened in the afternoon another exhibit as to the signature of William Murdock was placed in evidence.

Attorney Lusk then read a deposition of John S. Lewis of Oroville, taken at that place. This deposition referred to matters supposed to be in the knowledge of Lewis, who was employed on the ranch of Gawn Murdock at one time. Lewis in his deposition was asked a number of questions as to his being at Allen's Springs with the Murdocks in 1877. Said he did not think Mrs. Murdock left the springs, though she might have gone away for a day.

William S. Murdock was called. Testified was son of Samuel Murdock and nephew of William Murdock, both deceased. Witness' father was a cousin of Samuel Murdock, father of Gawn Murdock, husband of plaintiff. Witness had been at his uncle William Murdock's place many times between 1870 and 1880. His uncle never had a single buggy or conveyance on his place and never to his knowledge had such a one-horse vehicle.

Had talked with plaintiff, Mrs. Murdock, while at Gawn Murdock's. She had told him that Uncle Billy was a peculiar man; that he owed nothing; ought to be worth half a million dollars; that Uncle Billy did not like her, although he did like her husband; because she traveled around too much, was away from home too much and put on too much style. That she believed Uncle Billy would leave her husband a good sum of money, only he didn't like her.

Cross-examined by Mr. Johnson: Was not his Uncle Billy's keeper and didn't know every place his uncle went. Had recovered from his lameness a short time before he went over to Gawn Murdock's. Was twenty years old when he went there, in June 1881. Thought one of the boys, Stanley, was at the house then. Gawn Murdock was there. Did not remember that anyone was doing the housework then. Paid no particular attention to matters there. Had quite a long talk with Mrs. Murdock and didn't know why he particularly remembered this conversation with her any more than he would any ordinary conversation.

Answering Mr. Lusk, said he might remember a conversation if his attention was called to it. First thought of this conversation with Mrs. Murdock when the matter of this note came up.

Albert Lothrop an S. P. Conductor now living at Ogden, was called. Knew Gawn W. Murdock and wife; also father of Gawn, Samuel. Had worked for Gawn Murdock in 1878. Was ill during part of the time he lived at Gawn's. Had never seen Wm. Murdock at Gawn's.

There was no cross-examination.

William Warren was called. Is employed by S. P. Co. in Sacramento railroad shops. Knows Mr. and Mrs. Gawn W. Murdock, knew Samuel Murdock. Had worked at the place from 1888 to 1892. Never saw Wm. Murdock there and never saw him eat a meal there.

Was asked how Mrs. Murdock treated Samuel, and the objection of attorney Johnson was sustained.

On cross-examination witness said he had been away, once for seven months, that there were two ranches owned by Gawn and witness had been back and forth working for different periods.

Gawn Murdock was called by Mr. Lusk and asked as to a visit to Wm. Murdock's at one time. Whether he had told Henry Compton at that time that Uncle Billy must be a shrewd man to accumulate so much money and that he supposed he (Billy) didn't owe a cent. Also other remarks. Witness denied making any and all of the statements.

Henry Compton was called and testified that Gawn Murdock did make all these remarks at that time.

Jas. Boyd was called. Knew William and Samuel Murdock. Samuel Murdock's wife's brother married witness sister. Had lived with William Murdock and rented land of him. In 1879 and 1880 no seed wheat was brought to the place; never saw a one-horse buggy on the place. An old book was shown witness and the writing identified as that of Wm. Murdock. Knew of Uncle Billy going to Gawn Murdock's place once; it was before Samuel left Gawn's house.

Mr. Boyd was asked to describe Wm. Murdock and he did so. Witness said that Uncle Billy always told him where he was going and when he would get back, etc. Never saw Mr. or Mrs. Gawn Murdock at the house. Never knew of Uncle Billy bringing $20,000 or any large sum home with him. Witness said he had been away but a few times; was always at home nights.

The cross-examination by Mr. Johnson was what might be called a stem-winder. It was rather hard on Mr. Boyd as it was a severe test of memory. Mr. Johnson succeeded in getting Mr. Boyd to contradict himself and to testify that his memory was not wholly accurate.

It was here that General Barnes made a hit. Johnson had mentioned an election in 1878, when his friend Barnes was elected to the only office he ever held through the California people, "although he has deserved others."

"Yes, and I might have had another if you hadn't voted for Dan Burns," retorted the General, and the first big hearty laugh went through the court room—and Mr. Johnson joined in.

Court adjourned until 9:30 tomorrow morning.

ROYAL Baking Powder
Made from pure cream of tartar.
Safeguards the food against alum.
Alum baking powders are the greatest menacers to health of the present day.
ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., NEW YORK.

EXPERT KYTKA

Enterviewed Last Evening By A Promoter Reporter.

A Man Broad And Liberal In His Views And Of Wonderful Experience And Work.

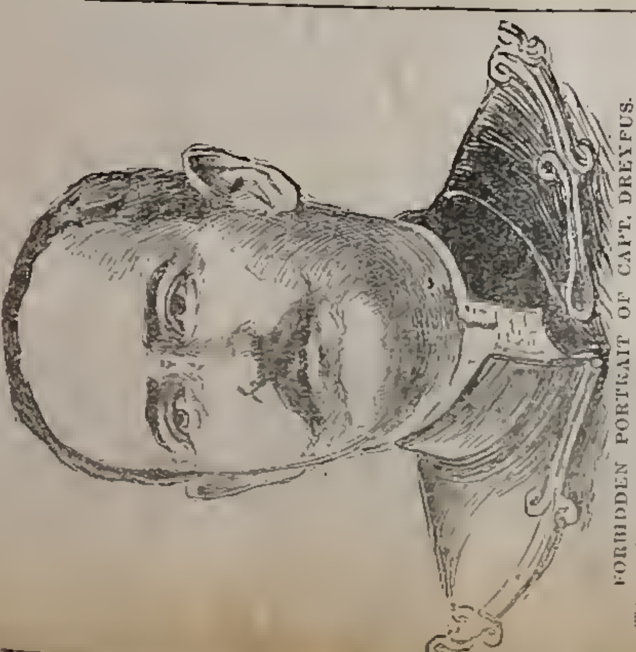
Theodore Kytka, the ... to the great note case ... last evening on the subject ... and hand writing by our rep... Kytka is a gentleman wort... respect of all and has made ... friends during his short stay ... He said in part, "I have ... ed myself while in Willows, ... impressed upon my mind ... most pleasant periods of my ... that this will not be my ... your beautiful town, for I have ... plated a hunting trip. I ... a very cordial invitation from ... brothers to visit them next ...

He was asked, what he thought ... testimony of Mr. Knock, and ... good-natured way, said, that his ... gret was that he had been ... hear and witness the fascinating ... mony of Mr. Knock, and would ... pay this gentleman if he would ... the same. As the notes of the ... stenographer failed to disclose ... derful impression made by ... called foot-rule measurements ... picturesque efforts on the bla... Had also heard that some ... Knock's friends were endeavoring ... duce him to deliver a lecture on ... tific photographic, tracing and ... handwriting. Continuing he ... no doubt, Ames, Lees, Eisen ... and Farr and his numerous other ... who had been connected with ... on such cases, would be ... amazed when they read in the ... duties" that a gentleman had ... in the great Murdock note case ... part whose youth and a greater ... his manhood had been spent ... of "dd" in attending the ... father, later mounted the ... fame and rose to Civil Engineer ... from there to a full-fledged ... handwriting.

He said he understood and ... that his able contemporary ... carried away and elated by the ... and fame which he acquired ... stand, with the aid of a yard ... tailor's tape, and would undoubt... move his residence from the ... tious little town of Willows ... great cosmopolitan metropolis ... prosperity and happiness ... who learns to labor and to wait.

DREYFUS MAY YET SECURE HIS FREEDOM.

The Court Reports Favorably on Revision of His Case—Paris Excited.



FORBIDDEN PORTRAIT OF CAPT. DREYFUS.

This portrait of Capt. Dreyfus was made by the French authorities immediately after his degradation by the military authorities. Its circulation is forbidden in France, but a copy was recently secured by Black and White of London, and through that publication it is given to the world.

PARIS, May 2.—It is understood that the report of M Ballot-Beaupre, the president of the civil division of the Court of Cassation, on the Dreyfus revision proceedings, states that the documents ... fully ... that if the ... of Dreyfus ... had been ... Picquart had acquainted Generals Boisdeffre and Gonse with his evidence of Esterhazy's guilt he was not permitted to act independently, his chiefs seeking to prevent the scandalous discovery that innocent officers had been convicted, degraded and imprisoned. Henry, aided by Du Paty de Clam, Lauth and Gribelin, was redoubling his efforts to save Esterhazy. Du Paty de Clam forging the Weyler letter and conveying to the Eclair the two famous articles in one of which was first published the "Canaille" document.

DAILY PROMOTER.

WILLOWS, CALIFORNIA, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 26, 1899. No 48

PROGRESS MADE IN THE MURDOCK CASE.

Expert Testimony Is Concluded And The Promised Sensations Follow Each Other In Rapid Succession.

[illegible] with Gawn, but with the plaintiff, and that there was no consideration for the giving of the note. Mr. Johnson's objection was sustained.

Mr. Lusk asked a number of questions concerning what Sam had told witness, stating that the questions were asked to get them on record. The questions referred to a difficulty between Sam and the plaintiff. Mr. Johnson objected to the questions being asked in the presence of the jury, as the Court had ruled that the witness should not answer, and the Court ordered the Sheriff to take the jury into another room while the questions were put.

[illegible] were asked by the defense [illegible] Kirkpatrick [illegible]

Witness had never seen Sam and Kirkpatrick talking together. [illegible] plaintiff came home [illegible] the [illegible] and her family went to Allen Springs, witness [illegible] not remember.

Cross-Examination by Mr. Johnson.

Witness had [illegible] in Montana in 1897, had worked [illegible] at Bidwell's [illegible]. [illegible] Gawn in February and March 1897, [illegible]

[illegible] Lusk would pay [illegible] Montana, that he [illegible] Mr. Johnson asked if John [illegible] was not present when the [illegible] was made.

Mr. [illegible] a bad witness [illegible] did not say to Alex Lake [illegible] day [illegible] in front of Putnam's [illegible] Walker's [illegible] had received $100 and EXPERT KYTKA AND HIS TWO "WM'S".

All The Handwriting Experts Claim That The "Wm" On The Note [illegible] That On The Deed. Expert Kytka Declares That No Person Can Write Two Signatures Which Resemble Each Other As Closely As Do These Two Abbreviations. The Experiment Is One Which Anybody May Try. Kytka [illegible] Two "Wm's" On A Courtroom Window And Declared That The Lines Of One Fit The Lines Of The Other. The Expert Said On The Stand That After An Experience In Many Celebrated Cases The Signature "Wm Murdock" To The $100,000 Note Was One Of The Clumsiest Forgeries He Had Ever Examined.

Mr. Johnson asked that the questions be submitted in writing so they would not be taken down by newspaper reporters present, published in the papers and reach the jury through that medium.

The jury was recalled, and Mr. Lusk asked witness as to the relations between Sam and plaintiffs witness T. J. Kirkpatrick. Mr. Johnson's objection was sustained.

The jury was again excluded while three questions were asked, that they might go on the record. The questions related to uncomplimentary remarks purporting to have been made by Sam to witness about T. J. Kirkpatrick, and worked for Morrison Bryan the same year.

Witness went to Chico on April [illegible] and stayed there until yesterday. Witness saw Mr. Lusk in Chico and recited his testimony to him. Witness came to Willows to testify at Abb Merrill's request.

Witness had seen James Skillman on the train yesterday. He identified Skillman when the latter stood up in Court. Mr. Johnson asked witness if he had not said to Skillman on the train yesterday that he had been in Chico for twenty days, and was only allowed to "show up" at night; that Lusk said he would not lose his testimony for $500; that if he intended telling all he could would receive $200 more for his testimony; that Lusk said he could make more here than he could by going to Montana to shear sheep. Witness denied making the statement. He said he had not received the $100; that he received $20 from Mr. Lusk last Saturday and $2 for expenses from Ab Merrill yesterday, and that he was to receive just the same as he could make at sheep-shearing.

Ab Merrill On The Stand.

Mr. Lusk called Ab Merrill. Witness stated that he was an agent for defendants. He was asked to state what Bernight was to be paid, but Mr. Johnson objection was sustained.

Witness stated that plaintiff's witness

[illegible]

Deposition Of S. Q. Crafford.

[illegible]

Witness said [illegible] plaintiff [illegible] her letter to Skiff [illegible] what he had promised [illegible] and said that she wanted [illegible] very much in Oakland or San Francisco.

The reading of the deposition consumed nearly two hours.

Deposition of Peter Bryan.

The deposition of Peter Bryan, which like that of S. Q. Crafford was taken at Chico by attorneys Lusk and Freeman, was read.

Witness lived in Washington where he knew H. A. Skiff. Skiff had told him he had received a letter from plaintiff wanting to know his price for testifying in the Murdock case. Skiff told witness the business was a little dangerous and he should demand $10,000 for his testimony. Skiff said he had quoted plaintiff that price.

Deposition Of H. J. Rizeor.

The deposition of H. J. Rizeor of Winthrop, Washington, was read. The deposition was taken at Chico in November last.

H. A. Skiff had worked for witness for several weeks. Witness had heard Skiff speak of the Murdock note. Skiff said he was expecting a letter from plaintiff. Said if he got it he was going to take a trip to California and if things went right he would make a big stake. Skiff received a letter and said it was the one he expected. Skiff said he was going to California and if he could not get all he wanted from one party he would see what he could get out of the other party; or he might get all he could from one or both parties and skip out.

Witness stated that he was to receive $1 per day and expenses while he was in California giving his testimony—the same as Bryan was to receive.

[W]OWS DAILY JOUR[NAL]

WILLOWS, CALIFORNIA: FRIDAY EVENING, APRIL 28, 1899.

MANY WITNESSES

Examined by the Defendants at Today's Session of Court.

At yesterday afternoon's session Mr. Lusk continued his offering as follows:

"That in 1861 or 1862 he received from Wm. Murdock 300 ewes upon shares; that he started with these ewes on the plains, 2 or 3 miles back of Jacinto, now the Glenn ranch, and at the time when he started there, and at the time it is said that he loaned $4000 to Wm. Murdock, he had no property whatever, except the small band of ewes on shares, and that he brought no money to California of any kind or shape, and that he received no money from property in from his father's estate, except a few cattle, being one-fourth of less than 100 head, and most of them were lost in the flood of 1861-2, that this little band of sheep he had started with were taken up to Stony Creek in the year 1863 or 1864 and placed where he lived until his death, that the sheep grew and accumulated until 1870, he had a band of four or five thousand; that all of the proceeds of the sheep, after the year 1870 went into land that is now owned by Gawn Murdock, and we propose to offer with this evidence further evidence from different witnesses, that Samuel Murdock out of the proceeds of this band of sheep, and sheep business, was entirely used the first years in loaning small sums of money to his neighbors and immediate family connections—such as Cam Ashurst and others. After that the proceeds were put into lands.

"This is also to be accompanied by evidence of other witnesses, that Wm. Murdock, during the year that he is said to have borrowed this money from Samuel, had money on hand all the time and loaned money without interest frequently to friends and neighbors, that he was a lender of money and not a borrower.

"We will show by witnesses the business habits and capabilities, and business judgment of Wm. Murdock, that he was close and penurious, and thrifty. He was not extravagant, and had no bad habits, and was careful in everything he did. He did not gamble nor keep a woman, but was careful and thrifty, and preserved all his means as he accumulated them. There will also be proof by other witnesses, that he kept his money after the year 1872 entirely in banks; and his bank account will be offered to show all money received by him from 1872."

Mr. Lusk had begun to read the deposition of Mrs. Ellen Murdock of Lake County, shortly after calling court, which was taken January 21, 1899. She is the wife of Gawn Murdock, deceased, a brother of William Murdock, deceased.

Mr. Johnson raised an objection to one of the questions embraced in the deposition, wherein Samuel Murdock had made a statement to her in 1870, at a time when she visited him, as to his financial conditions. Mr. Johnson argued at great length, and was replied to by Lusk and Bayne, the argument lasting until the hour of adjournment.

The judge gave notice that he would render his decision in the morning at 9:30.

TODAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

At the opening of court this morning, the objection made by plaintiff last evening as to reading the deposition of Mrs. Ellen Murdock, as to what Samuel Murdock told her he was worth in 1870, was sustained by Judge Pirkey, and defendants excepted.

Mr. Ames was recalled by defense and asked if he had made a study of ink. Said he had for about 30 years. He was handed the Kirkpatrick affidavit and asked if he could tell by an examination of it what kind of ink had been used in writing it, and said he could. Said he could only characterize it as colored water, rather than ink, for the reason that the water predominates so largely that a deposit was left on the edges of the lines. Mr. Ames placed the affidavit under the glass in order to show the jury the character of the lines—that is how outer edges of hair lines are made, and how the diluted ink, which he likened unto dirty water, with drift wood floating over the edges. Mr. Kirkpatrick was recalled for a moment to identify the handwriting on the affidavit. The expert was then asked to place under the glass an instrument written with undiluted ink and show both broad and hair, which he stated showed an uniform flowing of the ink over the surface of the lines, without the floating of the particles as in the case where diluted ink is employed. He was asked, if from the character of the ink employed in writing the affidavit, if he could state whether it had been written later than five years ago, and said he could not; that there was not enough coloring matter in the ink to cause oxidization. Asked if it might have been written longer than five years before, said it might.

He then placed two checks written in 1872 under the glass and explained that it showed the yellowing of the lines from oxidization consequent upon age.

Under cross-examination, Mr. Ames said he could not tell the age of the document by its appearance, but that it was not written within a month but might have been written within a year.

Expert Kytka was recalled and qualified as an expert on ink. Said he had made inks himself.

He was asked as to how different inks looked when photographed. He had photographed the affidavit under discussion, and explained that ink, which had yellowed by age, took much darker than when it is newer, as yellow is an opaque color. Stated that the photo showed the ink was diluted, which is manifested by the gray color of the lines. He explained that the black ink which is undiluted would appear in thirty years from now a perfectly solid and even line, while in the diluted ink in the instrument, there appears ragged lines, caused by the coloring matter flowing out to the edges and lodging there. There was not a single instance in the 800 exemplars, where diluted ink had been used except in the case of the affidavit.

The plaintiffs had no cross-examination to make of Mr. Kytka and he was excused.

General Barnes stated that Mr. Johnson had made a great many suggestions as to the photographs being exaggerations and divergencies. If the plaintiffs expected to offer any proof upon the theory that the photographs are not correct, then the defense would be compelled to keep Mr. Kytka here and have him reduce the photos from the enlargements to their original size in order to prove the correctness of the work, otherwise they would dismiss him.

Mr. Johnson said he would only argue that the enlargements made small things larger.

Quite a little discussion arose between counsel without any real understanding.

Mr. Lusk then proceeded with the reading of the deposition of Mrs. Ellen Murdock. When he had read the direct of it, Mr. Cannon stated that he wanted to read the cross-examination, but Mr. Lusk thought as he had introduced it, he had a right to read it, saying that the other side was trying to get a chance to read just as much as they desired, and exclude as much as they pleased. He asked them if they would read it all, but they declined to do so.

The point was that plaintiffs had no right to object to a single question brought out in the cross-examination in the deposition.

The court uniformly ruled out all answers as to what Samuel Murdock told her he was worth in the year 1870.

She was not friendly with Mary Helen Murdock because she had "forged that note." She knew it was a forgery because Gawn W. Murdock had told her that William owed no debts before that. She was down on her, and would tell anyone [illegible] would [illegible].

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The first witness [illegible] was J. B. DeJarnatt, called by defendants. He was asked what official positions [illegible] he had held, and stated that he had been

Continued on page [illegible]

County Clerk, Auditor and Recorder of the county of Colusa from 1878 to 1883.

He had made a search of these offices and failed to find the poll list of the election held in the year 1877.

Had also made a search for the assessment rolls showing the amount of property assessed to Samuel Murdock from 1860 to 1865 and failed to find them.

Mr. Lusk then offered a certified copy of the assessment rolls for the years 1865-6-7-8-9, which were ruled out by the court.

W. M. Heid was called. He had been County Assessor of Colusa County from 1870 to 1875. He was asked as to the assessment of Samuel Murdock for the years he was Assessor, but on the objection of the plaintiff the same was ruled out. All this, of course, was for the purpose of showing what property was assessed to Samuel Murdock for the years from 1872 to 1879.

Mr. Lusk stated that the offers were made for showing the improbability of Samuel Murdock having loaned the amount of money which it is alleged that he loaned to Wm. Murdock, by plaintiffs in this action.

L. V. Cushman was called by defendants. He lived in the county in the years 1875-6 and was deputy assessor for a number of years. He was asked about the amount of property assessed to G. W. Murdock during certain years, the evidence being ruled out on objection of plaintiff.

I. W. Brownell of Stony Creek, was next called and asked about the sheep owned by Samuel Murdock but was not allowed to answer the question, same having been objected to by plaintiffs.

Mr. Lusk offered to show by the witness on the stand what number of sheep Samuel Murdock owned from 1862 and several years thereafter, and that the number was never more than 2,000.

J. Griffith was called and testified that he was a member of the board of election at Orland on Sept 5, 1877; also gave the names of the other members of same board. Like the preceding three witnesses he was not cross examined.

G. D. Mecum was asked if he knew of Samuel Murdock peddling blackberries, whether witness had every borrowed any money from him; whether he had ever known of his loaning money to other people; whether he had any sheep. All were ruled out.

J. J. Winkler was called and asked a number of question about what property William Murdock owned at Angel Island and to what sort of a man he was, etc., but was not allowed to answer a single question.

Like the other witnesses, he was not cross-examined by plaintiffs.

L. Scearce was next called and questioned as to Samuel Murdock and as to what property he had in the Stony Creek country, after the time he knew him first, and whether he had borrowed any money of him.

At this juncture the court informed counsel that its patience was being sorely tried.

Mr. Lusk said that he was getting along just as rapidly as he possibly could.

Mr. Johnson argued that the questions along this line had certainly gone far enough.

The court permitted Mr. Lusk to proceed.

The next witness was Joseph Billiou. He knew Samuel Murdock from the fall of 1857, but was not allowed to answer any questions as to what property he owned at any time.

A. J. Logan had known William Murdock since 1854. Was not al-

WILLOWS DAILY JOURNAL

WILLOWS, CALIFORNIA: SATURDAY EVENING, APRIL 29, 1899.

THE NOTE CASE.

The Judge Will Allow No More Testimony Regarding Poverty or Wealth of Sam or Wm Murdock.

Mrs Eleanor Murdock testified as follows yesterday afternoon:

She is a sister of Samuel Murdock and niece of William Murdock. She and her sister and brother were willed $25,000 by William Murdock and one-quarter of the residue of the estate after paying all legacies. She like the others was asked a large number of questions regarding Samuel Murdock but was not allowed to answer.

Mr. Lusk made many offers to prove respecting what Samuel didn't have and as to what William Murdock did have; such as that Samuel had made statements at different times what he had, giving very small amounts; that William had a large amount of money and property and was loaning money at different times. She knew Cam Ashurst and heard him testify that he accompanied her to San Francisco to see William Murdock about getting some money to redeem property of hers which had been sold under mortgage by Cox & Clark of Sacramento.

Mr. Ashurst did not go there to see about getting money, and not one word was said about money. "We called to see my uncle, William Murdock, at the sanitarium as a matter of courtesy." She further testified that William Murdock, before the time that Cam Ashurst went there, had already made arrangement with the lawyers in reference to the redemption of her property. She met [illegible] in San Francisco just after the death of Samuel Murdock at the "Owl" lodging house, before the death of William Murdock; it was while he was in the sanitarium. "I heard Mary Helen Murdock say, when she was visiting me while William Murdock was at the sanitarium, that she did not see why William Murdock grudged himself to drink brandy at five dollars a bottle when he did not have a dollar in the world and had no children."

Witness said she is employed in the [illegible]

The deposition of John W. Bowers of Chico, was then read by Mr. Lusk, all answers to questions as to what Samuel Murdock ever had, or what he stated that he had or didn't have, were objected to and the objections sustained; also statements to his having nothing when he came to California.

The reading of the deposition was finished and court took an adjournment until 9:30 tomorrow morning.

The morning session of the court was brief. The Judge said:

"I wish to say this morning that after the statement of counsel and argument upon that line of testimony that was brought out yesterday, after considering the matter, I have decided to rule that there will be no more evidence permitted or attempted to be introduced as to the business relations between and the business standing of—the poverty or wealth of Samuel Murdock or William Murdock, or "Sheep Sam" as Samuel was called, whichever name it is. And that will be the rule of evidence in this case from now on. I have allowed the greatest latitude in regard to those matters and the defendants have the benefit of all rulings and exceptions of this court, and it is now the order of this court that that line of testimony and evidence be excluded from this time on.

"In regard to offers to prove, the court will impose this rule strictly; that hereafter all offerings to prove can be made in writing and handed to me, which I will pass upon promptly, or else all offers to prove must be made not in the presence of the jury. They will be excluded during such offers if they are not made in writing. This can be done in that way, and when the matter comes up in depositions an exception can be taken to all of those questions without reading the question, and much less reading the answer, and if upon that proof of anything, the offer, as heretofore stated, must be made in writing, which I will promptly pass upon, or it must be made not in the presence of the jury. They will be excluded.

"I hope you understand that as the matter has been gone into fully with a number of witnesses and the defendants have the benefit of course, of all rulings and exceptions, and the record seems to be complete in that line, and this rule will be enforced strictly."

Mr Lusk—The defendants desire to except to each branch and sub-division that is, to the order of the court made in reference to testimony and offers of proof this morning. The defendants desire to except to the matter as a whole and except especially to each subdivision and branch of the order.

The Court—The record shows that I have excluded all further testimony upon the business relations of William Murdock and Samuel Murdock—their business relations and dealings and standings, and especially those of "Sheep Sam" as he is commonly called.

Mr. Lusk—I take an exception to that, and also an exception to any other order made in the general order this morning in reference to the deposition and offers, and to all the order as a whole and to the subdivisions.

The Court—The exception is allowed.

J. J. Winkler was again called to the stand and testified as to the location of Mott ranch, and as to who owned it.

He was not cross-examined.

J. H. DeJarnett was called.

Mr. Lusk, Q. Without making anything that can be considered as an offer, so that I may understand, I would say to your honor the branch of the case I want to prove by this evidence is contained in the documents in front of me, and if that is a branch that is excluded in your order of exclusion, then I would like to make an order about it, which I will make in your presence or in the presence of the jury, or in any way you see fit. The branch of the case I desire to prove by Mr. DeJarnatt is the examination of the records of Colusa County, and the statements therefrom of all lands deeded in this county, as shown by the records, to William Murdock from 1858 to 1891, and a similar statement of all lands in this county, deeded to Gawn W Murdock from 1863 until 1890, and a similar statement of the lands deeded to Sheep Sam Murdock. And then, in connection with that, the deeds themselves, either by the original or by certified copies and for the purpose of showing in connection with other evidence——

Mr. Cannon: We think that Mr Lusk is violating the rule at the beginning.

Willows Daily Journal.

SATURDAY — APRIL 29, 1899.

TIME TABLE.

[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
Leave South	[illegible]	[illegible]
Leave North	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible] Stage	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]

THE NOTE CASE.

Continued from page 1

the deeds [illegible] property [illegible] erty [illegible] Colusa [illegible] to from the year [illegible] property [illegible] conveyed to William Murdock [illegible] made a list [illegible] which [illegible] testimony, showing all property which has been [illegible] in Colusa county which appears [illegible] the records. The list of deeds—of all the deeds recorded in the records of Colusa county showing conveyances of real property to Gawn W. Murdock, the husband of the plaintiff, in said county, from the year 1853 to the year 1891, also a list of all property conveyed in the county, as shown by the records of Colusa county to have been conveyed to Samuel Murdock, the father of Sheep Sam."

"And in connection with that testimony the defendants offer the original deeds themselves, or a certified copy of every deed mentioned in the said list as being conveyance of property in Colusa county to William Murdock from 1858 to 1891. And also offer to show in connection with the said deeds, to prove by other testimony that the consideration for each of the conveyances of land made to William Murdock came from funds acquired by William Murdock as the products of his land and stock business, and none of it came from the funds furnished or loaned to him, or furnished to him in any manner by Samuel Murdock, the father of Gawn Murdock. And I offer in connection with that, the deeds which came from the Central Pacific Railroad Company, quite a number, seven or eight in all, and part from H. H. Miller, seven or eight in all. I offer to prove by the deposition of witnesses, taken in San Francisco, the dates when the land was purchased and when they were made, and in connection with their testimony, we offer to show that payments were made from moneys other than moneys received by Wm. Murdock from Samuel Murdock, and in reference to the list of deeds conveying land from different parties to Gawn W Murdock, we offer to show by a certain copy of the deeds themselves, (18 in number) property was conveyed to Gawn Murdock in the County of Colusa—real estate, and for considerations aggregating in all considerable more than $50,000.

Mr. Lusk's offer was continued at great length, and the remainder will be published in our next issue.

The jury was recalled and Adam Compton, one of the defendants and a legatee and devisee under the will of William Murdock, was called by defendants. He was asked if while he was living at the Caton place and farming it for William Murdock during the years 1879 or 1880, if there was at any time any seed wheat brought there while he was farming the place and would have known if any had. He answered that there had not and he would have known if any wheat had been brought there.

This testimony impeached T. J. Kirkpatrick, who testified for plaintiffs that in one of these years William Murdock came to his place after a load of seed wheat and he let Murdock have it.

Witness was then asked what kind of a wagon or buggy William Murdock drove 1879-80 and replied that he always drove two horses to an old two-horse buggy with the top taken off, and never used any other kind or drove less than two horses.

[illegible] testimony contradicted the testimony of plaintiff, Mary Helen Murdock, [who] testified that at the time Samuel Murdock loaned William the $70,000 he took it away in an old one-horse buggy with the top off, she assisting to carry the money out to the buggy, the money be-

[illegible] in two canvas bags.

Henry Compton, another nephew of deceased William Murdock, [illegible] He was then asked if he knew [illegible] he [illegible] William [illegible] his traveling [illegible] years [illegible] he never [illegible] on [illegible]

[illegible] Mrs. M[illegible]

Mr. L[illegible] Murdock [illegible]

The jury being out then Mr. L[illegible] Samuel [illegible] Samuel and Gawn W. [illegible] the sheep, and [illegible] the women [illegible] out of their [illegible] shares.

He went back in the [illegible] some books, at which time he had a conversation with Samuel Murdock, father of Gawn in which Samuel told him that everything he had in the way of property was to be Gawn's same day after his death.

Mr. Lusk then stated that the rulings of the court had overtaken him by surprise that he would have to ask for a little time to rearrange his case. The court granted his request.

General Barnes called attention of the court to the fact that Mr. Johnson had characterized the enlarged photographs of the note as distortions and that the defense now offered to have the photographs reduced to the original size of the note, and to do this in the presence of the court and jury in order that they might see that the enlargements were perfect in every way. Mr. Johnson objected to having the jury witness the process. That it would be taking testimony out of court. The objection as to the jury being present was sustained.

Court then adjourned to 10 a. m. Tuesday.

12

DAILY PROMOT

SPECIALLY ... THE ... WEEKLY ... MOTTO ... THE ... IN ... O THE ... DO K NOTE SUIT

WILLOWS, CALIFORNIA, FRIDAY, APRIL 28, 1893.

EXPERTS ON INK.

They Declare Kirkpatrick's Affidavit May Have Been Written In The Last Five Years. Other Developments.

At the press hour yesterday afternoon Mr. Lusk had just begun reading the deposition of Mrs. Ellen Murdock of Lake county, a sister-in-law to William.

After reciting the circumstances of her family coming to California, etc., the witness stated that Sam Murdock's mother died in 1870, in Chico and that Sam was sent for and on his way to Colusa stayed all night at the home of witness who was then living near Dayton, Butte county, October 8th, 1870; that while sitting at supper with the family, Sam stated that if everything he possessed was converted into money he would have less than $25,000.

Mr. Johnson objected to this statement being admitted, and the matter was warmly argued until adjournment time. Judge Pirkey said he would not decide the point until this morning, though he intimated that he would sustain the objection.

FRIDAY'S SESSION.

On the convening of Court this morning Judge Pirkey stated that the objection of Mr. Johnson would be sustained. Mr. Lusk excepted.

Mr. Lusk desired to suspend the reading of Mrs. Ellen Murdock's deposition for a time, and he called expert Ames to the stand. Witness was handed the Kirkpatrick affidavit purporting to have been signed by Sam.

Witness stated that he had made a study of inks for thirty years; that he could tell a diluted ink when he saw it on paper. Witness said the ink used in writing the affidavit had very little coloring matter in it. He claimed the fluid used on the paper was nearly all water; that the coloring matter in it was to be seen mostly in the furrows made by the pen nibs.

T. J. Kirkpatrick was called to the stand and identified the affidavit to a deed of 1874 as having been written by himself. Mr. Lusk stated that he wanted this paper to use in a comparison of inks. It was placed in evidence.

Several documents written in the "70 ties" were introduced for the same purpose. Expert Ames explained where in he believed the ink on the affidavit to differ from that used on the others and a comparison of the writings was made under the microscope by the Court and jury.

The witness stated that ink used on the affidavit had not enough coloring matter too yellow. He believed the writing might have been done as late as five years ago, though it might have been written prior to that time. Mr. Lusk offered to prove by the expert that it was very common to use leaves from old account books in making simulated instruments, but the Court would not allow him to do so.

On cross-examination witness said he could not say what the age of the affidavit was.

Expert Kytka was called. He stated that fluid on the affidavit was no standard ink; that it was merely colored water. Witness had photographed the paper, and the plates and lens were placed in evidence. Witness stated that the photograph showed that the ink was diluted; that normal ink would show dark in a photograph while this showed gray.

Witness placed affidavit under the glass again and called attention to the lack of coloring matter in the writing. He thought the writing might have been done in the last five years.

Mr. Lusk continued the reading of Mrs. Ellen Murdock's deposition.

In her deposition witness stated that plaintiff had visited her house in Lake county three times; that plaintiff had reported several times that William did not like her; that plaintiff wanted witness to go with her to William's house and help her "make up" with him.

Plaintiff told witness she had heard that William had declared he would never speak to her again; that she (plaintiff) had made him speak to her over a glass of lemonade at the State Fair.

Mr. Lusk offered to prove by the deposition how many cattle Sam received from his father's estate, but this part of the testimony was disallowed. The attorney was not allowed to prove that Sam had no means when he came to California in 1858.

Witness had not been on good terms with plaintiff "since the note was forged." Witness believed it a forgery because Gawn Murdock had stated to her house long after the date of the note that William owed no debts.

Plaintiff told witness that William did not like her (plaintiff) because she was too extravagant, dressed too fine and would not work.

Mr. Lusk offered to show that William brought 7,000 sheep across the plains with him, but the objection was sustained.

Witness thought William took advantage in business; believed he had gone to the point of dishonesty on one occasion with her husband.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

J. B. DeJarnett was called. Witness stated that he was County Clerk of Colusa county from 1878 to 1882; that he had searched through the papers and found that the poll list for 1877 was missing; that he had searched through the offices of the Auditor, Clerk and Assessor of Colusa county and that the tax statements for the years from 1860 to 1885 were not there.

Mr. Lusk then offered in evidence a certified copy of the assessments of Sam, the cousin of William, and Sam, the brother of William, for 1863. It was disallowed as were the assessments of Sam, cousin of William, for 1864-65-66-67, the assessment of "S. Murdock & Son" for 1867 and the assessment of Sam for 1869.

W. M. Hurd On The Stand.

W. M. Hurd was called. Witness was Assessor of Colusa county from 1870 to 1885. He himself assessed the northern part of the county in 1870; he had assessed Sam Murdock. The objection to witness stating what money Sam had was sustained by the Court. Testimony to certain Sam's statements for 1875 was not allowed.

J. B. DeJarnett was recalled. Mr. Lusk offered to prove by witness that Sam Murdock was not assessed during the years from 1872 to 1876, but was not allowed to do so. The offers to prove by certified copies what property Sam possessed in 1884 to 1885 was disallowed, as were offers to prove the property Sam and Gawn possessed in earlier years to show that it was not possible for Sam to have loaned the sums claimed to William. Offers to prove property held by Gawn in various years and particularly in the year after the dissolution of the partnership with his father were not allowed.

L. V. Cushman On The Stand.

L. V. Cushman was called. Witness was Deputy Assessor of Colusa county in 1875 and 1876, and assessed the northern part of the county. Mr. Lusk offered to prove by witness the amount of property held by Sam and Gawn in those years, but he was not allowed to do so.

I. W. Brownell On The Stand.

I. W. Brownell was called. Witness had lived on Stony creek since 1862. Witness had known Gawn since 1862. Mr. Lusk offered to prove by witness that in 1862 and for several years thereafter Sam's band of sheep numbered about 2000. The objection was sustained.

J. Griffith On The Stand.

J. Griffith was called. Witness with Marshal Bryan, Jeff Walker, C. M. Moulton and Taylor Wilson was on the election board at Orland on September 5, 1877. Up to that time the polling place had been at Olimpo.

E. B. Mecum On The Stand.

E. B. Mecum was called. Witness settled 1½ miles from Sam and Gawn's house in the spring of 1872. A question as to the sheep and cattle owned by Sam and Gawn was disallowed, as were others concerning money loaned and fruit peddling done by Sam.

J. J. Winkler On The Stand.

J. J. Winkler had lived near Butte City since 1856. First knew William in 1858. The Court refused to allow witness to answer questions concerning cattle he had purchased from William and the price paid, questions as to what William was worth in 1858 and as to William's habits.

Laban Scearce On The Stand.

Laban Scearce had lived near Orland since 1857, three miles from Sam's. Sam moved in several years later with his wife and three children. Witness was not allowed to answer questions concerning Sam's property or money he had loaned witness.

Joseph Billiou On The Stand.

Joseph Billiou had lived on the Walsh ranch since 1856. He knew Sam there. Witness was not allowed to answer whether Sam had worked for him, what wages he received, whether Sam had any money, or what sheep Sam owned at a later date. Mr. Lusk offered to prove that Sam told witness that William had given him 300 ewes on shares.

A. J. Logan On The Stand.

By A. J. Logan Mr. Lusk wished to prove William's financial condition; that William had purchased large bands of sheep, and that William loaned witness money, but was not allowed to do so.

THE DAILY PROMOTER.

[illegible] ISSUED BY THE TRI-WEEKLY PROMOTER [illegible] THE HEARING OF THE M[illegible] CASE [illegible]

Vol. 3 | WILLOWS, CALIFORNIA, SATURDAY, APRIL 20, 1895 | No. 10

LITTLE PROGRESS MADE IN THE BIG CASE; RULINGS, EXCEPTIONS AND OFFERS IN FULL.

Stenographic Reports Of The Matters Engrossing The Attention Of The Court And Counsel.

Mrs. Elinor Murdock On The Stand.

Mrs. Elinor Murdock was called. Witness was one of the three surviving children of Samuel Murdock, William's brother. Witness came with William to California in 1853, she first knew Sam at the Murdock ranch. Mr. Lusk offered to prove that Sam was digging postholes for William at $40 per month, and that in 1859 Sam told witness he had no property, that he had great difficulty in getting to California, and that if he ever made any money he was going to give his children a good education. The proof was not allowed. The attorney offered to prove that while witness lived at her father's William had large sums buried and frequently dug it up and loaned it in $1000 and $6,000 amounts.

Witness married Adam Murdock in 1863. Mr. Lusk offered to prove that Sam had only 500 sheep in that year, and that Sam's father left his children only a hundred cattle and that nearly all of them were drowned.

